The Jesuits' educational activity was entirely geared to the service of the missions among the Indian population. The missionaries, who within a few years pushed forward to the extreme south of the country and began their Guarani mission, to become so famous, along the Portuguese-Spanish border, sought to acquire the local languages, instructed the children in reading and writing, and translated prayers and catechisms. In regard to missionary methods it is significant that the Jesuits were very cautious about conferring baptism. They required a long period of preparation and carefully selected the neophytes from the number of catechumens. They were even slower in allowing the new Christians to receive communion. The first ones were not admitted to Easter Communion until 1573 and they had to prepare for it by fasting and mortification. This procedure explains why the Jesuits did not accept a single Indian into the Society or let any be ordained.

The work of the missionaries was obstructed by the colonists, above all by the mulattoes known as "Mamelukes." Before long the Jesuits in Brazil were filling a role analogous to that of Las Casas in Spanish America. To protect the Indians, they gathered them into communities called aldeas or doutrinas or into reductions. In 1609 they succeeded in doing away with Indian slavery, but the Portuguese colonists were able to render the law inoperative by introducing forced labor.

The Jesuits of Brazil were constituted a separate province of the Society in 1553. Though forty Jesuits were sunk by Huguenot pirates while at sea,[65] and twelve more were captured and killed a year later, the Brazilian province counted 142 members in 1584 and about 180 in 1622. But not all of them were Portuguese; they came from various European countries. Portugal, which then had about 1,500,000 inhabitants, could never have carried out its tasks in its gigantic colonial empire without outside help. The burden of the mother country was heavy enough besides. For example, in 1572 Pope Pius V decreed that two-thirds of all Church revenue in Portugal must be applied to the missions of Brazil and Japan.[66] In 1627 North Brazil became the autonomous Jesuit province of Maranhão. Missionary work had been very quickly carried ever deeper into the interior. The stimulus to this came from José de Anchieta (1534–97),[67] a native of the Canary Islands, who earned for himself the title of Apostle of Brazil by his tireless zeal. By 1584 the number of Indian Christians is said to have mounted to 100,000.

---

[63] Julius III's Bull of 25 February 1551 in Bull Patr I, 177f.

[64] Pastor, XIII, 293.

[65] M. G. de Costa, Inacio de Azevedo (Braga 1946); A. Rumeau de Armas, "La expedicion misionera al Brasil martirizada en aquas do Canarias (1570)," Missionalia Hispanica 4 (Madrid 1947), 329–381.

Toward the end of the sixteenth century other Orders also entered the field. Carmelites came in 1580[68] Benedictines in 1581,[69] and a bit later Augustinians and Oratorians. When the competing French broke into Latin America at the beginning of the seventeenth century and founded a colony of their own at Maranhão in North Brazil, they obtained Capuchin missionaries for their district.[70] France was preparing to enter the contest with the Iberian colonial powers.

Entry of France into the Mission Field

North America. Francis I of France (1515–47) was not inclined to stand aloof from the partition of the world. He assisted Giovanni de Verrazzano, a Venetian in French service, who sighted the Hudson in 1523, and Jacques Cartier, who in 1534 took possession of Canada for France. Francis also, either from conviction or from political considerations, looked upon discovery and conquest as a means for the conversion of the "savages." But possession of Canada remained unexploited. French failure in Brazil—in 1557 they were driven from the Bay of Rio de Janeiro which they had occupied two years before—made them recognize de facto the division of the world by Alexander VI. Later Henry IV (1589–1610) managed to secure in the Treaty of Vervins of 1598 the right to annex territory north of an east-west line which intersected the Canary Islands.

---

[66] Streit, II, 1301.

[67] A. Peixoto, Cartas Jesuiticas III; Cartas, informacoes, fragmentos historicos e sermoes do P. Joseph de Anchieta, S. J., 1554–1594 (Rio de Janeiro 1933); S. Leite, A primeira biografia inedita de Jose de Anchieta, apostolo do Brasil (1934); S. Lopez Herera, El P. J. de Anchieta (Madrid 1954); works in Streit, II, 1239, pp. 339–342.

[68] P. A. Prat, Notas historicas sobre as Missioes carmelitas no extremo norte de Brasil. Seculos XVII–XVIII (Recife 1948).

[69] D. J. Luna, Os mongos beneditinos no Brasil (Rio de Janeiro 1947); G. Muller, Os Beneditinos no Brasil (Bahia 1947).

[70] C. D'Aberville, L'arrivée de Pères Capucins en l'Inde Nouvelle, appelée Maragnon . . . (Paris 1612); cf. Streit, II, 2370; Suite de l'histoire des choses plus mémorables advenues en Maragnon . . . (Paris 1615); cf. Streit, II, 2378.

Following the isolated efforts of two Jesuits in Acadia (1611–13), four Franciscan Recollects settled in 1615 at Quebec, founded in 1608 by Samuel de Champlain.[71] In 1625 the first Jesuits arrived in Canada under Father Charles Lalemant to evangelize the Hurons and other Indian tribes. But England seized the colony in 1628 and the missionaries had to leave. Not before 1632 could a third group of Jesuits undertake a new effort under Father Paul Le Jeune.[72] Jean de Brébeuf followed with a mission among the Hurons in 1633.[73] It seemed that the spell was broken, and as early as 1637 there were twenty-nine Jesuits in Canada. The first female religious came in 1639, among them the Ursuline Marie de l'Incarnation.[74]

But terrible reverses soon occurred. The wars between the Iroquois and the Hurons exacted bloody sacrifices from the Jesuits. Jean de Brébeuf, Gabriel Lalemant, Isaac Jogues, and five others suffered martyrdom between 1642 and 1649; they were beatified in 1925 and canonized in 1930.[75] The Huron mission was wiped out and the surviving missionaries returned to Quebec.

The Near East. France was chiefly interested in gaining influence in the Near East, and to this end Louis XIII (1610–43) and his minister, Cardinal Richelieu (1585–1642), made special use of the Capuchins. Their most eager assistant was Father Joseph of Paris,[76] born François

---

[71] O. Jouve, Les Franciscains et le Canada I: L'établissement de la foi, 1615–1629 (Paris 1915).

[72] J. Bouchard, Le R. P. Paul Le Jeune S. J. et la fondation des missions des Jésuites en Nouvelle France, 1632–1642 (Rome 1958).

[73] R. Latpurelle, Etude sur les écrits de S. Jean de Brébeuf, 2 vols. (Montreal 1952f.); F. X. Talbot, Saint Among the Hurons (New York 1949).

[74] Ecrits spirituels et correspondance de Marie de l'Incarnation, ed. by A. Jamet, 3 vols. (Paris 1928–35); 4 vols. (Quebec 1929–39); H. Bremond, Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France IV (Paris 1926), 1–76; P. Renaudin, Une mystique française au XVIIe siècle: Marie de l'Incarnation, ursuline de Tours et de Quebec (Paris 1935); G. Goyau, "La première francaise missionnaire: La vocation canadienne de Mère Marie de l'Incarnation," Et (1936), 145–168; id., L'Eglise en marche V (Paris 1936), 95–125; Le témoignage de Marie de l'Incarnation, O. S. U. (Paris 1943); Marie-Emmanuel, Marie de l'Incarnation, d'après ses lettres (Ottawa 1946); Les Ursulines de Quebec, 4 vols. (Quebec 1863–66).

[75] G. Goyau—G. Rigault, Martyrs de la Nouvelle France, XVIIe et XVIIIe siècles. Extraits des relations et lettres des missionnaires Jésuites (Paris 1928); H. Fouqueray, Martyrs du Canada (Paris 1930); J. A. O'Brien, The American Martyrs (New York 1953).

[76] G. Fagniez, Le P. Joseph et Richelieu, 2 vols. (Paris 1894); L. Dedouvres, Politique et apôtre, Le P. Joseph de Paris, 2 vols. (Paris 1932); G. Goyau, L'Eglise en marche V (Paris 1936), 63–94; G. de Vaumas, "L'activité missionnaire du Père Joseph de Paris," RHM 15 (1938), 336–359; G. de Vaumas, Lettres et documents du P. Joseph de Paris concernant les missions étrangères, 1619–1638 (Lyon 1942).

Le Clerc du Tremblay, Baron de Maffliers (1577–1638), in whom was a strange blend of crusading ardor and diplomatic finesse. Within a short time he managed to have 100 of his confreres sent to the Near East under a French protectorate.

Hence France's entry into the mission field took place despite the Portuguese and Spanish rights of patronage. And from the beginning it was clear how deeply national interests were involved. Thus was the ground prepared for the French protectorate of the missions that was destined to play a fateful role in their future history.

CHAPTER 47

The Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith

Into the seventeenth century the history of the missions was determined almost exclusively by the partition of the world into Portuguese and Spanish spheres of influence and the related rights of patronage. But it became increasingly more apparent that the two powers were far more concerned for their rights than for their duties. The view was even expounded that the Pope in granting the right of patronage had renounced his own rights over the missions. His instructions and decisions were subjected to a royal placet, without which they were not valid. In mission affairs the Kings were no longer regarded as merely the Pope's vicars but as the direct representatives of God.[1]

This development and the resulting abuses in mission lands called for the taking of decisive action by Rome, especially since the reform Popes had just taken the first steps to recover leadership in missionary work. Thus in 1568 Pius V established a Congregation of Cardinals for the Conversion of Infidels, and its activity is discernible in many mission briefs of the Pope. But presumably this was intended only as a temporary institution, for the systematic revamping of the Curia by Sixtus V involved no special department for the missions. It was not until Clement VIII that a specific Congregation of the Missions was constituted, which met several times at the turn of the century and had Cardinal Sanseverino as its spiritus rector.[2]

---

[1] Cf. J. Solorzano Pereira, De Indiarum iure (Madrid 1629); also A. de Egana, "La funcion misionera del poder civil segun Juan de Solorzano Pereira (1575–1655)," StMis 6 (1950–51), 69–113.

[2] P. Tacchi Venturi, Diario concistoriale di Antonio Santori, Cardinale di Santa Severina (Rome 1904); J. Schmidlin, "Eine Vorläuferin der Propaganda unter Klemens VIII.," ZMR 11 (1921), 232–234.

The view that a congregation of this sort must form part of the permanent set up of the Curia made steady progress and found literary expression in the De procuranda salute omnium genitum of the theorist of the missions, the Carmelite Thomas of Jesus (1564–1627).[3] In Book III the institution of a Roman Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith was urged. Gregory XV took up the suggestion and before the end of the first year of his pontificate established the Sacra Congregatio de Propaganda Fide on Epiphany 1622. Thirteen cardinals,[4] two prelates, and a secretary were assigned to it. It held its first meeting on 14 January, and on 22 June the Pope signed the bull of institution, "Inscrutabili divinae providentiae arcano,"[5] which claimed for the Pope in the fullest degree the duty and right to spread the faith as the chief task of the papal role of shepherd of souls. In this way the new congregation was to prepare for the change "from the colonial mission to the purely Church mission" (Kilger). Hence the entire mission system was to be subordinated to the Roman central authority; all missionaries were to depend on it in the most direct manner possible and be sent out by it, missionary methods were to be regulated, and mission fields to be assigned by it.

To carry out this task it was important first of all to clarify the status of the missions. For this purpose the earth was divided into twelve provinces, which were allotted to the respective nuncios in Europe and to the patriarchal vicars in the Near East. The nuncios were to compile information from their districts and then to report to Propaganda. In actual fact, the first reports came in from the missionary Orders.[6] Relying on them, the first secretary of the congregation, Francesco Ingoli (1622–49), composed three important memoranda in which he exposed the shortcomings and hindrances in missionary work and indicated remedies that would eliminate them.[7] Almost everywhere missionary activity was the victim both of jurisdictional quarrels between the local bishops and the religious and of the opposition between the older Orders and the Jesuits. Similarly, nationalist rivalries among missionaries and a mania to feather their own nest during residence overseas contributed to making their work ineffectual. Hence Ingoli felt that a clear distinction of missionary areas according to membership in the Orders and nationality was the first achievement to be sought. In addition, the sees were to be increased in number and assigned as far as possible to members of the diocesan clergy. An on the spot supervision of missionary work should be realized by the dispatching of papal legates or nuncios. In order to stop the mercantile activities of the missionaries, all departing missionaries had to be checked in regard to their pure intentions, and to guarantee this Ingoli wanted branches of Propaganda to be set up in Seville and Lisbon. He regarded as particularly urgent the formation of a native clergy, which should share in the work and in the direction of the missions on an equality with the foreign missionaries. Through the realization of these proposals Ingoli hoped to free the missions from the colonial powers and from direction by European religious superiors and, as a result, to have them become autonomous.

---

[3] Antwerp 1613; Rome 1940.

[4] Among them was Cardinal Eitel Friedrich von Zollern, Bishop of Osnabrück (1623–25).

[5] Coll I, n. 3.

[6] Propaganda archives: Scritture antiche 189, fol. 13f., 20–23 (Jesuits); 33–38 (Dominicans); 206–211 (Observant Franciscans); 220f. (Augustinian Hermits). In addition, a letter of the Bishop of Malacca (ibid., fol. 228), the report of the collettore in Portugal, Anthony Albergati (1623: Congr. Part. I, fol. 315–318), and the report of the Franciscan Gregory Bolivar on Spanish American (Scritt. ant. 189, fol. 62–74).

[7] 1625: Scritt. ant. 189, fol. 279–281; 1628: ibid., 189, fol. 153–155; 1644: ibid., 192, fol. 1–5.

A cursory glance at the Collectanea S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide is sufficient to show that these guidelines had existence not only on paper. The first care was for the training of missionaries, and as early as 15 April 1622 a special committee for the Roman seminaries and national colleges was set up. The various generals of Orders were admonished to establish schools for teaching languages to future missionaries (no. 7), and Propaganda itself erected seven schools of apologetics for the education of missionaries destined for work among heretics.[8] In 1627 Urban VIII, in the Constitution "Immortalis,"[9] set up a special College of Propaganda, which was soon accepting candidates from the missions. On missionary bishops was imposed the obligation of admitting qualified youths to the priesthood.[10] As arguments Propaganda adduced the practice of the Apostles and of the early Church, the greater confidence which a native priest would enjoy among his fellow countrymen, and his familiarity with their language, customs, and inclinations. Before long Propaganda was in a position to carry out its principles. A young Christian Brahman, Matteo de Castro Mahalo, had come to Rome in 1625 because in India he had not been permitted to enter the priesthood. He took degrees in philosophy and theology, became a priest, and in 1631 returned home as protonotary apostolic and Propaganda missionary to realize the aims of Propaganda in the [8] Jus Pont. II/1, no. 2.

---

[9] Of 1 August 1627 in Jus Pont. I, no. 87. Cf. N. Kowalsky, Pontificio Collegio Urbano de Propaganda Fide (Rome 1956).

[10] Thus, according to Coll I, no. 1002, p. 543, as early as 1626 for Japan and, according to Coll I, no. 62, in 1630 for India.

Mughal Empire and educate a native clergy. In spite of the hostility of the Portuguese and of the missionaries of the patronage, he contrived to gather a few priests from among the Brahmins into a sort of Oratory.[11]

Many things which are today taken for granted in missionary efforts were first proposed at that time, even though they could not be immediately realized. Such are: the duty of submitting an annual report (no. 22); the prohibition of giving up the mission without authorization (no. 41); the determining of the conditions in which missionaries may act as physicians (no. 42); the distinction between religious superiors and mission superiors (no. 46); the granting of special faculties to missionaries (nos. 88f.); and regulations on Church music (no. 107). All this vindicates von Ranke's judgment that Propaganda "sought to fulfill its function on a grand scale . . . , perhaps most successfully at its beginning."[12]

Not unexpectedly, this activity of the Propaganda Congregation encountered lively opposition from the powers enjoying patronage. Portugal especially, which had suffered painful losses of power in its East Indian possessions because of the union with Spain, defended its patronage in order thereby to retain influence overseas at least in the spiritual domain. But in the final analysis, the Congregation of Propaganda was concerned less with power than with an entirely new concept of the missions. The patronage powers had after all proved that it was their aim to assimilate the newly gained Christians to themselves in every respect, that in fact they were transplanting European Christianity overseas. But the Propaganda represented more than ever before the contrary idea. By means of a clergy recruited from the mission countries an indigenous Christianity was to be developed and a Church in complete harmony with it was to be founded. The renunciation of Europeanism was clearly expressed some decades after the erection of the new Congregation.[13]

The Spanish patronage power also resisted the claims made by Propaganda in regard to the papacy's exclusive right over the missions. Although Juan de Solorzano Pereira's De Indiarum iure had been put on the Index in 1642, in the Spanish colonial territories it continued to be an authoritative statement of prescriptive law for the local administrations; the condemnation was not published overseas.[14] The Catholic powers stubbornly refused to accept Propaganda's claim to the exclusive right to issue orders in regard to the missions.

---

[11] T. Ghesquière, Mathieu de Castro, premier Vicaire Apostolique aux Indes (Lophem-Bruges 1937); also, J. Schmidlin in ZMR 27 (1937), 243–250; F. Combaluzier in RHE 39 (1943), 132–151.

[12] Die römischen Päpste in den letzten vier Jahrhunderten II (Leipzig 1874; Munich 1938), 299.

[13] Cf. the instruction for the vicars apostolic in 1659 in Coll I, no. 135.

The Congregation had openly made this claim to the superiors of Orders.[15] These, however, knew how to escape direct control by Propaganda by again procuring privileges which enabled them, as before, to decide on the sending or recalling of their members. It was clear that the new Congregation could not assert itself vis-à-vis the competence of the other congregations and the administrative routine. The Orders had recourse, according to circumstances, to the department from which they expected a favorable decision in strife produced by rivalry or even in strictly missionary questions. Even the Pope failed to place himself squarely on the side of the supreme mission authority and, after all missions had been subjected to Propaganda in principle, allowed himself to be persuaded to renew the privileges of the Orders.

Hence it should cause no surprise that Propaganda sought to deal in another way with the difficulties arising from the patronage powers and the Orders by establishing missions outside the patronage lands and entrusting them to religious communities which had hitherto done little or hardly any missionary work, such as the Carmelites and the Capuchins. Since France had long sought, for reasons easy to understand, to open up overseas colonial areas of its own and to maintain missions in them, Propaganda obtained the opportunity it wanted. To be sure, the national opposition of the new European great powers to the older Iberian world powers contained new explosives. When Portugal withdrew from the personal union with Spain in the Braganza Revolt of 1640 and the Pope, under pressure from His Catholic Majesty, had to deny recognition to the new King, there arose in the Portuguese colonial empire a situation urgently calling for a solution. For soon almost all the dioceses in the Portuguese patronage area were vacant. In 1649 Brazil and Africa were without bishops, as were the East Indian sees of Cochin, Mailapur, Macao, and Funai. The course adopted by Rome in an effort to liquidate this state of affairs introduced a new period in the history of Catholic missions.

---

[14] Cf. P. de Leturia, "Antonio Lelio de Fermo y la condanacion del 'De Indiarum iure' de Solorzano Pereira," HS 1 (1948), 351–385; 2 (1949), 47–87; id., "El regio vicariato de Indias y los comienzos de la Congregacion de Propaganda," Spanische Forschungen der Görres-Gesellschaft 1. Reihe: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Kulturgeschichte Spaniens II (Münster 1930), 133–177.

[15] 5 December 1640 (Coll I, no. 101).

SECTION FIVE

European Counter Reformation and Confessional Absolutism (1605–55)

CHAPTER 48

Paul V, Gregory XV and the Beginnings of the Central European Counter Reformation

Sustained by the religious and intellectual forces of the Tridentine Reform, the papacy under Paul V and Gregory XV attained a position which can be compared only with that of the High Middle Ages. Its neutrality between the rival Catholic great powers, Spain and France, did not as yet work against Catholic interests, because France's relations with the rising Protestant powers of the North, the rebel Netherlands, England, and Sweden, had not yet been solidified into alliances for war. Hence the active Catholic faction in the Empire, the League, and Emperor Ferdinand II succeeded in defeating the disunited Protestants and in pushing the restoration of lost lands to the Catholic Church. But since Urban VIII was unwilling and perhaps not in a position to thwart Cardinal Richelieu's policy of alliance with Protestants, the defeat of the Catholics in the Empire sealed the end of the Counter Reformation and of the papacy's position of political leadership. From the Peace of Westphalia in 1648 its influence subsided irresistibly and the spirit of the Catholic Reform weakened. Religious and intellectual leadership within the Church passed from Italy and Spain to France, but also the secularization of European thought announced itself.

Sixty cardinals took part in the conclave of 14 March to 11 April 1605, following the death of Clement VIII. Cardinal Aldobrandini, leader of the strongest faction, was allied with the French; Cardinal Montalto, with the Spaniards. Cardinals Medici and Baronius, favored by France, met the resolute opposition of the Spaniards—Baronius because of his criticism of the Monarchia Sircula. Just the same, Baronius lacked only eight votes on 30 March. Since, however, not he but Zacchia was Aldobrandini's real candidate, the French Cardinal Joyeuse succeeded in carrying the election of Medici. As ambassador of Cosimo I in Rome, Leo XI had become the favorite disciple of Saint Philip Neri and was highly esteemed for his piety and integrity. But on 27 April 1605 he died as a result of a chill which he had caught when taking possession of the Lateran.

In the next conclave (8–16 May 1605) the fronts changed to the disadvantage of Aldobrandini. The election of Bellarmine foundered on Spain's veto. After vehement confrontations Aldobrandini and Montalto agreed on the fifty-two-year-old Camillus Borghese, hardly noticed until now. Paul V came from a family of lawyers that had moved to Rome from Siena and had himself risen from auditor of the Camera to the cardinalate in 1596. At first lacking in political experience, he conscientiously familiarized himself with matters of state, and little influence was exercised by the Cardinal Nephew, Scipione Borghese. His political advisers were first Cardinal Arigoni, later Millini, formerly nuncio in Spain, and Maffeo Barberini, formerly nuncio in France. He continued until 1613 the division of the Secretariate of State into two departments, introduced by Clement VIII, with one chief secretary for each (Secretarius domesticus in capite, Secretario intimo), although in 1609–11 Margotti, promoted to the purple, had conducted the business by himself. After 1613 Feliciani was the sole chief secretary.

Paul V's policy was based on the principle of neutrality vis-à-vis the tension between Spain and France. Ubaldini, nuncio to Henry IV, and Coton, the King's Jesuit confessor, urged a Habsburg-Bourbon marriage alliance, but the project was frustrated by Henry's refusal to give up his support of the rebel Netherlands and his urging of the claims of Brandenburg and Palatinate-Neuburg to the Jülich-Cleves inheritance. In an effort to prevent the threatened war from breaking out, Cardinals Millini and Barberini were dispatched as peace envoys to Spain and France, but before they were able to carry out their commission Henry IV was assassinated on 14 May 1610 by a fanatic, Ravaillac, who had not been instigated by the Jesuits, as was once claimed. The impending European war was averted, but the pernicious rivalry of the two great powers continued even though the dynastic alliance desired by the Curia was effected by the marriage in 1616 of the Bourbon Louis XIII to Anne of Austria, daughter of the Habsburg Philip III.

Conflict with Venice

The conflict of Paul V with the Republic of Venice very nearly led to a European war, which would necessarily have acquired the character of a religious war. Even before the Pope's accession the Venetian Signoria had forbidden the erecting of churches, monasteries, and hospitals and the acquiring of real estate by the Church without the permission of the state and, without regard to the privilegium fori, had brought two unworthy clerics to trial and had imprisoned them. In briefs of 10 December 1605 and 26 March 1606, Paul V condemned these procedures and, on the republic's declining to cancel its measures, sent an ultimatum threatening excommunication and interdict on 17 April 1606. On the advice of its official theologian, the shrewd and fluent Servite Paul Sarpi (1552–1623), the Signoria, protesting its divine right, forbade the publication of the papal censures under pain of death. After the expiration of the four weeks' respite allowed, the censures became effective but were ignored by the republic as invalid. A majority of the clergy obeyed the state and disregarded the interdict. All diocesan and regular priests who observed it, headed by the Jesuits, were banished. In his Treatise on the Interdict[1] and numerous other polemics Sarpi denied its validity on the ground that the Pope was abusing his authority and whoever obeyed him was guilty of sin. The conflict over Church policy was escalated to a conflict of principle over the relations of the spiritual to the secular power. As early as 1607 the Jesuit Gretser counted twenty-eight polemical writings favoring Venice and thirty-eight upholding the Pope, among these last being works by Bellarmine, Baronius, and Suarez. The apostasy of Venice from the Church and even a European war were distinct possibilities, especially when England, through its ambassador, Wotton, held out to the Signoria the prospect of support by the Protestant powers.

It was only after Cardinal Joyeuse, acting on instructions from Henry IV, had ascertained in the spring of 1607 how far the Signoria was prepared to yield that the Pope also gave in. The two imprisoned ecclesiastics were surrendered to Joyeuse. The Signoria promised not to repeal the laws in dispute, but not to enforce them, and the Kings of France and Spain vouched for this. Also, except for the Jesuits, priests who had been expelled for observing the interdict were allowed to return to Venice. On 21 April 1607 Joyeuse absolved the Signoria from the ecclesiastical censures it had incurred; thus the Signoria tacitly acknowledged their existence. The Pope's defeat was only thinly veiled: he lifted the interdict without requiring the Signoria to make adequate satisfaction or to abandon the principle at stake. The demanded surrender of Sarpi and of his partisans, Micanzio and Marsiglio, was refused and for almost fifty years the Jesuits were excluded from Venetian territory. Responsibility for a murderous attempt on Sarpi was blamed on the Curia because the culprits had taken refuge in the Papal State. Sarpi's History of the Council of Trent, printed in London in 1619, was inspired by hatred of the papacy and greatly damaged its prestige. However, his effort to propagate Calvinism in Venice misfired, as did his plans to overthrow the papacy with the aid of a coalition of Protestant powers.[2] [1] Istoria dell'Interdetto e altri scritti editi e inediti, ed. M. D. Busnelli–G. Gambarin, II, 1–41.

---

Loyal to his principle of neutrality, Paul V refused financial support to the Catholic Grisons (the easternmost canton of Switzerland) against the Protestants because he was unwilling to lay himself open to the reproach of furthering the involved strategic interests of Spain in a territorial connection between Milan and Tirol. To preserve peace, Paul's successor even agreed to have papal troops occupy the strongholds of the Valtellina.

Paul V's death was followed by a brief conclave on 8 and 9 February 1621. The choice fell on Allessandro Ludovisi, beloved for his kindness, esteemed for his knowledge of law, but in poor health. In memory of Gregory XIII, his fellow Bolognese, he styled himself Gregory XV. His right arm was the Cardinal Nephew, Ludovico Ludovisi, very much like him in character and a gifted statesman, whose many-faceted intellectual interests are demonstrated by the construction of Sant'Ignazio, the layout of the Villa Ludovisi on the Pincio, and his collections of antiques. "Let the fear and love of God be your political wisdom," was the Pope's admonition to his nephew.[3] According to Pastor, "Probably never has a short pontificate left such deep traces in history."

In the bull on the papal election, 15 November 1621,[4] the so-called election by adoration—or unanimous quasi-inspiration—which had taken place in several recent elections, was not excluded, but the secret written vote was prescribed as the rule. Subsequent "accession" was for the future to be allowed only in writing and only once after each of the two daily scrutinies. The greatness of the Ludovisi pontificate was revealed most clearly in the establishment of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith on 22 June 1622 as already noted. Financially well endowed and furnished with exceptional authority, it was conceived as the organ for the coordination of the missions in America, Asia, and Africa and as the counterpoise of the patronage exercised by the Spanish and Portuguese crowns. But since relations with the Eastern Churches and the spread of the Catholic faith in the parts of North Europe that had become entirely or mostly Protestant were assigned to it, it developed into the headquarters of the Counter Reformation.[5] Its presupposition was the continuance of the Catholic Reform, in which were concentrated the forces for the self-assertion of the Church in the struggle against Protestantism, and no less the political and military successes of the Catholic powers at the beginning of the Thirty Years' War.

---

[2] Sarpi's innermost conviction remains a puzzle. I still adhere to the view of Gallican influence on his history of the Council, even though, according to Ulianich, his concept of the Church was far more radical than the Gallican.

[3] "La vostra dottrina politica, i precetti di ragione di stato e gl'intimi consiglieri siano il timore e l'amore di Dio." H. Laemmer, Zur Kirchengeschichte des XVI. und XVII. Jh. (Freiburg 1863), p. 23.

[4] Bull Rom, XII, 619–627; further details are provided by a second bull of 12 March 1622 (ibid., p. 662ff.).

Successes and Failures

The implementation of the reform decrees of the Council of Trent was the chief concern of both Paul V and Gregory XV. The duty of residence was again enjoined on the bishops, and titular rather than residential bishops began to be appointed nuncios. The exertions of the Nuncios Barberini and Ubaldini to achieve the acceptance of Trent by France finally collapsed at the Estates General of 1614–15 because of the resistance of the Third Estate and of the Parlement of Paris, but on 7 July 1615 the clergy voted the publication of the reform decrees in provincial councils. In the Spanish Netherlands the decrees of the Provincial Council of Mechlin (1607) and of the diocesan synods following were declared binding by the government. In 1621 the Cologne Nuncio Albergati wrote that "the salvation of Germany depends" on the publication and observance of Trent.[6] In the conviction that the Catholic renewal was based not merely on the enforcement of laws but equally on the strength of ideals, the great sixteenth-century champions of renewal were raised to the honors of the altar. Charles Borromeo was canonized in 1610. Paul V had beatified Ignatius Loyola in 1609, Teresa of Avila in 1614, Philip Neri in 1615, and Francis Xavier in 1619; on 12 March 1622 the four of them were canonized in a single ceremony which in brilliance surpassed all previous celebrations.

But setbacks were not lacking. When on 5 November 1605 it was discovered that a group of English Catholics planned to blow up Parliament in order to kill King James I, suspicion of complicity fell on the Jesuit Garnet, who had acquired knowledge of the "Gunpowder Plot" under the seal of confession but had sought to stop the crime. Garnet's trial, legally open to attack, was exploited to charge the Pope and the Jesuits with high treason and immoral principles; Garnet was executed.[6a]

---

[5] The nuncios acted as connecting links: Brussels kept an eye on England, Holland, Denmark, and Norway; Cologne, on North Germany; the nuncio in Poland, on Sweden and Russia (Pastor, XXVII, 135f.).

[6] "Ex illo sc. Concilio Tridentino pendet salus Germaniae" (Pastor, XXVII, 318).

[6a] In addition to Pastor, XII, 405–428, see H. R. Williamson, The Gunpowder Plot (London, 1951).

New laws aggravated the situation of the English Catholics. An oath was required of them to the effect that James I was the lawful King of England and that the Pope had no power to depose him. The Archpriest Blackwell and many of the laity took the oath, though it had been condemned by Paul V, but sixteen priests and two lay persons who refused it were executed. The attitude to the oath of loyalty split the English Catholics into two factions.

In the Habsburg hereditary states the dissension between the incompetent Emperor Rudolf II and his brothers resulted in far-reaching concessions to the Protestants, which raised apprehension of serious losses to the Church. The Calvinist estates of Hungary obtained religious liberty in the Peace of Vienna (1606), as did the adherents of the Bohemian Confession in the "Letter of Majesty" of 9 July 1609. King Matthias extended the rights of the Hungarian Calvinists and in 1609 granted religious liberty to the Protestant estates of Upper Austria, a move synonymous with the suppression of Catholicism in their lands.

Despite these reverses the Catholics' self-assurance was so strengthened that they ceased to be satisfied with merely preserving what they held and considered the pushing back of Protestantism and the reconquest of lost areas. A plan to seize Geneva, the "Babylon of heresies," and to restore it to the Church again surfaced. The concessions to the Huguenots in the Edict of Nantes seemed to the Curia to be excessive. The Nuncio Barberini was to explain to Henry IV that reasons of state called for a confessionally unified state; at least the Protestants should be excluded from the highest functions of government, as Simonetta, nuncio in Poland, was successfully urging. Thus the Counter Reformation sought the aid of Poland, where the political disunion of the Catholics had been surmounted through the establishing of the League, while in Emperor Ferdinand II the House of Habsburg acquired a leader for whom the defense and propagation of the Catholic religion was a matter of conscience.[7]

Start of the Thirty Years' War

The execution by Duke Maximilian I of Bavaria of the ban against the Free City of Donauwörth, which had violated the Religious Peace, and the unlawful imposition of Catholicism on the city led to the bolting of the Diet of Regensburg by the Protestant estates and to the forming of a league, the Union (16 May 1608), led by the Calvinist Elector Palatine.

---

[7] Ferdinand had declared that "he would sooner lose his kingdoms and lands than knowingly let pass an opportunity to promote the true faith." ARG 49 (1958), 259.

The reply to this was the concluding a year later of a Catholic defensive alliance, the League, at the prompting of Maximilian I. At first it comprised, besides Bavaria, only the most seriously menaced spiritual princes—Würzburg, Constance, Augsburg, and Regensburg—and after 30 August 1609, the three spiritual electors, but not the Habsburgs, who were quarreling among themselves. The Pope hesitated to enter into a formal treaty with the League and made his financial support contingent upon proof that there existed a general Protestant union directed against the Catholics; legalist that he was, he did not wish to be suspected of violating the Religious Peace.[8] It was not until 1610 that he promised subsidies, while at the same time he urged the inclusion of the Emperor in the League. For its part, the Union acquired powerful support through alliances with England (1612) and Holland (1613).

While Emperor Matthias, under the influence of his advisor Klesl, Bishop of Vienna and in 1616 a Cardinal, was inclined to yield to Protestant demands in the Empire, such as permitting the Protestant administrator of Magdeburg to sit in the Diet, his successor, Ferdinand II, elected King of Bohemia in 1617 and King of Hungary in 1618, was opposed to any compromise. The revolt of the Protestant nobles in Bohemia and the election as anti-King of the Count Palatine Friedrich V set off the long-threatening religious war. Both Ferdinand II and the reinvigorated League obtained considerable subsidies from the Pope from 1620 onward. The "Winter King," left in the lurch by his allies, was defeated in the Battle of the White Mountain on 8 November 1620. To enable Ferdinand II and the League to make the most of their victory, Gregory XV in just two and one-half years contributed subsidies in the amount of about 1,239,000 florins in sound money and of about 700,000 florins in bad money, depreciated through inflation.[9] The transfer of the dignity of Elector Palatine to Bavaria was energetically pushed by the Pope, by, among other measures, the dispatch of the Capuchin Hyacinth of Casale. These military and political successes formed the basis for the Counter Reformation now getting under way, first of all only in the Habsburg states.

At the instigation of the energetic and circumspect nuncio, Carlo

---

[8] "Dixit nuntius quod S. Stas cupiat religionem Augustanae Confessionis et talia compactata illaesa." Briefe und Akten zur Geschichte des 30jährigen Krieges IX (Leipzig 1903), 312.

[9] Cf. Albrecht, "Zur Finanzierung des Dreissigjährigen Krieges. Die Subsidien der Kurie für Kaiser und Liga 1618–35," ZBLG 19 (1956), 534–567. Paul V had contributed around 650,000 florins in the last two and one-half years of his pontificate and in addition imposed a tithe on the German clergy.

Carafa,[10] Protestant ministers and teachers were expelled from Bohemia. At the start only those who had taken part in the revolt were affected, but later all were included on the basis of the King's right of reformation. Mixed commissions under military protection restored the churches and introduced Catholic pastors. Resistance, especially from the urban middle class and from the peasants, who were unwilling to forego the lay chalice, was quashed by military force. In order to avoid oppressive billeting, expected to force conversions, many Protestants emigrated. Recourse to these measures of force was not mitigated until 1626 and then without abandoning the fundamental requirement of return to the Catholic Church.

The soul of the rebuilding of Catholicism was Cardinal Harrach, Archbishop of Prague (1624–67), advised by the Capuchin Valerian Magni. At his urging, the role of the state's means of pressure gradually yielded to pastoral action. The chief source of difficulty was the lack of diocesan priests, and thus the lion's share of the immensely heavy burden fell to the Orders, most of all to the Jesuits and the Capuchins, but also to the older institutes. The University of Prague was entrusted to the Jesuits. Corresponding to Harrach in Prague was Cardinal Dietrichstein in his bishopric of Olmütz. In Silesia, where the "Letter of Majesty" continued in force, the Counter Reformation was carried out only in the principalities directly under the King and in the territory of the see of Breslau, which was held by Habsburg archdukes from 1608 to 1665. In Upper Austria on 12 October 1624 the Protestants were given until Easter of 1626 to return to the Church. In Lower Austria, where Ferdinand II had assured religious liberty to the nobles adhering to the Augsburg Confession, the authorities were content with expelling the Calvinist preachers. In Styria, Carinthia, and Carniola the Protestant nobles too were banished (1628). The restoration of Catholicism in Hungary was almost entirely the work of Cardinal Pázmány, Archbishop of Esztergom (1616–37).[11]

As early as 1621, opinions concerning the anti-Reformation measures to be adopted[12] recognized both the urgency and the questionable character of the Church's use of secular means of compulsion. Success, it was felt, depended on the intensification of the care of souls. The political postulate of denominational unity continued to be admitted. The extending of the Counter Reformation to the Empire belongs in the pontificate of Urban VIII.

---

[10] Carafa's final report of 1628, edited by J. G. Müller in Archiv für Kunde österreichischer Geschichtsquellen 23 (1860), 103–450, is based on several preliminary studies; cf. J. Pieper, HJ 2 (1881), 388–415; Pastor, XXVII, 229f.; H. Jedin, RQ 39 (1931), 411ff. His Commentaria de Germania sacra instaurata (Antwerp 1630; Cologne 1639; etc.) is the most important contemporary exposition of the Counter Reformation in the Habsburg hereditary states and in the Empire.

[11] His Opera Omnia, Series lat., 6 vols. (Budapest 1894–1904); Series Mugarica, 7 vols. (Budapest 1910–11); latest bibliography: L. Polgar, Bibliographica Soc. Jesu (Rome 1957)n. 1150–1416. Pázmány is viewed highly as a Hungarian stylist.

[12] Larmormaini's opinion, composed after 1 October 1621, in J. Kollmann, Acta S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide res gestas Bohemicas illustrantia I, 17–36; H. Jedin, "Eine Denkschrift über die Gegenreformation in Schlesien aus dem Jahre 1625," ArSKG 3 (1938), 152–171 (composed by Christoph Weller, S.J.). The memorandum De missionibus Germanicis (composed around 1600) also points in this direction; it will be found in Döllinger-Reusch, Geschichte der Moralstreitigkeiten II (Nördlingen 1889), 390–393.

CHAPTER 49

Urban VIII, Innocent X and the End of the Counter Reformation

In the conclave of 19 July to 6 August 1623, the small Ludovisi faction was so reinforced by the adherents of Aldobrandini, the German Cardinals Zollern and Klesl, and the Princes Farnese and Medici that it was almost equal to the followers of Borghese and was able to prevent the election of Millini, which Borghese was urging. The illness of a number of the cardinals hastened an agreement by the two party leaders on the person of the Florentine Maffeo Barberini, who, to the delight of the Romans, called himself Urban VIII. Only fifty-five years of age, he had acquired valuable political experience that qualified him to participate personally in the conduct of affairs.[1] He did so, at least in the first third of his pontificate, proving his skill in dealing with diplomats and his keen self-assurance. He had a dislike of Spain and a partiality for France that went back to the period of his nunciature in the latter kingdom (1604–07). More given to nepotism than any other Pope of the century, he bestowed the purple on his brother Antonio and his nephews Francesco and Antonio the Younger and enriched his family so prodigally that on his death bed he felt remorse of conscience. His extravagance toward the Barberini family presented a painful contrast to his niggardly contributions for the support of the Catholic side in the Thirty Years' War. At the urging of his nephews he had the papal fief of Castro occupied on the ground that its holder, Duke Odoardo Farnese of Parma, was not satisfying his creditors in Rome. But since the duke found support in France and formed a league with Venice, Tuscany, and Modena against the Pope, the "Castro War" ended with the Pope's defeat. The Papal State, enlarged by the territory of Urbino following the renunciation of claims by the last duke, della Rovere, suffered severely from the devastation of large areas and disordered finances.

---

[1] "All business," said the Venetian Ambassador P. Contarini in 1627, "passes through the hands of His Holiness, and without his knowledge and instructions no political or other important decision is rendered" (N. Barozzi–G. Berchet, Le relazioni della Corte di Roma lette al Senato degli ambasciatori veneti nel sec. XVII I, 212).

A connoisseur of both ancient and modern literature, owner of a large library, and himself an accomplished stylist, the Pope personally took part in the reform of the breviary of 1631, rewriting a number of the hymns. The reform commission, headed by Cardinal Gaetani and including the Franciscan Luke Wadding, the Jesuit Terenzio Alciati, the Dominican Niccolò Riccardi, and the Barnabite Bartolomeo Gavanti, contented itself with trifling changes in the lives of saints and the homilies. The corrections in the missal (1634) and pontifical (1644) were of no importance. Liturgical centralization found its culmination in the constitution of 5 July 1643, in which beatification and canonization were reserved to the Pope and every liturgical cult of a saint was forbidden which had not been in effect for at least a century with proper ecclesiastical approval. In 1630 Urban VIII granted cardinals the title of "Eminence." In an effort to deal with the pressure from the Catholic powers to consider their candidates, he preferred Italians even more than his predeccessors had in the creation of new cardinals. In nine promotions he bestowed the purple on seventy-eight men.

Church Policy during the Thirty Years' War

Von Ranke's view, that Urban VIII, from antipathy to Spain and preference for France, favored Cardinal Richelieu's anti-Habsburg policy and thus indirectly saved German Protestantism, simplifies the situation too much. Following the principle, correct in itself, that the papacy must stand above the rivalry of the great powers and intervene for the preservation of peace, he was unable and perhaps not really willing to thwart Richelieu's superior and crafty diplomacy, which, without regard for the interests of the Church, aimed at the destruction of the power of the Habsburg lands and at French hegemony in Europe. He failed to grasp that the defeat of the Emperor and of the League involved the ruin of the Counter Reformation which his predecesors had promoted. The question whether in this he let himself be influenced by the view that recourse to political and military means for religious ends was obsolete and restriction to the religious strength of the Church was necessary cannot be solved in the present state of research. The Pope's policy of neutrality must be evaluated from this standpoint.

He took no effective measures to prevent the expulsion of the papal troops from the fortresses of the Valtellina by Swiss in French pay. After the unsuccessful peace delegation of the Cardinal Nephew Francesco Barberini (1625), the affair was finally settled by the Treaty of Monzon in 1626. On the other hand, he refused to enter the anti-Spanish League promoted by France in the War of the Mantuan Succession (1628), although he regarded the claims of the Duke of Nevers as strongest and was opposed to a further extension of Spanish preponderance in Italy. He participated as mediator in the concluding of the Peace of Regensburg in 1630. When in 1631 France allied with Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden in the Treaty of Bärwalde, Urban trusted in Sweden's promise to maintain Catholic worship in the conquered territories and expected that the Franco-Bavarian alliance arranged with the cooperation of Bagno, nuncio at Paris, would deter Richelieu from joining the German Protestants. Both hopes were disappointed. When after Gustavus Adolphus' victory at Breitenfeld it was made clear that he had been deceived by Richelieu, the Pope made nothing stronger than paper protests and refused the Habsburg side the adequate financial help which could have brought relief to the seriously threatened Catholics.[2] Only when the victories of the Swedish King aroused fears of an invasion of Italy did he propose an Italian defensive league, which, however, found no favor. The tale that on the news of the death of Gustavus Adolphus he celebrated a Requiem Mass was long ago disproved.[3]

It was the interlacing of political and religious interests that made Urban's position so difficult. In Spain there was talk of convoking a general council, while Richelieu threatened schism. But when France's open entry into the war in 1635 compelled Ferdinand II to make concessions to the Protestants in the Peace of Prague, the Emperor was severely blamed, whereas Richelieu received merely an admonition to peace. The peace congress convoked to Cologne was sabotaged by Richelieu, but the Pope drew no conclusion from this attitude. It is hard to avoid the impression that Urban VIII's policy of neutrality actually amounted to a patronage of France. Its inescapable sequel was the cessation of the Counter Reformation in the Empire and heavy damage to Catholic interests.

---

[2] According to D. Albrecht, "Zur Finanzierung des Dreissigjährigen Krieges," ZBLG 19 (1956), 548–562, virtually only what was left of the amount earlier promised was paid out until 1631 and from then until 1635 about 550,000 thalers. In regard to the scene with Cardinal Borgia on 8 March 1632, described by Pastor (XXVIII, 286ff.), it is to be borne in mind that Cardinal Ludovisi, highly esteemed by Pastor, was on Borgia's side and the far more moderate Cardinal Pázmány had no support from Urban VIII.

[3] S. Ehses, "Papst Urban VIII. und Gustav Adolf," HJ 16 (1895), 336–341; J. S. Schnitzer, "Urbans VIII. Verhalten bei der Nachricht vom Tode des Schwedenkönigs," Festschrift Camposanto (Freiburg 1897), pp. 280–283.

Counter Reformation in the Empire

From the beginning of the seventeenth century the Catholics had held the initiative in the Empire. Following the conversion of Wolfgang Wilhelm of Palatinate-Neuburg in 1613, his territories had become again at least partly Catholic, Bamberg was assured by Aschhausen, and at the same time Bishop Jakob Fugger was effective in Constance. In North Germany also progress was to be noted. The Calvinist council was expelled by Spanish troops from the Free City of Aachen (1614). The Tridentine reform was carried out in the see of Münster by Ferdinand of Bavaria, Elector of Cologne, who was also able to profit by the measures of his predecessor Fürstenberg in the bishopric of Paderborn. But here and throughout the North there was no real change in the situation until the victories of Tilly and Wallenstein. The return of the prince-bishoprics and abbeys that had become Protestant since 1552 was begun. Montorio, nuncio at Cologne, sent missionaries to Bremen, Magdeburg, and Halberstadt. The convert Johann von Leckow and, later, Jesuit missionaries were active in the Margraviate of Brandenburg.

The legal basis for a large-scale operation was to be furnished by the Imperial Edict of Restitution of 6 March 1629. It was prepared by the Pacis Compositio of the same year, whose authors, the Jesuits Forer and Laymann, upheld the view that the Religious Peace of Augsburg did not formally annul the Edict of Worms and established merely a temporary emergency law which did not entitle the Protestants to further "reformations" beyond the position of 1552.[4] The Edict of Restitution decreed: 1) the return of the two archbishoprics, twelve bishoprics, and numerous monasteries, direct imperial fiefs, that had been alienated since the Treaty of Passau; 2) the return of mediatized sees and monasteries and their property, alienated in the same period; 3) by means of the abrogation of the Declaratio Ferdinandea, the equalizing of the Catholic estates with the Protestant in the "right of reformation." Defensible in law, the edict was a serious political mistake, for it united German Protestantism by threatening its very existence.[5]

---

[4] M. Heckel, "Autonomia und Pacis compositio. Der Augsburger Religionsfriede in der Deutung der Gegenreformation." ZSavRGkan, 45 (1959), 141–248.

[5] Text in M. C. Lundorp, Acta Publica II (Frankfurt a. M. 1668), 1048.

Imperial delegates were appointed to carry it out. In Lower Saxony the energetic Bishop of Osnabrück, Franz Wilhelm von Wartenberg,[6] obtained the sees of Verden and Minden; Bremen, Magdeburg, and Halberstadt were entrusted to the Archduke Leopold Wilhelm. By the end of 1631 two archbishoprics, five bishoprics, two prince-abbeys, and 150 churches and monasteries were again in Catholic hands. But before the execution of the edict was completed and the interior permeation of the newly won lands had passed beyond the initial stage, the preconditions for distribution of power for the counteroffensive were offset. Wallenstein was toppled, and the victories of Gustavus Adolphus and his advance into South Germany involved the loss of all gains in the North and of most of the South, especially in Württemberg. In the Peace of Prague with Saxony (1635) the Emperor was forced to renounce the Edict of Restitution and concede for forty years to those adherents of the Augsburg Confession who assented to the peace the ecclesiastical lands they had occupied from the Treaty of Passau until 12 November 1627.

The Peace of Westphalia

The Pope's endeavor to mediate between the chief opponents—the two Habsburg powers and France—through the Cardinal Legate Ginetti at the Peace Congress of Cologne came to nothing. Matters did not progress beyond formalities (1636–40). Meanwhile, year after year, the military situation of the Catholic party in the Empire deteriorated. Ferdinand III and his advisors understood that peace was impossible without great concessions in the ecclesiastical sphere. Fabio Chigi, nuncio at Cologne, was sent to the Peace Congress at Münster with instructions to intervene only between Catholic states. Whereas Count Trautmannsdorf, the Emperor's plenipotentiary, and the Elector Maximilian of Bavaria regarded broad concessions to the Protestants as unavoidable, a closed group whose public spokesman was the Jesuit Wangnereck, under the leadership of Cardinal Wartenberg and Bishop Knöringen of Augsburg, came forward against the surrender of ecclesiastical rights and claims as a matter of principle. But their efforts were in vain.

The peace signed on 24 October 1648,[7] contained three provisions which solidified the religious cleavage in the Empire, defined the property of the denominations, and brought the Counter Reformation to an end: 1) The Religious Peace of Augsburg was extended to include the Calvinists; 2) Except in the Austrian hereditary states, the standard year for deciding the practice of religion and the ownership of Church property was computed as 1 January 1624; 3) The "right of reformation" of the estates and the Ecclesiastical Reservation, which had hitherto been assailed by the Protestants, were both recognized. Against these stipulations, so injurious to the Church, but not against the peace as such, Chigi on 14 October 1648 lodged a protest long before prepared, and about twenty Catholic imperial estates associated themselves with it. It was confirmed, though to no purpose, by a papal brief of 26 November 1648. In the Peace of Westphalia a new age proclaimed itself; the system of European states freed itself from papal controls. Urban VIII's successor, by whom the protest was made, could do nothing to arrest this development.

---

[6] G. Schwaiger, Kardinal Franz Wilhelm von Wartenberg als Bischof von Regensburg (Munich 1954).

[7] The Instrumentum Pacis Osnabrugense and Monasteriense are most readily found in K. Zeumer, Quellensammlung zur Geschichte der deutschen Reichsverfassung in Mittelalter und Neuzeit (Leipzig 1904), pp. 332–379; the acknowledgment of the protest by Innocent X in Bull Rom XV, 603ff.

In the conclave of 9 August to 14 September 1644, Sacchetti, at first the most promising candidate of the nephews of Urban VIII and of the French, incurred the veto of Spain. Thereupon both factions united to elect Gianbattista Pamfili, though he was not acceptable to the French and the Spanish minister-in-charge Olivarez had earlier opposed the elevation of the former nuncio in Spain to the cardinalate. More to the point than any other characterization of Innocent X is the portrait by Diego Velazquez from 1650: a majestic appearance, intelligent, reserved, even distrustful, hence slow, sometimes vacillating in reaching decisions, intent on right and order. His pontificate, termed by Pastor "neither brilliant nor fortunate," was overshadowed by his tyrannical and venal sister-in-law, Olimpia Maidalchini, to whom he allowed far too much influence in secular matters and in personal politics. However, her son, the Cardinal Nephew Camillo Pamfili did not become secretary of state. This post went to Cardinal Panciroli, who was succeeded in 1651 by the former nuncio at Cologne, Chigi. When the Barberini were to be called to account for squandering Church money, Cardinal Antonio fled to France and placed himself under French protection. Overawed by the French prime minister's threats, the Pope submitted to a pardon for him.

The continuing war between France and Spain forced Innocent X "to tread a silk thread," to quote Pastor. Though inclined toward Spain, he could not disregard France, rising to the position of leading power in Europe, and its prime minister during the minority of Louis XIV, the Italian Jules Mazarin (d. 1661). Portugal had broken away from the Spanish crown in 1640 and elected a native King, John IV of the House of Braganza. Like Urban VIII, Innocent X refused to recognize him and to fill vacant sees with bishops nominated by him. During the Masaniello Revolt of 1647 he declined to uphold Spanish rule in the Kingdom of Naples but, contrary to Mazarin's wishes, did not exploit the confusion to extend the Papal State on the plea of the papal right of suzerainty. In the north the Papal State was rounded off by the confiscation of the Farnese fief on the Lake of Bolsena. The still strained relations with Venice improved when the Pope restored the inscription removed by Urban VIII from the Sala Regis. This was a representation of the Peace of Venice of 1177, which mentioned that Pope Alexander III had recovered his position through the aid of Venice. But when the Signoria continued to infringe ecclesiastical immunity, Innocent X gave it only meager support in its war with Turkey over the island of Candia (Crete).

England's Hegemony among Protestant Powers

In England the marriage of Charles I to Henrietta Maria, daughter of Louis XIII of France, did not bring the expected alleviation of persecution to the Catholics. The promises made when the dispensation was obtained were not honored when Parliament raised opposition. To replace the archpriest hitherto functioning there, a vicar of episcopal rank was named in 1623. But strife with the Jesuits induced the second holder of the office to leave England, and thus the approximately one hundred fifty thousand Catholics were without a head. Catholic worship continued to be proscribed, while absence from the Anglican service was punishable by a fine. Under the influence of the King, who inclined personally to the Catholic Church, and of the Queen the persecuting laws were more mildly enforced and even the possibility of reunion was discussed,[8] but Charles' absolute rule and, in the ecclesiastical sphere, the greater emphasis on the episcopalian constitution, which his father had gradually reintroduced in Scotland, and the communion rite, closer to the Catholic tradition, which he himself had prescribed there in 1637, encountered powerful opposition in Parliament and among the Presbyterians and Independents respectively. Although on the outbreak of the Civil War in 1642 he was supported by the Catholic nobility and eventually by the Irish, he was defeated and executed (1649). The fanatically anti-Catholic Lord Protector, Oliver Cromwell, abolished the fine for non-attendance at Anglican worship (1650), but the religious toleration granted by him was of slight benefit to Catholics as "idolators." Anyone who rejected the oath of abjuration, demanded of laity and clergy from 1655—repudiation of the papal primacy, of transubstantiation, and of the veneration of saints and images—lost two-thirds of his property and almost all his civil rights, and priests had to leave the country under pain of death.

---

[8] H. R. T. Brandreth, "Grégoire Panzani et l'idéal de la rèunion sous le règne de Charles I. d'Angleterre," Irenikon 21 (1948), 32–47, 179–192; M. Nedoncelle, Trois aspects du problème anglo-catholique au 17e siècle (P 1951); the reunion writing of the convert C. Davenport of 1634 is discussed in R. Rouse–S. C. Neill, Geschichte der ökumenischen Bewegung I (Göttingen 1957), 191ff.

The English revolution annihilated also the hope of an alleviation of the lot of the harshly suppressed Irish Catholics. Their at first victorious rising against English rule had been supported by Urban VIII through money and the sending of nuncios. The Treaty of Kilkenny (1645), in which the royal agent Glamorgan had guaranteed them religious liberty, was not ratified by Charles I and it was not until shortly before his fall that he granted it to them in return for an assurance of armed assistance in the struggle with Parliament.[8a] The concession came too late. With cruel severity Cromwell subjected the country to his control and by means of an act of settlement expropriated a great part of the property of Catholic landowners. A decree of 6 January 1653 prescribed that all Catholic priests had to leave the country under penalty of high treason. The Catholics were decimated, partly through deportation to the West Indies, partly through emigration and famine.

Cromwell made England the greatest Protestant power in Europe. The Netherlands obtained the definitive recognition of their sovereignty in the peace with Spain. Sweden, though unable long to maintain the position of a great power gained by Gustavus Adolphus, still dominated the Baltic Sea through its bridgeheads on imperial soil and forced Poland to make peace. The Protestant powers, in which the Catholic faith was virtually exterminated,[9] were in the ascendancy. Spain, the former Catholic power, was defeated by the France of Richelieu who was unwilling to accept Philip II's role of protector of Catholic interests. The Counter Reformation had come to a stop in Central Europe, but the Tridentine reform had not. Like his predecessors, Innocent X worked for it and, soon after the conclusion of peace, set in motion in the Empire a wave of Church renewal.[10]

[8a] According to H. F. Kearney, "Ecclesiastical Politics and the Counter-Reformation in Ireland 1618–1648," JEH 11 (1960), 202–212, the Irish episcopate was divided between a moderate faction, in favor of a reconciliation with England, and a radical one, favoring Spain; the Curia after 1640 supported the former.

[9] Romeinische Bronnen voor den kerkelijken Toestand der Nederlanden onder de Apostolische Vicarissen I, ed. J. D. M. Cornelissen ('s Gravenhage 1932), sources from 1592 to 1651; J. Metzler, Die Apostolischen Vikariate des Nordens (Paderborn 1919); I. Hansteen-Knudsen, De Relationibus inter Sanctam Sedem et Norvegiam (Rome 1946); on the Jesuits' fruitless missionary efforts in Denmark and Sweden, see Duhr, II, 2, 75ff.

In condemning five propositions from the Augustinus of Cornelius Jansenius (d. 1638 as Bishop of Ypres) on 31 May 1653, Innocent X delivered the most momentous official doctrinal decision of the century. It can be appreciated only in connection with the quarrel over the Augustinian doctrine of grace, which had broken out again under Urban VIII. This controversy continued the quarrel over Baius and Molinism but, in contrast to them, it affected almost all facets of Church life far into the eighteenth century.

Under Innocent X occurred a change still operative in regard to the highest political office in the Holy See: the respective Cardinal Nephew was supplanted as chief minister by the secretary of state. In the pontificate of his predecessor the Cardinal Nephew Francesco Barberini, who at first had been overshadowed by the secretaries of state Magalotti and Azzolini, had contrived to secure a predominant influence at the side of and in fact ahead of the secretary of state, Ceva, whom the Pope regarded as a counterpoise, and finally (1643) obtained this post for his creature, Spada. But this enhancement of the political importance of the cardinal nephew was no more than an episode. Camillo Pamfili and Astalli, nephews of Innocent X, never played a leading role. This went instead to the secretaries of state, Panciroli and after 1651, Chigi, with whom begins the series of cardinal secretaries of state. "For the first time in the history of the secretariate of state the nuncios and legates sent their correspondence directly to the secretary of state; for the first time the secretary of state alone signed letters and instructions" (Hammermayer). And Chigi became the first secretary of state to ascend the Throne of Peter.

The paralysis of the Catholic counteroffensive did not involve that of artistic powers. On 18 November 1626, Urban VIII had consecrated the new Saint Peter's, for which his architect, Bernini, executed the bronze baldachin over the confessio and the tomb of the Barberini Pope.[11] Numerous churches of martyrs, such as Santa Bibiana and Santi Cosma e Damiano, were restored by him, his nephews, and other cardinals. The rebuilding of the Seven Hills, started by Sixtus V, was continued with the laying out of new streets and the erection of a splendid family palace, and the appearance of the city was enhanced by the installation of numerous fountains. The guides to Rome by Mancini and Celio, Baglione and Totti were no longer pilgrims' guides to the sanctuaries and relics but experts on the artistic monuments of pagan and Christian Rome from antiquity to the present. Under the prosaic and thrifty Innocent X Bernini was for a time out of favor. The belfrey of Saint Peter's that he had erected was again torn down but the interior decorations were completed and thus the estimated seven hundred thousand pilgrims of the Jubilee Year 1650 viewed the church in essentially its present form. The same holds for the Lateran Basilica, restored by Borromini, and the Baroque churches of Sant' Ignazio and Sant' Andrea della Valle, finished after a long period of construction. The jewel of all the Roman squares, the Piazza Navona, where arose the Pamfili family palace, received its final form with Bernini's Fontana dei Fiumi. Baroque Rome was now completed. In the march of the Catholic Reform its universities and colleges had made it a center of ecclesiastical scholarship. Now it became the goal of cultural journeys.

---

[10] Encyclical of 4 April 1652, mentioned in Deutsche Geschichtsblätter 16 (1915), 10.

[11] Pastor, XXIX, 455–544; XXX, 381–411; L. Schudt, Le guide di Roma (Vienna 1930), pp. 40ff.; O. Pollak, Die Kunsttätigkeit unter Urban VIII (Augsburg 1928); R. Wittkower, Bernini, the Sculptor of the Roman Baroque (London 1955).

CHAPTER 50

Denominationalism and Secularization

The strict doctrinal and territorial separation between Catholics, Lutherans, and Calvinists, "confessionalization," and the resulting doctrinal quarrels are the outstanding characteristics of the century between the Council of Trent and the Peace of Westphalia. But the very violence of the opposing polemics and the blood-letting of the wars of religion gave rise to a new longing for religious peace and Church unity. While it is true that the ever more numerous conversions around the turn of the century and a series of religious colloquies led to renewed strife, nevertheless the hazards of irenicism were embraced, though only by individualists. When it became clear that religious unity within the state could no longer be enforced, the idea of toleration made progress, but, except in the France of Henry IV, it was unable to carry the day.

Strictly speaking, conversions to the Catholic Church presupposed the strict differentiation of the Catholic doctrine from the Protestant by the Council of Trent. This concept does not cover the return of entire territories on the basis of edicts issued by territorial lords, though, for example among the figures reported by the Jesuits,[1] a large number of genuine conversions based on conviction is found. The series of German converts of princely rank began in 1590 with the Margrave Jakob of Baden-Hachberg, later followed by the Count Palatine Wolfgang Wilhelm, Count Johann Ludwig of Nassau-Siegen, Margrave Christian Wilhelm of Brandenburg, Landgrave Friedrich of Hesse, and, in the years immediately after the Peace of Westphalia, Duke Ulrich of Württemberg, Duke Johann Friedrich of Braunschweig-Lüneburg, and Landgrave Ernst of Hesse-Rheinfels. It is obvious that in some of these conversions political and opportunistic motives played a part. For the conversion of scholars the disunity of the Protestants and the diversity of their doctrinal concepts were frequently given as motives, while the uniformity of the Catholic doctrinal system and the beauty of its worship exercised a powerful attraction. Outstanding among the large number of scholarly converts were: Friedrich Staphylus (d. 1563), former professor at Königsberg; the Hessian Johannes Pistorius (d. 1608), whose pamphlet Anatomia Lutheri (1595–98) enraged Protestants; the Marburg Jesuit Helferich Hunnius (d. 1636); the philologist Lukas Holstenius (d. 1661) of Hamburg, whose change of mind went back to the period of his Leiden activity and who, only after his conversion in Paris, was employed by Cardinal Francesco Barberini as librarian.

---

[1] Duhr, II,2, 66ff. J. Schacher, "Luzerner Akten zur Geschichte kath. Konvertiten 1580–1780," ZSKG 57 (1963), 1–36, 165–220, 303–41.

The religious conversations of the age varied from place to place. The colloquy arranged by Emperor Ferdinand I at Worms from 11–20 September 1557 was a straggler of the talks called for by Charles V to overcome a dilemma. Ferdinand's colloquy was sterile, for the Jena theologians, Flacius at their head, could not agree with the majority of the Protestant speakers led by Melanchthon, and these last refused to condemn doctrinal opinions not in accord with the original Confessio Augustana.[2] The Religious Colloquy of Baden (1589) had been summoned by the Margrave Jakob of Baden-Hachberg, the future convert. Its chief topic was the doctrine of justification. The Protestant spokesmen were Jakob Andreä and Jakob Heerbrand; the Catholic, the convert Pistorius and the Jesuit Busaeus. Pistorius was excluded from the Colloquy of Emmendigen, arranged the next year to discuss the doctrine of the Church.[3] The prospect of conversion was also the basis of the Regensburg Religious Colloquy of 1601, jointly convoked, after careful preparation, by Maximilian I of Bavaria and the strongly Lutheran Philip Ludwig of Palatinate-Neuburg. The topic was the relationship of Scripture and Tradition. In addition to Philip Ludwig, theologians from Württemberg, Electoral Saxony, and Brandenburg upheld the

---

[2] P. Canisii Epp. et Acta II, 125–180; ibid., p. 791, the list of the Catholic participants. Bishop Pflug of Naumburg presided. Further literature in Janssen, IV, 21–31.

[3] Acta des Colloquii zu Baden (1950); cf. A. Kleinschmidt, Jakob III., Markgraf zu Baden-Hachberg, der erste regierende Konvertit in Deutschland (Frankfurt a. M. 1875).

Protestant side; the Jesuits Gretser and Tanner, the Catholic view. No less than fifty-five controversial works came out of this discussion.[4] King Ladislaus of Poland summoned the Religious Colloquy of Torun in 1645 in the hope of ending the altercations going on within his country. In the number of participants—twenty-six Catholics, twenty-eight Lutherans, twenty-four Calvinists—it surpassed all earlier discussions, but it foundered at the outset on the question of the order of business.[5] Effective incentives for mutually drawing closer did not emanate from any one of these meetings, but came from elsewhere.

The humanist irenicists around the middle of the sixteenth century always started from the Erasmian distinction between the fundamental articles of faith, concerning which there was or at least could be agreement, and theological doctrinal opinions, which were to be left to free discussion; in them the traditional consciousness of the one Christianity lived on. However, there were not unimportant variations. Georg Witzel aspired to restore Christian unity by reform of the present Church and return to the ancient Church. His work on unity, Via regia, appeared posthumously in 1564.[6] Georg Cassander (d. 1566) became the most influential representative of this "Old Catholic" orientation. In his De officio pii et publicae tranquillitatis vere amantis Viri, composed on the occasion of the Religious Colloquy of Poissy (1561), he declared that all who accept the Apostles' Creed belong to the Church of Christ. The Consultatio de articulis inter Catholicos et Protestantes controversis (1564), ordered by Emperor Ferdinand I, specified as the sole practicable road to reunion a return to the faith and the institutions of the ancient Church, which for him was identified with the Age of Constantine and of the great Fathers of the Church.[7] But neither Witzel nor Cassander were regarded by Peter Canisius as real Catholics (vere et integre catholici), because they did not observe the decrees of the Council of Trent and the norms of a sound theology, and occasionally even deviated from the Catholic faith.[8] The influence of Erasmus continued predominant in the Pole Andreas Frycz Modrzewski (d. 1572), who as secretary of King

---

[4] W. Herbst, Das Regensburger Religionsgespräch von 1601 (Gütersloh 1928).

[5] K. E. Jordt Jorgensen, Ökumenische Bestrebungen unter den polnischen Protestanten bis zum Jahre 1645 (Copenhagen 1942); H. Schüssler, Georg Calixt. Theologie und Kirchenpolitik (Wiesbaden 1961), pp. 122–133.

[6] W. Trusen, Um die Reform und Einheit der Kirche. Zum Leben und Werk Georg Witzels (Münster 1956), pp. 77ff.

[7] M. E. Nolte, Georgius Cassander en zijn oecumenisch streven (Nijmegen 1951).

[8] P. Canisii Epp. et Acta VII, 553 (8 August 1580). According to Reusch, Der Index I, 361, Cassander's edition of ancient Church hymns was put on the Index of Trent, but not his work on union.

Sigismund Augustus influenced the latter's religious policy,[9] and in Michel de L'Hôpital (d. 1573), Catherine de Médicis's chancellor, who bridged humanist irenicism and the idea of state toleration and the group of politiques seeking an understanding with the Huguenots.[10] Cassander's ideas were taken up a half-century later by two Protestant irenicists, Grotius and Calixt.

The Dutchman Hugo Grotius (d. 1645), while he was imprisoned for having attacked the dominant strictly Calvinist line and for high treason (1619–21), developed the theological principles of his later efforts to bring closer especially the Protestant denominations, the Anglicans, and the Orthodox. Though as a boy he had sought to induce his Catholic mother to apostatize, because she "was too intelligent to remain a papist," toward the close of his life he drew nearer the Catholic Church by championing the apostolic succession, the hierarchy, and the Catholic concept of the Sacraments. He declared that the solution of the religious split, which with Erasmus he regarded as unnecessary and pernicious, was possible on the basis of the Confessio Augustana and, in the midst of the Thirty Years' War, outlined the ideal of a reconciled Magna Universitas Christianorum, headed by the supreme priest, the Pope.[11]

Whereas, on the side of the Reformed—partly from ecclesiastico-political motives, since Calvinism was not yet recognized in imperial law—exertions for the union of Protestants were never broken off, for example, the efforts of Philippe de Mornay Duplessis, Franz Junius, and John Dury, on the Lutheran side the "Old Catholic" tendencies present in Melanchthon were suppressed by orthodoxy and only reappeared with the Helmstedt theologian Georg Calixt (d. 1656). The principle of tradition, which at first (1629) he had sought to exploit against the Catholic Church, became the basis of his irenicism, which consciously made use of Cassander. Apostolicity and the universal consensus of the ancient Church on the fundamental articles of Christian faith constituted for him the only possible basis for reunion.[12] His viewpoint was violently attacked from the strict Lutheran side in the Anatomia Calixtina (1644), but some of his ideas recurred in the Mainz Plan of Union of 1660, which was probably connected with the efforts of Johann Philip von Schönborn, Elector of Mainz, to achieve a rapprochement of the denominations. This sought a reunion of the Lutherans, not of the Calvinists, with the Catholic Church on the basis of the Confessio Augustana, the marriage of priests, the lay chalice, and certain dogmatic and disciplinary concessions. As "reformed Catholics" they were to return to the obedience of the Pope.[13] The Elector remained aloof, and in Rome the project was presumably never given serious consideration.

---

[9] De republica emendanda (Basel 1559); cf. G. Schramm, "Modrevius-Forschungen," Jahrbücher fur Geschichte Osteuropas, NF 6 (1958), 352–373 (report on the literature).

[10] A. Buisson, Michel de L'Hôpital (Paris 1950), with excellent bibliography.

[11] Via ad pacem ecclesiasticam (Paris–Amsterdam 1642); to the works of J. Schlüter, R. Voeltzelt, and P. Polman (listed in LThK 2nd ed., IV, 1244) add J. Spörl, "Hugo Grotius und der Humanismus des 17. Jh.," HJ 55 (1935), 350–357; J. Cornelissen, "H. de Groot op den Index," Miscell. historica in honorem L. van der Essen II (Brussels 1947), 757–768; K. Repgen, "Grotius papizans," Reformata reformanda II, 370–400.

[12] E. L. T. Henke, Georg Calixt und seine Zeit, 2 vols. (Halle 1853f.); H. Schüssler, Georg Calixt. Theologie und Kirchenpolitik (Wiesbaden 1961).

Antipapal rather than irenic in tone was the project of union of the apostate Marcantonio de Dominis:[14] United in faith in Christ and in apostolicity, an Episcopal Church was to include the Protestants, without prejudice to certain doctrines proper to them; the Pope was the external symbol of unity but he must first restore their original rights to the members of the Church.

Different in principle from the efforts of the irenicists, though resembling them in their results, were the discussions on the lawfulness of toleration by the state. While the postulate that only one religion or denomination should prevail within a state remained essentially undisputed, it could not be maintained in practice. During the Huguenot Wars the politiques—the sons of the Connétable Montmorency, Cardinal Bellay, Maurillac, and others—advocated cooperation with and toleration of the Calvinists. According to Bodin (d. 1596), the monarch is obliged to preserve the religious unity of his country if it exists, but it must not be restored by force. Later Bodin inclined to the view that it is best to allow to each his own personal religion.[15] After Henry IV had granted religious liberty to the Huguenots in the Edict of Nantes, the English and the Dutch Catholics asked in vain for the same concession.[16] In Germany the Jena theologian Johann Gerhard (d. 1637) characterized unity of faith within a state as a desirable but scarcely realizable ideal. In the denominationally mixed state the prince might tolerate individuals of other faiths but not public worship for fear of serious disorders; excepted from toleration were Anabaptists and Unitarians.[17] And the Jesuit Martin Becanus (d. 1624), contradicting Bellarmine, knew a series of cases in which a Catholic prince may tolerate heretics in his territory: if they are in the majority or are more powerful than the Catholics or are supported by outside powers, and also if the use of force would impede their conversion.[18]

---

[13] A. P. Brück, "Der Mainzer Unionsplan aus dem Jahre 1660," Ehrengabe A. Schuchert (Mainz 1960), pp. 148–162.

[14] D. Cantimori, "L'utopia ecclesiologica di M. A. de Dominis," Problemi di vita religiosa in Italia nel Cinquecento (Padua 1960), pp. 103–122; on p. 111 the passage: "Neque componi potest dissensio neque partes ad concordiam possunt redire nisi restitutio fiat in integrum."

[15] J. Lecler, Histoire de la tolérance au siècle de la réforme I, 91ff., 153ff. E. Benz, "Der Toleranzgedanke in der Religionswissenschaft. Über den Heptaplomeres des J. Bodin," DVfLG 12 (1934), 540–571.

[16] R. Persons, Treatises tending to Mitigations towards Catholic Subjects in England (1607); cf. J. Lecler, op. cit., II, 383f.; H. Witte, Die Ansichten Jacobs I. v. England über Kirche und Staat mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der religiösen Toleranz (Berlin 1940).

Theories of State and Absolutism

In these theological exchanges over the permissibility of toleration by the state is reflected the power shift in the relations of state and Church since the religious cleavage. Earlier, during the Great Schism and the struggle against conciliarism, the papacy had had to court the secular powers. Now it was the princes first of all, and individuals only in the second place, who determined adherence to religion and creed. The Council of Trent took place in agreement with the princes, and only with their cooperation could it be enforced and implemented. To an even higher degree the Counter Reformation was their work. The power shift proceeded hand in hand with a change in the structure of the state, from a feudal to a modern bureaucratic state, with the development of princely absolutism and modern theories of government in which the way was prepared for its secularization.

Machiavelli's idea of the autonomous power state, subject to its proper law, the reason of state, slowly gained ground. In his apologia against Henry VIII Cardinal Pole had clearly recognized the threatening danger. Later writers, such as Giovanni Botero, for a time in Borromeo's service, believed it possible to transform Machiavelli's idea into a Christian one and thereby to neutralize it.[19] Bodin did not question the religious obligations of the prince, but subordinated the form and laws of the state to the concept of the sovereignty and the natural conditions of nations and individuals, in the final analysis to the welfare of the state.[20] Friends and enemies of Machiavelli derived arguments from Tacitus. Justus Lipsius, who revived him (though in 1591 he returned to the University of Louvain and to the Catholic Church) openly championed Machiavelli and his Politica (1589) was translated into five languages.[21] The Duke of Rohan, a coworker of Richelieu, made the statement that princes command peoples and interest commands princes.

---

[17] J. Lecler, op. cit., I, 289ff.; J. Wallmann, Die Theologiebegriff bei Johann Gerhard und Georg Calixt (Tübingen 1961).

[18] J. Lecler, op. cit., I, 292ff. On the penetration of Machiavellian ideas into England see G. Mosse, The Holy Pretence (Oxford 1957).

[19] Della ragion di stato (1589), n.ed. L. Firpo (Turin 1948).

[20] J. Bodin, Six livres de la république (1576); A. Schmitz, Staat und Kirche bei J. Bodin (Leipzig 1939); J. H. Franklin J. Bodin and the XVIth Century Revolution in the Methodology of Law and History (New York–London 1963).

The roots of princely absolutism reach back into the late Middle Ages, but its refinements, differing widely according to countries and people, were incontestably furthered, in both the Protestant and the Catholic area, by the religious split and its consequences. Considerable power accrued to the Protestant territorial princes through the formation of the territorial Church and the secularization of Church property. The Catholic princes not only made use of their right to determine the religion of their subjects; while protecting the Church and promoting reform and even reconquering lost territory for her, they extended their own authority in the ecclesiastical sphere, frequently with the consent or at least the toleration of the papacy. Roles were reversed: the state no longer afforded help to an imperiled Church, but the Church, even unconsciously and often unwillingly, aided a state that was becoming absolute.

The intrusion of the modern state into the ecclesiastical field is essentially different from the ascendancy of the lay power in the early medieval Western Christian family of nations. Now for the first time there arose a genuine Church establishment. The papacy defended the freedom and independence of the Church particularly against the claims of the dominant Catholic powers, Spain and France, but in most cases without any outstanding success. Papal decrees were subject to the royal placet; clerical privileges, such as the privilegium fori and the right of asylum, were curtailed; Church property was taxed, with or without papal authorization and in France by means of clerical contributions voted by the national assembly; the Inquisition and ecclesiastical censure of books were impeded or, as in Spain, nationalized. Even after the adjustment of the conflict with Rome, Venice tolerated the propaganda proceeding from the Dutch and English embassies, refused to readmit the Jesuits, and acted as protector of monasteries whose reform was demanded by the Curia. The Church was forced into a defensive position.

The doctrine of the right of resistance and of tyrannicide is to be explained by the increasing pressure of princely absolutism. In the last third of the sixteenth century assassinations of princes increased in number, and Bodin declared tyrannicide lawful. Nevertheless it created a sensation when the Spanish Jesuit Juan Mariana in his De rege et regis institutione (1599), dedicated to King Philip III, expounded the theory that a usurper may be killed by anyone, but a legitimate prince only if, in the general opinion (si vox populi adsit), he is destroying the state, despising religion and laws, and there is no other way of inducing him to cease from tyranny. These rules, unobjectionable in regard to content, were intended as a warning to princes who ruled in an absolutist manner, but since they were related to a thinly veiled approval of the assassination of Henry III of France the Sorbonne, on the basis of the decree of Constance against John Petit, condemned Mariana's book, and the Society's general, Acquaviva, disavowed it and forbade further debate.

---

[21] G. Oestreich, "J. Lipsius als Theoretiker des modernen Machtstaates," HZ 181 (1956), 31–78; id., "J. Lipsius in sua re," Festgabe Fritz Neubert (Berlin 1956), pp. 291–311. Other literature in LThK 2nd ed., VI, 1072.

Secularization of Thought

Even more portentous than absolutism and Church establishment, or than the rising secularization of the concept of the state, were the beginnings of the secularization of European thought in both the arts and the sciences. It must not only be assessed negatively as a natural process of maturation. It must also be regarded as a reaction to the extreme claims of theologians and their quarrels, to the recourse to ecclesiastical and political means of power in the religious sphere, and to the luxuriant growth of superstition. Skepticism and incredulity became a problem. A growing number of religious individualists, abandoning the central doctrines of the Christian faith, were rejected by the Catholic Church as well as by the Protestant denominations. And religious splintering proceeded noticeably. Unrelated to theology, there arose the "natural system of intellectual knowledge" (W. Dilthey). The natural sciences, with no regard for authority, based themselves on empirical observation and mathematical computation, but in the "Galileo Case" they encountered the Church's opposition.

In the "century that wanted to believe" superstition proliferated. Astrology was held in reverence, illness in man and beast was traced to magic, devils and witches were portrayed in the theater. The most frightful aberration of superstition, the witch trials, claimed thousands of innocent victims in both Catholic and Protestant Germany. In Gerolshofen, belonging to the see of Würzburg, ninety-nine witches were put to death in the year 1616; in Ellwangen, 167 in 1612; in Trier and its vicinity the witchcraft delusion required 306 victims in less than seven years from 1587 to 1593; in the Canton of Bern more than 300 within the decade 1591–1600. Only with great exertion did Johannes Kepler save his mother from the pyre. Duke Heinrich Julius of Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel (1589–1613) enjoyed the dubious fame of a zealous burner of witches.[22] Denunciations and the ruthless resort to torture to extort confessions released the basest instincts; not infrequently piety led to the suspicion of witchcraft. Although according to Janssen, "not a single example is known of Jesuits' having brought the ill-starred persons to the attention of the authorities or of ever having advocated their being burned," they were frequently accused of having instigated the trials. And in fact a majority of Jesuits, like the rest of their contemporaries, were under the spell of the witchcraft delusion, which they connected with diabolical possession; for example, Georg Scherer, Delrio, and Stengel. On the other hand, the moral theologians Tanner and Laymann warned against the illegal and inhuman conduct of the trials, and Friedrich von Spee (1591–1635), who, as confessor of many of the accused, knew at first hand their deep distress and despair, summoned the courage to brand the absurdity and the injustice of the trials as crying out to heaven, comparing them to the methods of Nero's persecution of Christians.[23] Within his own Order he met stiff resistance and was urged to leave it. Von Spee's Christian conscience was roused to indignation against the witch trials but he could not end them. It was inevitable that the reaction against the excesses perpetrated would one day bring into question the belief in a spiritual world.

The resort to ecclesiastical and political means of compulsion for the preservation of orthodoxy had already led, with Sebastian Castellio (d. 1563) and Jacobus Acontius (d. 1566–67), to the repudiation of any external force in the religious sphere. Religious individualists and groups, repelled and suppressed by the prevailing denominations, demanded freedom of conscience and of teaching; for example, the Arminians in Holland. Some even attacked the central dogma of the Trinity, especially Italians who had broken with the Christian faith and had fled from the Inquisition, usually into Switzerland. They had taken refuge, some in western, some in eastern Europe. Celio Secundo Curione lived in Basel until his death in 1569; Bernardino Ochino died in Moravia in 1565; Lelio Sozzini, who had attacked the dogma of the Trinity in his commentary on the prologue of the Fourth Gospel,[24] closed his turbulent wandering life at Zurich in 1562. Whereas the earlier anti-Trinitarians, such as Adam Pastoris, had drawn their objections from the Bible, the later ones were more rationalistic in their approach; for example, the Padua jurist Matteo Gribaldi, Giovanni Gentile (beheaded at Bern in 1566), and the physician Giorgio Blandrata, who drew from his Unitarianism the conclusion that, differing from Christianity, Judaism and Islam had preserved the true doctrine of the "One and Supreme." Poland became a refuge of anti-Trinitarians; as early as 1556 Papal Nuncio Lippomanni dealt with them in a report but without distinguishing between the different tendencies—Tritheists and Unitarians.

---

[22] Still of value are J. Hansen, Zauberwahn, Inquisition und Hexenprozess im MA und die Entstehung der grossen Hexenverfolgungen (Leipzig-Munich 1900); N. Paulus, Hexenwahn und Hexenprozess vornehmlich im 16. Jh. (Freiburg 1910); Janssen, VIII (Freiburg, 15th ed. 1924), 531–751; F. Merzbacher, Die Hexenprozesse in Franken (Munich 1957); W. Kramer, Kurtrierische Hexenprozesse im 16. und 17. Jh. (Munich 1959); H. Klein, "Die älteren Hexenprozesse im Lande Salzburg," Mitt. der Gesellschaft für Salzburger Landeskunde, 97 (1957), 17–50; popular and taking into account also France and England is K. Baschwitz, Hexen und Hexenprozesse (Munich 1963); other literature in LThK 2nd ed., V, 316–319.

[23] Cautio criminalis (Rinteln 1631) anonymous; German translation by J. F. Ritter (Weimar 1939); H. Zwetsloot, Friedrich Spee und die Hexenprozesse. Die Stellung und Bedeutung der Cautio criminalis in der Geschichte der Hexenverfolgungen (Trier 1954); E. Rosenfeld, F. Spee von Langenfeld (Berlin 1958); K. Honselmann, "F. von Spee und die Drucklegung seiner Mahnschrift gegen die Hexenprozesse," Westfäl. Zeitschrift 113 (1963), 427–54.

Unitarianism established itself between 1560 and 1568—Peter Gonesius constitutes a transitional stage. The "Polish Brethren" were partly inclined to Anabaptism, and hence the leader of the anti-Trinitarians, Fausto Sozzini (d. 1604), Lelio's nephew, prevailed only slowly. His catechism appeared in Polish in 1605. The sect's intellectual center was Rakow near Sandomir, where the general synod met annually and a secondary school flourished. But it was suppressed in 1638 and in 1658 the adherents of the sect were expelled from the country. Part of them took refuge in Holland; the historian of the Unitarians, Stanislaus Lubiniecki, found it in Hamburg.

In France François de Rabelais (d. 1553) had already posed the problem of unbelief. The skeptical outlook of Montaigne (d. 1592) was directed especially at the existing authorities and was compensated by a fideism, to which his friend, Pierre Charron (d. 1603), also subscribed in his Trois Vérité (1593), a defense of Christianity. Jean Pierre Camus, friend of Saint Francis de Sales, saw in Montaigne an ally against the rigid dogmatism of the Calvinists and defended him. The Jesuit Garasse recognized the mortal danger of skepticism and warned against it.[25] For René Descartes (d. 1650) methodical doubt was the beginning of philosophizing. His awareness of the sovereignty of constructive thought places him at the head of modern philosophy, emancipated from theology.

---

[24] Text in D. Cantimori–E. Feist, Per la storia degli Eretici italiani del secolo XVI in Europa (Rome 1937), pp. 61–78; A. Stella, "Ricerche sul Socianesimo," Bolletino dell'Instituto di storia della societa e dello Stato veneziano 3 (1961), 77–120. Written from a Marxist viewpoint and inadequate in content is A. Pirnat, Die Ideologie der Siebenbürger Antitrinitarier in den 1570er Jahren (Budapest 1961); cf. RHE 57 (1962), 602ff.; J. Tazbir, Stanislaw Lubiniecki, przywodca arianskie j emigrac ji (Warsaw 1961). For the Unitarian movement as a whole see E. M. Wilbur, History of Unitarianism, 2 vols. (Cambridge, Mass. 1945–52).

[25] R. H. Popkin, "Scepticism and the Counter-Reformation in France," ARG 51 (1960), 58–87; J. Lecler, "Un adversaire des libertins au début du XVIIe siècle, le P. François Garasse," Etudes 209 (1931), 553–572.

Though dependent on modern scholasticism in his doctrine of rights, and in particular on Francisco de Vitoria and Suarez, Hugo Grotius had preceded Descartes in understanding law as "an effective function of life, based on natural law and reason" (E. Wolf). The ethical foundation of law lies in man's social nature. Hence law is spiritually autonomous; its connection with theological and philosophical assumptions is not entirely broken but it is loosened. To this extent Grotius is the founder of modern natural and international law.

The rising independence of the arts, including history, was in itself a natural maturing of the European mind. It did not necessarily have to lead to conflict with the faith and with theology, no more than the constructing of a natural science on empirical observation and mathematical computation had to. The reason why the systems of natural philosophy, suspected of Pantheism, of the ex-Dominican Tommaso Campanella (d. 1639) and Giordano Bruno were, together with their creators, condemned by the Church lay in the nature of things and in the attitude of their representatives.

Far more momentous was Galileo's encounter with the Inquisition. Nicholas Copernicus (d. 1543) had dedicated to Paul III his De revolutionibus orbium coelestinum, which had endeavored to prove by mathematical arguments the motion of the earth around the sun. Since that time the "Copernican World System" had, like its preliminary steps in the Parisian natural philosophy of the fourteenth century, encountered no hostility from the Church. After 1594 the University of Salamanca made the text of Copernicus the basis of instruction. Luther, Melanchthon, Osiander, and the University of Tübingen attacked the Copernican system as contradicting Scripture. Nevertheless, it was further developed around the turn of the century. Johannes Kepler, court astronomer of Rudolf II, discovered the laws of planetary motion. Galileo Galilei (1564–1642), active in Florence from 1610, found confirmation of the Copernican system by observing the heavenly bodies, such as the moons of Jupiter. With the help of a telescope he constructed and defended it against objections drawn from Scripture (Josh. 10:12f., Ps. 103:5).[26] Following denunciation by the Dominican court preacher Lorini, Galileo was summoned before the Roman Inquisition. Until then he had enjoyed the greatest esteem in Rome's ecclesiastical circles and in 1611 had been admitted to the Papal Academy. But by his vehement efforts to demonstrate the compatibility of his system with a correct interpretation of Scripture, he so provoked the consultors of the Inquisition that on 24 February 1616 it declared his propositions on the standing of the sun and the movement of the earth as heretical or erroneous and forbade him to defend them in the future. He was not obliged to abjure them or to cease his investigations, and Pope Paul V granted him an audience and assured him of his protection. Just the same, on 5 March 1616 the work of Copernicus and all books that defended his system were placed on the Index. After the accession of Urban VIII Galileo, relying on the Pope's benevolence, dedicated to him his reply to a criticism by the Jesuit Grassi and, following a visit to Rome, was extolled "as the man whose fame shines forth in the sky and permeates the world." But when, confident of the Pope's favor, he published, with the Imprimatur of Riccardi, Master of the Sacred Palace, his Dialogues on the two most important World Systems in 1632, the Inquisition again summoned him on 23 September 1632, for having violated the earlier prohibition of 1616. Though during the second trial he declared that interiorly he did not adhere to the Copernican system, he was condemned on 22 June 1633 to abjuration and to life-imprisonment. He recanted and the imprisonment was commuted to a mild detention on his estate of Alcetri near Florence. The sequel to the Galileo trial was that his mathematico-physical concept of the world was not accepted by the Church and his chief work, Discorsi e dimostrazioni matematiche intorno a due nuove scienze (1638), the "first text in physics" (Von Laue), had to be printed in Leiden. Galileo's personal fate was determined by his taking into his own hands the resolving of the apparent contradiction between his conclusions from his study of natural science and scriptural revelation, instead of leaving it to theologians.

---

[26] Galileo to the Benedictine Castelli on 21 December 1613; Opere, ed. A. Favaro, V, 279–288.

A new epoch in Church history begins in the mid-seventeenth century. The Peace of Westphalia definitely settled denominational rights in the Empire and put a stop to the Counter Reformation as an ecclesiastico-political activity. It brought to a close the age of the Wars of Religion and at the same time shifted political powers. The Peace of the Pyrenees (1659) decided the struggle for European hegemony in favor of France, and a decade later the recognition of the English Navigation Acts by the States General of the Netherlands put the seal on England's maritime supremacy. Innocent X's protest against the religious articles of the Peace of Westphalia fell on deaf ears, and the papacy could not assert, even vis-à-vis the remaining Catholic powers, its authority as guarantor of supranational order. The already long-faded idea of Christianitas completely lost its significance in practical politics. However, the Church had been interiorly renewed since the Council of Trent and had overcome the crisis of the religious schism. She was asserting herself and was even able to recover lost ground, but to restore the unity of the Church had proven clearly impossible. Confessionalization divided the Christian peoples of the West into three sharply defined and quarrelling bodies—Catholics, Lutherans, and Calvinists—and lessened the convincing force of Christian thought. Forced into a defensive position, the Church was unable to master the religious and intellectual forces pressing to the surface, some of them released by the split, others having their roots deep in the late Middle Ages. She lost command, and a new crisis, the supreme crisis of the European mind, announced itself.

Parallel to, and often intertwined with, this changing relationship to the "world" were structural changes within the Church. Defense against Protestantism and inner renewal of the Church from the time of the Council of Trent were possible only because the papacy sharply tightened the reins of the central authority and, in a new centralization, very different from the medieval, strengthened the threatened members who were themselves too weak, by means of nuncios, controlled the bishops through the visitatio liminum, and in the congregations that were becoming stabilized and being organized as offices created an effective instrument, which, unlike the chancery and camera of the late Middle Ages, did not pursue a mainly financial end. The "Episcopalist" currents, which, becoming ever stronger in the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, resisted this tendency, left themselves open to suspicion because in part they attenuated or denied the Pope's primacy of jurisdiction, in part they relied on the protection of the national estate, as in France and Spain, or on secular means of power, as in the Holy Roman Empire. From the time of Bellarmine ecclesiology put the doctrine of the papal primacy in the center and caused the function of the college of bishops to withdraw into the background. After Trent no general council was summoned for more than three centuries.

The Tridentine doctrinal system and reform work, to which the Church owed her renewal and self-assertion, impressed their stamp on the Church's life and well-nigh became its unique form. The post-Tridentine Church was anti-Protestant and became anti-reform. Theological schools which had been unattacked in the Middle Ages, such as Augustinianism, were hard put to maintain themselves. Gratian and the older canon law lost their importance. And the historical picture of the Church which could have been obtained from the flourishing study of patrology and Church history became ineffectual. Just as liturgy in its post-Tridentine form hardened into rubricism, so canon law became formalistic and remained so for three whole centuries. Is one justified, then, in extending the "Tridentine epoch" of Church history or the "Counter Reformation" into the nineteenth century or even to the present?

It is not to be denied that certain characteristics of the post-Tridentine Church—her anti-Protestant orientation in doctrine and piety, her centralization and formalism—remained active after the time limit here treated, the middle of the seventeenth century. Nevertheless, it is misleading and ruinous to any effort to obtain an insight into the real historical process if the centuries that have elapsed since Trent are studied from the one viewpoint of the present, of ecumenism and the openness to the world as displayed by the Second Vatican Council, while the influence of the Enlightenment and of the great upheavals since the French Revolution—to cite only these examples—are treated as of little significance. It is no less one-sided, as our presentation has shown, to regard the schism in the Church as a tragedy only, while overlooking the deepening and activating of the religious life which it had as a consequence, the wealth of values which came to light in the Catholic Reform, in new and old Orders, in asceticism and mysticism, in piety and art, in missionary expansion on three continents. In the hard crust that was forming there lay hidden a precious kernel, a specific, not to be mistaken kernel, encountered only in this epoch. To throw it away as worthless, not to recall that every period of Church history stands directly before God, is unhistorical and presumptuous: unhistorical, because one cannot see the limits and possibilities of the pilgrim Church; presumptuous, because it means forgetting that even we are not in possession of the perfect. Instead we are awaiting it—and only then will we dispose of the standards for judging fairly.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

GENERAL BIBLIOGRAPHY

I. SOURCES FOR THE HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION AND COUNTER REFORMATION

1. General Aids, Dictionaries and Reference-works

A. v. Brandt, Werkzeug des Historikers (Stuttgart^{2} 1958; with bibliography); G. Wolf, Einführung in das Studium der neueren Geschichte (Berlin 1910); H. O. Meisner, Aktenkunde. Ein Handbuch für Archivbenutzer mit besonderer Berücksichtigung Brandenburg-Preussens (Leipzig^{2} 1952; with bibliography); A. Brennecke–W. Leesch, Archivkunde (Leipzig 1953); K. Haebler, Handbuch der Inkunabelkunde (Leipzig 1925); M. Geisberg, Der deutsche Einblattholzschnitt in der l. Hälfte des 16. Jahrhunderts (Munich 1923–30); Ch. Du Cange, Glossarium ad scriptores mediae et infimae latinitatis, 10 vols. (Niors 1883–88); M. Lexer, Mittelhochdeutsches Hand-Wörterbuch, 3 vols. (Leipzig 1872–78); id., Mittelhochdeutsches Taschen-WB (Leipzig^{24} 1944); A. Goetze, Frühneuhochdeutsches Glossar (Berlin^{5} 1956); H. Rössler–G. Franz, Biographisches Wörterbuch zur Deutschen Geschichte (Munich 1952); id., Sachwörterbuch zur Deutschen Geschichte (Munich 1958); E. Haberkern–J. F. Wallach, Hilfswörterbuch für Historiker (Bern-Munich 1964); H. Rudolph, Vollständig geographisch-topographisch statistisches Ortslexikon von Deutschland, 2 vols. (1859–68; including Austria); J. Penzler, Ritter's Geographisch-Statistisches Lexikon, 9th reprint, 2 vols. (1905–6); J. G. Th. Graesse, Orbis Latinus oder Verzeichnis der wichtigsten lat. Orts-und Ländernamen, revised ed. by F. Benedict (Berlin 1922); W. Maurer, Namenliste zur deutschen Geschichte des 16. Jahrhunderts, Part I: A-E (Leipzig 1941); A. Cappelli, Lexicon abbreviaturarum. Dizionario di abbreviature latine ed italiane (Milan^{6} 1961); id., Cronologia, Cronografia e Calendario perpetuo. Dal principio dell'Era Christiana ai giorni nostri (Milan 1930); Dictionary of National Biography (London 1885f.); G. Strauss, Sixteenth Century Germany: Its Geography and Topography (Madison, Wis. 1959); C. T. Martin, The Record Interpreter: A collection of Abbreviations (London 1949); M. S. Giuseppi, A Guide to the Manuscripts Preserved in the Public Record Office (London 1923–24), 2 vols. (supercedes F. S. Thomas, Handbook to the Public Records (London 1853); S. Scargil-Bird, Guide to the Principal Classes of Documents in the Public Record Office (London 1891, 1896, 1908); a new guide to the Public Record Office is in preparation; R. Hale, Guide to Photocopied Historical Material in the United States (Ithaca 1961); P. Haner (ed.), A Guide to the Archives and Manuscripts in the United States (New Haven 1961); D. H. Thomas–M. L. Case (eds.), Guide to the Diplomatic Archives of Western Europe (Philadelphia 1959); G. F. Howe et al., The American Historical Association's Guide to Historical Literature (New York 1961).

2. Sources and Bibliography

P. Herre, Quellenkunde zur Weltgeschichte (Leipzig 1910); Dahlmann-Waitz, Quellenkunde der deutschen Geschichte, ed. H. Haering, 2 vols. (Leipzig^{9} 1930–31; new edition in preparation); A. W. Pollard–G. R. Redgrave, A Short-Title-Catalogue of Books Printed in England, Scotland and Ireland, and of English Books Printed Abroad, 1475–1640 (The Bibliographical Society 1926); F. Schnabel, Deutschlands Quellen und Darstellungen in der Neuzeit I: Das Zeitalter der Reformation 1500–1550 (Leipzig 1931); G. Wolf, Quellenkunde der deutschen Reformationsgeschichte, 3 vols. (Gotha 1915, 1916 and 1922, two parts 1923); suppls. in Mitteilungen aus der historischen Literatur 45 (1916), 46 (1918), 51 (1923), 52 (1926), 55 (1927), 56 (1928), 57 (1929); L. Hain, Repertorium bibliographicum, 2 vols. (Stuttgart 1826–38; reprint Milan 1948); W. A. Coppinger, Supplement zu Hains Repertorium Bibliographicum Part I, II: 1, 2 (Milan 1950); G. W. Panzer, Annalen der älteren deutschen Literatur, 2 vols. (Nürnberg 1788–1805; reprint Hildesheim 1961); J. Weller, Repertorium typographicum. Die Deutsche Literatur im ersten Viertel des 16. Jahrhunderts (Nördlingen 1864; reprint Hildesheim 1961); Gesamtkatalog der Wiegendrucke, published by the Kommission für den Gesamtkatalog der Wiegendrucke (I–VII A-Ei) (1925–38); Th. Bestermann, Early Printed Books to the End of the Sixteenth Century (Geneva 1961); G. Franz, Bücherkunde zur deutschen Geschichte (Munich 1951); id., Bücherkunde zur Weltgeschichte (Munich 1956); W. Trillmich, Kleine Bücherkunde zur Geschichtswissenschaft (Hamburg 1949); G. Franz, Historische Kartographie, Forschung und Bibliographie (Bremen 1955); M. Arnim, Internationale Personalbibliographie, 3 vols. (Stuttgart 1952–63); G. M. Dutcher, Guide to Historical Literature (New York 1949; mainly Anglo-Saxon literature); H. Planitz-T. Buyken, Bibliographie zur deutschen Rechtsgeschichte (Frankfurt a. M. 1952) with index volume (to 1500; considers also legal ecclesiastical conditions); I. Dagens, Bibliographie Chronologique de la Litterature de Spiritualité et de ses sources (1501–1610) (Paris 1952); K. Schottenloher, Bibliographie zur deutschen Geschichte im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung 1517–85, 6 vols. (Leipzig^2 1956–58); VII, writings from 1938 to 1960 (Stuttgart 1966); Bibliographie de la Réforme, 1450–1648: I. Allemagne, Pais-Bas (Leiden 1958); II. Belgique, Suède, Norvège, Danemark, Irlande, Etats-Unis d'Amérique (ibid. 1960); III. Italie, Espagne, Portugal (ibid. 1961); IV. France, Angleterre, Suisse (ibid. 1963); H. J. Hillebrand, Bibliographie des Täufertums 1520–1630 (Gütersloh 1962); A. Goetze, Die hochdeutschen Drucker der Reformationszeit (Strassburg 1905); A. Kuczyński, Verzeichnis einer Sammlung von nahezu 3000 Flugschriften Luthers und seiner Zeitgenossen (Nieuwkoop 1955); Antiqua literarum monumenta autographa Lutheri aliorumque celebrium virorum ab A. 1517 usque ad A. 1546 (Brunswig 1690); Bibliotheca Missionum of Robert Streit, continued by Johannes Dindinger: I. Grundlegender und allgemeiner Teil (Münster 1916); II. Amerikanische Missionsliteratur 1493–1699 (Aachen 1924); IV. Asiatische Missionsliteratur 1245–1599 (Aachen 1928); V. Asiatische Missionsliteratur 1600–99 (Aachen 1929); XV. Afrikanische Missionsliteratur 1053–1599 (Freiburg 1951); XXI. Missionsliteratur von Australien und Ozeanien 1525–1950 (Freiburg 1955); Continued by Johannes Rommerskirchen and Josef Metzler: XXII. Grundlegender und allgemeiner Teil 1910–35 und Nachtrag zu Band I (Freiburg 1963); XXIII. Grundlegender und allgemeiner Teil 1936–60 (Freiburg 1964); S. Delacroix, Histoire Universelle des Missions Catholiques, 4 vols. (Paris 1956); L. Vriens–A. Disch (eds.), A Critical Bibliography of Missiology (Nymegen 1960).

3. SOURCES

GERMANY: J. Ch. Lüning, Teutsches Reichs-Archiv 22 (Leipzig 1719); Neue und vollständige Sammlung der Reichs-Abschiede, welche von den Zeiten Kayser Conrads des II bis jetzo auf den Teutschen Reichs-Tagen abgefasst worden sammt den wichtigsten Reichs-Schlüssen, 2 vols. (Frankfurt a. M. 1747); K. Lanz, Staatspapiere zur Geschichte des Kaisers Karl V. aus dem

Königlichen Archiv und der Bibliothèque de Bourgogne zu Brüssel (Stuttgart 1845); id., Correspondenz des Kaisers Karl V., 3 vols. (Leipzig 1846); J. Fiedler, Die Relationen der Botschafter Venedigs über Deutschland und Österreich im 17. Jahrhundert (Vienna 1866) (=Fontes rerum Austriacarum); J. J. I. Döllinger, Beiträge zur politischen, kirchlichen und Culturgeschichte der sechs letzten Jahrhunderte I: Dokumente zur Geschichte Kaiser Karls V., Philipps II. und ihrer Zeit. Aus spanischen Archiven (Regensburg 1862), III (Vienna 1882); Politische Korrespondenz der Stadt Strassburg im Zeitalter der Reformation, 5 vols. (Strassburg–Heidelberg 1882–1933); A. V. Druffel, Beiträge zur Reichgeschichte, 3 vols. (Munich 1873–82), Vol. 4 ed. K. Brandi (Munich 1896); Deutsche Reichstagsakten, Jüngere Reihe, ed. the Historischen Kommission bei der Bayerischen Adademie der Wissenschaften: I. A. Kluckhohn, Kaiserwahl 1519 (Gotha 1893); II. A. Wrede, Reichstag zu Worms 1520–21 (Gotha 1896); III. id., Nürnberger Reichstag 1522 u. 1523 (Gotha 1901); IV. id., Nürnberger Reichstag 1524 (Stuttgart 1905); VII. J. Kühn, 1. u. 2. anberaumter Reichstag zu Regensburg 1526–27; Schwäbische Bundestage 1527–28. Reichstag zu Speier 1529 (Stuttgart 1935); Acta Pacis Westfalicae, ed. M. Braubach–K. Repgen (Münster 1962f.); Briefe und Akten zur Geschichte des Dreissigjährigen Krieges, ed. the Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, 11 vols.: 1596–1613 (Leipzig 1870–1908); n. ed. 1618–51, Part II: 1-3: 1623–27 (Leipzig 1907f.); 4:1628–29 (Munich 1948).

FRANCE: Collection des documents inédits relatifs à l'histoire de France, to date 290 vols. (Paris 1836f.); Correspondance de Réformateurs dans les pays de langue française, ed. A. L. Herminjard, 9 vols. (Geneva–Paris 1866–7; reprinted Nieuwkoop 1966).

THE NETHERLANDS: L. P. Gachard, Collection des voyages des souverains des Pays-Bas (Brussels 1874); Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica, ed. S. Cranier–F. Pijper, 10 vols. ('s-Gravenhage 1903–4); Documenta Reformatoria, ed. J. N. Bakhuizen van den Brink et al., 2 vols. (Kampen 1960–62); G. Brom-A. H. L. Hensen, Romeinsche Bronnen voor den Kerkelijk-staatkundig toestand der Nederlanden in de 16de eeuw (Rijks geschiedkundige Publikatien . . . Groote serie 52) ('s-Gravenhage 1922); J. D. M. Cornelissen, Kerkelijken Toestand der Nederlanden onder de apostolische Vicarissen 1592–1727, Part 1, 1592–1651 ('s-Gravenhage 1932); Bibliotheca catholica Neerlandica impressa 1500–1727 (The Hague 1954).

ENGLAND: Calendar of State Papers Relating to English Affairs, ed. J. M. Rigg, 2 vols. (London 1961–62).

SPAIN: Colleción de documentos inéditos del Archivo general de la Corona de Aragón, 41 vols. (Barcelona 1847–1910).

REPORTS OF PAPAL NUNCIOS

GERMANY: Nuntiaturberichte aus Deutschland nebst ergänzenden Aktenstücken, Section I: 1533–59, 14 vols., ed. the Preussische Historische Institut in Rome (Gotha 1892–1912); more recently XIII: 1552–53, ed. H. Lutz (Tübingen 1959), XVI: 1550–54, ed. H. Goetz (Tübingen 1965); Erg. I: 1530–31, ed. G. Müller (Tübingen 1963); Section II: 1560–72, 7 vols. (1897–1953); Section III: 1572–85, 4 vols. (1894–1909); Section IV: 17th Century, 3 vols. (1895–1913); Nuntiaturberichte aus Deutschland nebst ergänzenden Aktenstücken 1585–1604, Section 2 with 6 vols., ed. the Görres-Gesellschaft (Paderborn 1895–1919); Editions of the Görres-Gesellschaft in addition to the Series "Nuntiaturberichte aus Deutschland" are: 1539–40; 1573–76 (Quellen und Forschungen aus dem Gebiete der Geschichte I (1892), V (1898); Details of the nuncio reports from Germany: H. Lutz, "Nuntiaturberichte aus Deutschland. Vergangenheit und Zukunft einer 'klassischen," Editionsreihe: QFIAB 45 (1965) 321–324.

BOHEMIA: Epistulae et Acta nuntiorum apostolicorum apud imperatorem 1592–1628 curis Instituti historici Bohemoslovenici (Rome–Prague 1932–46), III, IV, 1–312.

SWITZERLAND: Nuntiaturberichte aus der Schweiz, Part I, 1579–81, 3 vols. (Solothurn 1906–29).

FRANCE: Acta Nuntiaturae Gallicae, ed. the Gregoriana and the Ecole Française in Rome, 1535–46 and 1583–86, 3 vols. (Rome–Paris 1961–63), particulars in ZKG 75 (1964) 347–354.

BELGIUM: Analecta Vaticano Belgica. 2d series, ed. the Belgian Historical Institute in Rome, 1–10: 1596–1642 (=Nuntiatur in Flanders) (Brussels-Paris 1924–55; Section B, 1: 1634–39 (=Nuntiatur in Cologne) (Brussels-Rome 1956); 3: 1606–74 (Brussels-Rome 1958).

ITALY: Nunziature di Napoli, ed. the Instituto storico italiano per l'età moderna e contemporanea, I: 1570–77, revised by P. Vallani (Rome 1962); Nunziature di Venezia, I: 1533–35 revised by F. Gaeta, (Rome 1958); 2: 1536–42 (Rome 1960); Nunziature di Savoia, I: 1560–73, revised by F. Fonzi (Rome 1960).

SPAIN: Legaciones y nunciaturas en España I: 1466–86, ed. the Instituto español de historia eclesiastica, revised by A. J. Fernandez (Monumenta Hispaniae vaticana, 2 Secc.: Nunciatura I) (Rome 1963).

POLAND: Monumenta Poloniae Vaticana IV–VI, Series Nuntiaturae Poloniae, I: 1578–81 (1915), II: 1581–82 (1923–33), III: 1583 (1938).

REFORMATION: V. E. Löscher, Vollständige Reformations-Akta und Dokumente 1517–19 (Leipzig 1720–29); J. E. Kapp, Kleine Nachlese einiger zur Reformationsgeschichte nützlicher Urkunden (Leipzig 1727–33); Ch. G. Neudecker, Urkunden der Reformationszeit (Kassel 1836); Neues Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte der evangelischen Kirchenreformation I (Hamburg 1842); H. Laemmer, Monumenta Vaticana historiam ecclesiasticam saeculi XVI illustrantia (Freiburg 1861); O. Schade, Satiren und Pasquille aus der Reformationszeit 1–3 (Hanover ^{2}1863); P. Balan, Monumenta reformationis lutheranae (Regensburg 1881–84); Flugschriften aus der Reformationszeit, 19 vols. (Halle 1877–1928); Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahren der Reformation, ed. O. Clemen, 4 vols. (Halle 1906–11); Flugschriften aus der Reformationszeit in Facsimiledrucken, ed. O. Clemen (Leipzig 1921); Acta reformationis catholicae ecclesiam Germaniae concernentia saeculi XVI. The negotiations of the German episcopate on reform from 1520–70, I: 1520–32, II: 1532–42, ed. G. Pfeilschifter (Regensburg 1959–60); Schriften zur Kirchen- und Rechtsgeschichte, ed. E. Fabian, to date 31 vols. (Tübingen 1956f.); B. J. Kidd (ed.), Documents Illustrative of the Continental Reformation (Oxford 1911).

4. OLD DOCUMENTS WITH LISTED SOURCES

S. Franck, Chronica, Zeitbuch und Geschichtsbibell von anbegyn biss in diss gegenwertig iar verlangt (Ulm 1536); J. Cochlaeus, Commentaria de actis et scriptis Martini Lutheri (Mainz 1549); J. Sleidanus, De Statu religionis et reipublicae Carolo quinto Caesare Commentariorum libri XXVI (Strassburg 1555); O. Reginaldus (Reynald) and J. Laderchi, Caesaris Baronii Annales Ecclesiastici 31–37: 1513–71 (Paris 1878–83); L. v. Seckendorf, Commentarius historicus apologeticus de Lutheranismo sive de Reformatione religionis ductu D. Martini Lutheri . . . (Frankfurt–Leipzig 1688); Ch. A. Salig, Vollständige Historie der Augspurgischen Confession und derselben Apologie, 3 vols. (Halle 1730–35); P. Sarpi, Istoria del Concilio Tridentino (London 1619). Critical edition by S. Sambaria, 3 vols. (Bari 1935); P. Sforza Pallavicino, Istoria del Concilio di Trento, 2 vols. (Rome 1656–57); best edition by F. A. Zaccaria, 5 vols. (Faenza 1792–96); Texte zur Kirchen-und Theologiegeschichte, ed. G. Ruhbach, II: The beginning of the reformation historical writings (Melanchthon, Sleidanus, Flacius, and the Magdeburg Centuries) (Gütersloh 1966); J. Sandar, De Origine ac Progressu Schismatis Anglicani (Cologne 1585); T. Stapleton, Vita Thomae Morae in Tres Tomae (Cologne 1612); S. Cattely, ed. The Acts and Monuments of John Foxe, 8 vols. (Oxford 1837–41).

5. THEOLOGY

H. Hurter, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae II–III (Innsbruck 1906–7); Ch. Du Plessis d'Argentré, Collectio judiciorum de novis erroribus, 3 vols. (Paris 1724–36); Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense. Etudes et documents pour servir à l'histoire des doctrines chrétiennes dupuis la fin de l'âge apostolique jusqu'à la clôture du concile de Trente: Université Catholique et Collèges O. P. et S. J. de Louvain, Paris, 28 vols. (Louvain 1922ff.); Corpus Reformatorum (the works of Melancthon, Calvin, and Zwingli; to date 101 vols.) (Halle 1834ff.; Braunschweig 1853ff.; Berlin 1905; Leipzig 1908ff.; Zurich 1959ff.); D. Martin Luthers Werke. Kritische Gesamtausgabe ("Weimarer Ausgabe"), 58 vols. (Weimar 1883ff.); id., Die Deutsche Bibel, 12 vols. (Weimar 1906–61); id., Tischreden, 6 vols. (Weimar 1912–21); id., Briefwechsel, 12 vols. (Weimar 1930–67); Luthers Werke in Auswahl, ed. O. Clemen–E. Vogelsang–H. Rückert–E. Hirsch, 4 vols. (Berlin 1966) and 4 suppls. (Berlin 1959ff.); Klassiker des Protestantismus, ed. Ch. M. Schröder, I: Wegbereiter der Reformation, ed. G. A. Benrath (Bremen 1967), II: Der Glaube der Reformatoren, ed. F. Lau (Bremen 1964), III: Reformatorische Verkündigung und Lebensordnung, ed. R. Stupperich (Bremen 1963), IV: Der Linke Flügel der Reformation, ed. H. Fast (Bremen 1962); Corpus Catholicorum, Werke Katholischer Schriftsteller im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung, ed. J. Greving et al., to date 29 vols. (Münster 1919ff.).

6. COUNCILS, DOCTRINAL AND CANONICAL DECISIONS, CANON LAW

H. Quentin, J. D. Mansi et les Grandes Collections Conciliaires (Paris 1900); J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum Nova et Amplissima Collectio, 31 vols., to 1440 (Florence, then Venice 1759–98); n. ed. with additions 1902 by J. B. Martin–L. Petit, 60 vols. (Paris 1899–1927); J. Hardouin, Acta Conciliorum et Epistolae Decretales ac Constitutiones Summorum Pontificum, 12 vols. (Paris 1714–15); Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta, ed. Centro di Documentazione Bologna (Freiburg i. Br. 1962); J. Le Plat, Monumentorum ad Historiam Concilii Tridentini Potissimum Illustrandam Spectantium Amplissima Collectio, 7 vols. (Louvain 1781–87); Concilium Tridentinum, Diariorum, Actorum, Epistularum, Tractatuum Nova Collectio, ed. the Görres-Gesellschaft, to date 13 vols. (Freiburg 1901ff.); J. Doellinger, Ungedruckte Berichte und Tagebücher zur Geschichte des Concils von Trent, Abt. I–II (Nördlingen 1876); J. Sirmond, Concilia Antiqua Galliae, 3 vols. (Paris 1926) with suppl. by P. Delande (Paris 1966); J. Sáenz de Aguirre, Collectio Maxima Conciliorum Omnium Hispania et Novi Orbis, 4 vols. (Rome 1693); 2nd ed. by J. Catalanus, 6 vols. (Rome 1753–55); D. Wilkins, Concilia Magnae Britanniae et Hiberniae, 4 vols. (London 1737); J. Hartzheim, Concilia Germaniae, 11 vols. (Cologne 1759–90); H. Denzinger–A. Schönmetzer. Enchiridion Symbolorum, Definitionum et Declarationum de Rebus Fidei et Morum (Barcelona–Freiburg 1965); Corpus Confessionum, Die Bekenntnisschriften der Christenheit, Sammlung Grundlegender Urkunden aus Allen Kirchen der Gegenwart, ed. C. Fabricius (Berlin 1931ff.); Quellen zur Konfessionskunde:

Reihe A. Römisch-katholische Quellen, I, ed. D. Schmidt–W. Sucker (Lüneburg 1954–57). Reihe B. Protestantische Quellen, ed. K. Kinder et al., Heft I–VII (Lüneburg 1957–61); Die Bekenntnisschriften der Evangelisch-Lutherischen Kirche, ed. the Deutsche Evangelische Kirchenausschuss (Göttingen ^{5}1963); Die Bekenntnisschriften der Reformierten Kirche, ed. E. F. K. Müller (Leipzig 1903); Bekenntnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen der Nach Gottes Wort Reformierten Kirche, ed. W. Niesel (Zurich 1948); Reformierte Bekenntnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen in Deutscher Übersetzung, ed. P. Jacobs (Neukirchen 1949); W. Gussmann, Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte des Augsburgischen Bekenntnisses, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1911, Kassel 1930); Corpus Juris Canonici, the best edition of Editio Romana Iussu Gregorii XIII (Rome 1582); E. Friedberg, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1879–91); Codis Juris Canonici Fontes, ed. Petrus Card. Gasparri, since VII by Justinianus Card. Serédi, I–VIII and IX: Tabellae (Rome 1923–39); A. U. Richter, Die Evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jahrhunderts (1846); E. Sehling, Die Evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jahrhunderts. I–V (Leipzig 1902–13); VIff. (Tübingen 1955ff.); Bullarium Romanum, Editio Taurinensis by A. Tomassetti, 24 vols. (Turin 1857–72); C. Mirbt, Quellen zur Geschichte des Papsttums und des Römischen Katholizismus (Tübingen 1934); 6th ed., ed. K. Aland, I (Tübingen 1967); A. Mercati, Raccolta dei Concordati su Materie Ecclesiastiche tra la S. Sede e le Autorità Civili (1908–54), 2 vols. (Rome 1954).

7. CHURCH HIERARCHY

A. Ciaconius, Vitae et Res Gestae Pontificum Romanorum et S. R. E. Cardinalium III (Rome 1677); P. B. Gams, Series Episcoporum Ecclesiae Catholicae (Regensburg 1873; suppl. 1879–86 Graz 1957); C. Eubel, Hierarchia Catholica Medii et Recentioris Aevi II: 1431–1503, III: 1503–92, IV: 1592–1667 (Münster 1914–35).

8. HAGIOGRAPHY

Acta Sanctorum, ed. J. Bolland and his followers (Antwerp–Brussels–Tongerloo–Paris 1643ff., Venice 1734ff., Paris 1863ff.); H. Quentin–H. Delehaye (eds.), Martyrologium Hieronymianum=Acta SS Nov. II, 2 (Brussels 1931); H. Delehaye et al. (eds.), Martyrologium Romanum, Propylaeum ad Acta SS Decembris (Brussels 1940).

9. ORDERS

H. Urs v. Balthasar (ed.), Die Grossen Ordensregeln (Einsiedeln ^{2}1961); L. Holstenius–M. Brockie (eds.), Codex Regularum Monasticarum et Canonicarum, 6 vols. (Augsburg 1759); A. M. Zimmermann, Kalendarium Benedictinum, 4 vols. (Vienna 1933–38); J. M. Canivez (ed.), Statuta Capitulorum Generalium Ordinis Cisterciensis 1116–1786, 9 vols. (Louvain 1933); N. Backmund, Monasticon Praemonstratense, 3 vols. (Straubing 1949ff.); J. Le Paige, Bibliotheca Ordinis Praemonstratensis (Paris 1633); Bullarium Franciscanum I–IV (Rome 1759–68), V–VII (Rome 1898–1904), VIII (Quaracchi 1929), IX–X (ibid. 1939–49). Suppl. I (Rome 1780); suppl. II (Quaracchi 1908); Acta Ordinis Fratrum Minorum, I–V (Rome 1882–86), VIff. (Quaracchi 1887ff.); L. Wadding, Annales Ordinis Minorum, 30 vols. (Quaracchi 1931ff.); id., Scriptores Ordinis Minorum (Rome^3 1906); suppl., 4 vols. (Rome 1906–36); Bullarium Ordinis Fratrum Praedicatorum, 8 vols. (Rome 1729–49); Epitome Bull. OP (Rome 1898); Monumenta OP Historica, 14 vols. (Rome 1896–1904); cont'd (Paris 1931ff.); J. F. Ossinger, Bibliotheca Augustiniana historica (Ingolstadt–Augsburg 1768); J. Lanteri, Eremi Sacrae Augustinianae, 2 pts. (Rome 1874–75); id., Postrema Saecula Sex Religonis Augustinanae I–II (Tolentino 1858–59), III (Rome 1860); N. Crusenius, Pars Tertia Monastici Augustiniani I (Valladolid 1890); Acta Ordinis Eremitarum Sancti Augustini (Rome 1956ff.); Daniel a V. Maria, Speculum Carm., 2 vols. (Antwerp 1680); E. Monsignani, Bullarium Carm., 4 vols. (Rome 1715–68); B. Zimmermann, Monumenta Hist. Carm. I (Sérius 1905–07); G. Wessels, Acta Capit. General., 2 vols. (Rome 1914–34); C. de Villiers, Bibliotheca Carm., 2 vols. (Rome 1927); Annales Ordinis Servorum Mariae, 3 vols. (Lucca 1719); Monumenta Ordinis Servorum Mariae (Brussels–Rome 1917ff.; to date 20 vols.); Bibliotheca Scriptorum Ordinis Minorum S. Francisci Capuccinorum (Venice 1747); Appendix 1747–1852 (Rome 1852); Bullarium OFM Cap. I–VII (Rome 1740–52), VIII–X (Innsbruck 1883–84); Monumenta Historica OFM Cap., 8 vols. (Assisi–Rome 1937); Monumenta ad Constitutiones OFM Cap. (Rome 1916); Constitutiones OFM Cap. (Rome 1926); Ordinationes Capitulorum Gen. OFM Cap. (Rome 1928); Monumenta Historica Societatis Jesu, to date 70 vols. (Madrid 1894ff., Rome 1932ff.); C. Sommervogel, Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus, 9 vols. (Brussels–Paris 1890–1900); X-suppl. by E. M. Rivière (Toulouse 1911).

10. MISSIONS

Bullarium Patronatus Portugalliae Regum in Ecclesiis Africae, Asiae et Oceaniae . . . , ed. L. M. Jardão et al. 1–3 (Lisbon 1868–79) (=Bull. Patr.); Collección de Documentos Inéditos Relativos al Descubrimiento, Conquista y Colonización de las Posesiones Españolas en América y Oceania, 42 vols. (Madrid 1864–84); 2nd Series, 13 vols. (Madrid 1885ff.); P. Hernáez, ed., Colección de Bulas, Breves, y Otros Documentos Relativos a la Iglesia de America y Filipinas (Brussels 1879); Cuerpo de Documentos del Siglo XVI Sobre los Derechos de España en las Indias y las Filipinas, ed. L. Hanke-Millares Carlo (Mexico 1943); R. Ricard, Études et Documents pour l'Histoire de l'Espagne et du Portugal (Louvain 1931); Bullarium Pontificii de Propaganda Fide Pars Prima, ed. R. de Martinis, I (Rome 1888). Collectanea S. C. de Propaganda Fide I (Rome 1907).

II. NARRATIVE ACCOUNTS

1. GENERAL

Historia Mundi, ed. F. Valjavek, 10 vols. (Bern 1952–61), VIII: Übergang zur Moderne (1957); Handbuch der Weltgeschichte, ed. A. Randa, 2 vols. (Olten–Freiburg 1954–55); Propyläen-Weltgeschichte, ed. G. Mann–A. Heuss, 12 vols. (Berlin 1961ff.), VIII: Von der Reformation zur Revolution (1964); Histoire Générale des Religions, ed. R. Goree–R. Mortier, 5 vols. (Paris 1948–51), IV: Christianisme Medieval–Réforme Protestante; J. Pirenne, Les Grands Courants de l'Histoire Universelle, 6 vols. (Neuchatel 1939), revised (1944–58); The New Cambridge Modern History, ed. G. R. Elton, I–II: The Reformation (1493–1559) (Cambridge 1957–58); A. Ballesteros y Beretta, Historia de España, 9 vols. (Barcelona 1920–36), I–III in 2, revised (Barcelona 1943–48), IV on Hapsburg Spain (Barcelona 1926–27); J. Janssen, History of the German People at the Close of the Middle Ages, 8 vols. (London 1896–1925); O. Brandt–A. O. Meyer, Handbuch der Deutschen Geschichte II (Potsdam 1935–41), newly edited by L. Just, II (Constance 1953), incomplete; B. Gebhardt–H. Grundmann, Handbuch der Deutschen Geschichte II: Von der Reformation bis zum Ende des Absolutismus (Stuttgart 1955); H. Holborn, A History of Modern Germany I: The Reformation (New York 1959).

2. Handbooks of Church History

K. Müller, Kirchengeschichte II, 1–2 (Tübingen ^{3}1923); K. Bihlmeyer-H. Tüchle, Church History III (Westminster, Md., 1966); G. Krüger, Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte für Studierende III: H. Hermelink–W. Maurer, Reformation und Gegenreformation (Tübingen 1931); K. Heussi, Kompendium der Kirchengeschichte, (Tübingen 1960); A. Fliche–V. Martin, Histoire de l'Église 17: L. Christiani, L'Église à l'Époque du Concile de Trente (Paris 1948); 18: Après le Concile de Trente. La Restauration Catholique (1563–1648) (Paris 1960); R. G. Villoslada–B. Llorca, Historia de la Iglesia Católica III: La Iglesia en la Época del Renacimiento y de la Reforma Católica (Madrid 1961); K. D. Schmidt-E. Wolf, Die Kirche in ihrer Geschichte III, K: F. Lau-E. Bizer, Reformationsgeschichte Deutschlands bis 1555 (Göttingen 1964); L. J. Rogier et al., The Christian Centuries III: H. Tüchle, Reformation und Gegenreformation (Einsiedeln 1965).

3. Accounts from the Middle Ages to the Reformation

J. Haller, Papsttum und Kirchenreform. 4 Kapitel zur Geschichte des Ausgehenden Mittelalters (Berlin 1903); R. Stadelmann, Vom Geist des Ausgehenden Mittelalters (Halle–Saale 1929); W. E. Peukert, Die Grosse Wende. Das Apokalyptische Saeculum und Luther (Hamburg 1948; new impression, Darmstadt 1966); J. Huizinga, The Waning of the Middle Ages (New York 1937); The Cambridge Medieval History. vol. VIII, The Close of the Middle Ages, ed. by C. W. Previté-Orton–Z. N. Brooke (Cambridge 1936); W. K. Ferguson, Europe in Transition 1300–1520 (Boston 1962); S. H. Thompson, Europe in Renaissance and Reformation (New York 1963); G. Leff, Heresy in the Later Middle Ages, 2 vols. (Manchester 1966); W. Andreas, Deutschland vor der Reformation. Eine Zeitwende (Stuttgart–Berlin^{6} 1959); L. Spitz, The Renaissance and Reformation Movements (Chicago 1971); A. G. Dickens, The Age of Humanism and Reformation (Englewood Cliffs, N. J., 1972).

4. Accounts of the Reformation and of the Counter Reformation

L. von Ranke, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation (Berlin 1839–47). Akadamie-Ausgabe, ed. P. Joachimsen, 6 vols. (Munich 1925–26); I. Doellinger, Die Reformation, ihre innere Entwicklung und ihre Wirkung im Umfange des Lutherischen Bekenntnisses, 3 vols. (Regensburg 1848); W. Maurenbrecher, Geschichte der Katholischen Reformation I (Nördlingen 1880); G. Egelhaff, Deutsche Geschichte im 16. Jahrhundert bis zum Augsburger Religionsfrieden, 2 vols. (Stuttgart 1889–92); Friedrich von Bezold, Geschichte der Deutschen Reformation (Berlin 1890); M. Ritter, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Gegenreformation und des Dreissigjährigen Krieges, 3 vols. (Stuttgart 1889–1907); P. Imbert de la Tour, Les Origines de la Réforme, 3 vols. (Paris 1905–14), vol. I was reprinted in 1944; J. Menyz, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation, Gegenreformation, und des 30jährigen Krieges (Tübingen 1913); E. Fueter, Geschichte des Europäischen Staatensystems von 1492–1559 (Munich–Berlin 1919); G. Schnürer, Katholische Kirche und Kultur in der Barockzeit (Paderborn 1937); L. E. Binns, The Reformation in England (Hamden ^{2}1966); J. Lortz, The Reformation in Germany, 2 vols. (New York 1968); T. W. Windsay, A History of the Reformation, 2 vols. (Edinburgh 1948); T. Janelle, The Catholic Reformation (Milwaukee, Wis., 1949); K. Eder, Die Geschichte der Kirche im Zeitalter des Konfessionellen Absolutismus (1555 bis 1648) (Freiburg–Vienna 1949); G. Ritter, Die Neugesaltung Europas im 16. Jahrhundert. Die Kirchliche und Staatliche Wandlung im Zeitalter der Reformation und der Glaubenskämpfe

(Berlin 1950); A. Hymna, From Renaissance to Reformation (Grand Rapids, Mich., 1951); P. Joachimsen, Die Reformation als Epoche der Deutschen Geschichte, ed. Otto Schottenloher (Munich 1951); R. H. Bainton, The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century (Boston 1952); F. H. K. Green, Renaissance and Reformation (London 1952); M. Benediscioli, La Riforma Protestante (Rome 1952); id., La Riforma Cattolica (Rome 1958); H. J. Grimm, The Reformation Era (1500–1650) (New York 1973; extensive literature); E. H. Harbison, The Age of Reformation (New York 1955); H. Rössler, Europa im Zeitalter von Renaissance, Reformation, und Gegenreformation (1450–1650) (Munich 1956); K. Brandi, Deutsche Geschichte im Zeitalter der Reformation und Gegenreformation (Munich^3 1960); E. G. Léonard, Histoire Générale du Protestantisme, 2 vols. (Paris 1961), vol. I in English translation, The Reformation (London 1965); H. E. van Gelder, The Two Reformations in the 16th Century (The Hague 1961); W. Durant, The Reformation (New York 1957); R. Rousse–S. C. Neill, History of the Ecumenical Movement (London 1954); G. R. Elton, Reformation Europe 1517–59 (London 1963); H. Lutz, Christianitas Afflicta. Europa, das Reich und die Päpstliche Politik im Niedergang der Hegemonie Kaiser Karls V (Göttingen 1964); E. Hassinger, Das Werden des Neuzeitlichen Europa, 1300–1600 (Braunschweig 1964); A. G. Dickens, Reformation and Society in Sixteenth Century Europe (London 1966); O. Chadwick, The Reformation (Grand Rapids, Mich., 1965); H. Koenigsberger–G. Mosse, Europe in the Sixteenth Century (New York 1968); G. Swanson, Religion and Regime: A Sociological Account of the Reformation (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1967); J. P. Dolan, History of the Reformation. A Conciliatory Assessment of Opposite Views (New York 1965); F. Braudel, The Meditterranean and the Mediterranean World in the Age of Philip II, 2 vols. (New York 1972).

5. PAPAL AND CONCILIAR HISTORY

L. von Ranke, History of the Popes, 3 vols. (London 1873); L. von Pastor, History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages, 40 vols. (London 1891), esp. vols. VIII to XXX; F. X. Seppelt, Geschichte der Päpste IV–V, revised by G. Schwaiger (Munich 1957–59); C. J. Hefele–H. Leclercq, Histoire des Conciles VIII: 1472–1536 (Paris 1917–21); IX: Concile de Trente (Paris 1930–31); X: Les Décrets du Concile de Trente (Paris 1938); H. Jedin, Ecumenical Councils of the Catholic Church, (St. Louis 1960); id., A History of the Council of Trent I: Council and Reform from the Council of Basle to the Lateran Council; II: The First Sessions at Trent 1545–47 (Freiburg 1951); id., Das Konzil von Trient. Ein Überblick über die Erforschung seiner Geschichte (Rome 1948); K. Repgen, Die Römische Kurie und der Westfälische Friede. Idee und Wirklichkeit des Papsttums im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert I: Papst, Kaiser, und Reich 1521–1644, 2 parts (Tübingen 1962, 1965).

6. LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

G. Phillips, Kirchenrecht, 7 vols. (Regensburg 1845–72); VIII by F. Vering (ibid. 1889); F. v. Schulte, Geschichte der Quellen und Literatur des Canonischen Rechts (Stuttgart 1877–80; new impression, Graz 1956); P. Hinschius, System des katholischen Kirchenrechts I–VI (Berlin 1869–97; new impression, Graz 1959); R. Sohm, Kirchenrecht, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1892–1923); J. B. Sägmüller, Lehrbuch des kath. Kirchenrechts, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br. 1914); J. Freisen, Verfassungsgeschichte der katholischen Kirche Deutschlands in der Neuzeit (Leipzig–Berlin 1917); G. Holstein, Die Grundlagen des evangelischen Kirchenrechts (Tübingen 1928); E. Sehling, Geschichte der protestantischen Kirchenverfassung (Leipzig–Berlin 1930); B. Kurtscheid, Historia iuris canonici, 2 vols. (Rome 1941–43); F. Hartung, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte vom 15. Jahrhundert bis zur Gegenwart (Stuttgart 1959); H. E. Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte. Die katholische Kirche

(Cologne–Graz 1964; Lit.); E. Wolf, Ordnung der Kirche. Lehr- und Handbuch des Kirchenrechts auf ökumenischer Grundlage (Frankfurt 1961); H. Dombois, Das Recht der Gnade. Ökumenisches Kirchenrecht I (Witten 1961); W. Plöchl, Geschichte des Kirchenrechts III: Das katholische Kirchenrecht der Neuzeit (Vienna 1959).

7. RELIGIOUS ORDERS

P. Hélyot, Histoire des ordres monastiques, religieux et militaires, 8 vols. (Paris 1714–19); M. Heimbucher, Die Orden und Kongregationen der kath. Kirche, 3 vols. (Paderborn 1933–34); G. G. Coulton, Five Centuries of Religion, 4 vols. (Cambridge 1923–50) (from the eleventh cent. on); M. Escobar, Ordini e Congregazioni religiose, 2 vols. (Turin 1951–53); D. Pflanzer (ed.), Orden der Kirche, to date 4 vols. (Fribourg 1955ff.); J. Hasenberg–A. Wienand, Das Wirken der Orden und Klöster in Deutschland (Cologne 1957); Ph. Schmitz, Histoire de l'ordre de Saint Benôit, 6 vols. (Maredeous I–II; III–VI 1948–49); dt.: Geschichte des Benediktinerordens, 5 vols. (Einsiedeln 1947ff.); St. Hilpisch, Geschichte des benediktinischen Mönchtums (Freiburg 1929); id., Geschichte der Benediktinerinnen (St. Ottilien 1951); E. Martène, Histoire de la Congrégation de St-Maure, 9 vols. (Ligugé–Paris 1928–43); B. Grassl, Die Prämonstratenserorden (Tongerloo 1934); L. Lekai–A. Schneider, Geschichte und Wirken der weissen Mönche (Cologne 1958); A. M. Rossi, Manuale di Storia dell'Ordine dei Servi di Maria (Rome 1956); H. Holzapfel, Handbuch der Geschichte des Franziskanerordens (Freiburg 1909); Th. Ferrée, Histoire de l'ordre de S. François (Reims 1921); Lázaro de Aspurz, Manual de historia franciscana (Madrid 1954); A. Mortier, Histoire des maîtres généraux do l'ordre des frères prêcheurs (Paris 1903ff.); A. Walz, Compendium historiae ordinis Praedicatorum (Rome^{2} 1948); D. A. Perini, Bibliographia Augustiniana, 4 vols. (Florence 1929–35); P. Cuthbert–J. Wildlöcher, Die Kapuziner (Munich 1931); Bernardinus a Colpetrazzo, Historia ordinis fratrum minorum Capuccinorum 1525–93, 3 vols. (Rome 1939–41); Melchior a Pobladura, Historia generalis ordinis fratrum minorum Capuccinorum, 2 vols. (Rome 1947–48); Th. Graf, Zur Entstehung des Kapuzinerordens (Olten 1940); id., Die Kapuziner (Fribourg 1957); B. Duhr, Geschichte der Jesuiten in den Ländern deutscher Zunge, 4 vols. (Freiburg 1907–28); T. Sévérin, L'épopée des Jesuits (Liege ^{2}1946); P. Tacchi Venturi, Storia della Compagnia di Gesù in Italia (Rome 1950); R. G. Villoslada, Manual de Historia de la Compagnia de Jesús (Madrid 1954); H. Becher, Die Jesuiten (Munich 1961); O. Kapsner, Catholic Religious Orders (Collegeville, Minn., 1948); P. Kunkel, The Theatines in the History of the Catholic Reform Before the Establishment of Lutheranism (Wash., D. C. 1941); C. Hess, The Capuchins (New York 1929); Sr. M. Monica, Angela Merici and Her Teaching Idea, (London 1927); M. Jounandeau, St. Philip Neri (New York 1961); J. de Guibert, The Jesuits: Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice (Chicago 1964); R. Huber, A Documented History of the Franciscan Order, 1182–1517 (Wash., D. C. 1941); L. Lekai, The Cistercians (Kent State, Ohio 1977); W. Hinnebusch, The History of the Dominicans I (New York 1966).

8. HISTORY OF EDUCATION, UNIVERSITIES, SCHOOLS, CULTURE

E. Paulsen, Geschichte des gelehrten Unterrichts an den deutschen Schulen und Universitäten vom Ausgang des Mittelalters bis zur Gegenwart, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1919–21); J. van den Driesch–J. Esterhues, Geschichte der Erziehung und Bildung, 2 vols. (Paderborn 1956–57); A. C. Crombie, Augustine to Galileo. The History of Science 400–1560 (London 1957); St. de Irsay, Histoire des universités françaises et étrangères des origines à nos jours, 2 vols. (Paris 1933–35); P. Féret, La faculté de théologie de Paris et ses docteurs les plus célèbres, Époque moderne, 7 vols. (Paris 1890–1909); Th. Muther, Aus dem Universitäts-und Gelehrtenleben im Zeitalter der Reformation (Erlangen 1866); G. Kaufmann, Zwei katholische und zwei protestantische Universitäten vom 16–18. Jahrhundert (Ingolstadt–Wittenberg–Helmstedt–Freiburg i. Br.) (Munich 1920); H. Rückert, Die Stellung der Reformation zur mittelalterlichen Universität (Die Universität, Stuttgart 1933); L. Petry, "Die Reformation als Epoche der deutschen Universitätsgeschichte. Eine Zwischenbilanz" Festgabe J. Lortz, ed., E. Iserloh–P. Manns (Wiesbaden 1958), II: Glaube und Geschichte, 317–353; E. Bonjour, Die Universität Basel. Von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart 1460–1960 (Basel 1960); M. Curtis, Oxford and Cambridge in Transition, 1558–1642 (Oxford 1959); H. Porter, Reformation and Reaction in Tudor Cambridge (New York 1959); H. Barycz, Historja Uniwersytetu Jagiellonskiego w epoce Humanizmu (Cracow, 1935); N. Wood, The Reformation and English Education (London 1931). For art history of the period: The Pelican History of Art: A. Blunt, France, 1500–1700 (London 1953); H. K. Gerson–E. H. Kuile, Belgium, 1600–1800 (London 1960); E. Hempel, Central Europe, 1600–1800 (London 1965); G. Kubler–M. Soria, Spain and Portugal, 1500–1800 (London 1959); J. Rosenberg, Dutch Art and Architecture, 1600–1800 (London 1966); J. H. Summerson, Britain, 1530–1830 (London 1953); R. Wittkower, Italy; 1600–1750 (London 1958). On Music: The New Oxford History of Music: Ars Nova and the Renaissance, 1300–1540, III; The Age of Humanism, 1540–1630, IV (Oxford 1954–1968). H. Rashdall, The Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, (n.ed. in 3 vols. by F. Powicke–A. Emben) (Oxford 1958).

9. THE HISTORY OF DOGMA AND THEOLOGY

L. Maimbourg, Histoire du Lutheranisme, 2 vols. (Paris 1680); G. J. Planck, Geschichte der Entstehung, der Veränderungen und der Bildung unseres protestantischen Lehrbegriffs vom Anfang der Reformation bis zur Einführung der Concordienformel, 6 vols. (Leipzig 1791–1800); id., Geschichte der protestantischen Theologie von der Konkordienformel an bis in die Mitte des 18. Jahrhunderts (Göttingen 1831); J. A. Möhler, Symbolik oder Darstellung der dogmatischen Gegensätze der Katholiken und Protestanten nach ihren öffentlichen Bekenntnisschriften (Mainz 1832), critical edition by J. R. Geiselmann, 2 vols. (Cologne 1958–61); H. Laemmer, Die vortridentinische-katholische Theologie des Reformations-Zeitalters (Berlin 1858; new impression, Frankfurt a. M. 1966); K. Werner, Geschichte der apologetischen und polemischen Literatur der christlichen Theologie, 5 vols. (Schaffhausen 1861–67); id., Geschichte der kath. Theologie seit dem Trienter Concil bis zur Gegenwart (Munich–Leipzig 1889; new impression, Hildesheim 1965); J. A. Dorner, Geschichte der protestantischen Theologie, besonders in Deutschland (Munich 1867; new impression, Hildesheim 1965); O. Ritschl, Dogmengeschichte des Protestantismus, 4 vols. (Göttingen 1908–27); A. v. Harnack, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, 3 vols. ([1885–89] Tübingen 1931–32); F. Loofs, Leitfaden zum Studium der Dogmengeschichte ([1889] Tübingen 1959); R. Seeberg, Textbook of the History of Doctrines, 2 vols. (Philadelphia 1905); P. Wernle, Der evangelische Glaube nach den Hauptschriften der Reformatoren, 3 vols. (Luther, Zwingli, Calvin) (Tübingen 1918–19); E. Troeltsch, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, 2 vols. (New York 1949); W. Elert, Morphologie des Luthertums I: Theologie und Weltanschauung des Luthertums hauptsächlich im 16. und 17. Jahrhundert, II: Soziallehren und Sozialwirkungen des Luthertums (München [1931], 1952–53). English trans. of Vol. 1: The Structure of Lutheranism: The Theology and Philosophy of Life of Lutheranism, (St. Louis 1962); M. Grabmann, Die Geschichte der katholischen Theologie seit dem Ausgang der Väterzeit (Freiburg 1933); H. E. Weber, Reformation, Orthodoxie und Rationalismus, 2 vols. in 3 parts (Gütersloh 1937–40–51; new impression, Darmstadt 1966); C. Giacon, La seconda scolastica, 3 vols. (Milan 1946–50); W. Koehler, Dogmengeschichte. Von den Anfängen bis zur Reformation (Zurich 1951); id., Dogmengeschichte. Das Zeital- ter der Reformation (Zurich 1951); E. Hirsch, Geschichte der neueren evangelischen Theologie im Zusammenhang mit den allg. Bewegungen des europ. Denkens, 5 vols. (Gütersloh 1964); M. Werner, Der protestantische Weg des Glaubens, 2 vols. (Bern 1955–62); M. Schmaus–J. R. Geiselmann–A. Grillmeier, Handbuch der Dogmengeschichte (Freiburg 1951ff.); P. Jacobs, Theologie reformierter Bekenntnisschriften in Grundzügen (Neukirchen 1959); H. A. Oberman, The Harvest of Medieval Theology (Cambridge, Mass., 1963); F. Stegmüller, Geschichte des Molinismus I (Munich 1935).

10. HAGIOGRAPHY AND ICONOGRAPHY

R. Aigrain, L'Hagiographie. Ses sources, ses méthodes, son histoire (Paris 1953); P. Peeters, L'oeuvre des Bollandistes (Brüssel 1961); F. Doye, Heilige und Selige der römisch-katholischen Kirche. Deren Erkennungszeichen, Patronate und lebensgeschichtliche Bemerkungen, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1929); J. Baudot et Chaussin, Vies des Saints et des Bienheureux selon l'ordre du calendrier avec l'historique des fêtes, 13 vols. (Paris 1935–59); J. Torsy, Lexikon der deutschen Heiligen (Köln 1959); P. Manns (ed.), Die Heiligen in ihrer Zeit (Mainz 1967); Bibliotheca Sanctorum, ed. Istituto Giovanni XXIII, to date 8 vols. (A-Mar) (Rome 1961–67); K. Künstle, Iconographie der christlichen Kunst, 2 vols. (Freiburg 1926–28); J. Braun, Tracht und Attribute der Heiligen in der deutschen Kunst (Stuttgart 1943); L. Réau, Iconographie de l'art chrétien, 3 vols. (Paris 1955–58).

11. LITURGY

Liturgisch Woordenboek, ed. L. Brinkhoff et al., 2 vols. (Roermond 1962ff.); L. Eisenhofer, Handbuch der katholischen Liturgie, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Br.^{2} 1941); J. A. Jungmann, The Mass of the Roman Rite, History of the Liturgy, Vol. I trans. F. A. Brunner (New York 1951); M. Righetti, Manuale di storia liturgica, 4 vols. (Milan: I, 1950; II, 1955; III, 1964; IV, 1955); A. G. Martimort, Handbuch der Liturgiewissenschaft I (Freiburg 1963); Th. Klauser, Kleine abendländische Liturgiegeschichte. Bericht u. Besinnung (Bonn 1965); Leiturgia, Handbuch des evangelischen Gottesdienstes, ed. K. F. Müller–W. Blankenburg, 4 vols. (Kassel 1954–61); P. Graff, Geschichte der Auflösung der alten gottesdienstlichen Formen in der evangelischen Kirche Deutschlands, 2 vols. (Göttingen 1937–39); Ph. Wackernagel. Das dt. Kirchenlied von der ältesten Zeit bis zu Anfang des 17. Jahrhunderts, 5 vols. (Leipzig 1864–77); W. Bäumker, Das katholische deutsche Kirchenlied in seinen Singweisen von den frühesten Zeiten bis gegen Ende des 17. Jahrhunderts, 4 vols. (Freiburg 1883–1911).

12. MISSIONS

J. Schmidlin, Katholische Missionsgeschichte (Steyl o. J. [1925]); Histoire universelle des missions catholiques I–II, ed. S. Delacroix (Paris 1956–57); K. S. Latourette, A History of the Expansion of Christianity III (New York–London 1939); A. Mulders, Missionsgeschichte. Die Ausbreitung des katholischen Glaubens (Regensburg 1960); A. Jann, Die Katholischen Missionen in Indien, China und Japan. Ihre Organisation und das portugisische Patronat vom 15. bis 18. Jahrhundert (Paderborn 1915); R. Aubenas–R. Ricard, L'Église et la renaissance: Fliche-Jarry XV (Paris 1951).

BIBLIOGRAPHY TO INDIVIDUAL CHAPTERS

Part One

The Protestant Reformation

SECTION ONE

Martin Luther and the Coming of the Reformation (1517–25)

1. Causes of the Reformation

Literature

G. v. Below, Die Ursachen der Reformation (Munich 1917); J. Haller, Die Ursachen der Reformation (Tübingen 1917); J. Hashagen, Staat und Kirche vor der Reformation (Essen 1931); W. Andreas, Deutschland vor der Reformation (Stuttgart 1932, 1948); J. Lortz, Die Reformation als religiöses Anliegen heute (Trier 1948); id., Wie kam es zur Reformation? (Einsiedeln 1955); id., Zur Problematik der kirchlichen Missstände im Spätmittelalter (Trier 1950: SD from TThZ 58, 1949); H. Rückert, "Die geistesgeschichtliche Einordnung der Reformation" ZThK 52 (1955) 43–64; R. Post, Kerkelijke verhoudingen voor de Reformatie (Utrecht 1955); L. Spitz, The Reformation: Material or Spiritual (Boston 1962) selections of recent interpretations; H. J. Grimm, "Social Forces in the German Reformation" CH XXXI (1962) 3–13; H. A. Oberman, Forerunners of the Reformation (New York 1966).

2. Martin Luther: The Early Years

Sources

The first edition of Luther's collected works appeared during his own lifetime at the insistence of the Saxon Elector Johann Friedrich and his friends. This Wittenberg edition appeared in German in fifteen volumes between 1539 and 1559 and a Latin edition in seven volumes appeared between 1545 and 1557. The Jena edition, more complete and reliable, appeared between 1555 and 1558, eight volumes in German and four in Latin. J. Aurifaber edited a "Comprehensive Eisleben" addition to the Jena volumes in 1564–1565. Meanwhile, the ten-volume Altenburg edition with a better chronological order and an index appeared. This was enlarged in 1702 by J. G. Zeidler in his Halle Supplement. The Altenburg, Eisleben, and Halle volumes formed the basis for the twenty-two-volume Leipzig edition which appeared between 1728 and 1734. Johann Georg Walch published the twenty-four-volume Halle edition between 1740 and 1753 which included introductory material as well as other reformatory writings including those of the opponents of Luther. The Latin works were translated into German. In 1826 Johann Georg Plochmann and Johann Konrad Irmischer began the Erlangen edition. The German section contains some sixty-seven volumes of which volumes 1–20 and 24–26 were revised by E. L. Enders (1862–85). The Latin section remained incomplete with thirty-eight volumes. To this was added the correspondence in nineteen volumes (Frankfurt, 1884–1932) edited by E. L. Enders, G. Kawerau, and P. Fleming. Due to the great advances made in Luther studies, the Erlangen edition was outdated before its completion. Hence J. F. K. Knaake during the jubilee year of 1883 began the new critical Weimar edition (Martin Luthers Werke, Kritische Ausgabe). After completing the first two volumes himself he was forced to call upon the assistance of collaborators among philologists and theologians. The project consists of the chief writings, sermons, lectures, and disputations arranged in chronological order with critical footnotes. By 1921 the Table Talk was finished in six volumes; the Works fill an entire sixty-nine volumes; the Letters comprise eleven volumes and the German Bible ranges over twelve volumes. The first part of volume 58, released in 1948, is an index of previous volumes. The first, Lectures on the Psalms (1513–15) WA 3 and 4, was revised and other volumes have been photographically reproduced; vol. 32 in 1963; 33 in 1961; vol. 40, 1st and 2nd sections, in 1962. The new editions do not contain the emendations, supplements, citations, and indices, rather they are found in additional revisions published separately. The Berlin student edition "Luthers Werke in Auswahl" (four vols. Berlin ^{6}1966) and a compendium 1950–55 by O. Clemen, E. Vogelsang, and E. Hirsch is based upon the Weimar edition.

ENGLISH EDITIONS: The "Philadelphia Edition" Works of Martin Luther, ed. by H. E. Jacobs, 6 vols. (Philadelphia 1915–43). Luther's Correspondence (selections), ed. by P. Smith, 2 vols. (Philadelphia 1913–18). An American edition of Luther's Works in English (LW) St. Louis, 1955ff. by J. Pelikan is in the process of completion. As planned it will include fifty-five volumes. The first thirty volumes are to contain Luther's expositions of various Biblical works, the remaining volumes will contain his Reformation writings and other occasional pieces. The final volume will be an index, quotes, proper names, topics, and a glossary of technical terms. Volume 26 (1963) contains Luther's lectures on Galatians (1535) chaps. 1–4. The Library of Christian Classics also contains a number of Luther's works in translation, including his Lecture on Romans, Scholea vol. XV (Philadelphia 1961) and vol. XVI (Philadelphia 1962). Early Theological Works containing Lectures on the Epistle to the Hebrews 1517–18, disputation against "Scholastic Theology" 1517, Heidelberg Disputation, 1518, and Answer to Latomus (poor translation) appeared in Works of Martin Luther (WML, Philadelphia 1965).

GUIDE TO LUTHER'S WORKS AND EDITIONS: G. Kawerau, Luthers Schriften (SVRG 147) (Leipzig ^{2}1929); K. Aland, Hilfsbuch zum Lutherstudium (Berlin ^{2}1958); H. Volz, RGG IV (^{3}1960) 520–523 (lit.); G. S. Robert, "A Checklist of Luther's Writings in English" Concordia Theological Monthly XXXVI (1965) 772–792; K. Hagen and J. Bigane, Annotated Bibliography of Luther Studies, 1967–1976 (Sixteenth Century Bibliography, No. 9) (St. Louis 1977).

BIBLIOGRAPHY

LITERATURE

1. BIOGRAPHIES AND GENERAL WORKS: J. Köstlin–G. Kawerau, Martin Luther. Sein Leben und seine Schriften, 2 vols. (Berlin ^{5}1903); H. Denifle, Luther und Luthertum, 2 vols. and 2 suppl. (Mainz 1904–9); Grisar, 3 vols. (Freiburg 1924–25) English trans. 6 vols. (London 1913–17); id., Martin Luthers Leben und sein Werk (Freiburg 1927); K. Holl, Gesammelte Aufsätze KG I: Luther (Tübingen 1948); G. Ritter, Luther (New York 1963); R. Thiel, Luther (1933–35, Berlin–Stuttgart 1952); J. Lortz, Reformation (Westminister, Md. 1964); P. J. St. Reiter, Martin Luther's Umwelt, Charakter und Psychose, 2 vols. (Copenhagen 1937–41); R. H. Bainton, Here I Stand. A Life of Martin Luther (New York 1950); H. Bornkamm, Luther's World of Thought (London 1958); id., Das Jh. der Reformation (Göttingen 1961); H. Fausel, Martin Luther. Sein Werden im Spiegel eigener Zeugnisse (Stuttgart 1955); F. Lau, Luther (Philadelphia 1963); J. Mackinnon, Martin Luther and the Reformation, 4 vols. (London 1925–30); H. Boehmer, Road to Reformation (St. Louis 1946); R. H. Fife, The Revolt of Martin Luther (New York 1957); G. Rupp, Luther's Progress to the Diet of Worms (New York 1964); E. S. Schweibert, Luther and His Times (St. Louis 1950); V. H. H. Green, Luther and the Reformation (London 1964).

2. LUTHER'S THEOLOGY: Th. Harnack, Luthers Theologie mit besonderer Beziehung auf seine Versöhnunge- und Erlösungslehre, 2 vols. (1862–86, new printing, Munich 1927); J. Köstlin, Luthers Theologie in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und ihrem inneren Zusammenhang, 2 vols. (Stuttgart 1901); R. Seeberg, Dogmengeschichte IV, 1 (Leipzig 1933, new printing, Basel 1953); E. Seeburg, Luthers Theol. I: Die Gottesanschauung (Göttingen 1929), II: Christus (Stuttgart 1937); id., Luthers Theologie in ihren Grundzügen (Stuttgart 1950); W. v. Loewenich, Luthers Theologia crucis (Munich 1954); Ph. S. Watson, Um Gottes Gottheit. Einf. in Luthers Theologie (Berlin 1952); R. Hermann, Gesammelte Studien zur Theologie Luthers (Göttingen 1960); R. Prenter, Spiritus Creator, Studien zu Luthers Theologie (Munich 1954); E. Seeberg, Textbook of the History of Doctrine (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1964) 221–306; W. Ebert, The Structure of Lutheranism (St. Louis 1962); J. Pelikan, Obedient Rebels (New York 1964); J. Dillenberger, God, Hidden and Revealed (Philadelphia 1953); J. M. Headley, Luther's View of Church History (New Haven 1963); P. Althaus, Die Theologie M. Luthers (Gütersloh 1963); id., Die Ethik M. Luthers (Gütersloh 1965); L. Pinomaa, Sieg des Glaubens, Grundlinien der Theologie Luthers (Göttingen 1964); I. Asheim (ed.), Kirche, Mystik, Heiligung und das Natürliche bei Luther (Göttingen 1967).

3. LUTHER STUDIES: H. Boehmer, Luther im Lichte der neueren Forschung (Leipzig 1906, 1918); E. Wolf, "Über neuere Lutherliteratur u. den Gang der Lutherforschung" Christentum und Wissenschaft 10 (1934) 6–21, 203–219, 259–273, 437–457; H. Hermelink, "Die neuere Lutherforschung" ThR NF 7 (1935) 63–85, 131–165; V. Vajta, Lutherforschung heute (Berlin 1958) contains summaries of research in various countries, presented at first International Congress for Luther Research at Arhus, Denmark, 1956; D. Löfgren, "Verschiedene Tendenzen in der neueren Lutherforschung" KuD 5 (1959) 146–164; G. Müller, "Neuere Lit. zur Theologie des jungen Luther" KuD 11 (1965) 325–357; W. Pauck, "The Historiography of the German Reformation in the Past Twenty Years" CH IX (1940) 305–340; J. Dillenberger, "Major Volumes and Selected Periodical Literature in Luther Studies, 1956–1959" CH XXX (1961) 61–87; H. Grimm, "Luther Research Since 1920" Journal of Modern History XXXII (1960) 105–118; id., The Reformation in Historical Thought (New York 1946).

4. HISTORY OF THE UNDERSTANDING OF LUTHER: H. Stephan, Luther in den

Wandlungen seiner Kirche (1907, Berlin 1951); O. Wolff, Die Haupttypen der neueren Lutherdeutung (Stuttgart 1938); A. Herte, Das kath. Lutherbild im Bann der Lutherkommentare des Cochläus, 3 vols. (Münster 1943); E. W. Zeeden, Martin Luther and the Reformation in the Estimation of the German Lutherans (London 1954) id., "Die Deutung Luthers und der Reformation" ThQ 140 (1960) 129–162; H. Bornkamm, Luther im Spiegel dt. Geistesgeschichte (Heidelberg 1952); English trans. Luther's World of Thought (St. Louis 1958); W. Seibel, Martin Luther. Wandlungen des Lutherbildes (Kevelaer 1962); Wandlungen des Lutherbildes, Stud. u. Ber. d. kath. Akad. in Bayern, ed. K. Foster, H. 36 (Würzburg 1966). E. Carlson, The Reinterpretation of Luther (Philadelphia 1948).

5. The Young Luther: O. Scheel, Martin Luther. Vom Katholizismus zur Reformation, 2 vols. (Tübingen 1921–30); id., Dokumente zu Luthers Entwicklung (Tübingen 1929); H. v. Schubert, Luthers Frühentwicklung bis 1517 (Leipzig 1916); E. Wolf, Staupitz und Luther (Leipzig 1927); id., "Johann v. Staupitz und die theol. Anfänge Luthers" LuJ II (1929) 43–86; H. Boehmer, Road to Reformation (Philadelphia 1946); K. A. Meissinger, Der kath. Luther (Munich 1952); M. Werner, "Psychologisches zum Klostererlebnis Martin Luthers" Schweizer Zschr. für Psychologie 7 (1948) 1–18; F. Lau, "Luthers Eintritt ins Erfurter Augustinerkloster" Luther 27 (1956) 49–70; E. Iserloh, "Luther-Kritik oder Luther-Polemik?" Festgabe J. Lortz I (Baden-Baden 1958) 15–42; E. H. Erikson, Young Man Luther (New York 1962); H. Strohl, Luther jusqu'en 1520 (Paris ^{2}1962); S. Rupp, Luther's Progress to the Diet of Worms (New York ^{2}1962); J. von Rohr, "The Sources of Luther's Self-despair in the Monastery" Journal of Bible and Religion XIX (1951) 6–11; R. Bainton, "Luther's Struggle for Faith" CH XVIII, 193–206.

6. Luther and the Theology of the Late Middle Ages: F. Benary, Zur Geschichte der Stadt und Universität Erfurt ("via antiqua" and "via moderna" at the German universities of the Middle Ages with special attention to the University of Erfurt) (Gotha 1919); H. Rommel, Über Luthers Randbemerkungen (Diss., Kiel 1931); A. Hamel, Der junge Luther und Augustin, 2 vols. (1934–35); P. Vignaux, Luther: Commentateur des Sentences (Paris 1935); id., "Sur Luther et Ockham" FStud 32 (1950) 21—30; E. Vogelsang, "Luther und die Mystik" LuJ 19 (1937) 32–54; W. Kohlschmidt, Luther und die Mystik (Diss., Hamburg 1936); W. Link, Das Ringen Luthers um die Freiheit der Theologie von der Philosophie (Munich 1955); R. Weijenborg, "La Charité dans la première théologie de Luther" RHE 45 (1950) 617–669; A. Gyllenkrok, Rechtfertigung und Heiligung in der frühen ev. Theologie Luthers (Uppsala 1952); W. Jetter, Die Taufe beim jungen Luther (Tübingen 1954); B. Hägglund, Theologie und Philosophie bei Luther und in der occamistischen Tradition (Lund 1955); E. Iserloh, Gnade und Eucharistie in der philos. Theologie des W. v. Ockham (Wiesbaden 1956); H. Beintker, "Neues Material über die Beziehungen Luthers zum ma. Augustinismus" ZKG 68 (1957) 144–148; E. Bizer, Fides ex auditu (Neukirchen 1958); L. Grane, Contra Gabrielem (Byldendal 1962); R. Schwarz, Fides, spes und caritas beim jungen Luther (Berlin 1962); K. Bauer, Die Wittenberger Universitätstheologie und die Anfänge der Reformation (Tubingen 1928); A. Zumkeller, "Die Augustinertheologen Simon Fidati von Cascia u. Hugolin von Orvieto u. M. Luthers Kritik an Aristoteles" ARG 54 (1963) 15–36.

7. Luther's Journey to Rome: H. Boehmer, Luthers Romfahrt (Leipzig 1913); R. Weijenborg, "Neuentdeckte Dokumente im Zshg. mit Luthers Romreise" Antonianum 32 (1957) 147–202.

8. Lecture on Psalms: Text: WA 3; 4; Selection Cl V, 38–221; LW vols. 12, 13, and 14. Literature: A. W. Hunzinger, Luthers Neuplatonismus in der Psalmen-Vorlesung von 1513–16 (Leipzig 1906); K. A. Meissinger, Luthers Exegese der Frühzeit (Leipzig 1911); H. Thomas, Zur Würdigung der Psalmen-Vorlesung Luthers von 1513–15 (Weimar 1920); H. Boehmer, Luthers 1. Vorlesung (Leipzig 1924); J. Ficker, "Luthers 1. Vorlesung -welche?" ThStk 100 (1927–28) 348–353; E. Vogelsang, Die Anfänge von Luthers Christologie nach der 1. Psalmen-Vorlesung (Berlin–Leipzig 1929); H. Lang, "Die Rechtfertigungslehre in Luthers 1. Psalmen-Vorlesung" NKZ 40 (1929) 549–564; F. Huck, "Die Entwicklung der Christologie Luthers von der Psalmen- zur Römervorlesung" ThStK 102 (1930) 61–142; A. Hamel, Der junge Luther und Augustin, 2 vols. (Gütersloh 1934–35); W. Wagner, "Die Kirche als Corpus Christi mysticum beim jungen Luther" ZKTh 61 (1937) 29–98; F. Hahn, "Faber Stapulensis und Luther" ZKG 57 (1938) 356–432; id., "Die Hl. Schrift als Problem der Auslegung bei Luther" EvTh 10 (1950) 407–424; G. Ebeling, Ev. Evangelienauslegung. Eine Untersuchung zu Luthers Hermeneutik (Munich 1942); id., "Die Anfänge von Luthers Hermeneutik" ZThK 48 (1951) 172–230; id., "Luthers Psalterdruck vom Jahre 1513" ZThK 50 (1953) 43–99; id., "Luthers Auslegung des 14.(15.) Ps in der 1. Psalmen-Vorlesung im Vergleich mit der exegetischen Tradition" ZThK 50 (1953) 280–339; H. Volz, "Luthers Arbeit am lateinischen Psalter" ARG 48 (1957) 11–56; U. Saarnivaara, Luther Discovers the Gospel (St. Louis 1951); J. Pelikan, Luther the Expositor (St. Louis 1959); A. Brandenburg, Gericht und Evangelium (Paderborn 1960); Also, E. Iserloh, "Existentiale Interpretation" in "Luthers 1. Psalmen-Vorlesung?" ThRv 59 (1963) 73–84; R. Prenter, Der barmherzige Richter. Iustitia dei passiva in Luthers Dictata super Psalterium 1513–15 (Copenhagen 1961); S. Raeder, Das Hebräische bei Luther bis zum Ende der 1. Ps-Vorlesung (Tübingen 1961); G. Müller, "Ekklesiologie u. Kirchenkritik beim jungen Luther" NZSTh 7 (1965) 100–128.

9. Lecture on the Epistle to the Romans: Text: WA 56; Selection Cl. V, 222–304; German Translation by: E. Ellwein (Munich 1957); Italian-German Edition: 2 vols. (Darmstadt 1960); English: W. Pauck, Christian Classics XV. Literature: K. Holl, "Die Rechtfertigungslehre in Luthers Vorlesung über den Römerbrief" Gesammelte Aufsätze I, 111–154; F. W. Schmidt, "Der Gottesgedanke in Luthers Römerbrief-Vorlesung" ThStK 93 (1920–21) 117–248; H. Lang, "Die Bedeutung Christi für die Rechtfertigungslehre in Luthers Römerbrief-Vorlesung" NKZ 39 (1928) 509–547; R. Hermann, Luthers These "Gerechte und Sünder zugleich" (1930, new printing Gütersloh 1960); A. K. Wood, "The Theology of Luther's Lecture on Romans" Scottish Journal of Theology 3 (1950) 1–18, 113–126; J. Hilburg, Luthers Frömmigkeit in seiner Vorlesung über den Römerbrief (Diss., Marburg 1951); P. Althaus, Paulus und Luther (Gütersloh 1958); H. Beintker, "Glaube und Handeln nach Luthers Verständnis des Römerbriefs" LuJ 28 (1961) 52–85; J. Lortz, "Luthers Römerbrief-Vorlesung" TThZ 71 (1962) 129–153, 216–247; M. Lienhard, "Christologie et humilité dans la Theologia du commentaire de l'Épître aux Romains du Luther" RHPhR 42 (1962) 304–315; W. Grundmann, Der Römerbrief . . . und seine Auslegung durch M. Luther (Weimar 1964); H. Hübner, Rechtfertigung und Heiligung in Luthers Römerbrief-Vorlesung (Witten 1965).

10. Lecture on the Epistle to the Galatians: Text: WA 57, II; Selection Cl V, 327–343. Literature: H. v. Schubert–K. A. Meissinger, Zu Luthers Vorlesungstätigkeit (Heidelberg 1920); J. Ficker, "Zu Luthers Vorlesung über den Galaterbrief 1516–17" ThStK 88–89 (1926) 1–17; L. Grane, "Lov og nåde in Luthers Galaterbrevsforelaesning 1516–17," Svensk teologisk kvartalskrift 50 (1954) 107–122; H. Volz, "Eine neue studentische Nachschrift von Luthers 1. Galaterbrief-Vorlesung" ZKG 66 (1954–55) 72–96.

11. Lecture on the Epistle to the Hebrews: Text: WA 57, III; Selection Cl V, 344–374; E. Hirsch–H. Rückert, Luthers Vorlesung über den Hebräerbrief (Berlin–Leipzig 1929); J. Ficker, Luthers Vorlesung über den Hebräerbrief (Leipzig 1929); trans. E. Vogelsang (Berlin–Leipzig 1930); trans. G. Helbig (Leipzig 1930); Library of Christian Classics, vol. 16, contains Disputation against Scholastic Theology, etc. Literature: E. Vogelsang, Die Bedeutung der neuveröffentlichten Hebräerbrief- Vorlesung Luthers von 1517–18 (Tübingen 1930); E. Ellwein, "Die Entfaltung der Theologia crucis in Luthers Hebräerbrief-Vorlesung" Theologische Aufsätze, K. Barth zum 50. Geburtstag (Munich 1936) 382–404.

12. REFORMATION EXPERIENCE: IUSTITIA DEI: E. Stracke, Luthers grosses Selbstzeugnis 1545 (Leipzig 1926); H. Bornkamm, "Luthers Bericht über seine Entdeckung der iustitia dei" ARG 37 (1940) 117–128; id., "Iustitia Dei in der Scholastik und bei Luther" ARG 39 (1942) 1–46; id., "Zur Frage der Iustitia beim jungen Luther" ARG 52 (1961) 16–29, 53 (1962) 1–59; E. Bizer, Fides ex auditu (Newkirchen 1966); G. Pfeiffer, "Das Ringen des jungen Luthers um die Gerechtigkeit Gottes" LuJ 26 (1959) 25–55; A. Peters, "Luthers Turmerlebnis" Neue ZSTh 3 (1961) 203–236; E. Hirsch, Initium theologiae Lutheri: Lutherstudien II (Gütersloh 1954) 9–34; E. G. Rupp, The Righteousness of God (London 1953); F. E. Cranz, An Essay on the Development of Luther's Thought on Justice, Law and Society (Cambridge, Mass. 1959); K. Aland, Der Weg zur Reformation (Munich 1965); O. Pesch, "Zur Frage nach Luthers reformatorischer Wende" Catholica 20 (1966) 216–243, 264–280.

3. The Indulgence Controversy

LITERATURE

LThK ^{2}I (1957) 46–54; N. Paulus, Geschichte des Ablasses im Mittelalter vom Ursprung bis zur Mitte des 14. Jh., 3 vols. (Paderborn 1922–23); B. Porschmann, Der Ablass im Lichte der Bussgeschichte (Bonn 1948); id., Penance and the Annointing of the Sick (London–New York 1964).

THE INDULGENCE CONTROVERSY: N. Paulus, Johannes Tetzel, der Ablassprediger (Mainz 1899); W. Köhler, Dokumente zum Ablassstreit von 1517 (Tübingen 1934); E. Göller, Der Ausbruch der Reformation und die spätmittelalterliche Ablasspraxis (Freiburg i. Br. 1917); A. Schulte, Die Fugger in Rom 1495–1523, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1904); G. v. Pölnitz, Jakob Fugger, 2 vols. (Tübingen 1949–51); H. Volz, Martin Luthers Thesenanschlag und dessen Vorgeschichte (Vienna 1959) (lit.); E. Iserloh, Luthers Thesenanschlag. Tatsache oder Legende? (Wiesbaden 1962); English: The Theses Were Not Posted (Boston 1968; id., Luther zwischen Reform und Reformation (Münster 1966); K. Aland, Martin Luthers 95 Thesen (Hamburg 1965); English: Martin Luther's Theses (St. Louis 1967); K. Honselmann, Urfassung und Drucke der Ablassthesen M. Luthers und ihre Veröffentlichung (Paderborn 1966); F. Lau, "Die gegenwärtige Diskussion um Luthers Thesenanschlag," LuJ 34 (1967) 11–59; H. Bornkamm, Thesen und Thesenanschlag Luthers (Berlin 1967).

4. Rome's Proceedings against Luther and the Leipzig Disputation

LITERATURE

THE PROCESS: K. Müller, "Luthers römischer Prozess" ZKG 24 (1903) 46–85; P. Kalkoff, Forschungen zu Luthers römischem Prozess (Rome 1905); id., "Zu Luthers römischem Prozess" ZKG 25 (1904), 31 (1910), 32 (1911), 33 (1912); id., Zu Luthers römischem Prozess. Der Prozess des Jahres 1518 (Gotha 1912); id., Luther und die Entscheidungsjahre der Reformation (Munich–Leipzig 1917); suppl. ZKG 44 (1925) 213–225; Kalkoff's researches are summarized in E. G. Schwiebert, Luther and His Time (St. Louis 1950) 481f.; N. Paulus, Johannes Tetzel, der Ablassprediger (Mainz 1899); J. Atkinson, The Trial of Luther (New York, 1971).

ON THE RELATIONSHIP OF LUTHER TO FREDERICK THE WISE: P. Kalkoff; ARG 14 (1917) 249–262; ZKG 43 (1924) 179–208; HZ 132 (1925) 29–42; P. Kirn, Friedrich der Weise und die Kirche (Leipzig 1926); A. Koch, "Die Kontroversen über die Stellung Friedrichs des Weisen zur Reformation" ARG 23 (1926) 213–260; I. Höss, Georg Spalatin (Weimar 1956); F. Lauchert, Die italienischen literarischen Gegner Luthers (Freiburg i. Br. 1912); J. F. Groner, Kardinal Cajetan (Fribourg 1951); H. A. Creutzberg, Karl v. Miltitz (Freiburg i. Br. 1907); P. Kalkoff, Die Miltitziade (Leipzig 1911); K. Brandi, Die Wahl Karls V (Göttingen 1925).

THE LEIPZIG DEBATE: WA 2, 250–383; O. Seitz, Der authentische Text der Leipziger Disputation (Berlin 1903); H. Emser, "De Disputatione Lipsicensi" CCath 4 (1921); J. Lortz, "Die Leipziger Disputation 1519" BZThS 3 (1926) 12–37; F. Schulze, Aus Leipzigs Kulturgeschichte (Leipzig 1956) 41–70; H. Barge, Andreas Bodenstein v. Karlstadt, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1905); S. Harrison Thomson, "Luther and Bohemia" ARG 44 (1953) 160–181; E. Kähler, "Beobachtungen zum Problem von Schrift und Tradition in der Leipziger Disputation von 1519" Hören und Handeln, Festschrift f. E. Wolf (Munich 1962) 214–229.

5. Luther's Reform Writings of 1520

LITERATURE

H. Dannenbauer, Luther als religiöser Volksschriftsteller 1517–1520 (Tübingen 1930); O. Clemen, Die Lutherische Reformation und der Buchdruck (Leipzig 1939); H. v. Campenhausen, "Reformatorisches Selbstbewusstsein und reformatorisches Geschichtsbewusstsein bei Luther, 1517–1522" ARG 37 (1940) 128–150; H. Volz, "Die ersten Sammelausgaben von Lutherschriften und ihre Drucker (1518–1520)" Gutenberg-Jb. (1960) 185–202; W. Köhler, "Zu Luthers Schrift an den christlichen Adel deutscher Nation" ZSavRGkan 14 (1925) 1–38; W. Maurer, Von der Freiheit eines Christenmenschen (Göttingen 1949); H. Asmussen, "Glaube und Sakrament. Zwei Abschnitte aus 'De captivitate'" Begegnung der Christen (Stuttgart 1959) 161–178.

6. The Excommunicated Friar before the Diet of Worms

SOURCES AND LITERATURE

A) THE BULL OF EXCOMMUNICATION: Cf. Chap. 4; "Exsurge Domine": BullRom V 748–757; D. 741–781; "Decet Romanum Pontificem": BullRom V 761–764; Schottenloher I 12043–56; V 47670a–71; H. Roos, "Die Quellen der Bulle Exsurge Domine" Festschrift Schmaus (Munich 1957) 909–926; A. Schulte, "Die römischen Verhandlungen über Luther 1520" QFIAB 6 (1904) 32–52, 174ff.; J. Greving, "Zur Verkündigung der Bulle Exsurge Domine durch Dr. J. Eck 1520" RGStT 21–22 (Münster 1912) 196–221; G. Müller, "Die drei Nuntiaturen Aleanders in Deutschland" AFIAB 39 (1959) 222–276.

THE BURNING OF THE BULL OF EXCOMMUNICATION: Schottenloher I 14107–15, VII 55923–27; J. Luther–M. Perlbach, SAB V (1907) 95–102; O. Clemen, ThStK 81 (1908) 460–469; H. Boehmer, LuJ 2–3 (1920–21) 3–53; J. Luther, ARG 45 (1954) 260–265.

B) THE DIET OF WORMS: Deutsche Reichstagsakten unter Karl V (=RA), II (Gotha 1896); Th. Brieger, Aleander und Luther 1521. Die vervollständigten Aleander-Depeschen I. Abt (Gotha 1884); P. Kalkoff (trans.), Die Depeschen des Nuntius Aleander vom Wormser Reichstag (Halle ²1897) id., Briefe, Depeschen und Berichte über Luther vom Wormser Reichstage (Halle 1898); J. Cochlaeus, "Colloquium cum Luthero Wormatinae olim habitum" Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahren der Reformation IV (Leipzig 1910) 177–218; Schottenloher I 14281–346, III 27923–50; H. v. Schubert, "Die Vorgeschichte der Berufung Luthers auf den Reichstag zu Worms 1521" SAH (1912); H. Grisar, Luther zu Worms (Freiburg 1921); Paul Kalkoff, Der Wormser Reichstag von 1521 (Munich 1922); E., Kessel, "Luther vor dem Reichstag in Worms 1521" Festgabe für Paul Kirn, ed. E. Kaufmann (Berlin 1961) 172–190.

7. Luther at the Wartburg and the Reform Movement in Wittenberg

LITERATURE

G. Kawerau, Luthers Rückkehr von der Wartburg nach Wittenberg (Halle 1902); H. Barge, Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1905); id., "Luther und Karlstadt in Wittenberg" HZ 99 (1907) 256–324; id., Frühprotestantisches Gemeindechristentum in Wittenberg und Orlamünde (Leipzig 1909); id., Aktenstücke zur Wittenberg Bewegung Anfang 1522 (Leipzig 1912); K. Müller, Luther und Karlstadt (Tübingen 1907); N. Müller, Die Wittenberger Bewegung 1521 und 1522 (Leipzig ²1911); W. Köhler, GGA 174 (1912) 505–550; Th. Knolle, Luther und die Bilderstürmer (Wittenberg 1922); H. v. Campenhausen, "Die Bilderfrage in der Reformation" ZKG 68 (1957) 96–128; I. Höss, Georg Spalatin (Weimar 1956); P. Graff, Gesch der Auflösung der alten Gottesdienstformen in der evangelischen Kirche Deutschlands I (Göttingen ³1937); L. Fendt, Der lutherische Gottesdienst im 16. Jh. (Munich 1923); V. Vajta, Die Theologie des Gottesdienstes bei Luther (Göttingen ²1952); B. Lohse, Mönchtum und Reformation (Göttingen 1963); H. B. Meyer, Luther und die Messe (Paderborn 1965).

8. The Reformers in Luther's Circle

LITERATURE

R. Stupperich (ed.), Reformatorische Verkündigung und Lebensordnung (Bremen 1963).

NIKOLAUS VON AMSDORF: Ausgewählte Schriften, ed. O. Lerche (Gütersloh 1938); E. O. Reichert, Amsdorf und das Interim. Erstausg. seiner Schriften zum Interim mit Kommentar und hist. Einl. (Diss. Halle–Wittenberg 1955); O. H. Nebe, Reine Lehre. Zur Theologie des Niklas von Amsdorff (Göttingen 1935); H. Stille, Nikolaus von Amsdorf, sein Leben bis zu seiner Einweisung als Bischof von Naumburg (1483–1542) (Diss. Leipzig 1937); O. Lerche, Amsdorf und Melanchthon (Berlin 1937); P. Brunner, Nikolaus von Amsdorf als Bischof von Naumburg (Gütersloh 1961).

JUSTUS JONAS: Th. Pressel, Justus Jonas. Leben und ausgewählte Schriften (Elberfeld 1862); Briefwechsel des Justus Jonas, ed. G. Kawerau, 2 vols. (Halle 1884–85); Supp. by W. Delius: ARG 31 (1934) 133–136, 42 (1951) 136–145; M. Schellbach, Justus Jonas (Essen 1941); W. Delius, Lehre und Leben. Justus Jonas (Berlin 1952); id., Reformationsgeschichte der Stadt Halle (Berlin 1953); H. Abe, Der Erfurter Humanismus und seine Zeit (Diss. Jena 1953); F. W. Krapp, Der Erfurter Mutiankreis und seine Auswirkungen (Diss. Cologne 1954). M. Lehmann, Justus Jonas, Loyal Reformer (Minneapolis, Minn. 1963).

JOHANNES BUGENHAGEN: G. Geisenhof, Bibliotheca Bugenhagiana I, Bibliographie . . . des Johannes Bugenhagen (Leipzig 1908); Briefwechsel, ed. O. Vogt (Stettin 1888); G. Buchwald (ed.), Predigten Bugenhagens (Halle 1885); id., Johannes Bugenhagens Katechismuspredigten (Leipzig 1909); id., Ungedruckte Predigten Bugenhagens (Leipzig 1910); id., "Bugenhagens Katechismuspredigten vom Jahre 1534" ARG 17 (1920) 92–104; K. A. T. Vogt, Johannes Bugenhagen Pomeranus (Elberfeld 1867); H. Hering, Dr. Pomeranus Johannes Bugenhagen (Halle 1888); E. Wolf, Johannes Bugenhagen. Gemeinde und Amt. Peregrinatio (Munich, 1962) 257–278; W. Rautenberg (ed.), Johannes Bugenhagen, Beiträge zu seinem 400. Todestag (Berlin 1958) (lit.); R. Stupperich, "Dr. Pomeranus. Zum 400. Todestag des Reformators Johannes Bugenhagen" Luther 29 (1958) 49–60; additional articles on Johannes Bugenhagen: NDB III, 9f.

GEORG SPALATIN: I. Höss, Georg Spalatin (Weimar 1956); id., "Georg Spalatins Traktat 'De sacramento venerabile eucharistiae et de confessione' vom Jahre 1525" ARG 49 (1958) 79–88; id., "Georg Spalatins Verhältnis zu Luther und die Reformation" Luther 31 (1960) 67–80; H. Volz, "Bibliogr. der im 16. Jh. erschienenen Schriften Georg Spalatins" Zschr. für Bibliothekswesen und Bibliogr. 5 (1958) 83–119; W. Ulsamer, "Spalatins Beziehungen zu seiner fränkischen Heimat" Jb. für fränkische Landesforschung 19 (1959) 425–479.

PHILIP MELANCHTHON: Works: CR 1–28 (Halle-Braunschweig 1834–60); Epistolae iudicia, consilia etc., ed. E. Bindseil (Halle 1874); Supplementa Melanchthoniana, 6 vols. (Leipzig 1910–26); Selected Works (text for study), ed. R. Stupperich (Gütersloh 1951f.); P. Fraenkel, "Fünfzehn Jahre Melanchthonforschung (lit)" Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance 22 (1960) 582–624, 23 (1961) 563–602, 24 (1962) 443–478; C. L. Hill (ed.), The Loci Communes of Philip Melanchthon (Boston 1944); id., Selected Writings (Minneapolis, Minn. 1962); C. Schmidt, Philipp Melanchthon, Leben und ausgewählte Schriften (Elberfeld 1861); A. Herrlinger, Die Theologie Melanchthons (Gotha 1879); K. Hartfelder, Philipp Melanchthon als Praeceptor Germaniae (Berlin 1889); G. Ellinger, Philipp Melanchthon (Berlin 1902); O. Ritschl, "Die Entwicklung der Rechtfertigungslehre Melanchthons bis zum Jahre 1527" ThStK 85 (1912) 518–540; P. Joachimsen, "Loci Communes" LuJ 8 (1926) 27–97; H. Engelland, Melanchthon, Glauben und Handeln (Munich 1931); F. Hübner, Natürliche Theologie und theokratische Schwärmerei bei Melanchthon (Gütersloh 1936); Cl. Bauer, "Die Naturrechtsvorstellungen des jüngeren Melanchthon" Festschrift G. Ritter (Tübingen 1950) 244–255; id., "Melanchthons Naturrechtslehre" ARG 42 (1951) 64–98; id., "Melanchthons Wirtschaftsethik" ARG 49 (1958) 115–160; P. Schwarzenau, Der Wandel im theologischen Ansatz bei Melanchthon von 1525–35 (Gütersloh 1956); W. H. Neuser, Der Ansatz der Theolgie Philipp Melanchthons (Neukirchen 1957); W. Maurer, "Melanchthons Anteil am Streit zwischen Luther und Erasmus" ARG 49 (1958) 89–115, and in Melanchthon-Studien (Gütersloh 1964) 137–162; id., "Die Loci Communes als wiss. Programmschrift" LuJ 27 (1960) 1–50; A. Sperl, Melanchthon zwischen Humanismus und Reformation (Munich 1959); G. Urban (ed.), Philipp Melanchthon. Gedenkschrift zum 400. Todestag (Bretten ^{2}1960); H. Bornkamm, Philipp Melanchthon (Göttingen ^{3}1960); P. Meinhold, Philip Melanchthon. Der Lehrer der Kirche (Berlin 1960); W. Elliger (ed.), Philipp Melanchthon. Forschungsbeiträge (Göttingen 1961); V. Vajta (ed.), Luther und Melanchthon (Göttingen 1961); R. Stupperich, Melanchthon (Berlin 1960); id., Der unbekannte Melanchthon (Stuttgart 1961); R. Schäfer, Christologie und Sittlichkeit in Melanchthons frühen Loci (Tübingen 1961); P. Fraenkel, Testimonia Patrum. The Function of the Patristic Argument in the Theology of Philip Melanchthon (Geneva 1961); H. Lieberg, Amt und Ordination bei Luther und Melanchthon (Göttingen 1962); E. Bizer, Theologie der Verheissung, Studien der theol. Entwicklung des jungen Melanchthon (1519–24) (Neukirchen 1964); F. Hildebrandt, Melanchthon: Alien or Ally? (New York 1946); C. L. Manschreck, Melanchthon, the Quiet Reformer (New York 1958); M. Greschat, Melanchthon neben Luther (Witten 1965); H.-G. G. Geyer, Von der Geburt des wahren Menschen (Neukirchen 1965).

9. The Pontificate of Adrian VI

SOURCES

L.-P. Gachard, Correspondance de Charles-Quint et d'Adrien VI (Brussels 1859); H. J. Reusens, Syntagma doctrinae theologicae Adriani Sexti (Louvain 1862); A. Mercati, Dall'Archivio Vaticano II: Diarii di concistori del pontificato di Adriano VI (SteT 157) (Rome 1951).

LITERATURE

C. v. Höfler, Papst Adrian VI. (Vienna 1880); M. v. Domarus, "Die Quellen zur Geschichte des Papstes Hadrian" HJ 16 (1895) 70–91; P. Kalkoff, "Kleine Beiträge zur Gesch. Adrians VI." HJ 39 (1918–19) 31–72; L. v. Pastor, Gesch. der Päpste IV, 2, pp. 3–157; E. Hocks, Der letzte dt. Papst (Freiburg 1939); E. Göller, "Hadrian VI. und der Ämterkauf an der päpstl. Kurie" Abhh. aus dem Gebiete der mittleren und neueren Gesch. Festgabe H. Finke (Münster 1925) 375–407; H. W. Bachmann, Kuriale Reformbestrebungen unter Adrian VI. (Diss. Erlangen 1948); E. van Eyl, "Keizer Karel V en de pauskeuze van Adriaan VI" SE 1 (1948) 277–298; P. Brachim, "Adrian VI et la devotio moderna" Etudes Germaniques 14 (1959) 97–105; ETbL 35 (1959) 313–629 (with bibliography); J. Posner, Der dt. Papst Adrian VI. (Recklinghausen 1962); P. Berglar, Verhängnis und Verheissung (Bonn o. J.).

SECTION TWO

The Struggle over the Concept of Christian Freedom

10. The Knights' War

LITERATURE

KNIGHTHOOD: Schottenloher 41521a–41534; K. Schottenloher, Flugschriften zur Ritterschaftsbewegung des Jahres 1523 (Münster 1929); R. Fellner, Die fränkische Ritterschaft von 1495–1524 (Berlin 1905); G. Lotz, "Der fränkische Adel und dessen Einfluss auf die Verbreitung der Reformation" Zschr. für die gesamte luth. Theologie und Kirche 29 (1868) 465–486; G. Knetsch, Die landständische Verfassung und reichsritterschaftliche Bewegung im Kurstaate Trier, vornehmlich im 16. Jh. (Berlin 1909); O. Brunner, Adeliges Landleben und europäischer Geist (Salzburg 1949)

SICKINGEN AND THE TRIER AFFAIR: Schottenloher 20010–20067; 49329–49339a; 58243–58254; H. Ullmann, F. v. S. (Leipzig 1872); id., ADB 34, 151–158; E. Göller, "Sickingen u. seine Beziehungen zur Reformation: Bl. für Pfalz." KG 2 (1926) 36–46; K. H. Rendenbach, Die Fehde F. v. Sickingens gegen Trier (Berlin 1933); G. Franz, "F. v. S." Saarpfälz. Lebensbilder 1 (1938) 61–74; E. Kilb, F. v. S. (Metz 1943); W. R. Hitchcock, The Background of the Knight's Revolt 1522–1523 (Berkeley 1958).

ULRICH V. HUTTEN: Schottenloher 9157–9301; 47021–47043; 65068–65071; 55286–55308; Werke, ed. E. Böcking, 5 vols. and 2 suppl. vols. (Leipzig 1859–70); Deutsche Schriften, ed. S. Szamatolski (Strassburg 1891); F. Walser, Die politische Entwicklung Huttens (Munich–Berlin 1928); P. Held, Hutten, seine geistige Auseinandersetzung mit Katholizismus, Humanismus und Reformation (Leipzig 1928); H. Holborn, Ulrich v. Hutten and the German Reformation (New Haven 1937); H. Fechter, Ulrich v. Hutten (Pähl 1954); K. Kleinschmidt, Ulrich von Hutten (Berlin 1955).

E. Bock, Der Schwäb. Bund u. seine Verfassungen 1488–1534 (Breslau 1927); G. Truchsess v. Waldburg: Schottenloher 21459–21463; 60985–60988; F. Siebert, Zwischen Kaiser und Papst (Berlin 1950).

11. The "Fanatics" Karlstadt and Müntzer

LITERATURE

KARLSTADT: Works: E. Freys and H. Barge, "Verz. der gedr. Schriften des Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt" ZblB 21 (1904; reprinted Nieuwkoop 1965); Von Abtuhung der Bilder, ed. H. Lietzmann, Kleine Texte 74 (Berlin 1911); E. Kähler, Karlstadt und Augustin, Der Kommentar des Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt zu Augustins Schrift De spiritu et litera. Einführung und Text (Halle 1952); Schriften aus den Jahren 1523–25, ed. E. Hertzsch, 2 vols. (Halle 1956–57); "Karlstadts Sabbat-Traktat von 1524," ed. R. Stupperich: Neue Zschr. für systematische Theologie 1 (1959) 349–375. Literature: similar to Chap. 35: H. Barge, Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1905); E. Hase, "Karlstadt in Orlamünde" Mitt. der geschichts- und altertumsforschenden Ges. des Osterlandes 4 (1858) 42–125; W. Friedensburg, "Der Verzicht Karlstadts auf das Wittenberger Archidiakonat" ARG 11 (1914) 69–72; M. Wähler, Die Einführung der Reformation in Orlamünde (Erfurt 1918); E. Hertzsch, Karlstadt und seine Bedeutung für das Luthertum (Gotha 1932); id., Luther und Karlstadt: Luther in Thüringen, compiled by R. Jauernig (Berlin 1952) 87–107; E. Kähler, "Karlstadts Protest gegen die theologische Wissenschaft" 450 Jahre Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg I (Halle 1952) 299–312; G. Fuchs, "Karlstadts radikal-reformatorisches Wirken und seine Stellung zwischen Müntzer und Luther" Wiss. Zschr. der Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg 3 (1953–54) 523–551; NDB II 356f.; RGG III 1154f.; G. Rupp, "Andrew Karlstadt and Reformation Puritanism" JthS NS 10 (1959) 308–326; J. Seuppel, Schwenckfelk, Knight of Faith (Pennsburg, Pa. 1961).

MÜNTZER: Works: G. Franz, "Bibliographie der Schriften Th. Müntzers" Zschr. des Vereins für Thüring. Gesch. u. Altertumskunde NF 34 (Jena 1940) 161–173; H. J. Hillerbrand, Bibliographie des Täufertums (Gütersloh 1962) 21011–21050; Thomas Müntzers

Briefwechsel, ed. H. Böhmer–P. Kirn (Leipzig 1931); Thomas Müntzer, sein Leben und seine Schriften, ed. O. H. Brandt (Jena 1933); O. J. Mehl, Thomas Müntzers deutsche Messen und Kirchenämter (Grimmen 1937); Sehling I; Thomas Müntzers politische Schriften, ed. C. Hinrichs (Halle 1950); Die Fürstenpredigt, ed. by and with introduction by S. Streller (Leipzig 1958). Literature: O. J. Mehl, "Thomas Müntzer als Liturgiker" ThLZ 76 (1951) 75–78; C. Hinrichs, Luther und Müntzer (Berlin 1952); H. S. Bender, "Thomas Müntzer und die Täufer" ThZ 8 (1952) 262–278; A. Meusel, Thomas Müntzer und seine Zeit (Berlin 1952); M. Schmidt, "Das Selbstbewusstsein Thomas Müntzers" Theologia viatorum 6 (Berlin 1954–58) 25–41; M. M. Smirin, Die Volksreformation des Thomas Müntzer und der grosse Bauernkrieg (Berlin ^{2}1956); M. Steinmetz, "Zur Entstehung der Müntzerlegende" Beiträge zum neuen Geschichtsbild. Zum 60. Geburtstag von A. Meusel (Berlin 1956) 35–70; id., Das Müntzerbild in der Geschichtsschreibung von Luther und Melanchthon bis zum Ausbruch der französischen Revolution (Jena 1956); cf. R. Schmid, "Thomas Müntzer im Geschichtsbild des Dialektischen Materialismus" Deutsches Pfarrerblatt 65 (1965) 258–262; G. Franz, Der deutsche Bauernkrieg (Darmstadt ^{4}1956) 248–270; H. Goebke, "Neue Forschungen über Thomas Müntzer" Harz-Zschr 9 (Bad Hatzburg 1957) 1–30; G. Baring, "Hans Denck und Thomas Müntzer" ARG 50 (1959) 145–181; W. Elliger, Thomas Müntzer (Berlin 1960); id. LuJ 34 (1967) 90-116; RGG^{3} IV 1183f.; E. Iserloh, "Zur Gestalt und Biographie Thomas Müntzers" TThZ 71 (1962) 248–253.

12. The Peasants' War

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Dahlmann-Waitz 9891–9902; 9976–9981; 10065–10080; Schottenloher 34765–35241; 51510–51531; 62311–62366; Bibl. de la Réforme I, Reg. p. 77.

SOURCES

L. Baumann, QQ zur Gesch. des Bauernkrieges in Oberschwaben (Tübingen 1876); id., Akten zur Gesch. des Bauernkrieges aus Oberschwaben (Freiburg 1877); H. Wopfner, QQ zur Gesch. des Bauernkrieges in Dtl. I (Innsbruck 1908); H. Brandt, Der grosse Bauernkrieg (Jena 1925); Akten zur Gesch. des Bauernkrieges in Mittel-Dtl., ed. O. Merx–G. Franz–W. P. Fuchs, 3 vols. (Leipzig–Berlin 1923–1941); G. Franz, QQ zur Gesch. des Bauernkrieges (Munich 1963).

LITERATURE

G. Franz, Der dt. Bauernkrieg (Darmstadt ^{4}1956); R. M. Radbruch–G. Radbruch, Der dt. Bauernkrieg zwischen MA u. Neuzeit (Göttingen 1962); H. v. Schubert, Revolution u. Reformation im 16. Jh. (Tübingen 1927); H. Hantsch, Der dt. Bauernkrieg (Würzburg 1925); W. Stolze, Bauernkrieg und Reformation (Leipzig 1926); A. Rosenkranz, Der Bundschuh, 2 vols. (Heidelberg 1927); E. Bohnenblust, Luthers Verhalten im Bauernkrieg (Bern 1929); A. Waas, Die grosse Wende im dt. Bauernkrieg (Munich–Berlin 1939); id., Die Bauern im Kampf um Gerechtigkeit 1300–1525 (Munich 1964); I. Schmidt, Das göttl. Recht (Diss. Jena 1939); M. M. Smirin, Die Volksreformation des Th. Müntzer u. der grosse Bauernkrieg (Berlin 1956); H. Kamnitzer, Zur Vorgesch. des dt. Bauernkrieges (Berlin 1953); W. Andreas, Der Bundschuh (Karlsruhe 1953); P. Althaus, Luthers Haltung im Bauernkrieg (Tübingen 1952); H. Michaelis, Die Verwendung und Bedeutung der Bibel in den Hauptschriften der Bauern von 1525–26 (theol. diss.

Greifswald 1954); F. Lau, "Der Bauernkrieg und das angebliche Ende der lutherischen Reformation als spontaner Volksbewegung" LuJ 26 (1959) 109–134; M. Greschat, "Luthers Haltung im Bauernkrieg" ARG 56 (1965) 31–47; J. S. Schapiro, Social Reforms and the Reformation (New York 1909); H. Kirschner, Luther and the Peasant's War (Philadelphia, 1972); A. Holmio, The Lutheran Reformation and the Jews (Hancock, Mich., 1949).

13. Luther's Rejection of Humanism—Erasmus' Later Years

LITERATURE

F. Kattenbusch, Luthers Lehre vom unfreien Willen und von der Prädestination nach ihren Entstehungsgründen untersucht (Diss. Göttingen 1875); K. Zickendrath, Der Streit zwischen Erasmus und Luther über die Willensfreiheit (Leipzig 1909); H. Jedin, Des Johannes Cochläus Streitschrift De libero arbitrio hominis (1525) (Breslau 1927); E. Schott, "Luthers Lehre vom servum arbitrium in ihrer theologischen Bedeutung" ZSTh 7 (1929) 399–430; W. Maurer, "Humanismus und Reformation" ThR NF 3 (1931) 49–74, 104–145; R. Hermann, "Zu Luthers Lehre vom unfreien Willen" Greifswalder Studien zur Lutherforschung und neuzeitlichen Geistesgeschichte 4 (1931) 17–38; A. Renaudet, Etudes érasmiennes (1521–1529) (Paris 1939); E. Schweingruber, Luthers Erlebnis des unfreien Willens (Zürich 1947); L. Schauenburg, Luthers Lehre vom verborgenen, alleinwirksamen Gott und von der Unfreiheit des Willens (Diss. Göttingen 1949); E. Erikstein, Luthers Prädestinationslehre geschichtlich dargestellt bis einschliesslich "De servo arbitrio" (Diss. Göttingen 1957); M. Werner, Erasmus und Luther: Glaube und Aberglaube (Bern–Stuttgart 1957) 50–65; H. Bandt, Luthers Lehre vom verborgenen Gott (Berlin 1958); H. Bornkamm, "Erasmus und Luther" LuJ 25 (1958) 3–22; W. Maurer, "Melanchthons Anteil am Streit zwischen Luther und Erasmus" ARG 49 (1958) 89–115; id., Melanchthonstudien (Gütersloh 1964) 137–162; C. Reidijk, "Das Lebensende des Erasmus" Basler Zschr. für Gesch. u. Altertumskunde 57 (1958) 23–66; K. H. Oelrich, Der späte Erasmus und die Reformation (Münster 1961); O. J. Mehl, "Erasmus contra Luther" LuJ 29 (1962) 52–64; J. Boisset, Erasme et Luther (Paris 1962); E. F. Winter, (ed.), Erasmus-Luther-Discourse on Free Will (New York 1961); E. W. Kohls, Die Theologie des Erasmus (Basel 1966); J. P. Dolan, The Essential Erasmus (New York 1964); H. Holeczek, Humanistische Bibelphilologie als Reformproblem bei Erasmus von Rotterdam, Thomas More und William Tyndale (Leiden, 1975); J. Rouschausse, Erasmus and Fisher: Their Correspondence, 1511–1524 (Paris 1968); The first volume of the new edition of the complete works of Erasmus appeared in 1969, the five-hundredth anniversary of his birth: Opera Omnia Desiderii Erasmi Roterodami recognita et adnotatione critica instructa notisque illustrata (Amsterdam 1969ff.).

14. Zwingli and the Beginnings of the Reformation in German Switzerland

SOURCES

Die Eidgenössischen Abschiede aus dem Zeitraume von 1521–28 (The Confederate Secession of 1521–1528), Der Amtlichen Abschiedesammlung IV, la, revised by J. Strickler (Bruges 1873); W. Oechsli, Quellenbuch zur Schweizergeschichte, n.s., (Zurich 1893); id., Quellenbuch zur Schweizergeschichte, Kleine Ausgabe (Zurich 1918); Actensammlung zur Schweizerischen Reformationsgeschichte in den Jahren 1521–1532, revised and edited by J. Strickler, 5 vols. (Zurich 1878–83); Actensammlung zur Gesch. der Zürcher Reformation in den Jahren 1519–1533, ed. E. Egli (Zurich 1879); Actensammlung zur Gesch. der Berner Reformation 1521–1532, ed. R. Steck–G. Tobler (Bern 1923); Actensammlung zur Geschichte der Basler Reformation in den Jahren 1519–1534, ed. E. Dürr–P. Roth, 6 vols. (Basel 1921–1950); Heinrich Bullingers Reformationsgeschichte, ed. J. J. Hottinger–H. H. Vögeli, 3 vols. (Frauenfeld 1838–1840); Die Chronik des Bernhard Wyss 1519–1530, ed. G. Finsler (Basel 1901); Johannes Stumpfs Schweizer- und Reformationschronik, 2 parts, ed. E. Gagliardi–H. Müller–F. Büsser (Basel 1952–55); Gerold Edlibachs Chronik, ed. J. M. Usteri (Zurich 1847); Valentin Tschudi's Chronik der Reformationsjahre 1521–33, ed. Joh. Strickler (Bern 1889); B. Sprüngli, Beschreibung der Kappelerkriege, ed. W. Weiss (Zurich 1932); Reformation und kath. Reform 1500 bis 1572, Quellenhefte zur Schweizergeschichte 5, revised A. Bucher–W. Schmid (Aarau 1958).

ZWINGLI, Works: First complete edition, ed. M. Schuler–J. Schultheiss, 8 vols. (Zurich 1828–42); Huldreich Zwinglis sämtliche Werke: Corpus Reformatorum 88–92; 93–98, 100–101 (Berlin 1905, Leipzig 1908, 1935, Zurich 1959ff.) (=ZW 1–14), cf. Zwingliana 12 (1964) 1–9; Ulrich Zwingli, Eine Auswahl aus seinen Schriften, trans. and ed. G. Finsler–W. Köhler–A. Rüegg (Zurich 1918); Zwingli, Hauptschriften, revised by F. Blanke–O. Farner–O. Frei–R. Pfister, 11 vols. (Zurich 1940–63); Huldrych Zwingli. Auswahl seiner Schriften, ed. E. Künzli (Zurich 1962); Aus Zwinglis Predigten, 2 vols., ed. O. Farner (Zurich 1957).

LITERATURE

J. Dierauer, Gesch. der Schweizer Eidgenossenschaft 1516–1648 (Gotha 1907); E. Gagliardi, Gesch. der Schweiz, 2 vols. (Zurich 1934–37); H. Nabholz et al., Gesch. der Schweiz (Zurich 1932–38); Th. Schwegler, Gesch. der kath. Kirche in der Schweiz (Stans^2 1945); E. Egli, Schweizerische Reformationsgeschichte I (1519–25) (Zurich 1910); B. Fleischlin, Schweizerische Reformationsgeschichte, 2 vols. (Stans 1907–09); W. Hadorn, Die Reformation in der deutschen Schweiz (Frauenfeld–Leipzig 1928); R. Pfister, Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz I (Zurich 1964); G. Gerig, Reisläufer und Pensionenherren in Zürich 1519–32 (Zurich 1947); O. Vasella, Reform und Reformation in der Schweiz (Münster 1958); W. Oechsli, History of Switzerland (Cambridge 1922).

ZWINGLI: Bibliography and research reports: G. Finsler, Zwingli-Bibliographie (1897, new printing Nieukoop 1962); G. Locher,: "The Change in the Understanding of Zwingli in Recent Research" CH 34, 3–24 (1965); L. v. Muralt, "Probleme der Zwingli-Forschung" Schweizerische Beiträge zur Allgemeinen Gesch. 4 (Aarau 1946) 247–267; R. Pfister, "Die Zwingli-Forschung seit 1945" ARG 48 (1957) 230–240; id., "Neue Beiträge" Zwingliana 9 (1952) 445–452; J. v. Pollet: RevSR 28 (1954) 155–174, 37 (1963) 34–59, 38 (1964) 294–298; P Hauri, Die Reformation in der Schweiz im Lichte der neueren Geschichtsschreibung (Zurich 1945); G. W. Locher, "Wandlungen des Zwingli-Bildes" Vox Theologica 32 (Assen 1962) 169–182; F. Büsser, Das katholische Zwingli-Bild von der Reformation bis zur Gegenwart (Diss. Zurich 1964). Biographies: R. Staehelin, Huldreich Zwingli. Sein Leben und sein Wirken, 2 vols. (Basel 1895–97); W. Köhler, Huldrych Zwingli (1943, Stuttgart 1952); O. Farner, Huldrych Zwingli, 4 vols. (Zurich 1943–60); id., Zwingli the Reformer (New York 1952); J. Courvoisier, Zwingli (Geneva 1953); J. v. Pollet, Huldrych Zwingli et la Réforme en Suisse (Paris 1963); id., LThK X 1433–41; F. Schmidt-Clausing, Zwingli (Berlin 1965); F. Blanke, Aus der Welt der Reformation (Zurich 1960); Th. Pestalozzi, Die Gegner am Grossmünsterstift (Zurich 1918); J. Figi, Die innere Reorganisation des Grossmünsterstiftes in Zurich 1519–31 (Phil. Diss. Zurich 1951); O. Vasella, "Die Wahl Zwinglis als Leutpriester von Glarus" ZSKG 51 (1957) 27–35; id., Österreich und die Bündnispolitik der kath. Orte (Fribourg 1951); J. Rogge, Zwingli und Erasmus (Stuttgart 1962); J. Rilliet, Zwingli, Third Man of the Reformation (Philadelphia 1964); M. Haas, Zwingli und der l. Kappeler Krieg (Diss. Zurich 1962); cf. Zwingliana 12 (1964) H. 1, 93–136; 2, 35–68; L. v. Muralt, "Zwingli als Sozialpolitiker" Zwingliana 5 (1929–33); W. Köhler, Zürcher Ehegericht und Genfer Konsistorium, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1932–40); K. Kildenmann, Die Organisation des Zürcherischen Ehegerichtes zur Zeit Zwinglis (Zurich 1946); R. Ley, Kirchenzucht bei Zwingli (Zurich 1948); A. Farner, Die Lehre von Kirche und Staat bei Zwingli (Tübingen 1930); Erik Wolf, "Die Sozialtheologie Zwinglis" Festschr. Guido Kisch (Stuttgart 1955) 167–188; S. Rother, Die religiösen und geistigen Grundlagen der Politik Zwinglis (Erlangen 1956); J. F. G. Goeters, L. Hätzer (Gütersloh 1957); S. M. Jackson, Huldreich Zwingli (New York 1901). J. Walton, Zwingli's Theocracy (Toronto 1968). Theology: F. Blanke, "Zwinglis 'Fidei ratio' (1530). Entstehung und Bedeutung" ARG 57 (1966) 96–101; J. Courvoisier, Zwingli: A Reformed Theologian (Richmond 1963); E. Künzli, "Zwingli als Ausleger des AT" ZW 14, 871–899; id., Zwingliana 9 (1952) 185–207, 253–307; 10 (1957) 488–491; G. Krause, "Zwinglis Auslegung der Propheten" Zwingliana 11 (1960) 257–265; L. v. Muralt, Zwinglis dogmatisches Sondergut (Zurich 1932); A. Rich, Die Anfänge der Theologie H. Zwinglis (Zurich 1949); R. Pfister, Das Problem der Erbsünde bei Zwingli (Leipzig 1939); id., Die Seligkeit erwählter Heiden bei Zwingli (Zurich 1952); H. Schmid, Zwinglis Lehre von der göttlichen und menschlichen Gerechtigkeit (Zurich 1959); G. W. Locher, Die Theologie H. Zwinglis im Lichte seiner Christologie, 1st part: Die Gotteslehre (Zurich 1952); id., "Das Geschichtsbild Zwinglis" ThZ 9 (1953) 275–302; id., "Die Prädestinationslehre H. Zwinglis" ibid. 12 (1956) 526–548; W. Tappolet, Das Marienlob der Reformatoren (Tübingen 1962); G. W. Locher, "Inhalt und Absicht von Zwinglis Marienlehre" Kirchenblatt für die reformierte Schweiz 107 (1951) 34–37; K. Federer, "Zwingli und die Marienverehrung" ZSKG 45 (1951) 13–26. Eucharistic Doctrine: F. Blanke, "Zwinglis Sakramentsanschauung" ThBl 10 (1931) 283–290; C. C. Richardson, Zwingli and Cranmer on the Eucharist (Evanston, I11., 1949); W. Köhler, Zwingli und Luther. Ihr Streit über das Abendmahl nach seinen politischen und religiösen Beziehungen, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1914, Gütersloh 1953); H. Gollwitzer, "Zur Auslegung von John 6 bei Luther und Zwingli" In Memoriam E. Lohmeyer (Stuttgart 1951) 143–168; H. Rückert, "Das Eindringen der Tropuslehre in die Schweizer Auffassung vom Abendmahl" ARG 37 (1940) 199–221; J. Courvoisier, "Vom Abendmahl bei Zwingli" Zwingliana 11 (1962) 415–426; J. Schweizer, Zur Ordnung des Gottesdienstes in den nach Gottes Wort reformierten Gemeinden der deutschsprachigen Schweiz (Zurich 1944); id., Reformierte Abendmahlsgestaltung in der Schau Zwinglis (o. J.); F. Schmidt-Clausing, Zwingli als Liturgiker (Berlin 1952); id., "Johann Ulrich Surgant, ein Wegweiser des jungen Zwingli" Zwingliana 11 (1961) 287–320; id., "Zwingli und die Kindertaufe" Berliner Kirchenbriefe 6 (1962) 4–8; G. W. Locher, Im Geist und in der Wahrheit. Die reformatorische Wende im Gottesdienst zu Zurich (Neukirchen 1957); M. Lenz, "Zwingli und Landgraf Philipp" ZKG 3 (1879); R. Hauswirth, "Landgraf Philipp v. H. und Zwingli" Zwingliana 11 (1962) 499–552. C. Richardson, Zwingli and Cranmer on the Eucharist (Evanston, I11., 1949).

LEO JUD: Leo Jud, Katechismen, compiled by O. Farner (Zurich 1955); id., Vom Leiden, Sterben und Auferstehen des Herrn, revised by O. Farner (Zurich 1955); Schottenloher 9528–34f., 36656, 55341–48; L. Weiss, Leo Jud, Ulrich Zwinglis Kampfgenosse (Zurich 1942); O. Farner, "Leo Jud, Zwinglis treuester Helfer" Zwingliana 10 (1955) 201ff.

CONSTANCE: A. Willburger, Die Konstanzer Bischöfe Hugo v. Landenberg, Balthasar Merklin, Johann v. Lupfen (1496–1537) und die Glaubensspaltung (Münster 1917); C. Gröber, "Die Reformation in Konstanz von ihrem Anfang bis zum Tode Hugos von Hohenlandenberg (1517-32)" FreibDiözArch 46 (1919) 120–322; Th. Gottlob, Die Offiziale des Bistums Konstanz im MA (Limburg 1951); O. Vasella, Das Visitationsprotokoll über den Schweizer Klerus des Bistums Konstanz von 1586 (Bern 1963); L. Helbling, Dr. Johann Fabri und die schweizerische Reformation (Einsiedeln 1933).

ST. GALLEN: Th. Müller, Die St. Gallische Glaubensbewegung (1520–30) (St. Gallen 1913); P. Staerkle, Beiträge zur spätmittelalterlichen Bildungsgeschichte St. Gallens (St. Gallen 1939); G. Thürer, St. Gallen Geschichte, 1st vol. (St. Gallen 1953), cf. HJ 76 (1956) 518; K. Spillmann, Zwingli und die Zürcherische Politik gegenüber der Abtei St. Gallen (St. Gallen 1965).

VADIAN: Schottenloher 21628–56, 58615–40; J. Ninck, Arzt und Reformator Vadian (St. Gallen 1936); W. Näf, Vadian und seine Stadt St. Gallen, 2 vols. (St. Gallen 1944–57) (lit.); Vadianstudien. Untersuchungen und Texte, ed. W. Näf, 1–7 (St. Gallen 1945–62); C. Bonorand, "Stand und Probleme der Vadianforschung" Zwingliana 11 (1959 bis 1963) 586–606; id., "J. Vadian und die Täufer," Schweizer Beiträge zur allg. Gesch. 2 (1953) 43–72.

TOGGENBURG: O. Frei, Die Reformation im Toggenburg (Zurich 1920).

GRAUBÜNDEN: E. Camenisch, Bündnerische Reformationsgeschichte (Chur 1920); id., Gesch. und Reformation und Gegenreformation in den italienischen Südtalern Graubündens (Chur 1950); O. Vasella, "Bauernkrieg und Reformation in Graubünden 1525 bis 1526" ZSKG 20 (1940) 1–65; id., Abt Theodul Schlegel von Chur und seine Zeit (Freiburg, Switz. 1954) (lit.).

APPENZELLERLAND: J. Willi, Die Reformation im Lande Appenzell (Bern 1924).

SCHAFFHAUSEN: J. Wipf, Reformationsgeschichte der Stadt und Landschaft Schaffhausen (Zurich 1929).

BASEL: Schottenloher 23706–58, 59189–59219; Wackernagel, Gesch. der Stadt Basel, 3rd vol.: Humanismus und Reformation (Basel 1924); E. Staehelin, Das Buch der Basler Reformation (Basel 1929); K. Gauss, "Basels erstes Reformationsmandat" Basler Jahrbuch 50 (1930) 185–224; P. Roth, Die Reformation in Basel, 1st part: Die Vorbereitungsjahre (1525-28): Neujahrsblatt 114 (Basel 1936); id., Durchbruch und Festsetzung der Reformation in Basel (Basel 1942); P. Burckhardt, Gesch. der Stadt Basel von der Zeit der Reformation bis zur Gegenwart (Basel ^{2}1957); W. Brändly, "Oswald Myconius in Basel" Zwingliana 11 (1959–63) 183–192.

OECOLAMPADIUS: E. Staehelin, "Oekolampad-Bibliographie" Basler Zeitschrift für Gesch. und Altertumskunde 17 (1918) 1–119; id., Briefe und Akten zum Leben Oekolampads I: 1499–1526 (Leipzig 1927), II: 1527–1593 (Leipzig 1934) (lit.); id., Das theologische Lebenswerk Joh. Oekolampads (Leipzig 1939); H. W. Frei, "Johannes Oekolampads Versuch, Kirchenzucht durch den Bann zu üben" Zwingliana 7 (1939–43) 494–503; A. Moser, "Die Anfänge der Freundschaft zwischen Zwingli und Oekolampad" Zwingliana 10 (1958) 614–620.

BERN: Gedenkschrift zur Vierjahrhundertfeier der bernischen Kirchenreformation, 2 vols. (Bern 1928); W. Koehler, Zwingli und Bern (Tübingen 1928); O. E. Strasser, Capitos Beziehungen zu Bern (Leipzig 1928); H. Specker, Die Reformationswirren im Berner Oberland 1528 (Freiburg, Switz. 1951); R. Feller, Gesch. Berns, 2nd vol.: Von der Reformation bis zum Bauernkrieg 1516–1653 (Bern 1953); K. Guggisberg, Bernische Kirchengeschichte (Bern 1958).

THE DISPUTATION AT BADEN: Schottenloher 41283c-97; A. Baur, "Zur Vorgeschichte der Disputation von Baden" ZKG 21 (1901) 91–111; L. v. Muralt, Die Badener Disputation (Leipzig 1926); A. Weiss, "Das Kloster Engelberg unter Abt A. Bürki" ZSKG Beiheft 16 (1956); Th. Platter, Lebensbeschreibung, ed. A. Hartmann (Basel 1944).

THE DISPUTATION AT BERN: Text: E. F. K. Müller, Die Bekenntnisschriften der Reformierten Kirche (Leipzig 1903); Schottenloher 41299–311; F. Schlachter, Das Evangelische der Reformation am Berner Religionsgespräch 1528 (Bern 1909); K. Lindt, "Der theologische Gehalt der Berner Disputation" Gedenkschrift zur Vierjahrhundertfeier I: 301–344; L. v. Muralt, "Zwinglis Mitwirkung an der Berner Disputation" ZW 6: 1202–225.

15. Anabaptists and Spiritualists

LITERATURE

GENERAL: Bibliography: H. J. Hillerbrand, A Bibliography of Anabaptism (Elkart 1962); Schottenloher 44213a–44512, 52181–52191, 64167–64431. Sources: Hillerbrand 2683–3542; Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer (in late vols, Täufer): Vol. 1, Württemberg, ed. G. Bossert (Leipzig 1930): Vol. 2, Bayern I, ed. K. Schornbaum (Leipzig 1934): Vol. 3, Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter, ed. L. Müller (Leipzig 1938); Vol. 4, Baden und Pfalz, ed. M. Krebs (Gütersloh 1951); Vol. 5, Bayern II, ed. K. Schornbaum (Gütersloh 1951); Vol. 7–8, Elsass 1–2, ed. M. Krebs–H. G. Rott (Gütersloh 1959–60); Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer in der Schweiz: I., Zürich, ed. L. von Muralt and W. Schmid (Zurich 1952); Urkundliche Quellen zur Hessischen Reformationsgeschichte: IV., Wiedertäuferakten 1527–1626, ed. G. Franz (Marburg 1951); Urkunden zur Geschichte des Bauernkrieges und der Wiedertäufer, ed. H. Böhmer (Berlin 1933); Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers, ed. G. H. Williams (Philadelphia 1957); Der linke Flügel der Reformation. Glaubenszeugnisse der Täufer, ed. H. Fast (Bremen 1962) (=H. Fast); Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica, ed. S. Cramer–F. Pijper (Gravenhage 1903–14) (=BRN); Documenta Reformatoria 1, ed. J. N. Bakhuizen van den Brink et al. (Kampen 1960). Literature: The Mennonite Quarterly Review (Goshen, Ind., 1927f.) (=MQR); Mennonitisches Lexikon (Frankfurt–Karlsruhe 1913–58 (=ML); The Mennonite Encyclopedia, 4 vols. (Scottdale, Pa. 1955–59); W. Wiswedel, Bilder und Führergestalten aus dem Täufertum III (Kassel 1952); S. Hirzel, Heimliche Kirche. Ketzerchronik aus den Tagen der Reformation (Hamburg 1953); F. H. Littel, The Anabaptist View of the Church (Boston 1958); H. A. E. van Gelder, The Two Reformations (The Hague 1961); G. H. Williams, The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962); J. C. Wenger, Die dritte Reformation (Kassel 1963); G. F. Hershberger, Das Täufertum (Stuttgart 1963); K. Holl, "Luther und die Schwärmer" Gesammelte Aufsätze I (Tübingen 1923) 420–467; H. S. Bender, "Die Zwickauer Propheten, Thomas Müntzer und die Täufer" ThZ 8 (1952) 262–278; R. Stupperich, "Melanchthon und die Täufer" KuD 3 (1957) 150–170; H. J. Hillerbrand, "Anabaptism and the Reformation: Another Look" CH 29 (1960) 404–423; U. Bergfried, Verantwortung als theologisches Problem im Täufertum des 16. Jh. (Wuppertal 1938); F. Heyer, Der Kirchenbegriff der Schwärmer (Leipzig 1939); W. Wiswedel, "The Inner and the Outer Word" MQR 26 (1952) 171–191; F. H. Littell, Von der Freiheit der Kirche (Bad Nauheim 1957); G. Rupp, "Word and Spirit in the Reformation" ARG (1958) 13–26. C. Clasen, Anabaptism: A Social History (Ithaca, N.Y. 1972).

1. THE SWISS BRETHREN AND THE LOWER GERMAN ANABAPTISTS: Ausbund, das ist: Etliche schöne christliche Lieder, Wie sie in dem Gefängnis zu Passau . . . von den

Schweizer-Brüdern . . . gedichtet worden (Lancaster County, Pa. 1935). Literature: E. Bernhofer, Täuferische Denkweisen und Lebensformen im Spiegel mittel-und oberdeutscher Täuferverhöre (Diss. Freiburg 1967); G. Zschäbitz, Zur mitteldeutschen Täuferbewegung nach dem grossen Bauernkrieg (Berlin 1958); H. W. Schraepler, Die rechtliche Behandlung der Täufer in der deutschen Schweiz, Südwestdeutschland und Hessen 1525–1618 (Tübingen 1957); H. J. Hillerbrand, Die Politische Ethik des oberdeutschen Täufertums (Leiden–Cologne 1962); Ch. H. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz (Frankfurt 1908); E. F. P. Güss, Die kurpfälzische Regierung und das Täufertum (Stuttgart 1960).

THE SWISS BRETHREN: W. Köhler, "Die Zürcher Täufer" Gedenkschrift zum 400jährigen Jubiläum der Mennoniten oder Täufgesinnten 1525–1925, ed. C. Neff (Ludwigshafen 1925) 48–64; F. Blanke, "Beobachtungen zum ältesten Täuferbekenntnis" ARG 37 (1940) 240–249; O. Vasella, "Zur Geschichte der Täuferbewegung in der Schweiz" ZSKG 48 (1954) 179–186; P. Peachy, Die soziale Herkunft der Schweizer Täufer in der Reformationszeit (Karlsruhe 1954); F. Blanke, Brüder in Christo: Die Geschichte der ältesten Täufergemeinde (Zurich 1955); J. Yoder, Täufertum und Reformation: I, Die Gespräche zwischen Täufern und Reformierten in der Schweiz 1523–1548 (Karlsruhe 1962).

CONRAD GREBEL: Hillerbrand 1484–1508; H. Fast 9–27; H. S. Bender, Conrad Grebel (c. 1498–1526): The Founder of the Swiss Brethren (Goshen 1950).

FELIX MANTZ: Hillerbrand 1840–1847; H. Fast 27–35; E. Krajewski, Leben und Sterben des Zürcher Täuferführers Felix Mantz (Kassel 1958); id., "The Theology of Felix Mantz," MQR 36 (1962) 76–87.

JÖRG BLAUROCK: Hillerbrand 1190–1199; J. A. Moore, Der starke Jörg (Kassel 1955); NDB II: 292.

MICHAEL SATTLER: Hillerbrand 2276–2285; Schottenloher 57954–57969; H. Fast 58–77; ML 4 (1959) 29–38.

WILHELM REUBLIN: Hillerbrand 2216–2221; H. Fast, "Neues zum Leben Wilhelm Reublins" ThZ 11 (1955) 420–426; ML 3 (1958) 477–481.

BALTHASAR HUBMAIER: Hillerbrand 1602–1640a; Schottenloher 9057–9075, 46993–46998, 55259–55266a; Hubmaiers Schriften, ed. G. Westin–T. Bergsten (Gütersloh 1962); H. Fast 35–58; C. Sachsse, D. Balthasar Hubmaier als Theologe (Berlin 1914); W. Wiswedel, Balthasar Hubmaier (Kassel 1939); ML 2, 353–363; T. Bergsten, Balthasar Hubmaier (Kassel 1961).

HANS DENCK: Hillerbrand 1350–1402; Schriften I (with bibliog.), ed. G. Baring (Gütersloh 1955); II (with bibliog.) and III, ed. W. Fellmann (Gütersloh 1956–60); O. E. Vittali, Die Theologie des Wiedertäufers Hans Denck (Offenburg 1932); J. J. Kiwiet, "The Life of Hans Denck" MQR 31 (1957) 227–259; id., "The Theology of Hans Denck" MQR 32 (1958) 3–27; G. Baring, "Hans Denck und Thomas Müntzer in Nürnberg 1524" ARG 50 (1959) 145–181; W. Fellmann, "Der theologische Gehalt der Schriften Dencks" Leibhaftigkeit des Wortes. Festgabe für Adolf Köberle (Hamburg 1958) 157–165; id., "Irenik und Polemik bei Hans Denck" LuJ 29 (1962) 110–116.

LUDWIG HÄTZER: Hillerbrand 1528–1549a; J. F. G. Goeters, Ludwig Hätzer (Gütersloh 1957).

HANS HUT: Hillerbrand 1648–1659; H. Fast 79–99; W. Neuser, Hans Hut (Berlin 1913); H. Klassen, "The Life and Teaching of Hans Hut" MQR 33 (1959) 171–205; id., "Hans Hut und Thomas Müntzer" MQR 267–304.

2. THE HUTTERIAN BRETHREN: Hillerbrand 221–336; Die älteste Chronik der Hutterischen Brüder, ed. A. J. F. Zieglschmid (Ithaca, N.Y. 1943); Das Kleingeschichtsbuch der Hutterischen Brüder, ed. A. J. P. Zieglschmid (Philadelphia 1947); F. Hubry, "Die Wiedertäufer in Mähren" ARG 30–32 (1935) 1–36, 1–40, 61–102, 170–211; R. Friedmann, "The Christian Communism of the Hutterite Brethren" ARG 46 (1955) 196–209; G. Mecenseffy, "Die Herkunft des oberösterreichischen Täufertums" ARG 47 (1956) 252–259; G. J. Neumann, "Nach und von Mähren" ARG 48 (1957) 75–90; P. Hofer, The Hutterian Brethren and their Beliefs (Starbuck Man 1955); V. J. Peters, A History of the Hutterian Brethren, 1528–1558 (Diss. Göttingen 1960); R. Friedmann, Hutterite Studies (Goshen, Ind. 1961).

JAKOB HUTTER: H. F. Fischer, Jakob Hutter (Diss. Vienna 1949–Newton 1956); R. Friedmann, "Jakob Hutter's Last Epistle to the Church in Moravia 1535" MQR 34 (1960) 37–47. Z. Zeman, The Anabaptists and the Czech Brethren in Moravia (The Hague 1969).

3. THE ANABAPTISTS IN THE LOW COUNTRIES AND IN NORTH GERMANY: Hillerbrand 877–1094; Schottenloher 44213a–44513, 52181–52188, 64314–64324; W. J. Kühler, Geschiedenis der nederlandsche Doopsgezinden I–III (Haarlem 1961); N. van der Zijpp, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Nederland (Arnheim 1952); A. F. Mellink, De Wederdopers in de Noordelijke Neerlanden 1531–1544 (Groningen–Djakarta 1954); A. L. E. Verheyden, Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in de zuidelijke Nederlanden in de XVI^{e} eeuw (Brussel 1959); J. F. G. Goeters, "Die Rolle des Täufertums in der Reformationsgeschichte des Niederrheins" Rheinische Vierteljahresblätter 24 (1959) 217–236; H. Stiasny, Die strafrechtliche Verfolgung der Täufer in der freien Reichsstadt Köln 1529–1618 (Münster 1962).

MELCHIOR HOFMANN: Hillerbrand 1570–1593; H. Fast 196–318; W. I. Leendertz, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem 1883); F. O. zur Linden, Melchior Hofmann (Haarlem 1885); P. Kawerau, Melchior Hof(f)man als religiöser Denker (Haarlem 1954); E. W. Kohls, "Ein Sendbrief Melchior Hofmanns aus den Jahre 1534" ThZ 17 (1961) 356–365.

THE MÜNSTER ANABAPTISTS: Hillerbrand 513–767; Bahlmann: Zschr. für vaterländische Gesch. u. Altertumskunde 51 (1893) 119–174; off print with additions (Münster 1894); K. Löffler, "Zur Bibliographie der münsterischen Wiedertäufer" ZblB 24 (1907) 116–118; H. Detmer, "Ungedruckte Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Münster" Zschr. für vaterländische Gesch. u. Altertumskunde 51 (1893) 90–118; C. A. Cornelius, Berichte der Augenzeugen über das Münsterische Wiedertäuferreich (Münster 1853); Hermanni a Kerssenbroch Anabaptistici furoris . . . narratio, ed. H. Detmer, 2 vols. (Münster 1899–1900); Die Wiedertäufer zu Münster 1534–35. Berichte, Aussagen und Aktenstücke von Augenzeugen und Zeitgenossen, ed. K. Löffler (Jena 1923). Literature: C. A. Cornelius, Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufruhrs, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1855–60); L. Keller, Geschichte der Wiedertäufer und ihres Reichs zu Münster (Münster 1880); F. Blanke, "Das Reich der Wiedertäufer zu Münster 1534–35" ARG 37 (1940) 13–37; H. Rothert, Das Tausendjährige Reich der Wiedertäufer zu Münster 1534–35 (Münster 1947); R. Stupperich, Das Münsterische Täufertum (Münster 1958); H. Neumann, Masse und Führer in der Wiedertäuferherrschaft in Münster (Diss. Freiburg 1959); K. H. Kirchhoff, "Die Wiedertäufer in Coesfeld" WZ 106 (1956) 113–174.

BERNHARD ROTHMANN: Hillerbrand 2254–2270; R. Stupperich, Die Schriften der münsterischen Täufer und ihrer Gegner 1: Die Schriften Bernhard Rothmanns (Münster 1968); H. Fast 340–360; F. J. Wray, "The 'Vermanung' of 1542 and Rothmann's 'Bekenntnisse' " ARG 47 (1956) 243–251.

OBBE PHILIPS: BRN 7; H. Fast 318–340; B. Stroman, Obbe Philipsz, oudste der Doopers (Hilversum 1935); J. A. Brandsma, "Is Obbe Filips wer Roomsk wurden?" It Breaken. Tydskrift fan der Fryske Akademy 22 (1960) 119–121.

DIRK PHILIPS: BRN 10; Enchiridion oder Handbüchlein von der christlichen Lehre und Religion (Scottdale, Pa. 1920); C. J. Dyck, "The Christology of Dirk Philips" MQR 31 (1957) 147–155, 277–295; W. Keeney, Dirk Philips (Diss. Hartford Theol. Seminary 1957); id., MQR 32 (1958) 171–191, 298–306; J. ten Doornkaat Koolman, "Een onbekende brief van Dirk Philips (1550)" Nederlands Archief voor Kerkgeschiednis 43 (1959) 15–21; id., Dirk Philips (Haarlem 1964).

MENNO SIMONS: Hillerbrand 1893–2002e; Schottenloher 15370–15580a, 48248–48254, 57026–57046; C. Krahn, "Menno Simons Research (1910–1960)" CH 30 (1961) 473–480; Opera omnia theologica (Amsterdam 1681); The Complete Works, 2 vols. (Elkhart 1876–81); The Complete Writings, trans. L. Verduin, ed. C. Wenger, with a biography by H. S. Bender (Scottdale, Pa. 1956); H. Fast 147–169. Literature: C. H. Smith, The Story of the Mennonites, 3rd rev. ed. C. Krahn (Newton 1957); F. H. Littell, A Tribute to Menno Simons (Scottdale, Pa. 1961); H. W. Meihuizen, Menno Simons (Haarlem 1961); J. A. Brandsma, Menno Simons (Kassel 1962) (from the Dutch); I. B. Horst, A Bibliography of Menno Simons (Wieuwboop 1962).

4. SPIRITUALISM:

KASPAR SCHWENCKFELD: Schottenloher 19575–19720, 49233–49247, 58077–58140. Works: Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum, 19 vols. (Leipzig 1907ff.); H. Fast 204–217. Literature: G. Wolf, Quellenkunde der deutschen Reformationsgeschichte II/2 (Gotha 1922) 171–183; S. G. Schultz, Caspar Schwenckfeld von Ossig (Norristown, Pa. 1946); H. Urner, "Die Taufe bei Caspar Schwenckfeld" ThLZ 73 (1948) 329–342; H. J. Schoeps, Vom Himmlischen Fleisch Christi (Tübingen 1951); K. Ecke, Kaspar Schwenckfeld (Gütersloh 1952); P. G. Eberlein, "Schwenckfelds Urteil über die Augsburger Konfession" Jahrbuch für die Schlesische Kirche und Kirchengesch. NF 34 (1955) 581–586; G. Maron, Individualismus und Gemeinschaft bei Caspar von Schwenckfeldt (Stuttgart 1961); J. H. Seyppel, Schwenckfeld, Knight of Faith (Pennsburg, Pa. 1961); R. Pietz, Der Mensch ohne Christus. Eine Untersuchung zur Anthropologie Schwenckfelds (Diss. Tübingen 1956); W. Knörrlich, Kaspar von Schwenckfeld und die Reformation in Schlesien (Diss. Bonn 1957); T. Bergsten, "Pilgram Marbeck und seine Auseinandersetzung mit Caspar Schwenckfeld" Kyrkohistorik Arsskrift 57 (1957) 39–100, 58 (1958) 53–87; P. L. Maier, Caspar Schwenckfeld on the Person and Work of Christ (Assen 1959); R Pietz, Die Gestalt der zukünftigen Kirche. Schwenckfelds Gespräch mit Luther 1525 (Stuttgart 1959); W. Knoke, "Schwenckfelds Sakramentsverständnis" ZRGG 11 (1959) 314–327.

SEBASTIAN FRANCK: Hillerbrand 1453a–1457; Schottenloher 6472–6536, 46321–46334, 54608–54623; H. Fast 217–248; B. Becker, "Nederlandsche vertalingen van Sebastiaan Francks geschriften" Nederlands Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis 21 (1928) 149–160; A. Hegler, Geist und Schrift bei Sebastian Franck (Freiburg 1892); W. E. Peuckert, Sebastian Franck (München 1943); E. Teufel, "Landräumig." Sebastian Franck (Neustadt a.d. Aisch 1954); K. Räber, Studien zur Geschichtsbibel Sebastian Francks (Basel 1952); J. Lindeboom, Een Franc-tireur der Reformatie, Sebastian Franck (Arnheim 1952); S. L. Verheus, Kroniek en Kerugma. Een theolog. studie over de Geschichtsbibel van Sebastiaan Franck (Arnheim 1958).

16. The Catholic Literary Opponents of Luther and the Reformation

TEXTS

Corpus Catholicorum (=CCath.) Werke kath. Schriftsteller im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung, to date 29 vols. (Münster 1919–67). For the origins of this series see H. Jedin, Jos. Greving (1868–1919) (Münster 1954).

LITERATURE

K. Werner, Geschichte der apologetischen und polemischen Literatur der christlichen Theologie IV (Schaffhausen 1865); H. Laemmer, Die vortridentinischkatholische Theologie des Reformationszeitalters (Berlin 1858); F. Falk, "Das Corpus Catholicorum" Der Katholik 71/1 (1891) 440–463; N. Paulus, "Kath. Schriftsteller aus der Reformationszeit" Katholik 72/1 (1892) 544–564; 73/2 (1893) 213–223; id., Die deutschen Dominikaner im Kampf gegen Luther (1518–63) (Freiburg 1903); F. Lauchert, Die italienischen literarischen Gegner Luthers (Freiburg 1912); G. Wolf, "Die kath. Gegner der Reformation vor dem Tridentinum und Jesuitenorden" Quellenkunde der dt. Reformationsgeschichte II ²(Gotha 1922) 206–262; P. Polman, Die polemische Methode der ersten Gegner der Reformation (Münster 1931); id., L'élément historique dans la controverse religieuse du XVI^e siècle (Gembloux 1932); H. Jedin, "Die geschichtl. Bedeutung der kath. Kontroversliteratur im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung" HJ 53 (1933) 70–97; id., The Council of Trent (St. Louis 1957) 355–409; J. Lortz, The Reformation in Germany (New York 1968) 175–223; E. Iserloh, Der Kampf um die Messe in den ersten Jahren der Auseinandersetzung mit Luther (Münster 1952); Acta Reformationis catholicae eccelsiam Germaniae concernantia, ed. G. Pfeilschifter, I: 1520–1532 (Regensburg 1959), II: 1532–42 (1960); J. P. Dolan, "The Catholic Literary Opponents of Luther" Journal of Ecumenical Studies II (1974) 447–466;

JOHANNES ECK: List of Writings: J. Metzler, CCath 16 (1930) LXXI–CXXXI. New editions: CCath 1 (1919), 2 (1921), 6 (1923), 13 (1928), 14 (1929); W. Friedensburg, "Dr. Johannes Ecks Denkschriften zur dt. Kirchenreformation 1523" Beitr. zur bayer, Kirchengesch. 2 (Erlangen 1895–96) 159–196, 222–253; id., Letters, ZKG 19 (1899) 211–264, 473–485; J. Greving, Eck als junger Gelehrter (Münster 1906); id., Ecks Pfarrbuch für U. L. F. in Ingolstadt (Münster 1914); H. Schauerte, Die Busslehre des Johannes Eck (Münster 1919); W. Gussmann, Des Johannes Eck 404 Artikel zum Reichstag von Augsburg 1530 (Kassel 1930); H. Rupprich, Der Eckius Dedolatus und sein Verf. (Vienna 1931); G. v. Pölnitz, "Die Beziehungen des Johannes Eck zum Augsburger Kapital" HJ 60 (1940) 685–705; Th. Wiedemann, Dr. Johannes Eck (Regensburg 1865); H. G. Assel, Das kanon. Zinsverbot und der 'Geist' des Frühkapitalismus in der Wirtschaftsethik bei Eck und Luther (unpublished Diss., Erlangen 1948); E. Iserloh, Die Eucharistie in der Darstellung des Johannes Eck (Münster 1950); F. Zeopfl, Johannes Eck: Lebensbilder aus dem Bayer. Schwaben (Münich 1958) 186–216; Gerh. Müller, "Johannes Eck und die Confessio Augustana. Zwei unbekannte Aktenstücke vom Augsburger Reichstag 1530" QFIAB 38 (1958) 205–242.

HIERONYMUS EMSER: Works: L. Enders, Luther und Emser. Ihre Streitschriften aus dem Jahre 1521, 2 vols. (Halle 1890–91); De disputatione Lipsicensi (1519), A venatione Luteriana assertio (1519), ed. X. Thurnhofer; CCath 4 (Münster 1921). Letters: RGStT 3 u. 40; 5 Messopferschriften 1524–25, ed. Th. Freudenberger; CCath 28 (Münster 1959). Literature: P. Mosen, Hieronymus Emser (Halle 1890); G. Kawerau. Hieronymus Emser (Halle 1898); F. Gess, Akten und Briefe zur Kirchenpolitik Herzog Georgs von Sachsen, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1905–17); F. Jenssen, Emsers N. T. in niederdt. Übertragung (Schwerin 1933); G. Reichel, Herzog Georg der Bärtige und Erasmus von Rotterdam (Diss. Leipzig 1947); O. Vossler, "Herzog Georg der Bärtige und seine Ablehnung Luthers" HZ 184 (1957) 272–291.

JOHANNES COCHLAEUS: List of Writings: M. Spahn, Johannes Cochlaeus (Berlin 1898) 341–373 New editions: Flugschriften aus den ersten Jahren der Reformation IV (Leipzig 1910) 177–218; CCath III, XV, XVII, XVIII; CT XII, 166–208. Letters: ZKG 18 (1898); RGStT 3 (1907) 14–18, 44–51, 53ff., 57, 59–65; 7 (1909) 32ff., 45ff., 51ff., 58–62; 21–22 (1912) 248–252; RQ 35 (1927) 447–451 with additional letters; ArSKG 5 (1940) 216–220. Literature: M. Spahn, Johannes Cochlaeus (Berlin 1898); H. Jedin, Des Johannes Cochlaeus Streitschrift de libero arbitrio hominis (1525) (Breslau 1927); id., Schlesische Lebensbilder IV (Breslau 1931) 18–28; A. Herte, Die Lutherkommentare des Johannes Cochlaeus (Münster 1935); id., Das kath. Lutherbild im Bann der Lutherkommentare des Cochlaeus, 3 vols. (Münster 1943); K. Kastner, "Cochlaeus und das Priestertum" ArSKG 10 (1952) 84–105.

JOHANNES FABRI: Works: Opuscula (Leipzig 1537); Opera (Cologne 1537–41); Malleus in haeresim Lutheranam, ed. A. Naegele; CCath 23–26 (Münster 1941–52); CT IV: 10–23. Literature: A. Horawitz, "J. Heigerlein (gen. Fabri) bis zum Regensburger Convent" SAW 107 (1884) 83–220; K. Czerwenka, Johannes Fabri als Generalvikar von Konstanz (Diss. Vienna 1903); L. Helbling, Johannes Fabri (Münster 1941, with further lit. and ref. to sep. works).

FRIEDRICH NAUSEA: Letters, ed. W. Friedensburg: ZKG 20 (1900) 500–545; 21 (1901) 537–594; Acta Reformationis Catholicae II (Regensburg 1960) 547–555; "Reformgutachten" CT XII: 364–426, 428–431. Literature: J. Metzner, Friedrich Nausea (Regensburg 1884); J. G. Mayer, "Bischof Nausea auf dem Konzil von Trient" HJ 8 (1887) 1–27; H. Gollob, Friedrich Nausea (Vienna 1952); H. Jedin, "Das konziliare Reformprogramm Friedrich Nauseas" HJ 77 (1958) 229–253; J. Wodka, Kirche in Österreich (Vienna 1959) 201–205.

BERTHOLD VON CHIEMSEE: Tewtsche Theologey, ed. W. Reithmeier (Munich 1852); F. X. Remberger, "Die Lehre von der Kirche in der 'Tewtschen Theologey'" MThZ 9 (1958) 97–109.

LOUVAIN UNIVERSITY: H. De Jongh, L'ancienne faculté de théologie de Louvain (Louvain 1911); E. de Moreau, "Luther et l'université de Louvain" NRTh 54 (1927) 402–435; R. Guelluy, "L'évolution des méthodes théologiques à Louvain d'Erasmus à Jansenius" RHE 37 (1941) 52–71; J. Étienne, Spiritualisme érasmien et théologiens louvanistes (Louvain 1956); K. Blockx, De Veroordeeling van Maarten Luther door de Theol. faculteit de Leuven in 1519 (Brussels 1958).

JAMES LATOMUS: Opera Omnia (Louvain 1550); "De Primatu Romani Pontificis (1525)" Bibliotheca reformatoria neerlandica III, ed. F. Pijper (The Hague 1905) 111–195; J. Étienne, Spiritualisme érasmien 163–186 (works and lit.).

ALBERT PIGGE: H. Jedin, Studien über die Schriftstellertätigkeit Albert Pigges (Münster 1931); L. Pfeifer, Ursprung der kath. Kirche und Zugehörigkeit zur Kirche nach Albert Pigge (Würzburg 1938); J. Feiner, Die Erbsündenlehre Albert Pigges (Zurich 1940); M. E. Kronenberg, "Albert Pigge zijn geschriften en zijn bibliotheek" Het Boek 28 (1944) 107–158, 226; R. Bäumer, Die Unfehlbarkeitslehre Albert Pigges (Diss. Bonn 1956); id., "Die Auseinandersetzung über die römische Petrustradition in den ersten Jahrzehnten der Reformationszeit" RQ 57 (1962) 20–57.

HENRY VIII: Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII, ed. J. S. Brewer, 21 vols.

(London 1861–1910); C. S. Meyer, "Henry VIII burns Luther's Books, 12 May 1521" JEH 9 (1958) 173–187; P. Hughes, The Reformation in England, 3 vols. (London 1951–54); E. Koermberg, Henry VIII and Luther (Stanford 1961); H. E. Jacobs, The Lutheran Movement in England (Philadelphia 1894); L. B. Smith, Tudor Prelates and Politics (Princeton 1953); E. F. Pollard, Henry VIII (London 1913); H. Thieme, Die Ehescheidung Heinrichs VIII. und die europäischen Universitäten (Karlsruhe 1957).

JOHN FISHER: Opera, ed. G. Fleischmann (Würzburg 1597); English Works, ed. J. B. Mayor (London 1876). Suppl. (London 1921); Sacerdotii defensio: CCath 9 (Münster 1925); T. E. Bridgett, Life of blessed John Fisher (London 1888, 1922); J. Grisar, "Der hl. Martyrer John Fisher" StdZ 129 (1935) 217–230; F. P. Bellabriga, De doctrine beati Joannis Fisher in operibus adversus Lutherum (Rome 1934); V. McNabb, St John Fisher (London 1935); O. Hendriks, John Fisher. Bissehop en martelaar (Nijmegen 1947).

THOMAS MORE: Opera Omnia latina (Frankfurt–Leipzig 1689; n. ed., Frankfurt 1963); English Works, ed. W. Rastell (London 1557), re-edited by W. E. Campbell, 2 vols. (London 1931). Literature: Moreana 1478–1945, ed. F.–M. P. Sullivan (Kansas City–Los Angeles 1946); T. E. Bridgett, Life and Writings of Sir Thomas Morus (London 1892); E. M. G. Routh, Sir Thomas Morus and his Friends (London 1934); AAS 27 (1935) 159–162, 201–208; R. W. Chambers, Thomas Morus (London 1935), German (Munich 1946, lit.); W. E. Champbell, Erasmus, Tyndale and More (London 1949); P. Huber, Traditionsfestigkeit und Traditionskritik bei Thomas Morus (Basel 1953); E. Flesseman van Leer, "The Controversy about Scripture and Tradition between Thomas Morus and W. Tyndale" Ned. Archief voor Kerkgesch. NS 43 (The Hague 1959) 143–164; id., "The Controversy about Ecclesiology between Thomas Morus and W. Tyndale" ibid. 44 (1960) 65–86; H. de Vocht, Acta Thomae More (Louvain 1947); G. J. Donnelly, A Translation of Sir Thomas More's Responsio ad Lutherum (Washington 1962); E. F. Rogers, ed., The Correspondence of Sir Thomas More (Princeton 1947); id., Selected Letters (New Haven 1961); E. E. Reynolds, St. Thomas More (London 1953); T. Stapelton, Thomas Mori. in Tres Thomae (Cologne 1612); L. Bradner–C. A. Lynch, The Latin Epigrams of Thomas More (Chicago 1953); R. W. Gibson, St Thomas More: A Preliminary Bibliography (New Haven 1961); G. Marchadour, L'Univers de Thomas More (Paris 1963); R. Ames, Citizen Thomas More and his Utopia (Princeton 1949); E. L. Surtz, The Praise of Pleasure (Cambridge, Mass. 1957); id., The Praise of Wisdom (Chicago 1957); J. H. Hexter, More's Utopia (New York 1965); J. P. Dolan and W. Greene, The Essential Thomas More (New York 1967); J. M. Headley, "Thomas Murner, Thomas More, and the First Expression of More's Ecclesiology" Studies in the Renaissance XIV 73–92; A. Prévost, Saint Thomas More, contribution a l'histoire de la pensée religieuse (Diss. Lille 1945).

SILVESTER PRIERIAS: F. Lauchert, Die it. literarischen Gegner Luthers (Freiburg 1912) 7–30.

THOMAS DE VIO CAJETANUS: Opera Omnis, 5 vols. (Lyon 1639); Opuscula Omnia (Lyon 1558); De divina institutione Pontificatus Romani, ed. F. Lauchert: CCath 10 (Münster 1925); J. F. Groner, Kard. Cajetanus (Freiburg 1951) (lit.).

AMBROSIUS CATHARINUS: Apologia, ed. J. Schweizer: CCath 27 (Münster 1956); J. Schweizer, Ambrosius Catharinus (Münster 1910); F. Lauchert, Die it. literarischen Gegner Luthers (Freiburg 1912) 30–133; ECatt IX 1686f. (lit.).

JAKOB VAN HOOGSTRAETEN: Bibliotheca reformatoria neerlandica III, ed. F. Pijper (The Hague 1905); De veneratione sanctorum (1524), De Purgatorio (1525), Disputationes contra Lutheranos (1526); N. Paulus, Die dt. Dominikaner im Kampf gegen Luther (Freiburg 1903) 87–107.

Johannes Mensing: N. Paulus, Die dt. Dominikaner 16–45; A. Warko, Johannes Mensings Lehre von der Ehrsünde und Rechtfertigung (Diss. Breslau 1963); E. Iserloh, Der Kampf um die Messe (Münster 1952) 46–52.

Johannes Faber, OP: N. Paulus, Die dt. Dominikaner 292–313; Th. a Dillis, "Johannes Faber" Lebensbilder aus dem bayerischen Schwaben 5 (1956) 93–111.

Johannes Fabri, OP: N. Paulus, Die dt. Dominikaner 232–266; P. Siemer, Gesch. des Dominikanerklosters St. Magdalena in Augsburg (Vechta 1936) 107–114.

Ambrosius Pelargus, OP: N. Paulus, Die deutschen Dominikaner, 190–212; A. Keil, "Ambrosius Pelargus" AMrhKG 8 (1956) 181–223; W. Mann, "Eine humanistische Schrift über die Messe," AMrhKG 13 (1961) 197–233; P. Mohr, Der Opfercharakter der Messe in der Apologia und im Hyperaspismus des Ambrosius Pelargus (Speyer 1965).

Johannes Dietenberger: Ch. Moufang, Kath. Katechismus des 16. Jh. (Mainz 1881) 1–105; N. Paulus, Die dt. Dominkaner 186–189; H. Wedewer, Johannes Dietenberger (Freiburg 1888).

Augustin von Alveldt: CCath 11 (Münster 1926); Wyder den wittenbergischen Abgot (1524) u. Erklärung des Salve Regina (1527); L. Lemmens, P. Augustin von Alveldt (Freiburg 1899); id., FStud 5 (1918) 131–134; G. Hesse, "Augustin von Alveldt, Verteidiger des Apostolischen Stuhles" ibid. 17 (1930) 160–178.

Kaspar Schatzgeyer: Omnia Opera (Ingolstadt 1543); Scrutinium, ed. U. Schmidt: CCath 5 (Münster 1922); N. Paulus, Kaspar Schatzgeyer (Freiburg 1889); O. Müller, Die Rechtfertigungslehre nominalistischer Reformationsgegner (Breslau 1940); V. Heynck: FStud 28 (1941) 129–151, 29 (1942) 25–44; H. Klomps, Kirche, Freiheit und Gesetz bei . . . Kaspar Schatzgeyer (Münster 1959); E. Komposch, Die Messe als Opfer der Kirche. Die Lehre Kaspar Schatzgeyers über das eucharistische Opfer (Diss. Munich 1962).

Nikolaus Herborn: Enchiridion, ed. P. Schlager: CCath 12 (Münster 1927), Confutatio Lutheranismi danici (1530), ed. L. Schmidt (Quaracchi 1902); E. Kurten, Franz Lambert von Avignon und Nikolaus Herborn (Münster 1950).

Gasparo Contarini: Opera (Paris 1571; Venice 1578, 1589); Gasparo Contarinis Gegenreformatorische Schriften, ed. F. Hünermann: CCath 7 (Münster 1923); "Reformgutachten" CT XII 131–145, 153f., 208–215; F. Dittrich, Gasparo Contarini (Braunsberg 1885); id., Regesten und Briefe (Braunsberg 1881); H. Rückert, Die theol. Entwicklung Gasparo Contarinis (Berlin 1926); H. Jedin, Kard. Contarini als Kontroverstheologe (Münster 1949); id., Contarini und Camaldoli (Rome 1953); id., "Ein 'Turmerlebnis' des jungen Contarni" HJ 70 (1951) 115–130; id., Gasparo Contarini e il contributo veneziano alla Riforma Cattolica: La Civilta Veneziana del Rinascimento (Florence 1958) 105–124; R. M. Douglas, Jacopo Sodaleto (Cambridge, Mass. 1959).

Johannes Gropper: W. van Gulik, Johannes Gropper (Freiburg 1906); W. Lipgens, Kard. Johannes Gropper (Münster 1951, lit.); H. Lutz, "Reformatio Germaniae. Drei Denkschriften Johannes Groppers" QFIAB 37 (1957) 222–310; R. Stupperich, "Briefe und Merkblätter Johannes Groppers aus den Jahren 1542–1549" WZ 109 (1959) 97–107; H. Jedin, "Das Autograph Johannes Groppers zum Kölner Provinzialkonzil von 1536" Spiegel der Gesch. Festgabe für M. Braubach (Münster 1964) 281–292.

Julius Pflug: A. Jansen, "Julius Pflug" Neue Mitteilungen aus dem Gebiet hist. antiquarischer Forschung X/1 (Halle 1863) 1–110; X/2 (1864) 1–212; W. Offele, Ein Katechismus im Dienst der Glaubenseinheit (Essen 1965) (lit.).

MICHAEL HELDING: N. Paulus, "Michael Helding" Katholik 74, II (1894) 410–430, 481–502; E. Feifel, Grundzüge einer Theologie des Gottesdienstes, Motive und Konzeption der Glaubensverkündigung Michael Heldings (Freiburg 1960) (lit.); id., Der Mainzer Weibischof Michael Helding zwischen Reformation und kath. Reform (Wiesbaden 1962).

GEORG WITZEL: G. Richter, Die Schriften Georg Witzels bibliographisch bearb. (Fulda 1913; new edition, Niewkoop 1963); Apologia (1533); A. Räss, Die Convertiten seit der Reformation I (Freiburg 1872) 156–184); H. Volz (ed.), "Drei Schriften gegen Luthers Schmalkaldische Artikel von Cochläus, Witzel und Hoffmeister" CCath 18 (Münster 1932); L. Pralle, "Die volksliturgischen Bestrebungen des Georg Witzel" Jb. für das Bistum Mainz 3 (1948) 224–242; R. Padberg, "Zum katechetischen Anliegen Georg Witzels" ThGl 43 (1953) 192–200; id., "Georg Witzel der Ältere, ein Pastoraltheologe des 16. Jh.s." ThQ 135 (1955) 385–409; J. P. Dolan, The Influence of Erasmus, Witzel and Cassander in the Church of Ordinances . . . of the United Duchies of Cleve (Münster 1957); id., "Witzel et Erasme a propos des sacrements" RHE LIV 1 (1959); id., "Georg Witzel: Liturgiker und Kirchenreformer" Una Sancta XI, IV, 196–204; id., N. Cath. Enc. XIV: 984–985; W. Trusen, Um die Reform und Einheit der Kirche. Zum Leben und Werk Georg Witzels (Münster 1957).

STANISLAUS HOSIUS: Opera, 2 vols. (Cologne 1584); Die dt. Predigten und Katechesen, ed. F. Hipler–V. Zakrzewski (Krakau 1879–88); E. M. Wermter (ed.), Kard. Stanislaus Hosius und Herzog Albrecht von Preussen. Ihr Briefwechsel über das Konzil von Trient (Münster 1957) (lit.); Bibliographia Hosiana, ed. J. Smoczynsky (Peplin 1937); H. Eichhorn, Der ermländische Bischof und Kard. Stanislaus Hosius, 2 vols. (Mainz 1854); J. Lortz, Kard. Stanislaus Hosius (Braunsberg 1931); L. Bernacki, La doctrine de l'église chez le Card. Hosius (Paris–Posen 1935); F. J. Zdrodowski, The Concept of Heresy according to Card. Hosius (Washington 1947).

REGINALD POLE: Epistolae, 5 vols. (Brescia 1744–57); M. Haile, Life of Reginald Pole (New York 1910); W. Schenk, Reginald Pole, Cardinal of England (London 1950).

JACOPO SADOLETO: Omnia Opera, 4 vols. (Verona 1737; Rome 1760–64); Epistulae (Cologne 1590; Rome 1767); F. C. Church, The Italian Reformers, 1534–1564 (New York 1932); A. Cistellini, Figure della Riforma pretridentina (Brescia 1948); S. Ritter, Un Umanista teologo Jacope Sadoleto (Rome 1912); G. Schultess-Reckberg, Der Kardinal Jacope Sadoleto (Zurich 1909); R. M. Douglas, Jacope Sadoleto: Humanist and Reformer (Cambridge 1959); F. Benoit, La Légation du cardinal Sadolet auprès de François I en 1542 (Paris 1928); P. McNair, Peter Martyr in Italy (Oxford 1967).

SECTION THREE

The Reform in the German Principalities

17. The Confessional Leagues. The Imperial Diets of Nürnberg (1524) and Speyer (1526)

LITERATURE

Deutsche Reichstagsakten. Jüngere Reihe. IV, compiled by A. Wrede (Stuttgart 1905)= RTA; Acta Reformationis Catholicae, ed. G. Pfeilschifter, I (Regensburg 1959)=ARC; W.

Friedensburg, "Der Regensburger Convent von 1524," Hist. Aufsätze dem Andenken v. G. Waitz (Hannover 1886) 502–539; id., Zur Vorgeschichte des Gotha-Torgauischen Bündnisses der Evangelischen (Marburg 1884); id., Der Reichstag zu Speier im Zusammenhang mit der politischen und kirchlichen Entwicklung Deutschlands im Reformationszeitalter (Berlin 1887); id., "Die Reformation und der Speierer Reichstag von 1526" LuJ 8 (1926) 120–195; J. K. Seidemann, "Das Dessauer Bündniss vom 26. Juni 1525" ZHTh 17 (1847) 638–655; E. Cardinal, Cardinal L. Campeggio, Legate of the Courts of Henry VIII and Charles V (Boston 1935); Schottenloher 41253–57 (Regensburg Konvent); 27957a–60a (Nürnberg 1524); 27960b–74 (Speyer 1926).

18. Luther's Concept of the Church and Doctrine of the Two Kingdoms

SOURCES

CONCEPT OF THE CHURCH: "Von dem Papsttum zu Rom wider den hochberühmten Romanisten zu Leipzig" (1520; WA 6: 285–324); "Ad librum . . . Ambrosii Catharini . . . responsio" (1521; WA 7: 705–778); "Dass eine christliche Versammlung oder Gemeine Recht und Macht habe, alle Lehren zu urteilen und Lehrer zu berufen, ein- und abzusetzen" (1523; WA 11: 408–416); "De instituendis ministris ecclesiae ad senatum Pragensem Bohemiae" (1523; WA 12: 169–196).

DOCTRINE OF THE TWO KINGDOMS: "Von weltlicher Oberkeit, wie weit man ihr Gehorsam schuldig sei" (1523; WA 11: 245–281); "Wider die himmlischen Propheten . . . " (1525; WA 18: 62–125); "Ob Kriegsleute auch in seligem Stande sein Können" (1526; WA 19: 623–662); "Vom Krieg wider die Türken" (1529; WA 30/II: 107–148); "Eine Heerpredigt wider den Türken" (1529; WA 30/II: 160–197).

LITERATURE

CONCEPT OF THE CHURCH: J. Köstlin, Luthers Lehre von der Kirche (Stuttgart 1853); P. Drews, Entsprach das Staatskirchentum dem Ideale Luthers? (Tübingen 1908); K. Müller, Kirche, Gemeinde und Obrigkeit nach Luther (Tübingen 1910); M. Rade, "Der Sprung in Luthers Kirchenbegriff" ZThK 24 (1914) 241–260; K. Holl, "Die Entstehung von Luthers Kirchenbegriff" Ges. Aufsätze I (Tübingen 1932) 288–325; id., "Luther und das landesherrliche Kirchenregiment" loc. cit. 326–380; F. Kattenbusch, "Die Doppelschichtigkeit in Luthers Kirchenbegriff" ThStK 100 (1927–28); E. Kohlmeyer, "Die Bedeutung die Kirche für Luther" ZKG 47 (1928) 466–511; E. Rietschel, Das Problem der unsichtbar-sichtbaren Kirche bei Luther (Leipzig 1932); H. J. Iwand, "Zur Entstehung von Luthers Kirchenbegriff" Festschr. für G. Dehn (Neukirchen 1957) 145–166; K. G. Steck, "Ecclesia-creatura verbi" J. Beckmann et. al., Von Einheit u. Wesen der Kirche (Göttingen 1960) 40–56; E. Kinder, Der evangelische Glaube und die Kirche (Berlin 1960) 57–144 (lit.).

DOCTRINE OF THE TWO KINGDOMS: R. Sohm, Kirchenrecht I (Leipzig 1892); Harold Diem, Luthers Lehre von den beiden Reichen (Munich 1938); G. Törnwall, Geistliches und weltliches Regiment bei Luther (Munich 1947); E. Kinder, Luther und die Politische Frage (Neukirchen 1950); F. Lau, Luthers Lehre von den beiden Reichen (Berlin 1953); J. Heckel, Lex charitatis. Eine juristische Untersuchung über das Recht in der Theologie M. Luthers (Munich 1953); id., Im Irrgarten der Zwei-Reiche-Lehre (Munich 1957); id., "Kirche und Kirchenrecht nach der Zwei-Reiche-Lehre" ZSavRGkan 48 (1962) 222–284; Gunnar Hillerdal, Gehorsam gegen Gott und Menschen. Luthers Lehre von der Obrigkeit und die moderne evangelische Staatsethik (Göttingen 1955); P. Althaus, "Luther Lehre von den beiden Reichen im Feuer der Kritik" LuJ 24 (1957) 40–68 (lit.); id., Die Ethik Martin Luthers (Gütersloh 1965) 49–87; Sigfrid Grundmann, "Kirche und Staat nach der Zwei-Reiche-Lehre Luthers: Im Dienste des Rechts" Festschr. Franz Arnold (Vienna 1963) 38–54; E. Wolf, "Königsherrschaft Christi und lutherische Zwei-Reiche-Lehre" Peregrinatio II (Munich 1965) 207–229; EKL III, 1927–47 (opposing interpretations of Luther's doctrine by P. Althaus and Joh. Hechel). Melanchthon: R. Nürnberger, Kirche und weltliche Obrigkeit bei Melanchthon (Diss. Würzburg 1937); A. Reuter, "Luther und Melanchthons Stellung zur jurisdictio episcoporum" NKZ 36 (1925) 549–575; A. Sperl, Melanchthon zwischen Humanismus und Reformation (Munich 1959); F. Lau, "Melanchthon und die Ordnung der Kirche" Philipp Melanchthon. Forschungsbeiträge, ed. W. Elliger (Göttingen 1961) 98–115.

19. The Completion of the Lutheran Community

SOURCES

E. Sehling (ed.), Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jh. (Tübingen 1955–56), 1–5 (1902–13), 6–8, 11–13 (1955–66).

CHURCH PROPERTIES: "Ordnung eines gemeinen Kastens" (Leipzig 1523; WA 12: 11–30).

DIVINE SERVICES: "Deutsche Messe und Ordnung des Gottesdiensts" (1526; WA 19: 72–113); "Das Taufbüchlein verdeutscht, aufs neue zugerichtet" (1526; WA 19: 537–541); "Das Taubüchlein für die einfältigen Pfarrherrn" (1529; WA 30/III: 74–80).

VISITATION: "Unterricht der Visitatoren an die Pfarrherren im Kurfürstentum Sachsen" (1528) CR 26: 51–96; WA 26: 195–240; Melanchthons Werke in Auswahl I (1959) 215–271; Sehling, I: 149–174.

SCHOOLS: "An die Ratsherren aller Städte deutschen Landes, dass sie christliche Schulen aufrichten und halten sollen" (1524; WA 15: 27–53); "Eine Predigt, dass man Kinder zur Schulen halten solle" (1530; WA 30/II: 517–588); R. Vormbaum, Die evangelishcen Schulordnungen des 16. Jh. (Gütersloh 1860); S. Hendrix, "Luther and the Climate for Theological Education" Lutheran Quarterly 26 (1974) 3–11.

CATECHISM: WA 30/I: Sermons on the Catechism 1528 and the Text of Luther's Catechism with introduction, bibliography, and philological notations, by O. Albrecht, O. Brenner, G. Buchwald and J. Luther (1910); BSLK 501–733; F. Cohrs, Die Evangelischen Katechismusversuche vor Luthers Enchiridion, 5 vols. (Berlin 1900–7).

LITERATURE

CHURCH PROPERTIES: A. Schultze, Stadtgemeinde und Reformation (Tübingen 1918); F. H. Löscher, Schule, Kirche und Obrigkeit im Reformations-Jahrhundert (Leipzig 1925); H. Werdermann, Luthers Wittenberger Gemeinde wiederhergestellt aus seinen Predigten (Gütersloh 1929); H. Lehnert, Kirchengut und Reformation (Erlangen 1935).

DIVINE SERVICES: H. Jacoby, Die Liturgik der Reformatoren, 2 vols. (Gotha 1871–76); P. Drews, "Studien zur Gesch. des Gottesdienstes IV–V" Beiträge zu Luthers liturgischen Reformen (Tübingen 1910); J. Smend, Die Deutschen Messen bis zu Luthers deutscher Messe (Göttingen 1896); H. Waldenmaier, Die Entstehung der evangelischen Gottes- dienstordnungen Süddeutschlands im Zeitalter der Reformation (Leipzig 1916); L. Fendt, Der lutherische Gottesdienst des 16. Jh. (Munich 1923); A. Allwohn, Gottesdienst und Rechtfertigungsglaube (Göttingen 1926); E. Reim, "The Liturgical Crisis in Wittenberg 1524" Concordia Theological Monthly 20 (1949) 284–292; W. Jensen, "Von der ev. Mess" Festgabe für K. Schornbaum (Neustadt a. d. Aisch 1950) 61–100; V. Vajta, Die Theologie des Gottesdienstes bei Luther (Göttingen 1959); A. Boes, "Die Reformatorischen Gottesdienste in der Wittenberger Pfarrkirche von 1523 an" JLH 4 (1958–59) 1–40; H. B. Meyer, Luther und die Messe (Paderborn 1965).

VISITATION: C. H. Burkhardt, Geschichte der sächsischen Kirchen- und Schulvisitationen 1524–1545 (Leipzig 1879); E. Sehling, Geschichte der protestantischen Kirchenverfassung (Leipzig 1914); K. Eger, "Grundsätze evangelischer Kirchenverfassung bei Luther" ThStK 106 (1934–35) 77–123; M. Schmidt, "Die Reformation Luthers und die Ordnung der Kirche" Im Lichte der Reformation II (Göttingen 1959) 5–31.

SCHOOLS: F. Paulsen, Geschichte des gelehrten Unterrichts an den deutschen Schulen und Universitäten I (Leipzig 1919); G. Mertz, Das Schulwesen der deutschen Reformation im 16. Jh. (Heidelberg 1902); F. H. Löscher, Schule, Kirche und Obrigkeit im Reformations-Jahrhundert (Leipzig 1925); O. Scheel, "Luther und die Schule seiner Zeit" LuJ 7 (1925) 141–175; F. Falk, "Luthers Schrift an die Ratsherrn . . . und ihre gesch. Wirkung auf die deutsche Schule" LuJ 19 (1937) 55–114; Th. v. Sicard, Luther und die Schule (Gütersloh 1947); G. Mertz, "Luther über die Schule" Schule und Leben I (1950) 289–296; E. Lichtenstein, "Luther und die Schule" Der ev. Erzieher 7 (1955) 2–13; E. Reimers, Recht und Grenzen einer Berufung auf Luther in den neueren Bemühungen um eine evangelische Erziehung (Weinheim 1958); I. Asheim, Glaube und Erziehung bei Luther (Heidelberg 1961) (Bibliography).

CATECHISM: O. Albrecht, Luthers Katechismen (Leipzig 1915); D. J. M. Reu, D. Martin Luthers Kleiner Katechismus (Munich 1929); J. Meyer, Historischer Kommentar zu Luthers Kleinem Katechismus (Göttingen 1929); K. Aland, Der Text des Kleinen Katechismus in der Gegenwart (Gütersloh 1954); Appraised by G. Dehn: ThLZ 79 (1954) 719–724; G. Hoffmann, "Der kleine Katechismus als Abriss der Theologie M. Luthers," Luther 30 (1959) 49–63; E. V. Wills, "Joh. Brenz's Catechismus of 1528 and 1535" Lutheran Church Quarterly 19 (1946) 271–280.

20. Clement VII and Charles V

LITERATURE

Pastor, X (London 1938) Chaps. 1–8; T. Pandolfi, "Giovan Matteo Giberti e l'ultima difesa della libertá d'Italia negli anni 1521–1525" AS Romana 34 (1911) 131–237; E. Rodonachi, Les pontificats d'Adrien VI et de Clément VII (Paris 1933); K. Brandi, The Emperor Charles V (New York 1939); P. Rassow, Die Kaiser-Idee Karls V. (Berlin 1932); id., Die politische Welt Karls V. (Munich 1947); M. Salomies, Die Pläne Karls V. für eine Reichsreform (Helsinki 1953); J. Calmette, Charles V (Paris 1945); R. Tyler, The Emperor Charles the Fifth (London 1956); Karl V: Der Kaiser und seine Zeit, ed. P. Rassow–F. Schalk (Cologne 1960); I. Ludolphy, Die Voraussetzungen der Religionspolitik Karls V. (Stuttgart 1965).

21. The Speyer Protest and the Marburg Religious Colloquy

THE PACK AFFAIR: Schottenloher 40566a–91; J. Kühn, "Über die Verantwortlichkeit an der Entstehung des politischen Protestantismus" Festschr. W. Goetz (Leipzig 1927); id., "Landgraf Philipp von Hessen, der politische Sinn der Packschen Händel" Festschr. E. Brandenburg (Leipzig 1928); K. Dülfer, Die Packschen Händel, 2 vols. (Marburg 1958).

DIET OF SPEYER: Deutsche Reichstagsakten unter Karl V., VII, revised by J. Kühn (Stuttgart 1935); Die Appellation und Protestation der ev. Stände auf dem Reichstag zu Speier, ed. J. Ney (1906; Neudruck Darmstadt 1967); J. Kühn, Die Gesch. des Speyrer Reichstages 1529 (Leipzig 1929); J. Boehmer, "Protestari und protestatio, protestierende Obrigkeiten und protestantische Christen" ARG (1934) 1–22.

RIGHT OF RESISTANCE: See Chap. 23.

THE MARBURG COLLOQUY: See Chapter 14; H. Heppe, Die fünfzehn Marburger Artikel vom 3. Oktober 1529 (Kassel ^{2}1854) (facsimile); M. Lenz, "Zwingli und Landgraf Philipp" ZKG 3 (1879) 28–62, 220–274, 429–463; id., (ed.), Briefwechsel Landgraf Philipps des Grossmütigen von Hessen mit Bucer, 3 vols. (Leipzig 1880, 1887, 1891); R. Hauswirth, "Landgraf Philipp von Hessen und Zwingli" Zwingliana 11 (1959–63) 499–552; H. v. Schubert, Bekenntnisbildung und Religionspolitik 1529–30 (Gotha 1910); id., Anfänge ev. Bekenntnisbildung bis 1529–30 (Leipzig 1928); W. Köhler, Das Marburger Religionsgespräch 1529. Versuch einer Rekonstruktion (Leipzig 1929); id., Zwingli und Luther II (Gütersloh 1953); E. Bizer, Studien zur Gesch. des Abendmahlsstreits im 16. Jh. (Gütersloh 1940); H. Köditz, "Die gesellschaftlichen Ursachen des Scheiterns des Marburger Religionsgesprächs 1529" Zschr. f. Geschichtswiss. 2 (1954) 37–70; J. Staedtke, "Eine neue Version des sog. Utinger-Berichtes vom Marburger Religionsgespräch 1529" Zwingliana 10 (1954–58) 210–216; F. Büsser (ed.), Beschreibung des Abendmahlstreites von Johannes Stumpf (Zurich 1960); H. W. Neuser, "Eine unbekannte Unionsformel Melanchthons vom Marburger Religionsgespräch" ThZ 21 (1965) 181–199; Chr. Gestrich, Zwingli als Theologe, Glaube und Geist beim Zürcher Reformator (Diss. Zurich 1966); S. Hausammann, "Die Marburger Artikel–eine echte Konkordia?" ZKG 77 (1966) 288–321.

HEINRICH BULLINGER: Works: Reformationsgeschichte, ed. J. J. Hottinger–H. H. Vögeli, 3 vols. (Frauenfeld 1838–40); Diarium, ed. E. Egli (Basel 1904); The Decades of Heinrich Bullinger, ed. T. Harding, 4 vols. (Cambridge 1849–52); Das höchste Gut, ed. J. Staedtke (Zurich 1955); Das 2. helvetische Bekenntnis, ed. R. Zimmermann–W. Hildebrandt (Zurich 1936); G. W. Bromily (ed.), Zwingli and Bullinger (Philadelphia 1953) (Contains Bullinger's Of the Holy Catholic Church). Literature: Schottenloher 2049–2122, 45237–46, 52997–53032; C. Pestalozzi, Heinrich Bullinger. Leben und ausgewählte Schriften (Elberfeld 1858); A. Bouvier, Heinrich Bullinger réformateur et conseiller oecuménique (Neuchâtel 1940); F. Blanke, Der junge Bullinger (Zurich 1942); W. Hollweg, Heinrich Bullingers Hausbuch (Neukirchen 1956); P. Walser, Bullingers Lehre von der Prädestination (Zurich 1957); H. Fast, Heinrich Bullinger und die Täufer (Weierhof 1959); J. Staedtke, Die Theologie des jungen Bullinger (Zurich 1962) (Bibliography to 1528 and literature); Glauben und Bekennen, 400 Jahre Confessio Helvetica Posterior (Zurich 1966).

22. The Imperial Diet of Augsburg

SOURCES

Schottenloher 28011–67, 34504–687a, 36895; 62221–50; G. Brück, Geschichte der Handlungen in der Sache des heiligen Glaubens auf dem Reichstage zu Augsburg im Jahre 1530, ed. K. E. Förstemann (Halle 1831); K. E. Förstemann, Urkundenbuch zu der Geschichte des Reichstages zu Augsburg im Jahre 1530, 2 vols. (Halle 1833–35; new imprint Osnabrück 1966); Monumenta Vaticana historiam ecclesiasticam saeculi XVI illustrantia, ed. H. Laemmer (Freiburg 1861); F. W. Schirrmacher, Briefe und Akten zu der Geschichte des Religionsgespräches zu Marburg 1529 und des Reichstages zu Augsburg 1530 (Gotha 1876); Die Ratschläge der evangelischen Reichsstände zum Reichstag von Augsburg, ed. W. Gussmann: Quellen und Forschungen zur Geschichte des Augsburgischen Glaubensbekenntnisses I, 1 and 2 (Leipzig–Berlin 1911);J. Ecks 404 Artikel zum Reichstag von Augsburg 1530, id.: ibid. II (Kassel 1930); V. Tetleben, Protokoll des Augsburger Reichstages 1530, ed. H. Grundmann (Göttingen 1958); St. Ehses, "Kardinal Lorenzo Campeggio auf dem Reichstag von Augsburg 1530" RQ 17–21 (1903–07); J. Walter, Die Depeschen des venez, Gesandten N. Tiepolo (Berlin 1928); Nuntiaturberichte aus Deutschland, Erste Abt. 1533–59, I. ErgBd 1530–31, ed. G. Müller (Tübingen 1963); "Briefwechsel," CR 2; WA, Br 5.

CONFESSIO AUGUSTANA: BSLK 31–137; M. Reu, The Augsburg Confession (Chicago 1930).

CONFUTATIO: Die Konfutation des Augsburgischen Bedenntnisses. Ihre erste Gestalt und ihre Geschichte, ed. J. Ficker (Leipzig 1891); CR 27, 1–243; Th. Kolde, Die Augsburgische Konfession (Gotha 1896, 1911) 140–169.

CONFESSIO TETRAPOLITANA: E. F. K. Müller, Die Bekenntnisschriften der reformierten Kirche (Leipzig 1903) 55–78; Zwingli, Fidei ratio (1530): ibid. 79–94.

APOLOGIA: CR 27, 244–378; BSLK, 139–404.

LITERATURE

L. Pastor, Die kirchlichen Reunionsbestrebungen während der Regierung Karls V. (Freiburg 1879); J. Walter, Die Depeschen des venez. Gesandten N. Tiepolo (Berlin 1928); id., "Der Reichstag zu Augsburg 1530" LuJ 12 (1930) 1–90; R. Hermann, "Zur theol. Würdigung der Augustana," ibid. 162–214; H. Schubert, "Luther auf der Koburg" ibid. 109–161; id., Der Reichstag zu Augsburg im Zusammenhang der Reformationsgeschichte (Leipzig 1930); W. A. Nagel, Luthers Anteil an der Confessio Augustant (Gütersloh 1930); W. Köhler, Zwingli und Luther II (Gütersloh 1953); F. W. Kantzenbach, Das Ringen um die Einheit der Kirche im Jahrhundert der Reformation (Stuttgart 1957); G. Müller, "Johann Eck und die CA" QFIAB 38 (1958) 205–242; H. Grundmann, Landgraf Philipp von Hessen auf dem Augsburger Reichstag 1530 (Gütersloh 1959); W. Maurer, "Studien über Melanchthons Anteil an der Entstehung der Confessio Augustana" ARG 51 (1960) 158–207; id., "Melanchthon als Verfasser der Augustana," Luth. Rundschau 10 (1960–61) 164–179; E. Honée, "Die Vergleichsverhandlungen zwischen Katholiken und Protestanten im August 1530" QFIAB 42–43 (1963) 412–434; G. Müller, "Um die Einheit der Kirche. Zu den Verhandlungen über den Laienkelch während des Augsburger Reichstages 1530" Reformata Reformanda, Festgabe H. Jedin, ed. E. Iserloh–K. Repgen, I (Münster 1965) 393–427; K. Honselmann, "Otto Beckmanns Vermittlungsversuch beim Reichstag zu Augsburg 1530" ibid. 428–444; K. Thieme, Die Augsburgische Konfession und Luthers Katechismen auf theologische Gegenwartswerte untersucht (Giessen 1930); E. Schlink, Theologie der lutherischen Bekenntnisschriften (Munich 1948); H. Asmussen, Warum noch lutherische Kirche (Stuttgart 1949); F. Brunstäd, Theologie der lutherischen Bekenntnisschriften (Gütersloh 1951); M. Lackmann, Katholische Einheit und Augsburger Konfession (Cologne 1959); H. Fagerberg, Die Theologie der lutherischen Bekenntnisschriften von 1528–1537 (Göttingen 1965); H. Bornkamm, Das Augsburgische Bekenntnis (Hamburg 1965); L. Fendt, Der Wille der Reformation im Augsburgischen Bekenntnis, 2 revised by B. Klaus (Tübingen 1966); B. Moeller, "Augustana-Studien" ARG 57 (1966) 76–95; F. Blanke, "Zwinglis 'Fidei ratio' (1530), Entstehung und Bedeutung" ibid. 96–101.

23. The Politicizing of the Reform Movement to the Collapse of the Religious Colloquies

LITERATURE

1. THE RIGHT OF RESISTANCE: L. Cardauns, Die Lehre vom Widerstandsrecht des Volkes gegen die rechtmässige Obrigkeit im Luthertum und im Calvinismus des 16. Jh. (Diss. Bonn 1903); K. Müller, "Luthers Äusserungen über das Recht des bewaffneten Widerstandes gegen den Kaiser" SAM 1915, VIII (Munich 1915); H. Lüttge, "Melanchthons Anschauung v. Recht des Widerstandes gegen die Staatsgewalt" ZKG 47 (1928) 512–542; J. Heckel, Lex charitatis (Munich 1953) 184–191; id., "Widerstand gegen die Obrigkeit?" Zeitenwende 25 (1954) 156–168; E. Wolf, "Widerstandsrecht" RGG VI 1681–92.

2. THE LEAGUE OF SCHMALKALD: Schottenloher 41646–71; 52101f; 64018–26; O. Winckelmann, Der Schmalkaldische Bund und der Nürnberger Religionsfrieden (Strassburg 1892); E. Fabian, Die Entstehung des Schmalkaldischen Bundes und seiner Verfassung (Tübingen 1962 lit.); id., Die Schmalkaldischen Bundesabschiede 1530–32 (Tübingen 1958); Chr. Glitsch, Die Bündnispolitik der oberdt. Städte des Schmalkaldischen Bundes unter Einfluss von Strassburg und Ulm 1529–32 (Diss. Tübingen 1960); St. Fischer-Galati, "Ottoman Imperialism and the Religion Peace of Nürnberg" ARG 47 (1956) 160–179; R. Schelp. Die Reformationsprozesse der Stadt Strassburg am Reichskammergericht z. Z. des Schmalkaldischen Bundes (Kaiserslautern 1965).

3. THE REFORMATION IN WÜRTTEMBERG: Schottenloher 34046d–62; 61983–62018; J. Wille, Philipp der Grossmütige von Hessen und die Restitution Ulrichs v. Wirtemberg 1526–35 (Tübingen 1882); J. Rauscher, Württembergische Reformationsgeschichte (1500–1559) (Stuttgart 1934); H. Hermelink, Gesch. der ev. Kirche in Württemberg von der Reformation bis zur Gegenwart (Stuttgart u. Tübingen 1949); W. Köhler, Zwingli u. Luther II (Gütersloh 1953).-J. Brenz: W. Köhler, Bibliographia Brentiana (Berlin 1904); J. Brenz, Anecdota Brentiana, ed. Th. Pressel (Tübingen 1868); "Brentiana," ed. W. Köhler: ARG 9–26 (1911–29); Confessio Virtembergica, ed. E. Bizer (Stuttgart 1952); Predigten des Joh. Brenz, ed. E. Bizer (Stuttgart 1955); A. Hegler, Joh. Brenz und die Reform in Württemberg (Freiburg 1899); M. Brecht, Die frühe Theologie des Johannes Brenz (Tübingen 1966) (lit.: auch Schottenloher 52867–81).

4. THE WITTENBERG CONCORD: E. Bizer, Studien zur Geschichte des Abendmahlsstreites im 16. Jh. (1940, Darmstadt 1962); W. Köhler, Zwingli u. Luther II (Gütersloh 1953).

5. THE SCHMALKALDIC ARTICLES: (Sch. A.): BSLK, 405–468, 1226–1228 (lit.); H. Volz, "Luthers Sch. A. u. Melanchthons Tractatus de potestate papae" ThStK 103 (1931) 1–70; E. Bizer, "Die Wittenberger Theologen u. das Konzil" ARG 47 (1956) 77–101; id., "Zum geschichtlichen Verständnis von Luthers Sch. A." ZKG 67 (1955–56) 61–92; id., "Noch einmal: Die Sch. A." ZKG 68 (1957) 287–294; Urkunden u. Aktenstücke zur Gesch. von M. Luthers Sch. A. (1536–74), ed. H. Volz (Berlin 1957); H. Volz, "Luthers Sch. A." ZKG 68 (1957) 259–286; id., "Zur Entstehungsgeschichte von Luthers Sch. A." ZKG 74 (1963) 316–320; A. Ebneter, "Luther und das Konzil" ZKTh 84 (1962) 1–48; Chr. Tecklenburg Johns, Luthers Konzilsidee (Berlin 1966).

6. THE TREATY OF FRANKFURT: Text: P. Fuchtel, "Der Frankfurter Anstand" ARG 28 (1931) 145–206; Le Plat II 625–630; E. Ziehen, "Frankfurter Anstand und deutsch-evangelischer Reichsbund von Schmalkalden 1539" ZKG 59 (1940) 324–351; G. Müller, "Zur Vorgeschichte des Frankfurter Anstandes 1539" QFIAB 39 (1959) 328–341.

REFORMATION IN SAXONY: O. A. Hecker, Religion und Politik in den letzten Lebensjahren Herzog Georgs des Bärtigen von Sachsen (Leipzig 1912); E. Brandenburg, Herzog Heinrich d. Fr. von Sachsen und die Religionsparteien im Reich (Dresden 1896); S. Issleib, "Herzog Heinrich als ev. Fürst" Beitr. zur sächs. KG 19 (1905) 143–215; H. Bornkamm, Das Jahrhundert der Reformation (Göttingen 1961) 142–162; H. Helbig, Die Reformation der Universität Leipzig im 16. Jh. (Gütersloh 1953).

BRANDENBURG: P. Steinmüller, Einführung der Reformation in der Kurmark Brandenburg durch Joachim II. (Halle 1903); N. Müller, "Zur Geschichte des Gottesdienstes der Domkirche zu Berlin 1540–1598" Jb. für brandenburgische KG 2–3 (1906) 337–550; L. Zscharnack, Das Werk M. Luthers in der Mark Brandenburg (Berlin 1917); W. Wendland, "Einführung in die Quellen und Literatur zur märkischen Reformations-Gesch." Jb. f. brandenburgische KG 34 (1939) 131–163; 35 (1940) 217–227; id., "Die märkische Reformation" ibid. 34 (1939) 33–51; W. Dürks. "Der Beginn der märkischen Reformation i. J. 1539" ibid. 52–87; O. Gross, "Vom Widerstand der Kath. Kirche gegen die Kirchenordnung Joachims II." Wichmann-Jb. (1953) 36–52; W. Delius, "Die Reformation des Kurfürsten Joachim II." Theol. Viatorum 5 (1954) 174–193; B. Klaus, "Die kurbrandenburgische Kirchenordnung" JLH 4 (1958–59) 82–85; E. W. Zeeden, Katholische Überlieferungen in den luth. Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jh. (Münster 1959).

7. THE RELIGIOUS COLLOQUIES: Schottenloher 41279f; K. Brandi, Kaiser Karl V. II (Münich 1941) 296–306; L. Pastor, Die kirchlichen Reunionsbestrebungen während der Regierung Karls V. (Freiburg 1879); L. Cardauns, Zur Geschichte der kirchlichen Unions- und Reformbestrebungen 1538–42 (Rome 1910); R. Stupperich, Der Humanismus und die Wiedervereinigung der Konfessionen (Leipzig 1936); W. Lipgens, Kardinal J. Gropper 1503–1559 (Münster 1951); H. Jedin, Kirche des Glaubens-Kirche der Geschichte I (Freiburg 1966) 361–366.

HAGENAU: Schottenloher 41323a–28; Text of the Abschiedes in L. v. Ranke, Dt. Gesch. im Zeitalter der Reformation VI (Munich 1926) 136–145; R. Moses, Die Religionsverhandlungen in Hagenau und Worms (Jena 1889); F. Dittrich, Nuntiaturberichte G. Morones vom dt. Königshofe 1539–40 (Paderborn 1892) 130–179; NBD I 420–464; A. Ph. Brück, "Die Instruktion Kardinal Albrechts von Brandenburg für das Hagenauer Religionsgespräch" AmrhKG 4 (1952) 275–280.

WORMS: Schottenloher 41404–16; W. Lipgens, "Theologischer Standort fürstlicher Räte im 16. Jh." ARG 43 (1952) 28–51; H. Jedin, Tommaso Campeggio (1483–1564) (Münster 1958).

REGENSBURG: Schottenloher 28073–82, 41253–57, 41376–89; P. Vetter, Die Religionsverhandlungen auf dem Reichstage zu Regensburg 1541 (Jena 1889); V. Schultze, "Aktenstücke zur dt. Ref.-Gesch. (Dispatches from Regensburg)" ZKG 3 (1879) 150–183, 609–653; L. Pastor, "Die Correspondenz des Card. Contarini . . . 1541" HJ 1 (1880) 321–392, 473–500.

SUPPLEMENTS: NBD 17 (Berlin 1912); H. Eells, "The Origin of the Regensburg Book" Princeton Theol. Review 26 (1928) 355–372; R. Stupperich, "Der Ursprung des Regensburger Buches" ARG 36 (1939) 88–116; J. Schattenmann, "Regensburger Religionsgespräche 1541 u. 1546" Zeitwende 19 (1947–48) 44–52; H. Mackensen, "Contarini's Role at Ratisbon in 1541" ARG 51 (1960) 36–57.

24. The Breakdown of Universalism and the Religious Peace of Augsburg

LITERATURE

GENERAL: K. Lanz, Correspondenz des Kaisers Karl V. III 1550–1556 (Leipzig 1846); A. v. Druffel, Beiträge zur Reichsgeschichte, [Vol. 1] 1546–51 (Munich 1873), [Vol. 2] 1552 (Munich 1880), [Vol. 3] 1546–52 (Munich 1882), [Vol. 4] 1553–1555, completed and revised by K. Brandi (Munich 1896) [=Briefe und Akten zur Geschichte des 16. Jahrhunderts Vol. 1–4]; Nuntiaturberichte aus Deutschland, first section 1533–1559, Vol. 7–13, 16 (Vienna, Leipzig, Tübingen 1898–1965); K. Brandi, Kaiser Karl V. 2 vols. (Munich 1941, 1959); F. Hartung, Karl V. und die Reichsstände 1546–55 (Halle 1910); J. Lecler, Toleration and the Reformation, 2 vols. (New York 1963); K. Repgen, Die Römische Kurie und der Westfälische Friede I: Papst, Kaiser und Reich 1521–1644, 2 parts (Tübingen 1962, 1965); H. Lutz, Christianitas afflicta, Europa, das Reich und die päpstliche Politik im Niedergang der Hegemonie Kaiser Karls V. 1552–1556 (Göttingen 1964; lit.).

THE EMPEROR AND THE PROTESTANTS IN THE EARLY STAGES OF THE WAR: A. Hasenclever, Die Politik der Schmalkaldener vor Ausbruch des Schmalkaldischen Krieges (Berlin 1901); id., Die Politik Kaiser Karls V. und Ladgraf Philipps von Hessen vor Ausbruch des Schmalkaldischen Krieges (Marburg 1903); P. Heidrich, Karl V. und die deutschen Protestanten am Vorabend des Schmalkaldischen Krieges, 2 vols. (Frankfurt 1911–1912).

THE BIGAMY OF PHILIPP OF HESSE: Schottenloher 30354–30369; W. W. Rockwell, Die Doppelehe des Landgrafen Philipp von Hessen (Marburg 1904); W. Köhler, "Die Doppelehe Landgraf Philipps von Hessen" HZ 94 (1905) 385–411; Th. Brieger, "Luther und die Nebenehe des Landgrafen Philipp" ZKG 29 (1908) 174–196; N. Paulus, "Die hessische Doppelehe im Urteil der protestantischen Zeitgenossen" HPBl 147 (1911) 503–517, 561—573; H. Eells, The Attitude of Martin Bucer toward the Bigamy of Philipp of Hesse (New Haven 1924); W. Maurer, "Luther und die Doppelehe Philipps von Hessen" Luther 24 (1953) 97–120.

THE WAR OF SUCCESSION IN GELDER: Schottenloher 30740a–g, 37186–37201; F. Petri, "Landschaftliche und überlandschaftliche Kräfte im habsburgisch-klevischen Ringen um Geldern und im Frieden von Venlo 1537–1543" Festschr. F. Steinbach (Bonn 1960) 92–113.

PROGRESS OF THE REFORMATION: "The Attack on Braunschweig (Brunswick)" Schottenloher 29766–29836; F. Bruns, Die Vertreibung Herzog Heinrichs von Braunschweig durch den Schmalkaldischen Bund (Diss. Marburg 1889); E. Brandenburg, Die Gefangennahme Herzog Heinrichs von Braunschweig durch den Schmalkaldischen Bund (1545) (Leipzig 1894); H. Reller, Vorreformatorische und reformatorische Kirchenverfassung im Fürstentum Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel (Göttingen 1959).

THE DIOCESE OF NAUMBURG: P. Brunner, Nikolaus von Amsdorf als Bischof von Naumburg (Gütersloh 1960) (lit.); Julius Pflug: Schottenloher 17222–17232, 31567–31572; F. I. Schwarzius, Acta Julii Pflugii episcopi Numburgensis in caussa religionis (Eisenberg 1774); A. Jansen, "Julius Pflug" Neue Mittheilungen aus dem Gebiet historisch-antiquarischer Forschungen 10 (1864) I: 1–110, II: 1–212; W. van Gulik, "Zeitzer Beiträge zur Geschichte der katholischen Gegenreformation im 16. Jh., I Julius Pflug und Eberhard Billick, II Julius Pflug und Daniel Mauch" RQ 18 (1904) 57–83; E. Hoffmann, Naumburg im Zeitalter der Reformation (Leipzig 1900).

COLOGNE: Schottenloher 30837–30880, 51297–51301, 61327–61339; C. Varrentrapp, Hermann von Wied und sein Reformationsversuch in Köln (Leipzig 1878); id., "Zur Charakteristik Hermanns von Wied, Bucers und Groppers" ZKG 20 (1900) 37–58; W. Lipgens, "Neue Beiträge zum Reformationsversuch Hermanns von Wied aus dem Jahr 1545" AHVNrh 149–150 (1950—51) 46–73; J. Niessen, "Der Reformationsversuch des Kölner Kurfürsten Hermann von Wied (1536–1547)" Rhein. Vierteljahresbl. 15–16 (1950–51) 298–312; H. Jedin, "Fragen um Hermann von Wied" HJ 74 (1955) 687–699; Th. Schlüter, Die Publizistik um den Reformationsversuch des Kölner Erzbischofs Hermann von Wied aus dem Jahre 1542–1547 (Diss. Bonn 1957); E. Mühlhaupt, "Die Kölner Reformation" Monatshefte für ev. KG des Rheinlandes 11 (Düsseldorf 1962) 73–93; M. Köhn, Martin Bucers Entwurf einer Reformation des Erzstiftes Köln (Witten 1966).

THE SCHMALKALDIC WAR (=SCH. K.): Schottenloher 41672–41797, 52103, 64027–64029; G. Wolf, Quellenkunde der dt. Reformationsgeschichte I (Gotha 1915) 466–476; F. Hortleder, Der Römischen Keyser- und Königlichen Majesteten, auch des Heiligen Römischen Reichs geistlicher und weitlicher Stände Handlungen und Ausschreiben von den Ursachen des Teutschen Kriegs (Frankfurt 1617–18, Gotha 1645); A. Stein, Kaiser und Kurfürst. Historische Erzählung aus dem Sch. K. (Halle a. S. 1885); A. Schütz, Der Donaufeldzug Karls V. (Tübingen 1930); A. Ph. Brück, "Stadt und Erzstift Mainz im Sch. K." Hessisches Jb. für Landesgeschichte 4 (1954) 155–185; E. Hühns, "Nationale Propaganda im Sch. K." Zschr. für Geschichtswissenschaft 6 (1958) 1027–1248.

THE COLLOQUY OF REGENSBURG: Schottenloher 41390–41398; H. Jedin, II: 165–168, 478 (lit.); H. v. Caemmerer, Das Regensburger Religionsgespräch im Jahre 1546 (Diss. Berlin 1901); F. Roth, "Der officielle Bericht der von den Evangelischen zum Regensburger Gespräch Verordneten an ihre Fürsten und Obern" ARG 5 (1907–8) 1–30, 375–397; V. Schultze, "Das Tagebuch des Grafen Wolrad II zu Waldeck zum Regensburger Religionsgespräch 1546" ARG 7 (1909–10) 135–184, 294–347; H. Nebelsieck, "Elf Briefe und Aktenstücke über das Religionsgespräch in Regensburg von 1546" ARG 32 (1935) 127–136, 253–283.

THE INTERIM: Schottenloher 38259a–38330a; K. Th. Hergang, Das Augsburger Interim (Leipzig 1855); N. Müller, "Zur Geschichte des Interims" (Leipzig 1855); N. Müller, "Zur Geschichte des Interims" Jb. für brandenburgische KG 5 (1908) 51–171; "Verteidigung des Augsburger Interims von dem Bischof Julius Pflug, aus einer Handschrift," ed. Ch. G. Müller: Archiv für alte und neue KG 4 (1818) 104–148; M. Weigel, "Ein Gutachten des Johann Agricola von Eisleben über das Interim" ZBKG 16 (1941)

32–46; W. v. Loewenich, Das Interim von 1548; id., Von Augustin zu Luther (Witten 1959) 391–406.

REVOLT OF THE PRINCES: K. E. Born, "Moritz v. Sachsen und die Fürstenverschwörung gegen Karl V." HZ 191 (1960) 18–67 (lit.).

THE RELIGIOUS PEACE OF AUGSBURG: Schottenloher 34481–34503, 62198–62220; Text: K. Brandi, Der Augsburger Religionsfriede vom 25. September 1555 (Göttingen 1927); E. Walder, Religionsvergleiche des 16. Jh. I (Bern 1960) 41–68; Ch. Lehenmann, De pace religionis acta publica (Frankfurt 1707); A. Druffel–K. Brandi, Beiträge zur Reichsgeschichte 1553–1555; Briefe und Akten zur Geschichte des 16. Jh. IV (Munich 1896); K. Brandi, "Passauer Vertrag und Augsburger Religionsfriede" HZ 95 (1905) 206–264; G. Wolf, Der Augsburger Religionsfriede (Stuttgart 1890); W. Kühns, Gesch. des Passauischen Vertrages 1552 (Diss. Göttingen 1906); G. Bonwetsch, Gesch. des Passauischen Vertrages von 1552 (Göttingen 1907); N. Paulus, "Religionsfreiheit und Augsburger Religionsfriede" HPBl 149 (1912) 356–367, 401–416; F. Siebert, Zwischen Kaiser und Papst. Kardinal Truchsess von Waldburg und die Anfänge der Gegenreformation in Deutschland (Berlin 1943); M. Simon, Der Augsburger Religionsfriede (Augsburg 1955); G. Pfeiffer, "Der Augsburger Religionsfriede und die Reichsstädte" Zschr. des hist. Vereins für Schwaben 61 (1955) 213–321; H. Tüchle, "Der Augsburger Religionsfriede. Neue Ordnung oder Kampfpause?" ibid. 323–340; H. Lutz, "Aus vatikanischen Quellen zum Augsburger Religionsfrieden 1555" ibid. 389–401; J. Grisar, "Die Sendung des Kardinals Morone als Legat zum Reichstag von Augsburg 1555" ibid. 341–387; id., "Die Stellung der Päpste zum Reichstag und Religionsfrieden von Augsburg" StdZ 156 (1954–55) 440–462; L. W. Spitz, "Particularism and the Peace of Augsburg 1555" CH 25 (1956) 110–126; M. Heckel, "Staat und Kirche nach den Lehren der ev. Juristen in der ersten Hälfte des 17. Jh." ZSavRGkan section 42 (1956) 117–247; id., "Autonomia und Pacis Compositio. Der Augsburger Religionsfriede in der Deutung der Gegenreformation" ibid. 45 (1959) 141–248; id., "Parität" ibid. 49 (1963) 261–420; W. P. Fuchs, "Der Augsburger Religionsfriede von 1555. Ein Literaturbericht" Jb. der Hessischen Kirchengeschichtlichen Vereinigung 8 (1957) 226–235; L. Petry, "Der Augsburger Religionsfriede von 1555 und die Landesgeschichte" Blätter für Deutsche Landesgeschichte 93 (1957) 150–175; H. Bornkamm, Der Augsburger Religionsfriede: id., Das Jahrhundert der Reformation (Göttingen ^{2}1966) 242–253.

SECTION FOUR

Europe under the Sign of Confessional Pluralism

25. The Reformation in Scandinavia

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bibliographie de la Réforme (1450–1648). Ouvrages parus de 1940 à 1955, fasc. 2 (Leiden 1960); H. Kellenbenz, "Forschungsbericht über skandinavische Geschichte I" HZ 190 (1960) 618–655.

LITERATURE

I. G. Lindhardt, Den nordiske Kirkes Historie (Copenhagen 1945); M. Gerhardt–W. Hubatsch, Deutschland und Skandinavien im Wandel der Jahrhunderte (Bonn 1950); G. Johannesson, "Die Kirchenreformation in den nordischen Ländern" XI^{e} Congrès International des Sciences Historiques. Rapports IV (Göteborg–Stockholm–Uppsala 1960) 48–83; G. Schwaiger, Die Reformation in den nordischen Ländern (Münich 1962).

DENMARK: Acta Pontificum Danica V–VI, ed. A. Krarup–J. Lindbeck (Copenhagen 1913–1915); J. Danstrup, A History of Denmark (Copenhagen 1948); N. K. Andersen, Confessio Hafniensis (1530) (Copenhagen 1954); E. H. Dungley, The Reformation in Denmark (London 1948); Hal Koch–B. Kornerup, Den Danske Kirkes Historie IV (Copenhagen 1959); Ekklesia, ed. F. Siegmund-Schultze, II:7 (Leipzig 1937); L. Schmitt, Der Karmeliter Paulus Heliä (Freiburg 1893); id., Joh. Tausen (Cologne 1894); id., Die Verteidigung der katholischen Kirche in Dänemark gegen die Religionserneuerung (Paderborn 1899); id. (ed.), Nic. Stagefyr seu Herborn, Confutatio Lutheranismi Danici (1530) (Quaracchi 1902); J. O. Andersen, Der Reformkatholizismus und die dänische Reformation (Gütersloh 1934); id., Paulus Helie I (Copenhagen 1936); M. Christensen, Hans Tausen (Copenhagen 1942); C. T. Engelstoft, Liturgiens Historie i Danmark (Copenhagen 1840); J. Schnell, Die dänische Kirchenordnung von 1542 und der Einfluss von Wittenberg (Breslau 1927); E. Feddersen, "Philippismus und Luthertum in Dänemark und Schleswig-Holstein" Festschr. H. von Schubert ARG ErgBd 5 (Leipzig 1929) 92–114; id., "Die lateinische Kirchenordnung König Christians III. von 1537" Schriften des Vereins für Schleswig-Holsteinische Kirchengesch. I:18 (1934) 1–93; O. Kaehler, "Zur Gesch. der dänischen Kirchenordnung von 1537" Festschr. K. Haff (Innsbruck 1950) 111–119.

NORWAY: Diplomatarium Norvegicum, to date 21 vols. (Oslo 1847ff.); A. Chr. Baug, Den norske kirkes historie ireformationsaarhundredet (Oslo 1895); Ekklesia, ed. F. Siegmund-Schultze, II:6 (Gotha 1936); J. Welle, Norges kirkehistorie (Oslo 1948); O. Garstein, "The Reformation in Norway" The Month N.S. 21 (London 1959) 95–103; T. B. Wilson, History of Church and State in Norway from the 10th to 16th Century (Philadelphia 1903); K. Larsen, A History of Norway (Princeton 1948).

ICELAND: Diplomatarium Islandicum, 12 vols. (Copenhagen 1857–1902; Reykjavik 1900–1932); F. Johanneus, Historia ecclesiastica Islandiae, 4 vols. (Copenhagen 1772–1778); J. Helgason, Islands Kirke fra Reformation en til vore Dage (Copenhagen 1922); Ekklesia, ed. F. Siegmund-Schultze, II:7 (Leipzig 1937); T. J. Oleson, "Bishop Jon Arason (1484–1550)" Speculum 28 (Cambridge, Mass. 1953) 245–278; cf. ibid. 29 (1954) 535f.

SWEDEN: J Weidling, Schwedische Gesch. im Zeitalter der Reformation (Gotha 1882); J. Andersson, Schwedische Geschichte (Munich 1950); B. Gustafsson, Svenk kyrkogeografi (Malmö 1957); id., Svenk kyrkohistoria (Stockholm 1963); J. F. Martin, Gustave Vasa et al Réforme en Suède (Paris 1906); Hj. Holmquist, Die Schwedische Reformation 1523–1531 (Leipzig 1925); S. Kjöllerström, "Kirche und Staat in Schweden nach der Reformation" ZSavRGkan 41 (1955) 271–289; id., Guds och Severiges lag under Reformationstiden (Lund 1957); id., "Gustav Vasa und die Bischofsweihe (1523–1531)" Festschr. für Joh. Heckel (Cologne–Graz 1959) 164–183; H. Yrwing, Gustav Vasa, kröningsfrågan och Västerås riksdag 1527 (Lund 1956); I. Salvenius, Gustav Vasa (Stockholm 1950); E. Färnström, Laurentius Petris Handskrivna Kyrkoordning av år 1561 (Stockholm 1956); Olavus Petri, Samlade skrifter, 4 vols., ed. B. Hesselmann, (Stockholm 1914–17); R. Holm, Olavus Petri (Uppsala 1917); C. Bergendoff, Olavus Petri and the Ecclesiastical Transformation in Sweden (1521–1552) (New York 1928); R. Murray, Olavus Petri (Stockholm 1952); S. Ingebrand, Olavus Petris reformatoriska åskådning (Uppsala 1964); E. E. Yelvertow, The Manual of Olavus Petri (London 1951); G. Carlsson, "Preussischer Einfluss auf die Reformation Schwedens" Festschr. O. Scheel (Schleswig 1952) 36–48; M. Roberts, The Early Vasas: A History of Sweden 1523–1611 (Cambridge 1968); J. Kolberg, "Aus dem Leben der letzten katholischen Bischöfe Schwedens" Vorlesungsverzeichnis der Akademie Braunsberg (1914); Briefe von Johannes und Olaus Magnus, ed. G. Buschbell (Stockholm 1932); Th. v. Haag, "Die apostolische Sukzession in Schweden" Kyrkohistorisk Arsskrift 44 (Uppsala 1945) 1–168; J. G. Hoffmann, La réforme en Suède 1523–1527 et la succession apostolique (Neuchatel 1945); E. Benz, Bischofsamt und apostol. Sukzession im dt. Protestantismus (Stuttgart 1953); Y. Stenström, Om biskops tjänst och ämbete (Stockholm 1959); A. A. Stomberg, A History of Sweden (New York 1931); H. W. Waddamg, The Swedish Church (London 1946).

FINLAND: W. Sommer, Gesch. Finnlands (Munich 1938); I. Salomies, Suomen kirkon historia, 3 vols. to date (Helsinki 1944–1962); G. Sentzke, Die Kirche Finnlands (Göttingen 1963); Ekklesia, ed. F. Siegmund-Schultze, II:8 (Leipzig 1938); J. Gummerus, Michael Agricola, der Reformator Finnlands (Helsinki 1944); T. Harjunpaa, "Liturgical Developments in Sweden and Finland in the Era of Lutheran Orthodoxy" CH XXXVII (1968) 14–36.

26. The Reformation in Eastern Europe

LITERATURE

E. Sehling, Die ev. Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jh. IV, V (Leipzig 1911–13) (Lit.); E. Benz, Wittenberg und Byzanz (Marburg 1949); R. Stupperich, "Der Protestantismus auf seinen Wegen nach Osteuropa" Kirche im Osten 1 (1958) 24–40; G. Rhode, "Die Reformation in Osteuropa" Zeitschrift für Ostforschung 7 (1958) 481–500; "Gestalten und Wege der Kirche im Osten" Festgabe für A. Rhode, ed. H. Kreska (Ulm 1958); R. Stupperich, "Geschichtl. Wandlungen und Lebensbedingungen des slawishcen Protestantismus" Kirche im Osten 2 (1959) 80–96; J. Matl, "Reformation und Gegenreformation als Kulturfaktoren bei den Slawen" Festschr. Karl Eder (Innsbruck 1959) 101–117; R. Stupperich, "Melanchthons Verhältnis zu Polen und Ungarn: Der Remter" Zscht. für Kultur und Politik im Osteuropa 6 (1960) 236–243; La Renaissance et la Réformation en Pologne et en Hongrie, ed. G. Székely–E. Fûgedi (Budapest 1963); E. W. Zeeden, Die Entstehung der Konfessionen (Munich–Vienna 1965) 153–178; The New Cambridge Modern History II (London–Cambridge 1962) 186–204; Baltische Kirkengeschichte, ed. R. Wittram (Munich 1956).

PRUSSIA: P. Tschackert, Urkundenbuch zur Reformationsgesch. des Herzogtums Preussen, 3 vols. (Leipzig 1890); H. Laag, "Die Einführung der Reformation im Ordensland Preussen" NKZ 36 (1925) 845–873; K. Forstreuter, Vom Ordensstaat zum Fürstentum (Kitzingen 1951); E. M. Wermter, "Herzog Albrecht von Preussen und die ermländischen Bischöfe" Zschr. für die Gesch. und Altertumskunde Ermlands 86 (1957) 198–311; id., "Reformversuche im Ermland vor dem Konzil von Trient" ibid. 87 (1958) 428–437; M. Lackner, "Neuere Lit. zur preussischen Reformationsgesch." Kirche im Osten 3 (1960) 195–200; P. Tschackert, Georg von Polentz (Leipzig 1888); id., Paul Speratus von Rötlen (Halle 1891); R. Stupperich, "Johann Briesmanns reformatorische Anfänge" Jb. Für brandenburgische Kirchengesch. 34 (1937) 3–21; E. Roth (ed.), Vertrau Gott allein. Gebete

Herzog Albrechts von Preussen (Würzburg 1956); W. Hubatsch, Albrecht von Brandenburg-Ansbach (Heidelberg 1960); J. B. Blessing, Johannes Dantiscus (Phil. Diss. Hamburg 1959); R. Stupperich (ed.), Die Reformation im Ordensland Preussen 1523–24. Predigten, Traktate und Kirchenordnungen (Ulm 1966).

LIVONIA–ESTONIA–CURLAND: L. Arbusow, Die Einführung der Reformation in Liv-, Est-, und Kurland (Leipzig 1921); O. Pohrt, Reformationsgesch. Livlands (Leipzig 1928); St. Arnell, Die Auflösung des livländischen Ordensstaates (Lund 1937); K. D. Staemmler, Preussen und Livland im ihrem Verhältnis zur Krone Polens 1561–1586 (Diss. Göttingen 1949); R. Wittram, "Die Reformation in Livland" Baltische Kirchengeschichte (Göttingen 1956) 35–56; R. Ruhtenberg, "Die Beziehungen Luthers und der anderen Wittenberger Reformatoren zu Livland" ibid., 56–76; E. Treulich, "Die Reformation der kurländischen Kirche unter Gotthard Kettler" ibid., 77–86.

POLAND: Ch. Z. Salig, Vollständige Historie der Augsburgischen Confession II (Halle 1733) 515–803 (Poland through 1557); K. Völker, Kirchengeschichte Polens (Berlin–Leipzig 1930); G. Smend, Die Synoden der Kirche Augsburgischer Konfession in Grosspolen (Posen-Poznan 1930); K. E. Jordt Jorgensen, Ökumenische Bestrebungen unter den polnischen Protestanten bis zum Jahre 1645 (Copenhagen 1942); A. Rhode, Gesch. der ev. Kirche im Posener Lande (Würzburg 1956); A. Schwarzenberg, "Besonderheiten der Reformation im Polen" Kirche im Osten 1 (1958) 52–64; E. W. Zeeden, "Calvins Einwirken auf die Reformation in Polen-Litauen" Syntagma Friburgense. Histor. Studien H. Aubin dargebracht (Lindau–Konstanz 1956) 323–359; K. Krejci, Gesch. der polnischen Literatur (Halle 1958); G. Schramm, "Antitrinitarier in Polen 1556–1658, ein Literaturbericht" Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Rennaissance 21 (1959) 473–511; O. Bartel, "Luther und Melanchthon in Polen" Luther und Melanchthon ed. V. Vajta (Göttingen 1961) 165–177; id., "Melanchthon und Polen" Philipp Melanchthon (Berlin 1963) 227–236; B. Stasiewski, Reformation und Gegenreformation in Polen (Münster 1960); cf. J. Lecler, Toleration in the Reformation I (New York 1960) 385–422; H. Holzapfel, Tausend Jahre Kirche Polens (Würzburg 1966); A. F. Modrevius, Opera omnia, ed. C. Kumaniecki, I–V (Warsaw 1953–60), compare to: J. Lecler; Jan Laski, Werke, ed. A. Kuyper, 2 vols. (Amsterdam 1866); O. Bartel, Jan Laski I (Warsaw 1955); U. Falkenroth, Gestalt und Wesen der Kirche bei Johannes von Laski (Diss. Göttingen 1958); G. Schramm, Der polnische Adel und die Reformation 1548–1607 (Wiesbaden 1965); O. Halecki, A History of Poland (Baltimore 1924); The Cambridge History of Poland I, ed. W. F. Reddaway et al. (New York 1950); S. Kot, Socialism in Poland (Boston 1957); O. Bartel, Jan Laski I (1499–1556) (Warsaw 1955).

BOHEMIA: Schottenloher 62501a–07; P. Rican, Das Reich Gottes in den böhmischen Ländern (Stuttgart 1957) (lit.); id., Die Böhmischen Brüder (Berlin 1961) (lit); id., "Melanchthon und die böhmischen Länder" Philipp Melanchthon (Berlin 1963) 237–260.

HUNGARY: G. D. Teutsch, Urkundenbuch der ev. Landeskirche Augsburgischen Bekenntnisses in Siebenbürgen, 2 vols. (Hermannstadt 1862–83); id., Die Reformation im (siebenbürgischen) Sachsenland (Hermannstadt 1929); F. Teutsch, Gesch. der ev. Kirche in Siebenbürgen, 2 vols. (Hermannstadt 1921–23); A. Schullerus, Die Augustana in Siebenbürgen (Hermannstadt 1923); V. Bruckner, "Die oberungarischen Glaubensbekenntnisse und die CA" Gedenkbuch anlässl. der 400jähr. Jahreswende der CA (Leipzig 1930) 1–67; B. v. Pukanzsky, Gesch. des deutschen Schrifttums in Ungarn (Münster 1931); M. Ödön, Die Entstehung der ungarischen protestantischen Kirchenverfassung im Reformations-Jh. (Papa 1942); E. Roth, Die Reformation in Siebenbürgen, 2 vols. (Cologne-Graz 1962–64); id., Die Geschichte des Gottesdienstes der Siebenbürger Sachsen (Göttingen 1954); K. Reinerth, Die Reformation der siebenbürgisch-sächsischen Kirche (Gütersloh 1956); id., "Studien und Kritiken zu E. Roth, Die Geschichte des Gottesdienstes" Jb. für Liturgik und Hymnologie 4 (1958–59) 73–82; M. Bucsay, Geschichte des Protestantismus in Ungarn (Stuttgart 1959) (Lit.); J. Solyom, "Melanchthonforschung in Ungarn" Luther und Melanchthon, ed. V. Vajta (Göttingen 1961) 178–188; E. Kovacs, "Melanchthon und Ungarn" Philipp Melanchthon (Berlin 1963) 261–269; K. Juhasz, "Kardinal Georg Utjesenovich (+1551) und das Bistum Tschanad" HJ 80 (1961) 252–264 (lit.); F. Kidric, Die protestantische Kirchenordnung der Slovenen im 16. Jh. (Heidelberg 1919); G. Stöckl, Die deutsch-slavische Südostgrenze des Reiches im 16. Jh., ein Beitrag zu ihrer Geschichte, dargestellt an Hand des südslavischen Reformationsschrifttums (Breslau 1940); id., "Der Beginn des Reformationsschrifttums in slowenischer Sprache" Südostforschungen 15 (1956) 268–277; F. Valjavec Gesch. der deutschen Kulturbeziehungen zu Südosteuropa II (Munich 1955); A. Slodnjak, Gesch. der slovenischen Lit. (Berlin 1958); Johannes Honter, Ausgewählte Schriften, ed. O. Netoliczka (Vienna 1898); K. K. Klein, Der Humanist und Reformator Johannes Honter (Hermannstadt–Munich 1935); Solyom, "Disticha Novi Testamenti. Ein didaktischer Buchdruck des siebenbürgischen Reformators Johannes Honter" Geschichtswirklichkeit und Glaubensbewährung. Festschr. für R. Müller (Stuttgart 1967) 192–203; G. Gündisch, "Franz Salicäus, Ein Beitrag zur Reformationsgesch. Siebenbürgens" ibid., 204–219; L. Binder, "Die frühesten Synoden der ev. Kirche in Siebenbürgen" ibid., 220–244; J. Balazs, Johannes Sylvester (1958) (lit.); W. Toth, "Stephen Kis of Szeged" ARG 44 (1955) 86–103; N. Rupel, Primus Truber (Munich 1965); W. Toth, "Highlights of the Hungarian Reformation" CH IX (1940) 141–156; L. Revesz, History of the Hungarian Reformed Church (Washington 1956).

27. Schism and Reformation in England

BIBLIOGRAPHY

C. Read, Bibliography of British History. Tudor Period (Oxford 1933).

SOURCES

J. S. Brewer–J. Gairdner, Letters and Papers, Foreign and Domestic, of the Reign of Henry VIII, 21 vols. (London 1862–1910); J. M. Rigg, Calendar of St. Paul relative to English Affairs, principally in the Vatican Archives and Library, 2 vols. (London 1916–26), to 1578; Calendar of State Papers, Domestic and Foreign, for the Reigns of Edward, Mary and Elizabeth, see C. Read, nos. 65, 66, 425; N. Pocock, Records of the Reformation, 2 vols. (Oxford 1870); J. Keble, Statutes (London 1684); H. Gee–W. J. Hardy, Documents Illustrative of English Church History (London 1896); G. R. Elton, The Tudor Constitution, Documents and Commentary (Cambridge 1960); Tudor Royal Proclamations I, ed. P. G. Hughes–I. F. Larkin (New Haven 1964); The Work of Thomas Cranmer, ed. J. I. Packer–C. E. Duffield (Appleford 1964); St. Ehses, Römische Dokumente zur Geschichte der Ehescheidung Heinrichs VIII. von England (Paderborn 1893).

LITERATURE

GENERAL: J. D. Mackie, The Earlier Tudors (Oxford 1952) (Oxford History of England VII); J. A. Williamson, The Tudor Age (London ^{3}1964); G. R. Elton, The Tudor Revolution in Government (Cambridge 1953); C. H. -K. George, The Protestant Mind of the English

Reformation 1570–1640 (Princeton 1961); Opposing the idealization of the character of Henry VIII, especially by A. F. Pollard, Henry VIII (London 1951), see G. R. Elton, Henry VIII. An Essay in Revision (London 1962); H. Maynard Smith, Henry VIII and the Reformation (London 1962); G. Mattingly, Catharine of Aragon (London 1942); N. Sanders, De origine ac progressu schismatis Anglicani (Köln 1585), the oldest complete description of the English schism; One of the newest accounts: G. Constant, La réforme en Angleterre, 2 vols. (Paris 1930–39), to Edward VI; Ph. Hughes, The Reformation in England, 3 vols. (London 1950–54), to Elizabeth I; An excellent short account is P. M. Parker, The English Reformation to 1558 (London 1963), with good literature survey; F. A. Gasquet, Heinrich VIII. und die englischen Klöster, 2 vols. (Mainz 1890–91); the work is brought up to date by D. Knowles, The Religious Orders in England III: The Tudor Age (Cambridge 1959) and W. C. Richardson, History of the Court of Augmentation 1536–54 (Baton Rouge, La. 1961); Concerning the penetration of Protestantism: E. G. Rupp, Studies in the Making of the English Protestant Tradition (Cambridge 1947); H. C. Porter, Reformation and Reaction in Tudor Cambridge (Cambridge 1958); C. Hopf, M. Bucer and the English Reformation (Oxford 1946); W. A. Clebsch, England's Earliest Protestants 1520–35 (New Haven 1964); C. W. Dugmore, The Mass and the English Reformers (London 1958); H. C. White, The Tudor Books of Private Devotion (Madison 1951); J. K. McConica, English Humanists and Reformation Politics under Henry VIII and Edward VI (Oxford 1965); N. S. Tjernagel, Henry VIII and the Lutherans (Saint Louis 1965); J. E. Oxley, The Reformation in Essex (Manchester 1965); A. G. Dickens, The English Reformation (London 1964); T. Mac Caffery, The Shaping of the Elizabethian Regime (Princeton, 1968); P. Seaver, The Puritan Lectureships, The Politics of Religious Dissent 1560–1662 (Stanford 1970); M. Breslow, A Mirror of England: English Puritan Views of Foreign Nations, 1618–1640 (Cambridge 1970); M. O'Connell, Thomas Stapelton and the Counter Reformation (New Haven 1964).

Church Government: E. W. Kemp, Counsel and Consent. Aspects of Church Government (London 1961); E. T. Davies, Episcopacy and the Royal Supremacy in the Church of England (Oxford 1950); Very detailed for the time of Elizabeth: W. P. M. Kennedy, Elizabethan Episcopal Administration, 3 vols. (London 1924); F. Higham, Catholic and Reformed. A Study of the Anglican Church (London 1962).

Biographies: A. F. Pollard, Thomas Wolsey (London 1953); Ch. Ferguson, Naked to Mine Enemies. The Life of Card. Wolsey (London 1958); See $LThK^2$ III 85 for works concerning Cranmer by A. F. Pollard (^{2}1926), A. C. Deane (1927), G. W. Bromily (1956) and T. Maynard (1956) to the comprehensive biography by J. Ridley, Thomas Cranmer (Oxford 1962). For literature concerning J. Fisher and Thomas More which increased greatly after canonization (1935), see $LThK^2$ IV:159 and VII:628; G. J. Donelly, A Translation of St. Thomas More's Responsio ad Lutherum (Washington 1962); G. Marc'Hadour, St. Thomas More. Lettre à Dorp. La supplication des âmes (Namur 1962); Opera omnia (Frankfurt a. M. 1689), reprinted unaltered in Frankfurt 1963; E. Flessmann–E. van Leer, "The Controversy about Scripture and Tradition between Th. More and W. Tyndale" NAKG 43 (1959–60) 143–164; From the extensive literature concerning the Utopia: E. Surtz, The Praise of Pleasure. Philosophie, Education and Communism in More's Utopia (Cambridge, Mass. 1957); H. Süssmuth, Studien z. Utopia des Th. M. (Münster 1967). Complete Works of St. Thomas More (New Haven, Ct. 1961ff.).

28. The Struggle over Lutheran Orthodoxy

LITERATURE

GENERAL: Ch. A. Salig, Vollständige Historie der Augsburgischen Confession I–III (Halle 1730–1733–1735); G. J. Planck, Gesch. der Entstehung, der Veränderungen und der Bildung unsers protestantischen Lehrbegriffs vom Anfang der Reformation bis zu der Einführung der Concordienformel I–VI (Leipzig 1791–1800); H. Heppe, Gesch. des deutschen Protestantismus I–IV (Marburg 1852–59); H. R. Frank, Die Theologie der Concordienformel, 4 vols. (Erlangen 1858–65); F. Loofs, Leitfaden zum Studium der Dogmengeschichte (Halle 1906); P. Tschackert, Die Entstehung der lutherischen und der reformierten Kirchenlehre (Göttingen 1910); O. Ritschl, Dogmengeschichte des Protestantismus (= DG) I–IV (Leipzig 1908–12, Göttingen 1926–27); R. Seeberg, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte IV, 2 vols. (Leipzig ^{3}1920; new imp., ^{3}1959) (Eng. The History of Doctrines, #76, #77; Grand Rapids, Mich. 1964); H. E. Weber, Reformation, Orthodoxie und Rationalismus Tl. I 1.2 (Gütersloh 1937–40; new impression, Darmstadt 1966); P. Meinhold, Philipp Melanchthon (Berlin 1960); R. Stupperich, Der unbekannte Melanchthon (Stuttgart 1961); F. W. Katzenbach, Die Reformation in Deutschland und Europa (Gütersloh 1965); W. Preger, Matthias Flacius Illyricus und seine Zeit, 2 vols. (Erlangen 1859–61; reprint Hildesheim–Nieuwkoop 1964); H. Aland, "Die theologische Fakultät Wittenberg während des 16. Jh." Kirchengeschichtliche Entwürfe (Gütersloh 1960) 283–394; L. Theobald, "Einiges über die Lebensschicksale des Gallus während seiner Regensburger Superintendentenzeit" ZBKG 19 (1950) 67–77, 20 (1951) 100; H. W. Gensichen, Damnamus. Die Verwerfung von Irrlehre bei Luther und im Luthertum des 16. Jh. (Berlin 1955); M. Mirkovic, Matjia Vlac'c Ilirik (Zagreb 1960); J. Massner, Kirchliche Überlieferung und Autorität im Flaciuskreis (Berlin–Hamburg 1964); P. Fraenkel, Testimonium Patrium: The Function of Patristic Argument in the Theol. of Melanchthon (Geneva 1961); C. L. Manschreck, Melanchthon, the Quiet Reformer (New York 1958).

THE ANTINOMIAN CONTROVERSY: G. Kawerau, "Der Ausbruch des antinomistischen Streites" ThStK 53 (1880) 24–48; id., "Briefe und Urkunden zur Gesch. des antinomistischen Streites" ZKG 4 (1880–81) 299–324, 437–465; id., "Beiträge zur Gesch. des antinomistischen Streites" Beiträge zur Reformationsgeschichte, Köstlin gewidmet (Gotha 1896) 60–80; id., RE ^{3}I (1896) 585–592; J. Werner, "Der erste antinomistische Streit" NKZ 15 (1904) 801–824, 860–873; G. Hammann, Nomismus und Antinomismus innerhalb der Wittenberger Theologie von 1524–30 (Diss. Bonn 1952); R. Hermann, Zum Streit um die Überwindung des Gesetzes (Weimar 1958); G. Rosenberger, Gesetz und Evangelium in Luthers Antinomerdisputationen (Diss. Mainz 1958); J. Rogge, Johann Agricolas Lutherverständnis (focuses on Antinomianism) (Berlin 1960).

THE SYNERGISTIC AND MAJORISTIC CONTROVERSY: C. Schlüsselburg, Catalogus Haereticorum V (De Synergistis, Frankfurt 1611), VII (De Maioristis, Frankfurt 1599); Ch. E. Luthardt, Die Lehre vom freien Willen und seinem Verhältnis zur Gnade in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung dargestellt (Leipzig 1863); G. L. Schmidt, Justus Menius, 2 vols. (Gotha 1867); Kawerau, RE ^{3}XIX:229–235 (Synergy); K. D. Schmidt, "Der Göttinger Bekehrungsstreit 1566–70" Zschr. der Ges. für niedersächsische KG 34–35 (1929) 66–121; H. Kropatscheck, Das Problem theologischer Anthropologie auf dem Weimarer Gespräch von 1560 zwischen Matthias Flacius Illyricus und Viktorin Strigel (Diss. Gottingen 1943); L. Haikola, Gesetz und Evangelium bei Matthias Flacius Illyricus (Lund 1952); R. Bring, Das Verhältnis von Glauben und Werken in der lutherischen Theologie (Munich 1955); G. Moldaenke, Schriftverständnis und Schriftdeutung im Zeitalter der Reformation Tl. I: Matthias Flacius Illyricus (Stuttgart 1936).

THE ADIAPHORAN CONTROVERSY: C. Schlüsselburg, 13 (1599); H. Ch. Hase, Die Gestalt der Kirche Luthers. Der casus confessionis im Kampf des Matthias Flacius gegen das Interim von 1548 (Göttingen 1940); C. L. Manschreck, "The Role of Melanchthon in the Adiaphora Controversy" ARG 48 (1957) 165–182; H. Scheible, "Melanchthons Brief an Carlowitz" ARG 57 (1966) 102–130.

THE OSSIANDRIAN CONTROVERSY: W. Möller, Andreas Osiander (Elberfeld 1870); A. Ritschl, "Die Rechtfertigungslehre des Andreas Osiander" Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung I (Bonn ³1889) 235–255; E. Hirsch, Die Theologie des Andreas Osiander (Göttingen 1919); M. J. Arntzen, Mystieke rechtvaardigingsleer. Een bijtrage ter beorderling van de theologie van Andreas Osiander (Kampen 1956).

THE EUCHARISTIC CONTROVERSY: A. Ebrard, Das Dogma vom Abendmahl und seine Gesch., 2 vols. (Frankfurt a. M. 1845); A. W. Dieckhoff, Die evangelische Abendmahlslehre im Reformationszeitalter geschichtlich dargestellt I (Göttingen 1854); G. L. Plitt, "Melanchthons Wandelung in der Abendmahlslehre" Zschr. f. Protestantismus und Kirche NF 56 (1868) 65–101; G. Mönckeberg, Joachim Westphal und Joh. Calvin (Hamburg 1865); C. H. W. Sillem, Briefsammlung des J. Westphal 1530–75, 2 vols. (Hamburg 1903); R. Calinich, Kampf und Untergang des Melanchthonismus in Kursachsen (Leipzig 1866); J. F. A. Gillet, Crato v. Crafftheim und seine Freunde, 2 vols. (Frankfurt 1860–61); H. Gollwitzer, Coena Domini. Die altlutherische Abendmahlslehre in ihrer Auseinandersetzung mit dem Calvinismus dargestellt an der lutherischen Frühorthodoxie (Munich 1937); E. Bizer, Studien zur Gesch. des Abendmahlstreites im 16. Jh. (1940; new impression, Darmstadt 1962); H. Grass, Die Abendmahlslehre bei Luther und Calvin (Gütersloh ²1954).

29. John Calvin: Personality and Work

WORKS

Omnia Opera (=OC), 59 vols. CR 29–87 (Braunschweig-Berlin 1863–1900); Supplementa Calviniana, Sermons inédits I: Predigten über 2 Sam. ed. H. Rückert (Neukirchen 1961); V: Sermons sur le Livre de Michée, ed. J. D. Benoît (Neukirchen 1964); Opera Selecta (=OS), 5 vols. ed. P. Barth, W. Niesel, D. Scheuner (Munich 1952–62); Johannes Calvins Auslegung der Heiligen Schrift, New Series, ed. O. Weber, 20 vols. (Neukirchen 1937f.); Johann Calvin, Diener am Wort. Predigtauswahl, ed. E. Mülhaupt (Göttingen 1934); Der Psalter auf der Kanzel Calvins, ed. E. Mülhaupt (Neukirchen 1959); Institution de la religion chrétienne (1541), ed. J. Pannier, 4 vols. (Paris 1936); A. L. Herminjard, Correspondance des Réformateurs dans les pays de langue francaise, 9 vols (Geneva 1866–1897); Johannes Calvins Lebenswerk in seinen Briefen, trans. R. Schwarz, 3 vols. (Neukirchen 1961–62); Bekenntnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen der nach Gottes Wort reformierten Kircher, ed. W. Niesel (Zollikon–Zurich 1938); Reformierte Bekenntnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen in dt. Übersetzung, ed. P. Jacobs (Neukirchen 1949); Commentaries and Letters, ed. J. Harovtiwian (Philadelphia 1958); Institutes of the Christian Religion, 2 vols., ed. J. T. McNiel (Philadelphia 1961); Theological Treatises, ed. J. A. S. Reid (Philadelphia 1954); A Collation of the Latin Texts of the First Edition of Calvin's Institutes, ed. W. G. Hards (Baltimore 1958).

LITERATURE

Bibliographia Calviniana: Opera 59, 457–586, new printing (Nieuwkoop 1960); W. Niesel, Calvin-Bibliographie 1901–1959 (Munich 1961); J. T. McNiel, "Thirty Years of Calvin Study" CH XVII (1948) 207–240; XVIII (1949) 241; E. A. Dowey, "Continental Reformation Reference Works of General Interest. Studies in Calvin and Calvinism since 1955" CH XXIX (1960) 187–204.

BIOGRAPHIES: F. W. Kampschulte, Johannes Calvin, seine Kirche und sein Staat in Genf, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1869–99); A. Lang, Johannes Calvin (Leipzig 1909); E. Doumerque, Jean Calvin, Les hommes et les choses de son temp., 7 vols. (Lausanne–Paris 1899–1927); A. de Quervain, Calvin. Sein Lehren und Kämpfen (Berlin 1926); P. Imbart de la Tour, Les origines de la Réforme IV: Calvin et l'institution chrêtienne (Paris 1935); G. Gloede, Calvin, Weg und Werk (Leipzig 1953); W. F. Dankbaar, Calvin. sein Weg und sein Werk (Neukirchen 1959); J. Cadier, Calvin. Der Mann, den Gott bezwungen hat (Zollikon 1959); E. Pfisterer, Calvins Wirken in Genf (Neukirchen 1957); F. Büsser, Calvins Urteil über sich selbst (Zurich 1950); J. Moltmann, ed., Calvin-Studien 1959 (Neukirchen 1960); J. Rogge, ed., Johannes Calvin (1509–1564) (Berlin 1963); J. Bohatec, Budé und Calvin (Graz 1950); E. W. Zeeden, "Das Bild Martin Luthers in den Briefen Calvins" ARG 49 (1958); A. Ganoczy, Le jeune Calvin (Wiesbaden 1966).

THEOLOGY: SOURCES: F. Wendel, Calvin—The Origins and Development of his Religious Thought (London 1963); B. B. Warfield, Calvin and Augustine (Philadelphia 1956); L. Smits, Saint Augustin dans l'oeuvre de Jean Calvin (Assen 1957–58); K. Reuter, Das Grundverständnis der Theologie Calvins (Neukirchen 1963); W. Neisel, Theology of Calvin (Philadelphia 1956); R. C. Hunt, Calvin (London 1933).

GENERAL WORKS: P. Wernle, Der evangelische Glaube III: Calvin (Tübingen 1919); O. Ritschl, Dogmengeschichte des Protestantismus III (Göttingen 1926); H. Bauke, Die Probleme der Theologie Calvins (Leipzig 1922); H. Weber, Die Theologie Clavins (Berlin 1930); E. Mülhaupt, Die Predigt Calvins (Berlin 1931); W. Niesel, Die Theologie Calvins (Munich ^{2}1957); H. Wendorf, Calvins Bedeutung für die prot. Welt (Leipzig 1940); H. Olsson, Calvin och reformationens theologi I (Lund 1943).

SPECIAL STUDIES: G. Gloede, Theologia naturalis bei Calvin (Stuttgart 1935); T. H. L. Parker, The Doctrine of the Knowledge of God (Edinburgh 1952); E. A. Dowey, The Knowledge of God in Calvin's Theology (New York 1952); H. H. Wolf, Die Einheit des Bundes. Das Verhältnis von AT und NT bei Calvin (Neukirchen 1958); H. Jackson Forstmann, Word and Spirit. Calvin's Doctrine of Biblical Authority (Stanford, Calif. 1962); H. Noltensmeier, Reformatorische Einheit. Das Schriftverständnis bei Luther und Calvin (Graz–Cologne 1953); P. Brunner, Vom Glauben bei Calvin (Tübingen 1952); M. Neeser, Le Dieu de Calvin (Neuchâtel 1956); J. F. Jansen, Calvin's Doctrine of the Word of Christ (London 1956); W. Kolfhaus, Christusgemeinschaft bei Johannes Calvin (Neukirchen 1939); id., Vom christlichen Leben nach Johannes Calvin (Neukirchen 1937); S. van der Linde, De leer van de Heilige Geest (Wageningen 1943); W. Krusche, Das Wirken des Heiligen Geistes bei Calvin (Göttingen 1957); J. Beckmann, Vom Sakrament bei Calvin (Tübingen 1926); W. F. Dankbaar, De Sacramentsleer van Calvijn (Amsterdam 1941); id., De tegen woordigheid van Christus in het Avondmaal (Nijkerk 1950); R. S. Wallace, Calvin's Doctrine of the Word and Sacrament (Edinburgh 1953); L. G. M. Alting v. Geusa, Die Lehre von der Kindertaufe bei Calvin (Mainz 1963); G. P. Hartvelt, Verum Corpus (Delft 1960); W. Niesel, Calvins Lehre vom Abendmahl (Munich 1935); W. Boelens, Die Arnoldshainer Thesen (Assen 1964); J. Rogge, Virtus und res. Um die Abendmahlswirklichkeit bei Calvin (Stuttgart 1965); A. Ganoczy, Calvin Théologien de l'église et du ministère (Paris 1964); L. Schummer, Le ministère pastorale dans l'Institution chrêtienne de Calvin (Wiesbaden 1965); K. Fröhlich, Gottes Reich, Welt und Kirche bei Calvin (Stuttgart 1965); W. Nijenhuis, Calvinus Oecumenicus ('s Gravenhage 1959); Th.

F. Torrance, Calvin and the Doctrine of Man (London 1949); H. Quistorp, Die letzten Dinge im Zeugnis Calvins (Gütersloh 1941); W. A. Hauck, Sünde und Erbsünde nach Calvin (Heidelberg 1938); id., Calvin und die Rechtfertigung (Gütersloh 1938); id., Christusglaube und Gottes Offenbarung nach Calvin (Gütersloh 1939); id., Vorsehung und Freiheit nach Calvin (Gütersloh 1947); id., Die Erwählten, Prädestination und Heilsgewissheit bei Calvin (Gütersloh 1950); A. Göhler, Calvins Lehre von der Heiligung (Munich 1934); P. Jacobs, Prädestination und Verantwortlichkeit bei Calvin (Neukirchen 1937); E. Buess, "Prädestination und Kirche in Calvins Institutio" ThZ 12 (1956) 347–361; H. Otten, Calvins Theologische Anschauung von der Prädestination (Munich 1938); G. Räcke, Gesetz und Evangelium bei Calvin (Diss. Mainz 1953); J. Bohatec, Calvin und das Recht (Feudingen 1934); id., Calvins Lehre von Staat und Kirche (Breslau 1937, reprinted Aalen 1961); M. E. Chenevière, La Pensée politique de Calvin (Paris 1937); J. T. McNiell, John Calvin on God and Political Duty (New York 1950); W. A. Mueller, Church and State in Luther and Calvin (Nashville, Tenn. 1954); Q. Breen, John Calvin, A Study in French Humanism (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1931); R. M. Kingdom, Geneva and the Coming of the Religious Wars in France 1555–1563 (Geneva 1956); J. T. McNeill, Calvin and the Reformation (New York 1962); A. M. Schmidt, John Calvin and the Calvinistic Tradition (London 1961); S. G. Craig, (ed.), Calvin and Augustine (Philadelphia 1956); W. E. Stuermenn, A Critical Guide to Calvin's Concept of Faith (Tulsa 1952); R. W. Battenhause, "The Doctrine of Man in Calvin and in Renaissance Platonism" Journal of the History of Ideas IX (1948) 447–471; J. T. McNeill, "The Democratic Element in Calvin's Thought" CH XVIII (1949) 153–168; G. L. Mosse, Calvinism: Authoritarian or Democratic (New York 1957); J. Baur, Gott, Recht und weltliches Regiment im Werke Calvins (Bonn 1965).

HERESY TRIALS: F. Buisson, S. Castellio, sa vie et son oeuvre, 2 vols. (Paris 1892); E. Giran, S. Castellio et la Réforme Calvinienne (Paris 1914); H. Fazy, Procès de Bolsec (Geneva 1866); E. Choisy, Calvin et Servet (Neuilly 1926); B. Becker (ed.), Autour de M. Servet et de S. Castellio (Haarlem 1953); J. F. Fulton, M. Servet. Humanist and Martyr (New York 1953); P. Cavard, Le procès de M. Servet à Vienne (Vienna 1953); R. H. Bainton, Hunted Heretic (Boston 1953); id., Concerning Heretics (New York 1935).

30. The Spread of Calvinism in Western Europe

SOURCES

E. F. K. Müller, Die Bekenntnisschriften der reformierten Kirche (Leipzig 1903); W. Niesel, Bekenntnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen der nach Gottes Wort reformierten Kirche (Zurich ^{3}1938); P. Jacobs, Reformierte Bekenntnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen (Neukirchen 1949); D. C. Fabricius, Die Kirche von England, ihr Gebetbuch, Bekenntnis und kanonisches Recht (= Corpus Confessionum 17. Abt.) (Berlin-Leipzig 1937); id., Presbyterianismus (= Corpus Confessionum 18. Abt.) (Berlin 1940).

LITERATURE

E. Knodt, Die Bedeutung Calvins und des Calvinismus für die protestantische Welt (1910); H. Wendorf, Calvins Bedeutung für die protestantische Welt (Leipzig 1940); A. A. van Schelven, Het calvinisme gedurende zijn blocitijd in de 16^{e} en de 17^{e} eeuw. Zijn uitbreiding en cultuur-historische beteeknis I: Genève, Frankrijk; II: Schotland, Engeland, Noord-Amerika (Amsterdam 1943–51); H. Rössler, Der Calvinismus (Bremen 1951); J. T. McNeill, The History and Character of Calvinism (New York 1954); B. S. Warburton, Calvinism (Grand Rapids 1955); E. G. Leónard, Histoire générale du protestantisme II: L'établissement (1564–1700) (Paris 1961); E. A. Dowey, "Continental Reformation: Works of General Interest. Studies in Calvin and Calvinism since 1955" CH XXIX: 187–204.

France

SOURCES: H. Hauser, Les sources de l'histoire de France. Le XVI^e siècle (1494–1610), 4 vols. (Paris 1906–16); Lettres de Catherine de Médicis, 10 vols. (Paris 1880 through 1909); Ivan Lontchinsky, Documents inédits sur la Réforme et la Ligue (Paris 1857).

LITERATURE: G. v. Polenz, Gesch. des französischen Calvinismus, 5 vols. (Gotha 1857–69); Ch. Roulet, Histoire de l'Église de France, 3 vols. (Paris 1946–49); J. Viénet, Histoire de la Réforme française des origines à l'Édit de Nantes, 2 vols. (Paris 1926–34); P. Imbart de la Tour, Les origines de la Réforme IV: Calvin et l'Institution chrétienne (Paris 1935); J. Chambon, Der französische Protestantismus (Munich 1948); R. Nürnberger, Die Politisierung des französischen Protestantismus (Tübingen 1948); S. Mours, "Liste des églises réformées" Bulletin de la Société de l'Histoire du Protestantisme français 103 (1957) 37–59, 113–130, 200–216; Checklist of French Political Pamphlets 1560–1644 in the Newberry Library, compiled by D. V. Welsh (Chicago 1950); E. Armstrong, The French Wars of Religion (Oxford 1904); id., Geneva and the Consolidation of the French Protestant Movement (Madison, Wisconsin 1967); R. M. Kingdom, Geneva and the Coming of the Wars of Religion in France (Geneva 1956); J. W. Thompson, The Wars of Religion in France (Chicago 1909); O. Zeff, The Huguenots (New York 1942); J. H. Mitchell, The Court of the Connetable (New Haven, Conn. 1947); S. L. England, The Massacre of St. Bartholomew (London 1938). Wars of Religion: L. Romier, Les origines politiques des guerres de rêligion, 2 vols. (Paris 1913–14); id., Le royaume de Catherine de Médicis: La France à la veille des guerres de religion, 2 vols. (Paris 1922); id., La conjuration d'Amboise (Paris 1923); id., Catholiques et Huguenots à la cour de Charles IX (Paris 1924); G. de Lagarde, Recherches sur l'esprit politique de la Réforme (Paris 1926); L. R. Lefèvre, Les Français, pendant les guerres de Religion (Paris 1949); A. de Lévis-Mirepoiz, Les guerres de Religion 1559–1610 (Paris 1950); Ph. Erlanger, Le massacre de la Saint-Barthélemy (Paris 1960); The Letters and Documents of . . . Baron di Biron (1524–1592), 2 vols., ed. J. W. Thompson (Berkeley 1936). Edict of Nantes: Text: E. Walder, Religionsvergleiche des 16. Jh. II (Bern 1961) 13–71; id., E. Mengin (ed.), Das Edikt von Nantes (Flensburg 1963); E. Benoist, Histoire de l'édit de Nantes, 5 vols. (Delft 1693–95); J. Pannier, L'église réformée de Paris sous Henri IV (Paris 1911); J. Faurey, Henri IV et l'édit de Nantes (Bordeaux 1903); id., L'édit de Nantes et la question de la tolérance (Paris 1929); J. de Missècle, L'édit de Nantes et sa révocation (Colmar 1930); A. Bailly, La réforme en France jusqu'à l'Édit de Nantes (Paris 1960); A. Buisson, Michel de l'Hôpital (Paris 1950); Jean Héritier, Catherine de Médicis (Paris 1941, Lit.); E. Neale, The Age of Catherine de Medici (London 1943); H. O. Evenett, The Cardinal of Lorraine and the Council of Trent (Cambridge 1930); E. Marcks, Gaspard de Coligny, sein Leben und das Frankreich seiner Zeit (Leipzig 1918); Ph. Erlanger, Henri III (Paris 1948); P. de Vaissière, Henri IV (Paris 1928); Ph. Erlanger, L'étrange mort de Henri IV (Paris 1957); M. Reinhard, Henri IV ou la France sauvée (Paris 1958).

The Netherlands

SOURCES: S. Cramer–F. Pijper, Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica I–X (The Hague 1903–14); Racueil des ordonnances des Pays-Bas, 6 vols. (1506–1555) (Brussels 1893– 1922); W. Perquin, Bibliotheca catholica neerlandica impressa 1500–1727 (The Hague 1955); Recueil des ordonnances de la principauté de Liège I (1507–80) (Brussels 1869); P. Frederico, Corpus documentorum inquisitionis haereticae pravitatis Neerlandicae IV–V (Gent 1900–06); G. Brom–A. H. L. Hensen, Romeinsche bronnen voor den kerkelijk-staatkundigen toestand der Nederlanden in de 16^{de} eeuw (The Hague 1922); J. Lefèvre, Correspondance de Philippe II sur les affaires des Pays-Bas (Brussels 1940); M. Dietrick, Documents, inédits sur l'érection des nouveaux diocèses au Pays-Bas 1521–70, 3 vols. (Brussels 1960–62).

LITERATURE: History: J. W. Motley, Der Abfall der Niederlande und die Entstehung des Holländischen Freistaats, 3 vols. (Dresden 1857–60); A. Heune, Histoire du règne de Charles-Quint en Belgique (Brussels 1858–60); P. Frederico, De Nederlanden onder Keizer Karl V. (Gent 1885); E. Gossart, L'établissement du régime espagnol dans les Pays-Bas et l'insurrection (Brussels 1905); G. de Boom, Charles-Quint, prince des Pays-Bas (Brussels 1941); M. Dierickx, De oprichting der nieuwe bisdommen in de Nederlanden onder Filips II 1559–70 (Antwerp–Utrecht 1950); id., RHE 59 (1964) 489–499. Inquisition: P. Claessens, L'Inquisition et le régime pénal pour la répression de l'hérésie dans les Pays-Bas du passé (Turnhout 1886); J. Scheerder, De Inquisitie in de Nederlanden in de 16^{de} eeuw (Antwerp 1944). Calvinism: H. Q. Janssen, De Kerkhervorming in Vlaanderen (Arnhem 1868); F. L. Rutgers, Calvijns involved op de Reformatie in de Nederlanden (Leiden 1899); H. J. Elias, Kerk en Staat in de zuidelikjke Nederlanden 1598–1621 (Antwerp 1931); L. J. Rogier, Geschiendenis van het Katholicisme in Noord-Nederland in de 16^{e} en de 17^{e} eeuw, 3 vols. (Amsterdam 1945–47); W. F. Dankbaar, Hoogtepunten uit het Nederlandsche Calvinisme in de zestiende eeuw (Haarlem 1946); J. Lindeboom, De confessioneele ontwikkeling de Reformatie in de Nederlanden (The Hague 1946); J. Roelink, Het calvinisme, Algemene Geschiedenis de Nederlanden IV (Utrecht 1952); E. de Moreau, Histoire de l'église en Belgique V (Brussels 1952); L. E. Halkin, La Réforme en Belgique sous Charles-Quint (Brussels 1957, Lit.).

GERMANY

LOWER RHINE: Die Akten der Synoden und Quartierskonsistorien in Jülich, Kleve und Berg, 1570–1610 (Neuwied 1909); E. Simons (ed.), Urkundenbuch zur rheinischen KG I: Synodalbuch; A. Wolters, Reformationsgesch. der Stadt Wesel bis zur Befestigung ihres reformierten Bekenntnisses (Bonn 1868); J. Hillmann, Die ev. Gemeinde Wesel und ihre Willibrordkirche (Düsseldorf 1896); W. Hollweg, "Calvins Beziehungen zu den Rheinlanden" Calvinstudien, ed. der reformierten Gemeinde Elberfeld (Leipzig 1909) 126–186; H. Kessel, "Reformation und Gegenreformation im Herzogtum Cleve (1517–1609)" Düsseldorfer Jb. 30 (1918–19) 1–160; H. Forsthoff, Rheinische KG I: Die Reformation am Niederrhein (Essen 1929); D. Coenen, Die katholische Kirche am Niederrhein von der Reformation bis zum Beginn des 18. Jh. (Münster 1967); G. Hövelmann u.a., Niederrheinische KG (Kevelaer 1965).

PALATINATE: A. Kluckhohn, "Wie ist Kurfürst Friedrich III. von der Pfalz Calvinist geworden?" Münchener Historisches Jb. (1866) 432–520; id., Friedrich der Fromme, Curfürst von der Pfalz, der Schützer der reformierten Kirche 1559–76 (Nördlingen 1876); id., (ed.) Die Briefe Friedrichs des Frommen, 2 vols. (Braunschweig 1866–70); R. Lossen, Die Glaubensspaltung in Kurpfalz (Heidelberg 1930); E. Mayer, Pfälzische KG (Kaiserslautern 1939); L. Stamer, KG der Pfalz III 1 (Speyer 1955); H. Müller, "Der Calvinismus am Rhein" Monatshefte für KG des Rheinlands (1954) 34–41; E. W. Zeeden, Kleine Reformationsgesch. von Baden-Durlach und Kurpfalz (Karlsruhe 1956) (lit.); K.

Sudhoff, C. Olevianus und Z. Ursinus (Elberfeld 1857); Ruth Wesel-Roth, Thomas Erastus. Ein Beitrag zur Gesch. der reformierten Kirche und zur Lehre von der Staatssouveränität (Lahr 1954); W. Hollweg, Neue Untersuchungen zur Gesch. und Lehre des Heidelberger Katechismus (Neukirchen 1961); id., Der Augsburger Reichstag von 1566 und seine Bedeutung für die Entstehung der Reformierten Kirche und ihres Bekenntnisses (Neukirchen 1964); J. Staedtke (ed.), Glauben und Erkennen. 400 Jahre Confessio Helvetica Posterior (Zurich 1966).

NASSAU: B. Weber, Cartons aus dem deutschen Kirchenleben (Mainz 1858) 575–660: Die Reformation in Nassau; H. F. Röttsches, Luthertum und Calvinismus in Nassau-Dillenburg (Berne 1954) (lit.); L. Hatzfeld, "Die Reformation in der Grafschaft Nassau-Dillenburg" AMrhKG 7 (1955) 77–111; K. Wolf, "Zur Einführung des reformierten Bekenntnisses in Nassau-Dillenburg" Nassauische Annalen 66 (1955) 160–193.

BREMEN: O. Veeck, Gesch. der reformierten Kirche Bremens (Berlin 1917); J. Moltmann, Christoph Pezel (1539–1604) und der Calvinismus in Bremen (Bremen 1958).

LIPPE: W. Butterweck, Die Gesch. der Lippischen Landeskirchen (Schötmar 1926); H. Kiewning, Lippische Gesch. (Detmold 1942).

ANHALT: R. Specht, Bibliogr. zur Gesch. von Anhalt (Magdeburg 1930); supplement 1930–35 (Dessau 1935); H. Wäschke, Gesch. Anhalts im Zeitalter der Reformation (Cöthen 1913); H. Duncker, Anhalts Bekenntnisstand während der Vereinigung der Fürstentümer unter Joachim Ernst und Johann Georg (1570–1606) (Dessau 1892); C. A. Valentiner, Das Bekenntnis der Anhaltischen Landeskirche (Bernburg 1895); G. Schubring, "Die Einführung der reformierten Confession in Anhalt" Zschr. für die gesamte luth. Theol. u. Kirche 9 (1848) 291–340; H. Becker, "Der wesentliche Anteil Anhalts an der Festlegung der Bezeichnung 'reformiert' als Kirchenname in Dtl." ThStK 74 (1901) 242–269; A. Boes, "Die ev. Landeskirche Anhalts, ihre geschichtliche Entwicklung in Bekenntnis und Verfassung" Amsblatt der ev. Landeskirche Anhalts (Dessau 1956) 41–45.

SCOTLAND

SOURCES: Acts and Proceedings of the General Assemblies of the Kirk of Scotland, from the year 1560, ed. Th. Thomson, 3 vols. (Edinburg 1839–45); D. Calderwood, The History of the Kirk of Scotland, ed. Th. Thomson–D. Laing, 8 vols. (1842–49); R. Keith, History of Affairs of Church and State in Scotland, ed. J. Parker Lawson, 3 vols. (1844–50); Statuta Ecclesiae Scoticanae (Concilia Scoticae), ed. Joseph Robertson, 2 vols. (1866); Papal Negotiations with Mary Queen of Scots during her Reign in Scotland, 1561–67, ed. John Hungerford Pollen (1901); John Knox, History of the Reformation in Scotland, ed. W. C. Dickinson, taken from the works of Knox, I–II (1949); A Source Book of Scottish History II (1424–1567), III (1567–1707), ed. W. C. Dickinson–G. Donaldson (Edinburgh 1958).

LITERATURE: A. Lang, History of Scotland, 4 vols. (Edinburgh 1903–07); F. H. Brown, History of Scotland to the Present Time, 3 vols., II: From the Accession of Mary Stuart to the Revolution (Cambridge 1911); G. Donaldsen, The Scottish Reformation (Cambridge 1960, Lit.); W. C. Dickinson–G. S. Tryde, A New History of Scotland, 2 vols., I: Scotland from the Earliest Times to 1603 (1961), II: Scotland from 1603 to the Present Day (1962) (lit.). Church History: A. Bellesheim, Gesch. der katholischen Kirche in Schottland, 2 vols. (Mainz 1883); A. R. MacEwen, A History of the Church in Scotland, 2 vols. (London 1913–18); D. Nobbs, England and Scotland 1560–1707 (London 1952); J. H. Burleigh, A Church History of Scotland (New York 1960). Reformation in Scotland: F. Mitchell, The Scottish Reformation. Its Epochs, Episodes, Leaders and Distinctive Characteristic, ed. D. H. Fleming (Blackwood–Edinburgh 1900); D. H. Fleming, The Reformation in Scotland, Causes, Characteristics, Consequences. (London 1910); A. Zimmermann, "Zur Reformation in Schottland" RQ 25 (1911) 27–41, 110–123; G. Donaldson, The Scottish Reformation (Cambridge 1960); J. Girdwood Maggregor, The Scottish Presbyterian Polity (Edinburgh 1926); G. D. Henderson, Religious Life in Seventeenth Century Scotland (Cambridge 1937); id., The Claims of the Church of Scotland (London 1951). John Knox: A. Lang, John Knox and the Reformation (London 1905); Lord E. Percy, John Knox (London 1937); Works, ed. D. Laing, 6 vols. (Edinburgh 1895); P. H. Brown, John Knox (New York 1905); H. Watt, John Knox in Controversy (New York 1950). Scotch-English Royal Houses: D. H. Fleming, Mary Queen of Scots: From her Birth to her flight into England (London 1898); H. Witte, Die Ansichten Jakobs I. von England über Kirche und Staat (Berlin 1940); S. A. Tannebaum, Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots. A Concise Bibliography, 3 vols. (New York 1944–46); A. Fraser, Mary Queen of Scots (London 1969).

ENGLAND

E. C. E. Boume, The Anglicanism of William Laud (London 1947); W. Haller, The Rise of Puritanism (New York 1956); J. Marlowe, The Puritan Tradition in English Life (London 1957); M. P. Ashley, Oliver Cromwell and the Puritan Revolution (London 1958); P. Collinson, The Elizabethan Puritan Movement (Berkley 1967); see chaps. 27 and 39; A. Fraser, Cromwell the Lord Protector (New York 1974).

31. The Formation of Denominations in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries

SOURCES

E. Sehling (ed.), Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jh. 1–5 (Leipzig 1902–14), 6–8, 11–13 (Tübingen 1955–6); L. Richter (ed.), Die evangelischen Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jh. (Weimar 1846); W. Niesel (ed.), Bekenntnisschriften und Kirchenordnungen der nach Gottes Wort reformierten Kirche (Zurich ^{3}1938); Die evangelisch-lutherischen Bekenntnisschriften (Göttingen 1952).

VISITATIONS: cf. Chap. 19; M. Gmelin, "Die Visitationsprotokolle der Diözese Konstanz 1571–86" ZGObrh 25 (1873) 129–204; J. Jungnitz, Visitationsberichte der Diözese Breslau, 4 vols. (Breslau 1902–08); W. E. Schwartz, Die Akten der Visitation des Bistums Münster aus der Zeit Johannes von Hoya 1571–73 (Münster 1913); A. Franzen, Die Visitationsprotokolle der ersten nachtridentinischen Visitation im Erzstift Köln unter Salentin von Isenburg 1569 (Münster 1960).

LITERATURE

A. Franzen, Die Kelchbewegung am Niederrhein im 16. Jh. (Münster 1955); id., "Die Herausbildung des Konfessionsbewusstseins am Niederrhein im 16. Jh." AHVNrh 158 (1956–57) 164–209; id., "Das Schicksal des Erasmianismus am Niederrhein im 16. Jh." HJ 83 (1964) 84–112; H. Lutz, "Bayern und der Laienkelch" QFIAB 34 (1954) 203–235; H. W. Gensichen, Damnamus: Die Verwerfung von Irrlehre bei Luther und im Luther- tum des 16. Jh. (Berlin 1955); H. Nottarp, Zur Communicatio in sacris cum haereticis (Halle 1933); E. W. Zeeden, "Grundlagen und Wege der Konfessionsbildung in Deutschland im Zeitalter der Glaubenskämpfe" HZ 185 (1958) 249–299; id., Katholische Überlieferungen in den lutherischen Kirchenordnungen (Münster 1959); id., Die Entstehung der Konfessionen (Munich 1965); J. B. Götz, Die religiösen Wirren in der Oberpfalz 1576–1620 (Münster 1937); D. Coenen, Die Katholische Kirche am Niederrhein von der Reformation bis zum Beginn des 18. Jh. (Münster 1967); A. Zieger, Das religiöse und kirchliche Leben im Spiegel der Kirchenordnungen von Preussen und Kurland (Diss. Tübingen 1963); F. Dickmann, "Das Problem der Gleichberechtigung der Konfessionen im Reich im 16. und 17. Jh." HZ 201 (1965) 265–305; H. Bornkamm, "Die religiöse und politische Problematik der Konfessionen im Reich" ARG 56 (1965) 209–218; H. Lutz, "Die Konfessionsproblematik ausserhalb des Reiches und in der Politik des Papsttums" ibid. 218–227; E. W. Zeeden and H. Molitor, Die Visitation im Dienst der kirchlichen Reform (Münster 1967).

Part Two
Catholic Reform and Counter Reformation

The Historical Concepts

LITERATURE

A. Elkan, "Entstehung und Entwicklung des Begriffes Gegenreformation" HZ 112 (1914) 473–493; H. Jedin, Katholische Reformation oder Gegenreformation? (Lucerne 1946), in addition K. D. Schmidt, Katholische Reform oder Gegenreformation (Limburg 1957); E. W. Zeeden, "Probleme und Aufgaben der Reformationsgeschichtsschreibung" Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht 6 (1955) 201–217; G. Villoslada, "La contrarreform, su nombre y su concepto histórico" Saggi storici intorno al Papato (Rome 1959) 189–242; B. Croce, Der Begriff des Barocks und der Gegenreformation (Zurich 1926).

GENERAL ACCOUNTS

W. Maurenbrecher, Geschichte der katholischen Reformation I (Nördlingen 1880); G. Schnürer, Katholische Kirche und Kultur in der Barockzeit (Paderborn 1937); K. Eder, Die Kirche im Zeitalter des konfessionellen Absolutismus (Freiburg 1949); P. Janelle, The Catholic Reformation (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1949); M. Bendiscioli, La riforma cattolica (Rome 1958); K. Eder, "Die katholische Erneuerung" HM VII (Bern 1957) 114–160; G. H. Tavard, "The Catholic Reform in the XVI Century" CH 26 (1957) 275–288; B. J. Kidd, The Counter Reformation (London 1933); H. Daniel-Rops, The Catholic Reformation (New York 1960); E. M. Burns, The Counter Reformation (Princeton 1964).

SECTION ONE

Origin and Breakthrough of the Catholic Reform to 1563

32. Preliminary Steps in Italy and Spain

SOURCES AND LITERATURE

A general work on the sources is lacking; likewise complete descriptions of each of the two countries; for France and Germay see Chapters 39 and 40.

ITALY: P. Tacchi Venturi, Storia della Compagnia di Gesù in Italia I:2–3 (Rome 1950); M. Petrocchi, La contrariforma in Italia (Rome 1947); P. Paschini, Tre ricerche sulla storia della Chiesa nel Cinquecento (Rome 1945) 3–88 (Oratories of Divine Love); id., Eresia e riforma cattolica al confine orientale d'Italia (Rome 1951); G. Alberigo, Contributi alla storia delle Confraternite dei disciplinati e della spiritualità laicale nei secoli XV e XVI (Perugia 1961); A. Cistellini, Figure della riforma pretridentina (Brescia 1948) (B. Stella and the Oratory in Brescia); F. S. da Brusciano, "Maria Lorenza Longo e l'opera del Divino Amore a Napoli" CollFr 23 (1953) 166–226; On the Venetian reform group: J. Leclercq, Le bienheureux P. Giustiniani (Rome 1951); The ascetic main work G.s: Secretum meum mihi (Frascati 1941); H. Jedin, "Contarini und Camaldoli" Arch. Ital. per la Storia della pietà 2 (1959) 51–117; id., "Quirini und Bembo" MisMercati IV (1946) 407–424; id., "G. Contarini e il contributo veneziano alla Riforma cattolica" La Civiltà veneziana del Rinascimento (Florence 1958) 105–125; F. Gaeta, Il vescovo Barozzi e il trattato de factionibus extinguendis (Venice–Rome 1958).

ROME AND DIOCESES: G. Pelliccia, La preparazione ed amissione dei chierici ai santi ordini nella Roma del secolo XVI (Rome 1946); R. Putelli, Prime visite pastorali alla città e diocesi [de Mantove] (Mantua 1934); A. Grazioli, G. M. Giberti (Verona 1955).

THEATINES: P. Paschini, S. Gaetano Thiene, G. P. Carafa e el origini dei Chierici Regolari Teatini (Rome 1926); P. Chiminelli, S. Gaetano Thiene, cuore della riforma cattolica (Vicenza 1948); F. Andreu, Le lettere di S. Gaetano da Thiene (Città del Vaticano 1954); R. de Maio, "Un tentativo rifomatore nel Cinquencento. Girolamo Ferro" Regnum Dei. Collectanea Theatina 16 (1960) 1–58.

BARNABITES: O. Premoli, Le lettere e lo spirito religioso di Antonio Maria Zaccaria (Rome 1909); id., Storia dei Barnabiti nel Cinquecento (Rome 1913); G. Chastel, S. A. M. Zaccaria (Paris 1930), Italian edition by S. de Ruggiero (Brescia 1933); G. M. Cagni–F. M. Ghilardotti, "I sermoni di S. A. M. Zaccaria" Arch. Ital. per la Storia della pietà 2 (1959) 231–284; G. Boffitto, Scrittori barnabiti IV (Florence 1937).

SOMASCHI: G. Landini, S. Girolamo Miani (Rome 1947); G. Vaira, G. Miano educatore (Rome 1960); M. Tentorio, Ven. P. Francesco Spaur da Trento preposito generale dei padri somaschi (Rome 1961); P. Bianchini, "Origine e sviluppo della Compagnia dei servi dei poveri" Rivista dell' Ordine dei PP. Somaschi 31 (1956) 100–111, 184–192, 229–237; 32 (1957) 11–28, 103–116.

URSULINES: C. Lubieńska, S. Aniela Merici i jej Dziejo I (Cracow 1935 with bibl.); P. Guerrini, S. A. Merici e la Compagnia di S. Orsola (Brescia 1936); S. M. Monica, Angela Merici and her Teaching Idea (S. Martin, Ohio ^{2}1945).

MENDICANTS: H. Jedin, "Zur Vorgeschichte der Regularenreform Trid. Sess. XXV" RQ 44 (1936) 231–281; id., G. Seripando I (Würzburg 1937) 147–289; A. Ghinato, "I Francescani e il Monte di pietà di Terni" AFrH 52 (1959) 204–289; id., "Il b. Michele d'Acqui e il suo apostolato in Verona" Venezie francescane 4 (1957) 145–192; L. Saggi, La Contregazione Mantovana dei Carmelitani sino alla morte del B. Battista Spagnoli 1512 (Rome 1954); A. Staring, Der Karmelitengeneral Nikolaus Audet und die katholische Reform des 16. Jh. (Rome 1959); P. Cuthbert-J. Widlöcher, Die Kapuziner (Munich 1931); Monumenta Hist. Ord. Min. Capuccinorum (since 1937); Melchior a Pobladura, Historia generalis O. Min. Cap. I (Rome 1947); Th. Graf, Die Kapuziner (Fribourg 1957); G. Abate, "Fra Matteo da Bascio el gli inizi dell'Ordine Cappuccino" CollFr 30 (1960) 31–77.

SPAIN: F. Fernández, F. Hernando de Talavera, confesor de los Reyes y primer arzobispo de Granada (Madrid 1942); Tarsicio de Azcona, "El tipo ideal de obispo en la Iglesia española antes la rebelión luterana" HS 11 (1958) 21–44; id., La elección y reforma del Episcopado español en tiempo de los Reyes Católicos (Madrid 1960); L. F. de Retana, Cisneros

y su siglo, 2 vols. (Madrid 1929); J. M. Doussinague, Fernando el Católico y el cisma de Pisa (Madrid 1946); V. Beltrán de Heredia, Historia de la Reforma de la Provincia de España 1450–1550 (Rome 1936); id., Las corrientes de espiritualidad entre los Dominicos de Castilla durante la primera mitad del siglo XVI (Salamanca 1941); Introducción a los origines de la Observancia en España: Las Reformas de los siglos XIV el XV (Madrid 1958); M. Battaillon, Erasmo y España, 2 vols. (Mexico 1950); C. Sánchez Aliseda, "Precedentes Toledanos de la Reforma tridentina" Revista española de Derecho Canónico 2 (1948); J. I. Tellechea Idigoras, El Obispo ideal en el siglo de la Reforma (Rome 1963), with special reference to Spanish authors.

33. Ignatius Loyola and His Order to 1556

BIBLIOGRAPHY AND SOURCES

A. Carayon, Bibliographie historique de la Compagnia de Jésus (Paris 1864); Heimbucher II:130–138; A. de Backer–Ch. Sommervogel, Bibliothèque des écrivains de la Compagnie de Jésus, 11 vols. (Paris 1890–1932); Since 1932 a continuous bibliography in AHSI. On the origin (1894) and history of the chief source material, MHSI cf. P. de Leturia: AHSI 13 (1944) 1–61 and HJ 72 (1953) 585–604. It was located originally in Madrid, since 1929 in Rome. The first section of the Monumenta Iganatiana contains 4 series: I: Epp. et instructiones, 12 vols. (1903–11), 6813 letters of the last decade, for the most part not by Ignatius himself, but rather formulated by his assistants. II: Exercitia spiritualia (1919), J. Iparraguirre, Directoria Exercitiorum Spiritualium 1540–1899 (Rome 1955). III: Constitutiones, 3 vols. (1934–38) and Regulae Societatis Jesu (1948). IV: Fontes narrativi di S. Ignatio, 3 vols (1943–60), containing the so-called "Memories of Life," other contemporary testimonies, and the canonization process. Manuscript: Obras completas de S. Ignacio de L., ed. J. Iparraguirre (Madrid 1952); On Ignatius and the establishment of the order the so-called Chronicon S. J. written by the secretary of the saint, by J. A. Polanco, Vita S. Ignatii Loyolae et rerum Soc. Jesu historia, 6 vols. (1894–97), in addition, Complementa, 2 vols. (1916–17) are important. For the history of the establishment of the order the following are useful in addition to the letters in the MHSI: The letters of the first members in the MHSI: Lainii Monumenta, 8 vols. (1912–17). Fabri Mon. (1914). Epp. Salmeronis, 2 vols. (1906–07). Bobadillae Mon. (1913). Epp. Hieronymi Nadal, 4 vols. (1889–1905). The Epp. mixtae 1537–56, 5 vols. (1898–1901) are useful also for general Church history.

LITERATURE

IGNATIUS: J. Juambelz, Bibliografía sobre la vida, obras y escritos de S. I. de L. (Madrid 1956); J. Iparraguirre, Orientaciones bibliográficas sobre S. I. de L. (Rome 1957); F. G. Gilmont–P. Daman, Bibliographie Ignatienne 1894–1957 (Paris–Louvain 1958). The official life of Ignatius is presented in the Vita of P. Ribadeneira (+1611), first appearing in Naples, 1572. Cf. R. G. Villoslada, "La figura histórica de S. I. de L. a través de cuatro siglos" RF 153 (1956) 40–70; H. Böhmer, Ignatius von Loyola, ed. H. Leube (Leipzig 1941); P. Dudon, S. Ignace de L. (Paris 1934); P. de Leturia, El gentilombre I. López de Loyola (Barcelona 1949); The numerous preliminary works of the former editor of the MHSI for an until now missing biography of large scope are collected in the Estudios ignacianos, ed. J. Iparraguirre, 2 vols. (Rome 1957); The 400th anniversary of the death of Loyola produced many biographies of varying worth: G. Papàsogli (Rome 1955), J. Brodrick, A. Guillermon, F. Wulf, R. G. Villoslada (all 1956, Villoslada in second edition 1961); Commentarii Ignatiani (Rome 1956), the Jubilee volume of the AHSI, with collection of the literature of the Jubilee, 617–629. Because of its insight one biography stands out: H. Rahner, I. v. L. Briefwechsel mit Frauen (Freiburg 1956); J. Lewis, Le gouvernement spirituel selon S. Ignace de Loyola (Bruges–Paris 1961).

SPIRITUAL EXERCISES: H. Böhmer, Loyola und die deutsche Mystik (Leipzig 1921); L. Zarncke, Die Exercitia Spir. des hl. I. v. L. in ihren geistesgeschichtlichen Zusammenhängen (Leipzig 1931); A. M. Albareda, "Intorno alla scuola di orazione metodica stabilita a Monserrato dall'abbate Garsias Jimenez de Cisneros" AHSI 25 (1956) 254–316. For the originality: A. Codina, Los orígenes de los Ejercicios espirituales de S. I. de L. (Barcelona 1926); P. de Leturia, "Génesis de los Ejercicios de S. Ignacio y su influjo en la fundación de la Compañiá de Jésus" AHSI 10 (1941) 16–59; H. Rahner, "I. v. L. und die aszetische Tradition der Kirchenväter" ZAM 17 (1942) 61–77; id., I. v. L. und das geschichtliche Werden seiner Frömmigkeit (Salzburg 1949), fundamental; id., "Zur Christologie der Exerzitien" GuL 35 (1962) 14–38, 115–140; id., The Dynamic Element in the Church, chap. III (New York 1964); J. Iparraguirre, Espíritu de S. I. de L. (Bilbao 1958); F. Charmot, L'union au Christ dans l'actions selon S. Ignace (Paris 1959); J. de Guibert, La spiritualité de la Comp. de Jésus (Rome 1953); Issac Jogues Iroquois, Fr. Mission in Canada; J. de Guibert, The Jesuits, Their Spiritual Doctrine and Practice (Chicago 1965): This is the chief work on the subject.

FIRST MEMBERS: F. Cerecéda, Diego Laínez en la Europa religiosa de su tiempo, 2 vols. (Madrid 1945); J. Danemarie, Le bienheureux P. Favre (Paris 1960); G. Guitton, Le bienheureux P. Favre (Lyon–Paris 1960); M. Nicoláu, J. Nadal (Madrid 1949); G. Schurhammer, Franz Xaver I (Freiburg 1955); O. Karrer, Der hl. Franz von Borja (Freiburg 1921); C. de Dalmases–J. F. Gilmont, "Las obras de S. Francisco de Borja" AHSI 30 (1961) 125–179; C. Englander, Ignatius von Loyola und Johannes von Polanco (Regensburg 1956); J. F. Gilmont, Les écrits spirituels des premiers Jésuites. Inventaire commenté (Rome 1961).

HISTORY OF THE ORDER: The order had from the beginning a carefully kept archive (see G. Schurhammer, "Der Ursprung des römischen Archivs der Gesellschaft Jesu" AHSI 12 [1943] 89–118) and carefully recorded its history. Older complete descriptions: N. Orlandini, F. Sacchini et. al., Historia S. J., 6 parts (Rome 1614–1859); D. Bartoli, Dell'istoria della Comp. di Gesù, 6 vols. (Rome 1650–60); J. Crétineau-Joly, Histoire religieuse, politique et littéraire de la Comp. de Jésus, 6 vols. (Paris ^{3}1851), strongly apologetic; E. Rosa, I gesuiti dalle origini ai nostri giorni (Rome ^{3}1957); Th. J. Campbell, The Jesuits (London 1935); R. G. Villoslada, Manual de historia de la Compañía de Jésus (Madrid 1941); H. Becher, Die Jesuiten (Munich 1951), best account in German; More detailed, extending only to 1579: J. Brodrick, The Origins of the Jesuits (London 1940); id., The Progress of the J. (London 1946). Good tabulated synopsis [F. X. Wernz–J. B. Boetstouwers], Synopsis Historiae Societatis Jesu (Louvain 1950). Rich in material but of variable worth are the histories of the provinces written at the mandate of the order: B. Duhr, Geschichte der Jesuiten in den Ländern deutscher Zunge, 4 vols (Freiburg–Regensburg 1907–28), extends to the suppression of the order, and is indispensable for the general Church history of Germany from the 16th to the 18th centuries; A. Astraín, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús en la Asistencia de España, 7 vols. (Madrid 1902–25); P. Tacchi Venturi, Storia della Compagnia di Gesú in Italia, 2 vols. (Rome 1930–51), extending only to 1556; H. Fouqueray, Histoire de la Comp. de Jésus en France, 5 vols. (Paris 1910–25), to 1645, completed by P. de Lattre, Les établissements des Jésuites en France, 4 vols. (Paris 1941–56); A Poncelet, Histoire de la Comp. des Jésus dans les anciens Pays-Bas (Brussels 1927–28); F. Rodrigues, História de la Companhia de Jesus na Assistên- cia de Portugal I (Porto 1931); A. Kröss, Geschichte der Böhmischen Provinz der Gesellschaft Jesu, 2 vols. (Vienna 1910–38). For the histories of the overseas provinces see chaps. 45 and 46.

REFERENCE BOOKS AND WORKS ON THE SPIRIT OF THE ORDER: B. Duhr, Jesuitenfabeln (Freiburg 1904); L. Koch, Jesuitenlexikon (Paderborn 1934); P. Lippert, Zur Psychologie des Jesuitenordens (Freiburg 1956); G. Gundlach, Zur Soziologie der kath. Ideenwelt und des Jesuitenordens (Freiburg 1928); H. Stoeckius, Forschungen zur Lebensordnung der Gesellschaft Jesu im 16. Jh., 2 parts (Munich 1910–11); M. Mir, Historia interna documentada de la Comp. de J., 2 vols. (Madrid 1913); P. M. Baumgarten, Ordenszucht und Ordensstrafrecht [der Jesuiten] (Krumbach 1932); P. v. Hoensbroech, Der Jesuitenorden, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1926–28), pamphlet.

ASSESSMENTS OF THE ORDER WRITTEN BY NON-JESUITS: Pilatus [=V. Naumann], Der Jesuitismus (Regensburg 1905); R. Fülöp-Müller, Macht und Geheimnis der Jesuiten (Lucerne 1929); H. Böhmer, The Jesuits (Philadelphia 1928).

34. The Beginnings of the Catholic Reform in Rome under Paul III

SOURCES

BullRom VI:173–401; Raynold, Ann. Eccl. XXI:1; NBD, I. Abt. 1–11 (Gotha 1892, Berlin 1910); The preliminary Acts of the Council of Trent: CT IV (1904); G. Ribier, Lettres et Mémoires d'Estat sous François I, Henry II et François II, 2 vols. (Paris 1666); Acta nuntiaturae Gallicae, I: Correspondance des Nonces en France Carpi et Ferrero 1535–40, ed. J. Lestocquoy (Rome–Paris 1961); id., G. Alberigo: Critica storica (1962) 66f.; P. G. Baroni, La nunziatura in Francia di Rodolfo Pio 1535–37 (Bologna 1962); Correspondance du Card. de Tournon, ed. M. Francois (Paris 1946); Nunziature di Venezia, ed. F. Gaeta, 2 vols. (Rome 1958–60), cf. also id., Annuario dell'Instituto storico ital. per l'età moderna e contemporanea 9–10 (1957–58) 5–281.

LITERATURE

Pastor V; C. Capasso, Paolo III, 2 vols. (Messina 1924); L. Dorez, La cour du Pape Paul III, 2 vols. (Paris 1932); L. Cardauns, Von Nizza bis Crépy (Rome 1923); W. Friedensburg, Kaiser Karl V. und Papst Paul III. (Leipzig 1932); K. Brandi, Kaiser Karl V., 2 vols. (Munich 1937–41) Eng. Vol. I (New York 1939); P. Rassow–F. Schalk, Karl V.: Der Kaiser und seine Zeit (Cologne 1960) 104–117, the conciliar politics of the Emperor; H. Jedin, A History of the Council of Trent I (St. Louis 1957) 245–444, also treats the works of St. Ehses and others used by Pastor; id., "Eine bisher unbekannte Denkschrift Tommaso Campeggios über die Reform der Römischen Kurie" Lortz F I (Baden-Baden 1958) 405–417; K. Schnith, "Karl V. in europäischer Sicht. Hinweise auf neuere Arbeiten" HJ 80 (1961) 270–285; W. Gramberg, "Die Hamburger Bronzebüste Pauls III" Festschrift E. Meyer (Hamburg 1959) 160–172.

ITALIAN EVANGELISM: Opuscoli e lettere di riformatori italiani del Cinquecento, ed. G. Paladino, 2 vols. (Bari 1913); E. M. Jung, "On the Nature of Evangelism in Sixteenth-Century Italy" Journal of the History of Ideas 14 (1953) 511–527; Bibliography on Vittoria Colonna in the jubilee volume: V. Colonna, Marchesa di Pescara (Rome 1947) 126–134; The ambivalent character of Evangelism was often misunderstood due to the numerous defections and the Inquisition, e.g., H. W. Beyer, Die Religion Michelangelos (Bonn 1926); P. McNair, Peter Martyr in Italy (Oxford 1967).

INQUISITION: G. Buschbell, Reformation und Inquisition in Italien um die Mitte des 16. Jh. (Paderborn 1912); P. Paschini, "Episodi della Inquisizione a Roma nei suoi primi decenni" Studi romani 5 (1957) 281–301.

35. The Council of Trent under Paul III and Julius III

SOURCES

H. Jedin, Das Konzil von Trient. Ein Überblick über die Erforschung seiner Geschichte (Rome 1948). The official edition of the Canones et Decreta (Rome 1564 by Paulus Manutius) was reprinted innumerable times; expanded to include the most important declarations of the council congregation, ed. E. L. Richter (Leipzig 1853). Phototypic reproduction of an autograph of Massarelli with an introduction about the oldest prints: St. Kuttner, Decreta septem priorum sessionum Concilii Tridentini sub Paulo III Pont. Max. (Washington 1945). Because the acts were inaccessible since the end of the 16th century, both of the descriptions of the history of the council, which appeared in the 17th century, were treated into the 19th century almost like source works: the sharply antipapal Istoria del Concilio Tridentino by P. Sarpi (London 1619), critical edition by Gambarin, 3 vols. (Bari 1935), and the refutation by P. Sforza Pallavicino, Istoria del Concilio di Trento (Rome 1655), best edition by F. A. Zaccaria, 5 vols. (Faenza 1792–96); cf. H. Jedin, Der Quellenapparat der Konzilsgeschichte Pallavicinos (Rome 1940). On the reliability of Sarpi see Jedin II 518–21ff. A synopsis of those sources made available up to that time is supplied by J. Le Plat, Monumentorum ad historiam concilii Tridentini potissimum illustrandam spectantium amplissima collectio, 7 vols. (Louvain 1781–87); the first, defective edition of the acts A. Theiner, Acta genuina ss. oecumenici Concilii Tridentini, 2 vols. (Agram 1874). A critical edition of all comprehensible sources was begun in 1891 after the opening of the Vatican Archives by the Görres-Gesellschaft: Concilium Tridentinum. Diariorum, actorum, epistularum, tractatuum nova collectio (Freiburg 1901–61), till now 13 vols. in 4 sections: Diaries, S. Merkle I–III:1; Acts, IV–V (1545–47); VIII–IX (1561–63), ed. St. Ehses; VI:1 (Bologna) and VII:1 (1551–52), ed. Th. Freudenberger; Letters, X–XI, ed. G. Buschbell; Treatises, XIII, ed. V. Schweitzer; XIII:1, ed. V. Schweitzer–H. Jedin. The history of the origin of the collection by Jedin, U. Sufera 195–213.

GENERAL LITERATURE

P. Richard, Histoire de Concile de Trente, 2 vols. (Paris 1930–31), suppl. A. Michel, Les decrets du Concile de Trente (Paris 1938); L. Cristiani, L'Église à l'époque du Concile de Trente (Paris 1948). In addition RSTI 2 (1948) 274–284; G. Schreiber, Das Weltkonzil von Trient, 2 vols. (Freiburg 1951), there I:11–31 a survey of the literature appearing at the jubilee in 1945.

ON THE PARTICIPANTS: G. Alberigo, "Cataloghi dei partecipanti al Concilio di Trento editi durante il medesimo" RSTI 10 (1956) 345–373; 11 (1957) 49–94; H. Jedin, "Die deutschen Teilnehmer am Konzil von Trient" ThQ 122 (1941) 238–261; 123 (1942) 21–39; C. Gutiérrez, Españoles en Trento (Valladolid 1951); A. Wazl, I domenicani al Concilio di Trento (Rome 1961). Further statements about the participants of the orders: Jedin, II:457; J. de Castro, Portugal no Concilio de Trento, 6 vols. (Lisbon 1944–46); I. Rogger, Le nazioni al Concilio di Trento 1545–52 (Rome 1952). On the attitude of the Protestants, comprehensive but not exhaustive, R. Stupperich, "Die Reformation und das Tridentinum" ARG 47 (1956) 20–63. A stronger consideration of the sociological factors is demanded by A. Dupront, "Du Concile de Trente. Reflexions autour d'un IV^{e} Centenaire" RH 206 (1951) 202f.

FIRST SESSION: "Acts": CT IV–V, in addition the later discovered votes on justification by J. Olazarán, Documentos inéditos Tridentinos sobre la justificación (Madrid 1957); The diaries of Severoli, Massarelli and the pro-imperial Pratanus: CT I–II; The correspondence: CT X with suppl. CT XI:3–129. Complete description with literature to 1956: Jedin II; newer special literature in the notes. Copious bibliography on the Italian bishops by G. Alberigo, I vescovi italiani al Concilio di Trento 1545–47 (Florence 1959). H. O. Evennett, Three Benedictine Abbots at the Council of Trent: Studia monastica 1 (Montserrat 1959) 343–377.

BOLOGNA: "Acts": CT VI:1; the votes follow in VI:2; L. Carcereri, Storia esterna di Concilio di Bologna (Montevarchi 1902); id., Il Concilio di Trento dalla traslazione a Bologna alla sospensione (Bologna 1910); H. Jedin, "Il significato del periodo Bolognese per le decisioni dogmatiche e l'opera di riforma del Concilio di Trento" Problemi di vita religiosa in Italia nel Cinquecento (Padua 1960) 1–10.

SECOND SESSION: "Acts": CT VII:1, in addition J. Birkner, "Die Akten des Trienter Konzils für die zweite Tagungsperiode unter Papst Julius III" QFIAB 29 (1939) 297–311. The letters of the treasurer Vargas, recorded in the correspondence CT XI, the authenticity of which has long been doubted, may now, after recent archival discoveries in England, be considered to be authentic. H. Jedin, "Das Konzilstagebuch des Bischofs Julius Pflug von Naumburg 1551–52" RQ 50 (1955) 22–43; E. Bizer, Confessio Virttembergica (Stuttgart 1952), with important introduction; C. M. Abád, "Dos Memoriales inéditos para el Concilio de Trento del B. Juan de Avila" MCom III (1945), in addition ZAM 11 (1936) 124–139; H. Jedin, "Die Deutschen am Trienter Konzil 1551–52" HZ 188 (1959) 1–16; J. Birkner, "Kardinal Marcellus Crescentius" RQ 43 (1935) 267–285; G. Alberigo, "Un informatore senese al Conc. di Trento 1551–52" RSTI 12 (1958) 173–201.

36. The Breakthrough of the Catholic Reform (1551–59)

SOURCES

BullRom VI:401–566; Raynald, Ann. eccl. XXI:2; The Reform Decrees of Julius III and Paul IV:CT XIII:1; NBD, I. Sect. 12 (1901), ed. G. Kupke; Sect. 13 (1959), ed. H. Lutz; R. Ancel, Nontiatures de France I (Paris 1909–11), includes the years 1554–57. For the Catholic Restoration in England: Calendar of Letters, Dispatches and State Papers Relating to the Negotiations between England and Spain. Philip and Mary 1554–58, ed. R. Tyler (London 1954); The Acts of the Provincial Synod of Canterbury: Mansi XXXV: 475–504; W. Sharp–L. E. Whatmore, Archdeacon Harpsfield's Visitations 1557 (London 1950–51); J. Tellechea Idigoras, "Pole y Paulo IV" AHPpont 4 (1966) 105–154.

LITERATURE

Pastor, VI; Seppelt, ^{2}IV:58–90; H. Lutz, Christianitas afflicta (Göttingen 1963).

FOR MARCELLUS II: In addition to the still reliable biography by P. Polidori (Rome 1744): A. Mercati, Prescrizioni pel culto divino nella diocesi di Reggio-Emilia del vescovo card. M. Cervini (Reggio–Emilia 1933).

For Paul IV: G. M. Monti, Ricerche su Papa Paolo IV Carafa (Benevent 1925); id., Studi sulla Riforma cattolica e sul papato nei secoli XVI e XVII (Trani 1941); I. Torriani, Una tragedia nel Cinquecento romano: Paolo IV e i suoi nepoti (Rome 1951).

English Restoration: Ph. Hughes, Reformation in England II (London 1954) 184–330; W. Schenk, Reginald Pole (London); G. Mattingly, Catherine of Aragon (Boston 1941).

Other Subjects: H. Jedin, "Kirchenreform und Konzilsgedanke 1550–1559" HJ 54 (1934) 401–431; id., "Analekten zur Reformtätigkeit der Reformpäpste Julius' III und Pauls IV" RQ 42 (1934) 305–332; 43 (1935) 87–156; id., "Kard. Giovanni Ricci" Misellanea P. Paschini II (Rome 1949) 269–358; L. Serrano, "Anotación al tema: El papa Paolo IV y España" Hispania 3 (1943) 293–325.

Literature on Poland: B. Stasiewski, Reformation und Gegenreformation in Polen [=KLK 18] (Münster 1960) 72–78; M. Francois, Le Card. Francois Tournon (Paris 1951) [=Bibliothèques des écoles françaises d'Athènes et de Rome, Vol. 173].

37. Pius IV and the Conclusion of the Council of Trent

Sources

Negotiations: CT VIII–IX (St. Ehses); Diaries: CT II–III:1 (S. Merkle); Correspondence of the Legates: J. Susta, Die Römische Curia und das Concil von Trient unter Pius IV., 4 vols. (Vienna 1904–14); Most important earlier work: Th. Sickel, Römische Berichte, 5 parts (Vienna 1895–1901); Reports of Imperial Ambassadors: Th. Sickel, Zur Geschichte des Concils von Trient (Vienna 1872); G. Drei, "La Corrispondenza del Card. Ercole Gonzaga, presidente del Concilio di Trento" Archivio storico per le provincie Parmensi 17 (1917) 185–242, 18 (1918) 30–143; H. Jedin, Krisis und Wendepunkt des Trienter Konzils 1562–63. Die neuentdeckten Geheimberichte des Bischofs Gualterio von Viterbo an den hl. Karl Borromäus (Würzburg 1941); Survey of important sources for history of last session: H. Jedin, G. Seripando II: 121; "Reports of the Nuncios Hosius, Delfino and Commendone to the Imperial Court" NBD, II. Abt., 1–3 (Vienna-Graz 1897–1953). E. M. Wermter, Kard. St. Hosius, Bischof von Ermland, und Herzog Albrecht von Preussen. Ihr Briefwechsel über das Konzil von Trient 1560–62 (Münster 1957) [=RST 82].

Literature

Pastor VII; St. Ehses, "Die letzte Berufung des Trienter Konzils durch Pius IV" Festschrift G. von Hertling (Kempen 1913) 139–162; H. Jedin, G. Seripando II (Würzburg 1937) 194–238; H. O. Evennett, The Cardinal of Lorraine and the Council of Trent (Cambridge 1930); B. Chudoba, "Les relaciones de las dos cortes Habsburgesas en la tercera asemblea del Concilio Tridentino" Boletín de la R. Academia de la Historia 103 (1933) 297–368; H. Jedin, "La politica conciliare di Cosimo I" RSIt 62 (1950) 345–374, 477–496; G. Constant, La légation du Cardinal Morone près l'Empereur et le Concile de Trente (Paris 1922); L. Castano, Mons. Nicolò Sfrondrato, Vescovo di Cremona al Concilio di Trento (Turin 1939); P. Prodi, Il Cardinale Gabriele Paleotti I (Florence 1959).

SECTION TWO

The Papacy and the Implementation of the Council of Trent (1565–1605)

38. Personality and Work of the Reform Popes from Pius V to Clement VIII

SOURCES

BullRom VI–IX; L. Serrano, Correspondencia diplomática entre España y la S. Sede durande el Pontificato de Pio V, 4 vols. (Madrid 1914); G. Catalano, Controversie giurisdizionali tra Chiesa e Stato nell'età di Gregorio XIII e Filippo II (Palermo 1955); for the reports of the Nuncios cf. chap. 39 and 40; A. Sala, Documenti circa la vita di San Carlo, 4 vols. (Milan 1857–62); Acta Ecclesiae Mediolanensis, ed. A. Ratti, 3 vols. (Milan 1890–96); A. G. Roncalli, Gli atti della Visita Apostolica di S. Carlo Borromeo a Bergamo, 5 vols. (Florence 1936–58), also there is the short account of this visitation in RSTI 14 (1960), 452–457; P. Guerrini, Atti della visita pastorale del vescovo Domenico Bollani alla diocesi di Brescia, 3 vols. (Brescia 1915–40); Nunziature di Savoia I, ed. F. Fonzi (Rome 1960); Nunziature di Napoli I, ed. P. Villani (Rome 1962); Also, H. Jedin, "Osservazioni della Nunziature d'Italia" RSIt 75 (1963) 327–343.

LITERATURE

Basic: Pastor VIII (Pius V), IX (Gregory XIII), X (Sixtus V), XI (Clement VIII); P. Herre, Papsttum und Papstwahl im Zeitalter Philipps II. (Leipzig 1907); L. Browne Olf, The Sword of Saint Michael. The Life of Pius V (Milwaukee, Wisc. 1943); G. Grente, Le pape des grands combats (Paris ^{2}1956); G. Carocci, Lo Stato della Chiesa nella seconda metà del sec. XVI (Milan 1961); L. Castano, Gregorio XIV (Turin 1957).

NUNCIATURES: L. Just, "Die Erforschung der päpstlichen Nuntiaturen" QFIAB 24 (1933) 244–277; H. Kramer, "Die Erforschung und Herausgabe der Nuntiaturberichte" Mitt. des Österr. Staatsarchivs 1 (1948) 492–514; L. H. Halkin, "Les Archives des Nonciatures" Bull. de l'Institut Belge de Rome 33 (1961) 649–700.

CATALOGUE OF NUNCIATURES: H. Biaudet, Les nonciatures permanentes jusqu'en 1648 (Helsingfors 1910).

ROMAN COLLEGES: P. Paschini, "Le origini del Seminario romano" Cinquecento romano e riforma cattolica (Rome 1958) 3–32; R. G. Villoslada, Storia del Collegio Romano dal duo inizio 1551 alla soppressione della Compagnia di Gesù 1773 (Rome 1954); F. A. Gasquet, A History of the Ven. English College at Rome (London 1920); Steinhuber, see chap. 40.

THE CITY OF ROME: P. Pechiai, Roma nel Cinquecento (Bologna 1949); J. Delumeau, Vie économique et sociale de Rome dans la seconde moitié du XVI^{e} siècle, 2 vols. (Paris 1959); H. Siebenhüner, "Umrisse zur Gesch. der Ausstattung von St. Peter in Rom von Paul III. bis Paul V." Festschrift H. Sedlmayr (Munich 1962) 229–320; M. Romani, Pellegrini e viaggiatori nell' economia di Roma dal XIV al XVII secolo (Milan 1948), there are 323–355 accounts of pilgrims cared for in S. Trinità dei Pellegrini; P. M. Baugarten, Von den Kardinälen des XVI Jh. (Krumbach 1926).

CATHOLIC REFORM IN ITALY: G. Alberigo, "Studi e problemi relativi all' applicazione del concilio di Trento in Italia" RSIt 70 (1958) 239–298, numerous unpublished dissertations are summarized; Problemi di vita religiosa in Italia nell Cinquecento. Atti del Convegno di Storia della Chiesa in Italia 1958 (Padua 1960). A satisfactory biography of Borromeo does not exist, primarily because his extensive correspondence in the Library Ambrosiana has not been researched. Bibliography: LThK² II: 612; R. Mols, "S. Borromée pionnier de la moderne pastorale" NRTh 89 (1957) 600–622, 715–747; M. Grosso–M. F. Mellano, La Controriforma nella arci diocesi di Torino 1558 bis 1610, 3 vols. (Vatican City 1957); M. F. Mellano, La controriforma nella diocesi di Mondovi 1560–1602 (Turin 1955); F. Molinari, Il card. Teatino B. P. Burali e la riforma tridentina a Piacenze 1568–76 (Rome 1957); R. de Maio, Le origini del Seminario di Napoli (Naples 1957); id., Alfonso Carafa, Card. di Napoli [SteT 210] (Vatican City 1961); P. Villani, "Una visita apostolica nel Regno di Napoli 1566–68" Studi in onore di R. Filangieri II (Naples 1959) 433–466; "Bibliography of the Italian diocesan synods" Silvino da Nedro, Sinodi diocesani italiani 1534–1878 (Vatican City 1960) [=SteT 207].

39. Self-Assertion of the Church in Western and Eastern Europe

SPAIN AND THE NETHERLANDS

SOURCES: Provincial Synod of Toledo: Mansi 34, 537–570; R. Sánchez Lamadrid, "Un manoscrito inédito del B. Juan de Avila" Arch. Theol. Granadino 4 (1941) 137–241, completed by C. M. Abad, "Ultimos inéditos extensos del B. J. de Avila" MCom 13 (1950) 13–60. The Provincial Synods of Salamanca, Granada and Saragossa: Aguirre V², 445–463; E. Rodríguez Amaya, Revista de estudios extremeños 6 (1951) 235–295. The Statutes of the Provincial Synod of Valencia: Aguirre V, 445–463. Visitations: I. I. Tellechea Idiogoras, "El formulario de visita pastoral de B. de Carranza, arzobispo de Toledo" Anthologica annua 4 (1956) 385–437; D. Mansilla, "Reacción del Cabildo de Burgos ante las visitas y otros actos de iurisdicción intentados por sus obispos" HS 10 (1957) 135–159. The Religious Policies of Philip II: Serrano, Catalano and Villani see Chap. 38; For Philip II (early periods): J. de Olarra–M. L. de Larramendi, Correspondencia entre la nunciatura en España y la S. Sede I (Rome 1960). Netherlands: Correspondance de Philippe II sur les affaires des Pays-Bas, ed. L. Gachard, 5 vols. (Brussels 1848–79); Correspondance de Philippe II sur les affaires des Pays-Bas, ed. J. Lefèvre (Brussels 1941–53); Nonciatures de Flandres, ed. The Belgian Historical Institute in Rome, especially L. van der Essen-A. Louant, Correspondance d' O. M. Frangipani 1595–1606, 3 vols. (Rome 1924, 1932, 1942); J. Cleyntjens, Corpus iconoclasticum, 4 vols. (Tilburg 1928–34); Documents relatifs à la jurisdiction des nonces et internonces des Pays-Bas pendant le régime espagnol 1596–1706, ed. J. Lefèvre (Burssels–Rome 1942); M. Dierickx, Documents inédits sur l'érection des nouveaux diocèses aux Pays-Bas 1521–70, 3 vols. (Brussels 1960–62).

LITERATURE: L. Pfandl, Philipp II (Munich 1938); R. Konetzke: HZ 164 (1941) 316–331; J. M. March, Niñez y juventud de Felipe II, 2 vols. (Madrid 1941–42); R. Altamira, Felipe II, hombre de estado (Mexico City 1950); G. Mattingly, The Armada (Boston 1959); F. Braudel, La Méditerranée et le Monde méditerranéen à l'époque de Philippe II (Paris 1949); R. T. Davies, The Golden Century of Spain 1501–1621 (New York 1961); A. Robb, William of Orange I (London 1962); C. V. Wedgewood, William the Silent (New Haven 1944); C. J. Cadoux, Philip of Spain and the Netherlands; L. van der Essen, Alexandre Farnèse, 5 vols. (Brussels 1933–37); B. de Meester, Le Saint Siège et les troubles des Pays-Bas 1566–79 (Louvain 1934); F. Willcox, L'introduction des décrets du Concile de Trente dans les Pays-Bas et dans la Principauté de Liège (Louvain 1929); E. Donckel, "Luxemburger Gutachten zu den Trienter Reformdekreten" Rhein. Vierteljahrsbll 19 (1957) 119–134; L. J. Rogier, Geschiedenis van het Katholizime in Noord-Nederland in de 16^e en 17^e Eeuw, 3 vols. (The Hague 1945–47); A. Pasture, La restauration religieuse aux Pays-Bas catholiques 1596 bis 1633 (Louvain 1925); J. Scheerder, Die Inquisitie in de Nederlanden in de XVI^e Eeuw (Antwerp 1944); E. de Moreau, Histoire de l'Église en Belgique V (Brussels 1952); C. Petrie, Philip II of Spain (New York 1963); I. I. Woltjer, Friesland in de hervormingstijd (Leiden 1962).

FRANCE

SOURCES: H. Hauser, Les sources de l'hist. de France, XVI^e siècle III, IV (Paris 1912–15); Lettres de Cathérine de Médicis, ed. H. de la Ferrière-Baguenalt de la Puchesse, 10 vols. (Paris 1880–1909); Recueil des lettres missives de Henri IV, ed. Berger de Xivrey et. al., 9 vols. (Paris 1843–76); H. C. Davila, Historia delle guerre civili di Francia 1559–98 (Venice 1630).——Provincial Councils: Reims 1564: Mansi 33, 1289–1390; Rouen 1581: Mansi 34, 617–682; Reims 1583: Mansi 34, 683–938; Aix 1585: Mansi 34, 937–1014; Toulouse 1590: Mansi 34, 1269–1322; Narbonne 1609: Mansi 34, 1477–1536.——Girolamo Ragazzoni, évêque de Bergame, nonce en France. Correspondance de sa nonciature 1583–86, ed. P. Blet (Rome–Paris 1962).

LITERATURE: L. Romier, Les origines politiques des guerres de Religion, 2 vols. (Paris 1913–14); id., Le Royaume de Cathérine de Médicis, 2 vols. (Paris 1922); id., Catholiques et Huguenots à la Cour de Charles IX (Paris 1924); N. Reolker, Queen of Navare: Jeanne d'Albert, 1528–1572 (Cambridge, Mass. 1968); J. E. Neale, The Age of Catherine de Medici (London 1943); A. Bailly, La réforme en France jusqu' à l'Édit de Nantes (Paris 1960); R. Nürnberger, Die Politisierung des französischen Protestantimus (Tübingen 1948); A. Buisson, Michel de l'Hôpital (Paris 1950); Ch. Hirschauer, La politique de Pie V en France 1566–72 (Paris 1922); V. Martin, Le Gallicanisme et la réforme catholique (Paris 1919), chief work, see criticism by Ch. Hirschauer: RHEF 9 (1923) 545f.; A. Degert, Histoire des séminaires français jusqu' à la révolution, 2 vols. (Paris 1912); L. Serbat, Les assemblées du Clergé de France 1561–1615 (Paris 1906); V. Carrière, "Le épreuves de l'église de France au XVI^e siècle" Introduction aux études d'histoire eccl. locale III (Paris 1936) 247–509; J. Lestocquoy, "Les évêques français au milieu du XVI^e siècle" RHEF 45 (1959) 25–40; J. Cloulas, "Les aliénations du temporel eccl. sous Charles IX et Henri III" RHEF 44 (1958) 5–56; id., "Un aspect original des relations fiscales entre la royauté et le clergé" RHEF 55 (1960) 876–901; J. Imbert, "Les prescriptions hospitalières du Concile de Trente et leur diffusion en France" RHEF 42 (1956) 5–28; R. M. Kingdon, Geneva and the Coming of the Religious Wars in France (Geneva 1956); J. R. Mayor, Representative Institutions in Renaissance France (Madison 1960); W. C. Grant, Constitutional Thought in 16th Cent. France (New York 1947); F. C. Palm, Calvinism and the Religious Wars (New York 1932); O. Zoff, The Huguenots (New York 1942); S. L. England, The Massacre of St. Bartholomew (London 1938); D. Jensen, Bernardine de Mendoza and the French Catholic League (Cambridge 1964); R. B. Merriman, Six Contemporaneous Revolutions (Oxford 1938); W. F. Church, Constitutional Thought in 16th Cent. France (Cambridge 1941); Bibliography of Cardinal d'Ossat, active in the reconciliation of Henry IV with Rome, P. Laccade (Tarbes 1937).

ENGLAND

SOURCES: In addition to the older series of State Papers: J. M. Rigg, Calender of State Papers Relating to English Affairs, 2 vols. (London 1961–62) (to 1578); J. H. Pollen, Sources for the History of Roman Catholics in England, Ireland and Scotland (London 1921); id., Unpublished Documents Relating to the English Martyrs I (London 1908); E. H. Burton–J. H. Pollen, Lives of the English Martyrs under Elizabeth I 1583–88 (London 1914); L. Hicks, Letters and Memorials of Father Robert Persons I (London 1942).——The Act of Uniformity, 1559: H. Gee–W. J. Hardy, Documents Illustrative of English Church History (London 1921) 442–458; On the development of the Anglican Church: J. E. Neale: EHR (1950) 304ff.; For sources concerning the Establishment of the Anglican Church: Parker Society Publications; For the Inner Consolidation of Anglicanism: The Works of R. Hooker, ed. R. W. Church–F. Paget, 3 vols. (Oxford 1888); An Irish source concerning the Flanders Nunciature: Collectanea Hibernica I, ed. C. Giblen (Dublin-London 1958).

LITERATURE: J. B. Black, The Reign of Elizabeth (Oxford 1959); H. Wilson, King James VI and I (London 1956); Ph. Hughes, The Reformation in England III (London 1954); A. O. Meyer, England und die katholische Kirche unter Königin Elizabeth (Rome 1911) (this is the primary work); J. H. Pollen, The English Catholics in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth (London 1920); A. H. Atteridge, The Elizabethan Persecution (London 1928); H. S. Lucas, "Survival of the Catholic Faith in the XVIth Century" CHR 29 (1943) 25–52; Ph. Caraman, The Other Face. Catholic Life under Elizabeth I (London 1960); M. D. R. Leys, Catholics in England 1559–1829. A Social History (London 1961); P. McGrath, Papists and Puritans Under Elizabeth I (London 1968).

NORTHERN AND EASTERN EUROPE

SOURCES: A. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae II (Rome 1861); III (Rome 1863); id., Schweden und seine Stellung zum Heiligen Stuhl unter Johann III., Sigismund III; und Karl IX., 2 vols. (Augsburg 1838–39); The Reports of the Nuncios Caligari (1578–81) and Bolognetti (1581–85): Monumenta Poloniae Vaticana IV–VII (Cracaw 1915–50); J. Sawicki, Concilia Poloniae, 9 vols. (Cracaw–Warsaw–Breslau 1945–57). Cf. ZSavRGkan 46 (1960) 395–429; M. Olsoufieff, Le lettere di Ivan il Terribile con i Commentari della Moscovia di A. Possevino (Florence 1958); Litterae nuntiorum apostolicorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantes, ed. A. G. Welykyj, I–IV (Rome 1959–60); Res Polonicae Elizabetha I Angliae regnante conscriptae ex archivis Londoniarum, ed. C. H. Talbot (Rome 1961); Res Polonicae Jacobo I Angliae regnante conscriptae ex archivis Londoniarum, ed. C. H. Talbot (Rome 1962).

LITERATURE: B. Stasiewski, Reformation und Gegenreformation in Polen, Neue Forschungsergebnisse (Münster 1960) (lit.); "The Lists of the Bishops Collected by Z. Szostkiewicz" Sacrum Poloniae Millenium I (Rome 1954) 391–608; O. Halecki, "From Florence to Brest" ibid. V (1958) 13–444; St. Polein, Une tentative d'Union au XVI^e^ siècle. La Mission religieuse du P. A. Possevino en Moscovie 1581–82 (Rome 1957); A. Wolter, "A. Possevino, Theologie und Politik im Spannungsfeld zwischen Rom und Moskau" Scholastik 31 (1956) 321–350; J. Lecler, Histoire de la tolérance au siècle de la réforme I (Aubier 1955) 363–398 (Concerning tolerance in Poland); E. Winter, Russland und das Papsttum I (Berlin 1960); H. Holmquist–H. Pleijel, Svenska Kyrkans Historia III:2 (Stockholm 1933); H. Biaudet, Le St. Siège et la Suède durant la seconde moitié du XVI^e siècle (Paris 1907), with 2 vols. of documents (Paris 1906 and Geneva 1913). O. Garstein, Rome and the Counter-Reformation in Scandinavia (Copenhagen, 1963); F. Dvornik, The Slavs in European History and Civilization (New Brunswick, N. J. 1962); G. Schramm, Der polnische Adel und die Reformation 1548–1607 (Weisbaden 1965); I. Revesz, History of the Hungarian Reformed Church (Washington, D. C. 1956).

40. Crisis and Turning Point in Central Europe

SOURCES

For the background history of the Tridentine reform in Germany the following is basic: Acta reformationis catholicae ecclesiam Germaniae concernentia saec. XVI (1520–1570), ed. G. Pfeilschifter, earlier 2 vols. (Regensburg 1959–60) [=ARC]. NBD, section II, 1560–72, ed. the Historical Commission of the Vienna Academy, 7 vols. (Vienna 1897–1953); section III, 1572–85, ed. the Prussian Historical Institute Rome, l: Der Kampf um Köln, ed. J. Hansen (Berlin 1892), 2: Der Reichstag zu Regensburg 1576 . . . , ed. J. Hansen (Berlin 1894), 3–5: Die süddeutsche Nuntiatur des Grafen Portia, ed. K. Schellhas (Berlin 1899, 1903–09); this portion was completed by W. E. Schwarz, Die Nuntiaturkorrespondenz Kaspar Groppers 1573–76 (Paderborn 1896). W. E. Schwarz, Zehn Gutachten über die Lage der katholischen Kirche in Deutschland 1573–76 (Paderborn 1891). The third division closed the undertaking of the Görres-Gesellschaft: Die Nuntiatur am Kaiserhofe 1584–92 I, ed. R. Reichenberger (Paderborn 1905), II:3, ed. J. Schweizer (Paderborn 1912–19). Die Kölner Nuntiatur 1584–90 I, ed. St. Ehses and A. Meister (Paderborn 1895), II, ed. St. Ehses (Paderborn 1899). From the fourth section which includes the nuncios' reports of the 17th century, belongs here: Die Prager Nuntiatur des D. St. Ferreri und die Wiener Nuntiatur des G. Serra 1603–06, ed. A. O. Meyer (Berlin 1913). From the Czechoslovakian Historical Institute Rome the following is used: Epistulae et Acta A. Gaetani 1607–08, ed. M. Linhartova (Prague 1932–37). P. Canisii epp. et acta IV–VIII, ed. O. Braunsberger (Freiburg 1905–23).

SYNODS: F. Dalham, Concilia Salisburgensia (Augsburg 1788) 348–583 (Salzburg Provincial Synods of 1569 and 1573). Diocesan Synods: Hartzheim, C VII: 498–517 (Lüttich 1585), 873–908 (Breslau 1580), 1057–1077 (Regensburg 1588; VIII), 320–363 (Olmütz 1591), 367–402 (Breslau 1592), 517–536 (Cologne 1598), 822–947 (Constance 1609).

VISITATIONAL REPORTS: M. Gmelin, "Die Visitationsprotokolle der Diözese Konstanz 1571–86" ZGObrh 25 (1873) 129–204; J. Jungnitz, Visitationsberichte der Diözese Breslau, 4 vols. (Breslau 1902–08); W. E. Schwarz, Die Akten der Visitation des Bistums Münster aus der Zeit Johanns von Hoya 1571–73 (Münster 1913); A. Franzen, Die Visitationsprotokolle der ersten nachtridentinischen Visitation im Erzstift Köln unter Salentin von Isenburg 1569 (Münster 1960); J. B. Kaiser, Der Archidiakonat Longuyon am Anfang des 17. Jh., 2 vols. (Colmar 1928–29).

GENERAL LITERATURE

E. W. Zeeden, "Zeitalter der europäischen Glaubenkämpfe, Gegenreformation, Katholische Reform" Saeculum 7 (1956) 321–368; Literature of recent research; id., "Das Zeitalter der Glaubenskämpfe" Gebhardt-Grundmann II (1955) 105–202; K. Repgen, "Kaiser und Reich als Idee und Wirklichkeit für das Papsttum im Zeitalter der Reform" Jb. der Görres-Gesellschaft 1958 (Cologne 1959) 5–15; J. Hashagen, "Das Zeitalter der Gegenreformation und der Religionskrieg" L. Just, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte II (Constance 1956) (with good bibliography); J. Greven, Die Kölner Kartause und die Anfänge der Kath. Reform in Deutschland (Münster 1935); Schreiber II (1951); id., "Tridentinische Reformdekrete in deutschen Bistumern" ZSavRGkan 38 (1952) 395–442; J. Schmidlin, Die kirchlichen Zustände in Deutschland vor dem 30 jährigen Kriege, 3 parts (Freiburg 1908–10); A. Steinhuber, Geschichte des Collegium Germanicum-Hungaricum in Rom I (Freiburg 1906); B. Duhr, Geschichte der Jesuiten in den Ländern deutscher Zunge I (Freiburg 1907) (rich in material); B. Schneider, "Die Jesuiten als Gehilfen der päpstlichen Nuntien und Legaten in Deutschland zur Zeit der Gegenreformation" Miscellanea Hist. Pont. XXI (Rome 1959) 269–303; Bibliography on Peter Canisius: *LThK*² II, 917.

CONFESSIONALISM: E. W. Zeeden, "Grundlagen und Wege der Konfessionsbildung in Deutschland im Zeitalter der Glaubenskämpfe" HZ 185 (1958) 249–299; id., Katholische Überlieferungen in den lutherischen Kirchenordnungen des 16. Jh. (Münster 1959); A. Franzen, Die Kelchbewegung am Niederrhein im 16. Jh. (Münster 1955); H. Lutz, "Bayern und der Laienkelch" QFIAB 34 (1954) 203–235; J. P. Dolan, The Influence of Erasmus, Witzel and Cassander in the Church Ordinances and Reform Proposals of the United Duchies of Cleve during the Middle Decades of the 16th Century (Münster 1957); H. Nottarp. Zur Communicatio in sacris cum haereticis (Halle 1933).

CONFESSIONAL CHANGES IN THE UPPER PALATINATE: J. B. Götz, Die erste Einführung des Kalvinismus in der Oberpfalz 1559–76 (Münster 1933); id., Die religiösen Wirren in der Oberpfalz 1576–1620 (Münster 1937).

SWITZERLAND: K. Fry, G. A. Volpe. Seine erste Nuntiatur in der Schweiz 1560–64 I (Fribourg 1931), II (Florence 1936), III (Stans 1946), also: ZSKG 39 (1945) 1–32, 81–110; F. Steffens–A. Reinhardt, Die Nuntiatur von G. F. Bonhomini 1579–81, 3 vols. (Solothurn–Fribourg 1906–29); E. Giddey, "Le nonce Paravicini 1587–91" Revue Suisse d'hist. 5 (1955) 369–375; J. G. Mayer, Das Konzil von Trient und die Gegenreformation in der Schweiz, 2 vols. (Stans 1902); R. Fischer, Die Gründung der Schweizer Kapuzinerprovinz 1581–89 (Fribourg 1955), also: ZSKG 54 (1960) 257–281; R. Tschudi, Das Kloster Einsiedeln unter den Äbten Ludwig II Blarer und Joachim Eichhorn 1526–69 (Einsiedeln 1946); W. Brotschi, Der Kampf J. Chr. Blarers von Wartensee um die religiöse Einheit im Bistum Basel 1575–1608 (Fribourg 1956); A. Chèvre, "La restauration religieuse tridentine dans le diocèse de Bâle" ZSKG 42 (1948) 11–22, 107–123; see also 44 (1950), 17–36; 47 (1953), 25–46, 123–148; id., L'officialité du diocèse de Bâle à Altkirch 1565–1630 (Fribourg 1946); H. Rennefahrt, "Die Verstärkung der Staatsgewalt im Bistum Basel unter Bischof Jacob Christoph 1575–1608" In memoriam W. Näf (Bern 1961) 267–310; J. Müller, "Der Kampf um die tridentinische Reform in Disentis" ZSKG 42 (1948) 23–65; 43 (1949) 175–202, 259–313; H. Metzger, Vorstudien zu einer Geschichte der tridentinischen Seelsorgereform im Eidgenössischen Gebiet des Bistums Konstanz (Basel 1951); H. Andres, D. Jodocus Knab, Probst von Luzern und Bischof von Lausanne 1593–1658 (Stans 1961).

SECTION THREE

Religious Forces and Intellectual Content of the Catholic Renewal

41. The Revival of Scholasticism, Michael Baius and the Dispute over Grace

GENERAL LITERATURE

Grabmann G 158–172; C. Giacon, La seconda scolastica, 3 vols. (Milan 1946–50); H. Hurter, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae III (Innsbruck ³1907), still indispensable [=Hurter].

UNIVERSITIES: Willaert 183–219; C. Duplessis d'Argentré, Collectio iudiciorum II (Paris 1728); P. Feret, La faculté de théologie de Paris et ses docteurs les plus célèbres I–IV (Paris 1900–6); J. Urriza, La preclara facultad de artes y filosofia de la univ. de Alcalá de Henares en el siglo de oro 1509–1621 (Madrid 1942); V. Beltrán de Heredia, "La teología en la univ. de Alcalá" RET 5 (1945) 145–178; About Sigüenza: id., RET 2 (1942) 409–469; Gonzalo de Arriaga, Historia del Colegio de S. Gregorio de Valladolid, ed. M. Hoyos, 2 vols. (Valladolid 1928–40); F. Stegmüller, "Zur Literaturgeschichte der Philosophie und Theologie an den Universitäten Evora und Coimbra im 16. Jh." Spanische Forschungen 3 (1931) 385–438, expanded Portugese edition: Coimbra 1959; J. Grisar, "Die Universität Löwen zur Zeit der Gesandtschaft des P. Franciscus Toltus (1580) nach bisher unbenützten Quellen des Vatikanischen Archivs" Miscellanea De Meyer II 941–968; K. Eschweiler, "Die Philosophie der spanischen Spätscholastik auf den deutschen Universitäten" Spanische Forschungen 1 (1928) 251–325.

VITORIA AND THE SCHOOL OF SALAMANCA: F. Ehrle, Los Manoscritos Vaticanos de los téologos Salmantinos del siglo XVI (Madrid 1930); V. Beltrán de Heredia, Los manoscritos del M. F. de Vitoria (Madrid 1928); Modern editions of Vitoria's work: Relecciones teológicas del M. F. de Vitoria, ed. L. G. Getino (Madrid 1936); Comentarios a la secunda secundae de Sto. Tomás (Salamanca 1952); L. G. Getino, El M. F. de Vitoria (Madrid 1930) (chief work); F. Stegüller, F. de Vitoria y la doctrina de la gracia en la escuela Salmantina (Barcelona 1934); J. I. Tellechea Idigoras, "F. de Vitoria y la reforma católica" Revista española de derecho canónico 12 (1957) 65–110; R. G. Villoslada, "Pedro Crockaert OP, maestro de F. Vitoria" EE 14 (1935) 174–201.

VITORIA AND INTERNATIONAL LAW: J. Brown Scott, The Spanish Origin of International Law (London 1934); J. A. Fernandes-Santamaria, The State, War and Peace. Spanish Political Thought in the Renaissance, 1516–1559 (Cambridge 1977); E. Reibstein, Die Anfänge des neueren Natur- und Völkerrechtes (Berne 1949) on Vasquez; K. Deuringer, Probleme der Caritas in der Schule von Salamanca (Freiburg 1959); A. Truyol Serra, Die Grundsätze des Staats- und Völkerrechtes bei F. de Vitoria (Heidelberg 1947); id., "Die Grundlagen der völkerrechtlichen Ordnung nach den spanischen Völkerrechtsklassikern" Heidelberger Jb. (1958); F. Elias de Tejada, "El concepto del derecho natural en los comentaristas Hispanos de Graciano" Studia Gratiana II (Bologna 1954) 230–261; V. Carro, Domingo Soto (Salamanca 1931); C. Pozo, La teoría del progreso dogmático en los téologos de la escuela de Salamanca (Madrid 1959); J. Btitau Prats, El pensamiento politico de D. de Soto y su concepción del poder (Salamanca 1960); A. Dempf, Christliche Staatsphilosophie in Spanien (Salzburg 1937).

POLEMICAL THEOLOGY AND BELLARMINE: (Survey) P. Polman, L'élément historique dans la Controverse religieuse du XVI^{e} siècle (Gembloux 1932). Bellarmine: last edition of his works in 12 volumes (Paris 1870–76); Opera oratoria posthuma, 9 vols. (Rome 1942–44); Sommervogel I:1151–1254. Sources for the history of his life: X. M. Le Bachelet, Bellarmin avant son cardinalat (Paris 1911), there 435–466 the controversial autobiography; id., Auctarium Bellarminianum (Paris 1913), also suppl. AHSI 4 (1935) 132–139; Scritti politici, ed. C. Giacon (Bologan 1950); J. Brodrick, Robert Bellarmine, Saint and Scholar (London 1961); J. de la Servière, La théologie de Bellarmin (Paris 1928). Methodologically correct: G. Buschbell, Selbstbezeugungen des Kardinals Bellarmin (Krumbach 1924), and S. Merkle, ZKG 45 (1926) 26–73; F. X. Arnold, Die Staatslehre des Kardinals Bellarmin (Munich 1934); Further Bibliography: LThK^{2} II:160f.; Special Bibliography for Toledo, Suárez, Vázguez in the notes.

BAJUS: Opera (Cologne [actually, Amsterdam] 1696), 2nd part contains Documents and is Jansenist inspired; Opposed viewpoint; J.-B. Duchesne, Histoire du Bainanisme

(Douai 1731) (anti-Jansenist); M. Roca, "Documentos inéditos en torno a Miguel Bayo" Anthologica annua 1 (1953) 303–476; F. -X. Jansen, Baius et le Baianisme (Louvain 1927); DThC II:38–111, the best treatment is by Le Bachelet; *LThK*² I:1196–1199; Ch. van Sull, Lessius (Louvain 1960); J. I. Tellechea Idigoras, "Españoles en Lovaina 1551–58. Primeras noticias sobre el Bayanismo" RET 23 (1963) 21–44.

CONTROVERSY CONCERNING GRACE: Critical text of the Concord, ed. J. Rabeneck (Madrid 1953); Older Treatment of the Controversy by the two parties: J. A. Serry OP (under the pseudonym Le Blanc), Historiae Congregationum de auxiliis divinae gratiae (Mainz 1699, Antwerp 1709); L. de Meyere SJ (under the pseudonym Eleutherius), Historiae controversiae de divinae gratiae auxiliis (Venice 1742); G. Schneemann SJ, Controversiarum de divinae gratiae liberique arbitrii concordia initia et progressus (Freiburg 1881); F. Stegmüller, Geschichte des Molinismus I (Münster 1935) (chief work); Pastor, XI:513–576, XII:163–183; On Molina: J. Rabeneck, "De vita et scriptis L. Molinae" AHSI 19 (1950) 75f.; G. Smith, Freedom in Molina (Diss. Toronto 1936); W. Weber, Wirtschaftsethik am Vorabend des Liberalismus. Höhepunkt und Abschluss der scholastischen Wirtschaftsbetrachtung durch L. Molina (Münster 1959); *StL*⁶ V:805–809 (Stegmüller).

42. The Rise of Positive Theology

GENERAL LITERATURE

Still reliable is H. Hurter, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae III (Innsbruck ³1907); J. Turmel, Histoire de la théologie positive du Concile de Trente au Concile de Vaticane (Paris 1906); P. Polman, *L'Elément historique dans la Controverse religieuse du XVI*ᵉ Siècle (Gembloux 1932); R. Snoeks, *L'argument de tradition dans la controverse eucharistique entre catholiques et réformées français au XVII*ᵉ siècle (Gembloux 1951); V. Baroni, La contreréforme devant la Bible (Lausanne 1943).

ON THE VULGATE DECREE AND REVISIONS: H. Höpfl, Compendium introductionis in Sacros utriusque Testamenti libros I (Rome ³1931) 346–367.

PATROLOGY, CHRISTIAN LITERARY HISTORY, CHURCH HISTORY, AND HAGIOGRAPHY: J. H. Fabricius, Bibliotheca ecclesiastica (Hamburg 1718) with Suffridus Petri's and Miraeus' extension of the Catalogue of Trithemius; H. Quentin, J. D. Mansi et les grandes collections conciliaires (Paris 1900); C. Baronius, Annales ecclesiastici, 12 vols. (Rome 1588–1605) (to 1198).

ON BARONIUS: G. Calenzio, La vita e gli scritti del Card. C. Baronio (Rome 1907) (unsatisfactory in spite of using Baronius' own notes); A. Walz, "La storiografia del Baronio e la storiografia de oggi" Angelicum 17 (1940) 88–110; A. Roncalli, Il Card. C. Baronio (Rome 1961) with bibliography by G. De Luca 47; Bibliotheca hagiographica Latina I (Breslau 1898–99), editions of Lippomanis and Surius; P. Peeters, L'oeuvree des Bollandistes (Brussels 1961); A. Fabrega Grau, "El P. Pedro Gil SJ (+1622) y su colección de Vidas de Santos" Analects Sacra Tarracon 31 (1958) 5–25; For the editor of the Acta Sanctorum veteris et maioris Scotiae seu Hiberniae (Louvain 1650) see F. J. Colgan OFM, Essays in Commemoration of the Third Century of his death, ed. T. O'Donell (Dublin 1959) 7–40.

CANONISTS: A good survey of canonists in this period in F. Kurtscheid, 278–301; J. F. V. Schulte, Gesch. der Quellen von der Lit. des Canon. Rechts III (Stuttgart 1880) though incomplete, is still indispensable; For Azpilcuenta, Antonio Agustin et. al. see footnotes in Pastor, IX 203f. the entire subject is in need of more serious research.

43. Spiritual Life, Popular Devotion and Art

LITERATURE

ASCETICISM AND MYSTICISM: M. -J. Dagens, Bibliographie chronologique de la littérature de spiritualité et de ses sources 1501–1610 (Paris 1952).

PORTUGAL: Survey in I. S. Da Silva Dias, Correntes de sentimento religioso em Portugal, 2 vols. (Coimbra 1960)

SPAIN: DSAM IV (1961) 1127–1178; C. M. Abád, "Ascetas y misticos españoles del siglo de oro" MCom 10 (1948) 27–127; E. Allison Peers, Studies of the Spanish Mystics (London 1951); P. S. Rodrigues, Introduccion a la historia de la literature mistica en Espana, 4 vols. (Madrid 1927); J. Chuzeville, Les Mystiques espagnols (Paris 1952); P. Groult, Les mystiques des Pays-Bas et la littérature espagnole du XVI^e siècle (Löwen 1927); J. Sanctis Adventosa, La escuela mística Alemana y sus relaciones con místicos del siglo de oro (Madrid 1946); D. Gutiérrez, "Ascéticos y místicos agostinos de España, Portugal y Hispano-América" S. Augustinus spiritualis vitae Magister II (Rome 1959) 147–238 (lit.); J. Monasterio, Místicos agustinos españoles, 2 vols. (El Escorial 1929); Espirituales españoles, (Numerous texts), P. Sáinz Rodríguez and L. Sala Balust, eds., 8 vols. (Barcelona 1959f.).

CARMELITE MYSTICISM: Teresa de Avila, Obras, ed., Silverius a S. Teresa, 9 vols. (Burgos 1915–24). Popular edition in one volume (Madrid 1948); Comprehensive Biography: Silverio de S. Teresa, Historia del Carmelo descalzo en España, Portugal y América I–IV (Burgos 1935–36); E. A. Peers, A Handbook to the Life and Times of St. Theresa and St. John of the Cross (London 1954); id., Complete Works of St. Theresa of Jesus, 3 vols. (London 1946); id., The Letters of St. Teresa of Jesus (Westminster 1950); M. Auclair, St. Teresa of Avila (London 1953); H. Flasche, "Syntaktische Untersuchungen zu Santa Teresa de Jesús" Spanische Forschungen 15 (1960) 151–174; E. Hamilton, Saint Teresa (New York 1959); A. Vermeulen, Ste. Thérèse en France au XVII^e siècle (Louvain 1958); S. Juan de la Cruz, Obras, ed., J. Vicente de la Eucaristía (Madrid 1957); A. Winklhofer, Die Gnadenlehre in der Mystik des Hl. Joh. vom Kreuz (Freiburg 1936); H. Sanson, St. Jean de la Croix entre Bossuet et Fénelon (Paris 1953); E. Schering, Mystik und Tat. Th. von Jesus, Joh. vom Kreuz und die Selbstbehauptung der Mystik (Munich–Basel 1959); E. A. Peers, St. John of the Cross (London 1946); id., The Complete Works of St. John of the Cross (Westminster 1949).

ITALY: G. Getto, "La letteratura ascetica e mistica in Italia nell'eta del Concilio Tridentino" Contributi alla Storia del Concilio di Trento e della Controriforma (Florence 1948) 51–77; cf. P. de Leturia, CivCatt II (1949) 82–98; A. Saba, Federico Borromeo e i mistici del suo tempo (Florence 1933); M. Andrews, Men and women of the Italian Reformation (New York 1914); F. C. Church, The Italian Reformers (New York 1932); P. Misciatelli, The Mystics of Italy (New York 1949); M. Jouhandeau, St. Philip Neri (New York 1960); L. Ponelle and L. Bordet, St. Philip Neri and the Roman Society of His Times (London 1932).

FRANCE: H. Brémond, Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France depuis la fin des guerres de religion, 11 vols. (Paris 1916–33); the primary work for our period is in I–III; English trans., A Literary History of Religious Thought in France, 3 vols. (New York 1929–1930); L. Cognet, De la dévotion moderne à la Spiritualité française (Paris 1958); id., La Spiritualité française au XVII^e siècle (Paris 1949). Franz von Sales, Oeuvres, 26 vols. (Annecy 1892–1932); Biography by F. Trochu, 2 vols. (Lyon–Paris 1946), H. Waach (Eichstatt 1955); A. Liuima, Aux sources du Traité de l'Amour de Dieu de F. d. S., 2 vols. (Rome 1959–60); M. de la Bedoyère, F. de Sales (London 1960). Pierre Bérulle, Correspondance, ed. J. Dagens, 3 vols. (Paris 1937–39); L. Molien, Le card. de Bérulle, 2 vols. (Paris 1947); J. Dagens, Bérulle et les origines de la restauration catholique 1575–1611 (Bruges 1952); J. Orcibal, "Les oeuvres de pitié du Card. Bérulle" RHE 57 (1962) 813–862.

PREACHING, SACRAMENTS, AND POPULAR PIETY: Bonaventura von Mehr, "De historica praedicationis, praesertim in ordine Min. Cap. scientifica pervestigatione" CollFr 11 (1941) 373–422; 12 (1942) 5–40; A. Valerius, De rhetorica ecclesiastica (Venice 1574); F. Borromaeus, De sacris nostrorum temporum praedicatoribus (Milan 1632); J. M. Connots, "Homiletic Theory in the Late 16th Century" AER 138 (1958) 316–332; B. Fischer, "Predigtgrundsätze des hl. Karl Borromäus" TThZ 61 (1952) 213–221; Bonaventura von Mehr, Das Predigtwesen in der kölnischen und rheinischen Kapuzinerprovinz im 17. und 18. Jh. (Rome 1945); A. L. Veit–L. Lenhart, Kirche und Volksfrömmigkeit im Zeitalter des Barock (Freiburg 1958); G. Schreiber, "Der Barock und das Tridentinum" Schreiber, I:381–425; St. Beissel, Geschichte der Verehrung Mariens im 16. und 17. Jh. (Freiburg 1910); H. Aurenhammer, Die Mariengnadenbilder Wiens und Niederösterreichs in der Barockzeit (Vienna 1956); C. Flachaire, La dévotion à la Vierga dans la littérature catholique au commencement du XVII^{e} (Paris 1950); M. Petrocchi, "La devozione alla Vergine negli scritti di pietà del Cinquecento italiano" Problemi di vita religiosa in Italia (Padua 1960) 281–287.

ART: Ch. de Job, L'influence du Concile de Trente sur la littérature et les Beaux-Arts chez les peuples catholiques (Paris 1884); G. Schnürer, Katholische Kirche und Kultur in der Barockzeit (Paderborn 1937); F. Würtenberger, Der Manierismus (Vienna 1962); C. J. Friedrich, The Age of the Baroque (New York 1965); Trattati d'arte del Cinquecento fra manierismo e controriforma, ed. P. Barocchi, 2 vols. (Bari 1960–61); B. Croce, Der Begriff des Barock. Die Gegenreformation (Zurich 1925); O. Benesch, The Art of the Renaissance in Northern Europe (Cambridge, Mass. 1947); E. Kirschbaum, "L'influsso del Concilio di Trento nell'arte" Gr 26 (1945) 100–116; E. Mâle, L'art religieuse après le Concile de Trente (Paris 1951); B. Knipping, De iconographie van de Contra-Reformatie in de Nederlanden, 2 vols. (Hilversum 1939–40); E. M. Vetter, "Der Verlorene Sohn und die Sünder im Jahrhundert des Konzils von Trient" Ges. Aufsätze zur Kulturgesch. Spaniens 15 (1960) 175–218; P. Prodi, "Ricerche sulla teoria delle arti figurativa nelle riforma cattolica" Archivio per la storia della pietà 4 (1962) 121–212; A. Hauser, The Social History of Art, 2 vols. (New York 1950); F. B. Artz, From the Renaissance to Romanticism (Chicago 1962).

MUSIC: K. Weinmann, Das Konzil von Trient und die Kirchenmusik (Regensburg 1919); K. G. Fellerer, Palestrina (Regensburg 1930); id., "Das Kölner Provinzialkonzil von 1536 und die Kirchenmusik" Festschrift G. Kallen (Bonn 1957) 327–336; O. Ursprung, "Palestrina und die tridentinische Reform de Kirchenmusik" Monatschefte für kath. Kirchenmusik 10 (1928) 210–219; K. Jeppesen, "Marzellusprobleme" Acta musicologica 16–17 (1946) 11–38; H. W. Frey, Die Diarien der Sixtinischen Kapelle in Rom 1560–61 (Düsseldorf 1959) 11–38; W. Boetticher, Orlando di Lasso und seine Zeit (Kassel 1958); R. Molitor, Die nachtridentinische Choralreform zu Rom, 2 vols. (Leipzig 1901–2); M. F. Bukofzer, Music in the Baroque Era (London 1957).

LITERATURE: P. Hankamer, Deutsche Gegenreformation und deutsches Barock (Stuttgart 1935); H. Kindermann, Theatergeschichte Europas III (Salzburg 1959) 440–484, 679f.; G. Müller, Das Jesuitendrama in den Ländern deutscher Zunge, 2 vols. (Augsburg 1930); K. Adel, Das Jesuitendrama in Österreich (Vienna 1957); C. M. Haas, Das Theater der Jesuiten in Ingolstadt (Emsdetten 1958).

44. The New and the Old Orders

SOURCES AND LITERATURE TO 1933

Heimbucher; additional, M. Escobar, Ordini e Congregazioni religiose, 2 vols. (Turin 1951–53); L. Willaert, La restauration catholique, (Paris 1960) 95–167.

JESUITS: Ratio studiorum SJ, ed. G. M. Pachtler (Berlin 1887, contains the constitutions of 1586, 1599, and 1832). Bibliography: Sommervogel I:487ff.; H. Becher: Die Jesuiten (Munich 1961) 108–146; J. Sicard, "La reforma de Clemente VIII y la Comp. de Jesús" Revista española del derecho can. 3 (1954) 681–724; B. Schneider, Paul Hoffaeus (Rome 1956); id., "Der Konflikt zwischen Acquaviva und P. Hoffaeus" AHSI 26 (1957) 3–56; J. Iparraguirre, Boletín de spiritualité ignatienne 1556–1615 (Rome 1961).

CAPUCHINS: Bernardinus a Colpetrazzo, Historia ord. fr. min. Capuccinorum 1525–93, 3 vols. (Rome 1939–41) (with attention to contemporary accounts); Melchior a Pobladura, Hist. gen. I und II (Rome 1947–48); Godefroy de Paris, Les frères mineurs Capucins en France, 2 vols. (Paris 1937–48); P. Hildebrand, De Kapucijnen in de Nederlanden en het Prinsbisdom Luik, 9 vols. (Antwerp 1945–55); A. Jacobs, Die rheinischen Kapuziner 1611–1725 (Münster 1933); R. Linden, Die Regelobservanz in der rheinischen Kapuzinerprovinz 1611–68 (Münster 1936); C. von Oberlinsch, "Die Kapuziner in Österreich" CollFr 20 (1950) 219–334; Additional literature: LThK^{2} V:1332–1339; F. X. Martin, Friar Nugent. A Study of F. L. Nugent 1567–1635, Agent of the Counter-Reformation (Rome 1962).

OTHER MENDICANT ORDERS: "Anpassung der Konstitutionen an das Tridentinum bei den Dominikanern" MOP X:51ff. (general chapter at Bologna 1564); For the Augustinian Hermits: Analecta Aug. IX:423–440 (general chapter from 1564); For the Carmelites: Acta cap. gen., ed. G. Wessels I:462ff.; The Constitutions of the Servites from 1569; Mon. ord. Serv. VI:109–158; Additional: Heimbucher and in the histories of the order by Mortier, Walz and Holzapfel.

DISCALCED CARMELITES: B. M. a. S. Cruce [Zimmermann], Regesta J. B. Rubei (Rome 1936); Silverio a. S. Teresa, Historia del Carmel descalzo en España, Portugal y América IV–IX (Burgos 1935–40) (Chief work, extends to 1650); Higinio a. S. Teresa, Apuntos para la historia de la Ven. orden tercera del Carmel en España y Portugal (Victoria 1954).

AUGUSTINIAN: Bullarium ord. recollectorum S. Augustini, ed. J. Fernández de S. Corde Jesu, 2 vols. (Rome 1954–61) (extends from 1570 to 1683).

MONASTIC ORDERS: E. Martène, Histoire de la Congrégation de St. Maure, 9 vols. (Ligugé–Paris 1928–43), postum; U. Berlière, Nouveau Supplément á l'hist. litt. de la Congr. de St. Maur, 3 vols. (Maredsous 1931); Y. Chauny, Matricula monachorum professorum Congr. S. Mauri (Paris 1959). List of the numerous letters of the Maurians in Revue Mabillon 23–29 (1933–39), 33 (1943); Die Generalkapitelsrezesse der Bursfelder Kongregation, ed. P. Volk 11 (Siegburg 1957) (covers the years 1531–1653); Canivez, VII (1939); R. Molitor, Aus der Rechtsgeschichte benediktinischer Verbände I (Münster 1928) 319–384 (Post Tridentine Congregations), II (Münster 1932) 37–327 (German attempts at unification), 328–347 (France); Ph. Schmitz-R. Tschudy, Geschichte des Benediktinerordens IV (Einsiedeln 1960); St. Hilpisch, Geschichte des benediktinischen Mönchtums (Freiburg 1929) 323–350; R. Hesbert, "La Congrégation de St. Maure" Revue Mabillon 51 (1961); Additional literature: LThK^{2} VII 192; E. Martin, Los Bernardinos españoles (Palencia 1951).

SECTION FOUR

The Springtime of the Missions in the Early Modern Period

45. The Missions under Spanish Patronage

SOURCES

Colección de documentos inéditos relativos al descubrimiento, conquista y colonización de las posesiones españolas en América y Oceania, 42 vols. (Madrid 1864–84), Segunda Serie, 13 vols. (Madrid 1885ff.); (P. Hernáez), Colección de bulas, breves y otros documentos relativos ala Iglesia de América y Filipinas, 2 vols. (Brussels 1879); Cuerpo de documentos del siglo XVI sobre los derechos de España en las Indias y las Filipinas, ed. L. Hanke–Millares Carlo (Mexico City 1943); B. de Las Casas, Historia general de las Indias, ed. Millares Carlo, 3 vols. (Mexico City 1951); B. de Las Casas, Apologética Historia de las Indias, ed. Serrano y Sanz (Madrid 1909); The Spanish Tradition in America, ed. C. Gibson, (Columbia, S.C. 1968); Also the publications of the various orders in their periodicals and collections, e.g. the Franciscans in the Archivo Ibero-Americano and the Americas in the Documentary Series of the Academy of American Franciscan History (Washington, D.C. from 1951), The Archivium Fratrum Praedicatorum (Rome), the Archivium Historicum S. I. and the Monumenta Historica S. I. (Rome).

LITERATURE

Streit II (Aachen 1924); C. Bayle, España en Indias. Nuevos ataques y nuevas defensas (Vitoria 1934, Madrid 1944); G. García, Caracter de la conquista española según los testes de los historiadores primitivos (Mexico City 1901); L. Hanke, The Spanish Struggle for Justice in the Conquest of America (Philadelphia 1949); id., Colonisation et conscience chrétienne au XVI^e s. (Paris 1957); J. Höffner, Christentum und Menschenwürde. Das Anliegen der spanischen Kolonialethik im Goldenen Zeitalter (Trier 1947); P. de Leturia, "Der Heilige Stuhl und das spanische Patronat in Amerika" HJ 46 (1926) 1–71; J. Specker, Die Missionsmethode in Spanisch Amerika im 16. Jh. (Beckenried 1953); R. Greenleaf (ed.) The Roman Catholic Church in Colonial Latin America (New York 1971); A. Ybot León, La Iglesia y los eclesiásticos españoles en la empresa de Indias (Barcelona 1954); P. Borges, Métodos misionales en la cristianización de América s. XVI (Madrid 1960); A. de Egaña, La teoría del Regio Vicariato Español en Indias (Rome 1958); M. Mónica, La gran controversia del siglo XVI acerca del Dominio Español en América (Madrid 1952); P. de Leturia, Relaciones entre la Santa Sede e Hispanoamérica 1493–1835, 3 vols. (Rome–Caracas 1959).

BARTHLOMÉ DE LAS CASAS: B. de Las Casas 1474–1566. Bibliografía crítica y cuerpo de materiales, para el studio de su vida . . . , ed. L. Hanke–M. Giménez Fernández (Santiago de Chile 1954); L. Hanke, B. de Las Casas. An Interpretation of his Life and Writings (The Hague 1951); id., Bartolome de las Casas: Bookman, Scholar, Propagandist (Philadelphia 1952); C. H. Haring, The Spanish Empire in America (New York 1963) (reprint). B. Biermann, "Lascasiana" AFP 27 (1957) 337–358; A. Fabié, Vida y escritos de D. Fr. B. de Las Casas, 2 vols. (Madrid 1879). Also the Monographs by A. Freitag (Steyl 1915), M.

Brion (Paris 1927), C. Bayle (Sevilla 1945), M. González Calzada (Mexico City 1948), M. Giménez Fernandez (Sevilla 1953), M. Martínez (Madrid 1955); G. Sanderlin, (ed.) Bartolomé de Las Casas: A Selection of His Writings (New York 1971); A. Losada, Juan Gines de Sepulveda, Democrates segundo o De las justas causas de la guerra contra los indios (Madrid 1951).

MEXICO

SOURCES: J. García Icazbalceta, Colección de documentos para la historia de Méjico (Mexico City 1856–66); Nueva Collección (Mexico City 1886–92), there: Jerónimo Mendieta, Historia Eclesiástica Indiana (1956), Toribio de Benaventa o Motolinía, Historia de los Indios de la Nueva España (1541, Washington, D.C. 1951); F. Zubillaga, Monumenta Mexicana, 2 vols. (Rome 1956–59).

LITERATURE: J. García Icazbalceta, Bibliografía Mexicana del s. XVI (Mexico City 1886); M. Cuevas, Historia de la Iglesia en México, 5 vols. (El Paso 1921–28); R. Ricard, La "conquête spirituelle" de Mexique (Paris 1933) Eng. trans. The Spiritual Conquest of Mexico (Berkeley 1966); C. Ceccherelli, El bautismo y los Franciscanos en México (Madrid 1955); F. J. Alegre, Historia de la Compañia de Jesús en Nueva España, 4 vols. (Rome 1956–60); F. Chevalier, Land and Society in Colonial Mexico (Berkeley 1963); C. Gibson, The Aztecs under Spanish Rule: A History of the Indians of the Valley of Mexico 1519–1810 (Stanford, Calif. 1964); F. Cervantes de Salazar, Life in the Imperial Royal City of Mexico in New Spain and the Royal and Pontifical University (Austin, Tex. 1953); F. Morales, Ethnic and Social Background of the Franciscans Friars in Seventeenth-Century Mexico (Washington, D.C. 1973); J. Jacobsen, Educational Foundations of the Jesuits in Sixteenth Century New Spain (Berkeley 1938).

PERU

SOURCES: E. Lissón, La Iglesia de España en el Perú (Seville 1943–45); R. Vargas Ugarte, Concilios Limenses 1551–1772, 3 vols. (Lima 1951–54); A. de Egaña, Monumenta Peruana, 2 vols. (Rome 1954–58).

LITERATURE: F. de Armas Medina, Cristianización del Perú; 1532–1600 (Seville 1953); R. Levillier, Organización de la Iglesia y Órdenes religiosas en el Virreinato del Perú en el siglo XVI, 2 vols. (Madrid 1919); A. Robledo, La orden Franciscana en la América meridional (Rome 1948); A. Tibesar, Franciscan Beginnings in Colonial Peru (Washington, D.C. 1953); R. Vargas Ugarte, Los Jesuítas del Perú (Lima 1941).

THE JESUIT REDUCTIONS IN PARAGUAY

SOURCES: A. Ruiz de Montoya, Conquista espiritual . . . en Paraguay (Madrid 1639); id., Memorial (Madrid 1643); N. del Techo, Historia Provinciae Paraquariae (Liege 1673).

LITERATURE: P. Pastells–F. Mateos Historia de la Compañia de Jesús en la Provincia del Paraguay, 8 vols. (Madrid 1912–49); F.-X. Charlevoix, Histoire du Paraguay, 6 vols. (Paris 1747); P. Hernández, El Organización social de las doctrinas Guaranies, 2 vols. (Barcelona 1913); M. Fassbinder, Der "Jesuitenstaat" in Paraguay (Leipzig 1926); C. Lugon, La république communiste chrétienne des Guaranis, 1610–1768 (Paris 1949) (with literature); E. Gothein, Der christlich-soziale Staat der Jesuiten in Paraguay (Berlin 1883); J. Pfotenhauer, Die Missionen der Jesuiten in Paraguay, 3 vols. (Gütersloh 1891–93). R.

Graham, A Vanished Arcadia: Some Account of the Jesuits in Paraguay (London 1924); M. Morner, The Political and Economic Activities of the Jesuits in the Rio de la Plata Region: The Hapsburg Era (Stockholm 1953); G. O'Neill, Golden Years on the Paraguay: History of the Jesuit Missions (London 1934).

MISSIONS IN THE PHILIPPINES

SOURCES: The Philippine Islands (1493–1898), ed. Blair-Robertson, 53 vols. (Cleveland 1903–08); P. Torres y Lanzas, Catálogo de los documentos relatios a las Islas Filipinas I–V (Barcelona 1925–29).—For the Mission History of the Orders see Juan de Medina OESA (1630), Diego Aduarte OP (1698), F. Colin SJ (1663), Juan Franc. de S. Antonio OFM (1738–44).

LITERATURE: Streit IV–V (1928–29): W. E. Retana, Catálogo abreviado de La Biblioteca Filipina (Madrid 1898); Marín y Morales, Ensayo de una síntesis de los trabajos realizados por las corporacionas religiosas de Filipinas, 2 vols. (Manilla 1901); F. J. Montalbán, El patronato español y la conquista de Filipinas (Burgos 1930); H. Bernard-Maître, Les Iles Philippines du Grand Archipel de la Chine (Tientsin 1936); L. de la Costa, The Jesuits in Philippines, 1581–1768 (Manila 1961).

46. The Missions under Portuguese Patronage

SOURCES

Bullarium Patronatus Portugalliae Regum in Ecclesiis Africae, Asiae et Oceaniae . . . , ed. L. M. Jordão et al., I–III (Lisbon 1868–1879) (-BullPatr.); R. Ricard, Études et document pour l'histoire de l'Espagne et du Portugal (Löwen o. J. [1930]).

LITERATURE

A. Jann, Die katholischen Missionenen in Indien, China und Japan (Paderborn 1915); J. Godinho, The Padroado Portugal in the Orient, 1454–1860 (Bombay 1924); B. J. Wenzel, Portugal und der Heilige Stuhl (Lisbon 1957); M. de Oliveira, História ecclesiástica de Portugal (Lisbon 1960).

1. AFRICA

SOURCES: Paiva Manso, História do Congo [-L. M. Jordâo] (Lisbon 1877); A. Brasio, Monumenta Missionária Africana, Africa Ocidental (1471–1531), 7 vols. (Lisbon 1952–56).

LITERATURE: E. Weber, Die portugiesische Reichsmission im Königreich Kongo von ihren Anfängen 1491 bis zum Eintritt der Jesuiten in die Kongomission 1548 (Aachen–Immensee 1924); J. Cuvelier–J. Boon, Het Oud-Koninkrijk Kongo (Brügge 1941; French trans. Brussels 1946); J. Cuvelier–L. Jadin, L'ancien Congo d'après les archives romaines, 1518–1640 (Brussels 1954); L. Kilger, Die erste Mission unter den Bantustämmen Ostafrikas (Münster 1917); id., "Die ersten zwei Jahrhunderte ostafrikanischer Mission" ZMR 7 (1917) 97–108; P. Schebesta, "Zum ersten Missionsanfang am Sambesi" ZMR 14 (1914) 88–99; C. P. Groves, The Planting of Christianity in Africa, 4 vols. (London 1948–58).

2. ASIA

A) INDIA

SOURCES: Documentacão para a História das Missões de padroado Português do Oriente. India, ed. A. da Silva Rego, 12 vols. (Lisbon 1947–58); B. de Tobar, Compendio Bulario Indico I (Sevilla 1954); D. Gonçalez, História do Malavar, ed. J. Wicki (Münster 1955); S. Gonçalvez, Primeira parte da História dos Religiosos da Companhia de Jesus . . . nos reynos e provincias das India Oriental, ed. J. Wicki (Coimbra 1957–60); G. Schurhammer, Die zeitgenössischen Quellen zur Geschichte Portugiesisch-Asiens und seiner Nachbarländer . . . zur Zeit des hl. Franz Xaver, 1538–1552 (Leipzig 1932, Rome ^{2}1962); G. Schurhammer–E. A. Voretzsch, Ceylon zur Zeit des Königs Bhuvaneka und Franz Xavers, 1539–1552. Quellen zur Geschichte der Potugiesen sowie der Franziskaner- und Jesuitenmission auf Ceylon, 2 vols. (Leipzig, 1928); Epistolae S. Francisci Xaverii aliaque eius scripta, ed. G. Schurhammer–J. Wicki, 2 vols. (Rome 1944–45); Die Briefe des Francisco de Xavier, 1542–1552, ed. E. Gräfin Vitzthum (Munich ^{3}1950); A. Valignano, Historia del principio y progreso de la Compañís de Jesús en las Indias Orientales, 1542–1564, ed. J. Wicki (Rome 1944); B. Biermann, "Documenta quaedam initia missionum Ordinis Praedicatorum in India Orientali illustrantia" AFP (1940) 132–157.

LITERATURE: G. Correira, História da Colonizacão Portuguesa na India, 5 vols. (Lisbon 1948–54); F. Rodriquez, História da Companhia de Jesus na Assistencia de Portugal, 4 vols. (Porto 1931–50); M. Müllbauer, Geschichte der katholischen Missionen in Ostindien von der Zeit Vasco da Gamas bis zur Mitte des 18. Jh. (Freiburg 1852); A. Jann, Die katholischen Missionen in Indien, China und Japan. Ihre Organisation und das portugiesische Patronat vom 15. bis 18. Jh. (Paderborn 1915); G. Schurhammer, Franz Xaver, sein Leben und seine Zeit I (1506–1541) (Freiburg 1955); id., The Malabar Church and Rome During the Early Portuguese Period and Before (Trichinopoly 1934); E. Tisserant-E. R. Hambye, Eastern Christianity in India. A History of the Syro-Malabar Church from the Earliest to the Present Day (London 1957); E. Maclagen, The Jesuits and the Great Mogul (London 1932).

B) MALAY ARCHIPELAGO

SOURCES: Documentacão para a História das Missões do padroado Português do Oriente. Insulindia, ed. A. B. de Sá, 5 vols. (Lisbon 1954–58).

LITERATURE: B. Visser, Onder portugeesch-spaansche vlag. De Katholieke Missie van Indonesie 1511–1601 (Amsterdam 1925); A. Mulders, De Missie in Tropisch Nederland ('s-Hertogenbosch 1940); An Introduction to Indonesian Historiography, ed. Soedja Tmoko (Ithaca, N.Y. 1965); Historians of South East Asia, ed. D. G. E. Hall (London 1962) esp. chap. 13–15.

C) JAPAN

SOURCES: J. Laures, Kirishitan Bunko. A Manual of Books and Documents on the Early Missions in Japan (Tokyo 1957); L. Frois, História do Japão 1549–1578 (Leipzig 1926); Segunda parte da História de Japan 1578–1582 (Tokyo 1938); Terza parte da Historia de Japan, ed. A. Pinto u. a. (Tokyo 1942); La première ambassade du Japon en Occident (1582–1592), ed. A. Pinto et al. (Tokyo 1942).

LITERATURE: Streit IV–V; H. Haas, Geschichte des Christentums in Japan (Tokyo 1902– 04); J. Laures, Geschichte der katholischen Kirche in Japan (Kaldenkirchen 1956); C. R. Boxer, The Christian Century in Japan 1549–1650 (Berkeley 1951); O. Cary, A History of Christianity in Japan, 2 vols. (Chicago 1909); J. Jennes, History of the Catholic Church in Japan, 1529–1873 (Tokyo 1959).

D) China

Sources: Avvisi della Cina . . . (Milan 1586–1588); Lettere annue 1601–1611. Fonti Ricciane, ed. P. D'Elia, 3 vols. (Rome 1942–49); Cartas de China. Documentos inéditos sobre Misiones Franciscanas de los siglos XVII y XVIII, ed. O. Maas, 2 vols. (Sevilla 1917); D. Advarte, Historia de la Provincia del S. Rosario de Filipinas, Japón y China (Saragossa 1693).

Bibliography: H. Cordier, Bibliotheca Sinica, 4 vols. (Paris 1904–08), suppl. I (Paris 1922); Streit IV, V and VII; J. Beckmann, "Neuerscheinungen zur chines. Missionsgeschichte, 1945–1955" Monumenta Serica 15 (Tokyo 1956) 378–462.

Literature: K. S. Latourette, A History of Christian Missions in China (London 1929); H. Bernard-Maître: DHGE XII 693–741; P. M. D'Elia, "Sunto storico dell'attività della Chiesa Cattolica in Cina dalle origini ai nostri giorni (635–1294–1948)" StMis 6 (Rome 1951) 3–68; C. Cary-Elwes, China and the Cross (New York 1956).

E) Indo-China

Sources: Ch. Borri, Relatione della nuova missione de' Padri di Comp. di Gesù nel Regno di Cochinchina (Rome 1631); A. de Rhodes, Relazione de' felici successi della santa fede predicata da' padri della Comp. di Gesù nel regno di Tunchino (Rome 1650).

Literature: Streit IV–V; P. Pachtler, Das Christentum in Tonking und Cochinchina (Paderborn 1861); F. Schwager, "Aus der Vorgeschichte der hinterindischen Mission" ZMR 3 (1913) 146–156; B. Biermann, "Die Missionen der portugiesischen Dominikaner in Hinterindien" ZMR 21 (1931) 305–327; id., "Die Missionsversuche der Dominikaner in Kambodscha" ZMR 23 (1933) 108–132.

3. Portuguese-America: Brazil

Sources and Literature: Streit II:331–361, 739–753; S. Leite, Monumenta Brasiliae, 4 vols. (Rome 1956–60); id., História da Companhia de Jesus no Brasil I–II (Lisbon–Rio de Janeiro 1938); A. Lourenco Farinha, A expansão de fé na Africa e no Brasil I (Lisbon 1942) 419–542; R. Ricard, "Les Jésuites au Brésil pendant la seconde moitié du XVI^{e} siècle, 1549–1597" RHM 1 (1937) 321–366, 435–470; D. Romag, Compêndio de História da Igreja (Petrópolis 1952).

4. The Entrance of France into the Mission Field

Sources: Ch. le'Clercq, Premier établissement de la foi dans la Nouvelle France, 2 vols. (Paris 1691); S. le Tac, Histoire chronologique de la Nouvelle France, ou Canada, ed. Réveillaud (Paris 1888); R. G. Thwaites (editor), The Jesuit Relations and Allied Documents. Travels and Explorations of the Jesuit Missionaries in New France, 1610 to 1791, 73 vols. (Cleveland 1897–1910; selections [New York 1925]); F.-X. de Charlevoix, Histoire de la Nouvelle France, 3 vols. (Paris 1794); Documents inédits pour servir à l'histoire du christianisme en Orient, ed. Rabbath, 2 vols. (Beyrouth 1907–10).

LITERATURE: C. de Rochemonteix, Les Jésuites et la Nouvelle France au XVII^{e} siècle, 3 vols. (Paris 1895–96); G. Goyau, Une épopée mystique. Les origines religieuses du Canada (Paris 1934); L. Pouliot, Études sur les Relations des Jésuites de la Nouvelle France (Brugge 1940); C. de Bonnault, Histoire du Canada francais, 1534–1763 (Paris 1950); L. Groulx, Histoire du Canada francais depuis sa découverte (Montréal 1950); G. de Vaumas, L'éveil missionnaire de la France au XVII^{e} siècle (Paris 1959); Delacroix II:70–88, 281–320; H. de Barenton, La France catholique en Orient (Paris 1902); Rocco da Cesinale, Storia delle Missioni dei Cappuccini, 3 vols. (Rome 1873); Clemente da Terzorio, Missioni dei Minori Cappuccini IV–V (Rome 1918–19); F. X. Talbot, Saint among the Hurons (New York 1949); J. B. Tyrell (ed.), Documents Relating to the Early History of Hudson Bay (Toronto 1931).

47. The Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith

SOURCES

Bullarium Pontificum S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide, 5 vols. (Rome 1839–41); R. de Martinis, Juris Pontificii de Propaganda Fide Pars prima . . . , 7 vols. (Rome 1888–97), Pars secunda (Rome 1909); Collectanea S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide (Rome 1893 [arranged by subject], ^{2}1907 [2 vols. arranged chronologically]) [=Coll].

LITERATURE

O. Mejer, Die Propaganda, ihre Provinzen und ihr Recht, 2 vols. (Leipzig–Göttingen 1852–3); ZMR 12 (1922) Heft 1 for the 300th anniversary of the Propaganda with contributions from: J. Schmidlin, "Die Gründung der Propaganda Kongregation (1622)" 1–14, 115; L. Kilger, "Die ersten fünzig Jahre Propaganda—eine Wendezeit der Missionsgeschichte" 15–30; K. Pieper, "Ein Blick in die missionsmethodischen Erlasse der Propaganda" 31–51. Very good material in H. Chappoulie, Aux origines d'une Eglise. Rome et les missions d'Indochine au XVII^{e} siècle I (Paris 1943). Cf. also B. Arens, Handbuch der katholischen Missionen (Freiburg 1925) 7–17.

SECTION FIVE

European Counter Reformation and Confessional Absolutism (1605–55)

48. Paul V, Gregory XV and the Beginnings of the Central European Counter Reformation

SOURCES

BullRom XI–XII; A. O. Meyer, Die Prager Nuntiatur des G. St. Ferreri; Die Wiener Nuntiatur des G. Serra 1603–06 (Berlin 1913); L. Linhartova, Epp. et Acta A. Gaetani 1607–8, 3 vols. (Prague 1932–37–40); A. Cauchie-R. Maere, Recueil des instructions générales aux nonces de Flandre 1596–1635 (Brussels 1904); A. Louant, Correspondance d'Ottavio Mirto Frangipani III (Brussels 1942); L. van Meerbeeck, Correspondance des nonces Gésualdo, Morra, Sanseverino avec la Secrétairerie d'Etat Pontificale 1615–21 (Brussels 1937); B. de Meester, Correspondance du nonce G. F. Guido di Bagno 1621–27 (Brussels 1937); J. Kollmann, Acta S. Congregationis de Propaganda Fide res gestas Bohemicas illustrantia I (Prague 1923); Acta S. C. de Propaganda fide Germaniam spectantia. Die Protokolle der Propagandakongregation zu deutschen Angelegenheiten 1622–49, ed. H. Tüchle (Paderborn 1962); I. de Olarra Garmendia–M. L. de Larramendi, "Correspondencia entre la nunciatura de España y la Santa Sede durante el reinado de Felipe III" Anthologica annua 9 (1961) 495–816 continued to 13 (1965) 395–697.

LITERATURE

Pastor, XII (Paul V.), XIII:1, 27–224 (Gregory XV.); Seppelt, V:243–275.

THE HISTORY OF THE STATE SECRETARIATS: A. Kraus, "Secretarius und Sekretariat" RQ 55 (1960) 43–84; id., "Das Päpstliche Staatssekretariat i. J. 1623" RQ 52 (1957) 93–122; J. Semmler, "Beiträge zum Aufbau des Päpstlicher Staatssekretariates unter Paul V." RQ 54 (1959) 40–80; L. Hammermayer, "Grundlinien der Entwicklung des Päpstlichen Staatssekretariates von Paul V. bis Innocenz X." RQ 55 (1960) 157–202; D. Albrecht, Die deutsche Politik Papst Gregors XV. Die Einwirkung der päpstlichen Diplomatie auf die Häuser Habsburg und Wittelsbach 1621–23 (Munich 1956); id., Die auswärtige Politik Maximilans I. von Bayern 1618–35 (Göttingen 1962).

CONFLICT WITH VENICE AND SARPI: F. Gaeta, Origine e sviluppo delta rappresentanza stabile Pontificia in Venezia (Rome 1958); A. Stella, "La proprietà ecclesiastica nella Repubblica di Venezia dal sec. XV al XVII" Nuova Riv. storica 42 (1958) 4–30; P. Pirri, L'interdetto di Venezia del 1606 e i Gesuiti (Rome 1959) (many documents); J. M. Pou y Marti, "La intervención espãnola en el conflicto entre Paulo V y Venecia 1605–07" Misc. P. Paschini II (Rome 1949) 359–381; M. R. Pazos, "Del conflicto entre Paulo V y Venecia. El embajador de la Serenisima en Espãna y el entredicto" AIA 4 (1944) 32–61; A. M. dal Pino, "Fra Fulgenzio da Passirano negli anni di studio e di insegnamento" Studi storici dell'Ord. dei Servi 8 (1957–58) 134–151; Opere di P. Sarpi, 8 vols. (Helmstat, in reality Verona 1761–68); Istoria dell'Interdetto e altri scritti editi e inediti, ed. M. D. Busnelli and G. Gambarin, 3 vols. (Bari 1940); F. L. Polidori, Lettere di Fra P. Sarpi, 2 vols. (Florence 1863) (it is surpassed by more recently published collections of letters, especially Busnelli); In opposition to P. Savio, "Per l'epistolario di P. Sarpi" Aevum 10 (1936) 1–104; 11 (1937) 3–74, 275–322; 13 (1939) 558–623; 14 (1940) 3–84; 16 (1942) 3–43, 105–138; R. Taucci, Intorno alle lettere di P. Sarpi ad Antonio Foscarini (Florence 1939); B. Ulianich, Paolo Sarpi, Lettere ai Gallicani (Wiesbaden 1961) (lit.); id., "Considerazioni e documenti per una Ecclesiologia di P. Sarpi" Lortz F II (1958) 363–444; V. Buffon, Chiesa di Cristo e Chiesa Romana nelle opere e nelle Lettere di Fra Paolo Sarpi (Löwen 1941); C. M. Francescon, Chiesa e Stato nei consulti di Fra P. Sarpi (Vicenza 1942); G. Getto, Paolo Sarpi (Pisa 1941).

THE BEGINNINGS OF THE THIRTY YEARS WAR AND FERDINAND II: Briefe und Akten zur Geschichte des 30jährigen Krieges, 11 vols. (Leipzig 1870–1908); Continued by W. Goetz, Die Politik Maximilians I. und seiner Verbündeten, 2 vols. (Munich 1908–1918); Gebhardt-Grundmann II:130f., additional lit.; V.-L. Tapié, La Politique de la France et le début de la Guerre de Trente ans 1616–21 (Paris 1934); C. V. Wedgewood, The Thirty Years War (London 1938); H. Sturmberger, Aufstand in Böhmen, Der Beginn des 30jährigen Krieges (Munich 1959); For the characteristics of Ferdinand II—besides F.

Ch. Khevenhiller, Annales Ferdinandei, 12 vols. (1716–26) and F. Hurter, Geschichte Kaiser Ferdinands II., 11 vols. (Schaffhausen 1850f.)—B. Dudik, "Korrespondenz Kaiser Ferdinands II. und seiner Familie mit M. Becanus und W. Lamormaini" AÖG 54 (1876) 219–350; G. Franz, "Glaube und Recht im politischen Denken Kaiser Ferdinands II" ARG 49 (1958) 258–269 (biased); For his confessor Lamormaini: R. Stiegele: *HJ*28 (1907) 551–569, 849–870; Duhr II:2: 691–713; A. Posch: MIÖG 63 (1955) 375–390; F. X. v. Altötting, "Laurentius von Brindisi in der Politik Bayrens 1606–12" CollFr 29 (1959) 237–272; Arturo da Camignano, "La part de S. Laurent de Brindes dans le ban de Donauwörth 1607" RHE 58 (1963) 460–486; D. Albrecht, Die auswärtige Politik Maximilians von Bayern 1618–35 (Göttingen 1962) (basic).

49. Urban VIII, Innocent X and the End of the Counter Reformation

SOURCES

BullRom XIII–XV; Le relazioni della Corte di Roma lette al Senato degli ambasciatori veneti nel sec. XVII, ed. N. Barozzi–G. Berchet, 2 vols. (Venice 1877–79); A. Leman, Recueil des instructions générales aux nonces ordinaires de France 1620–34 (Paris 1919); Q. Aldea, "España, el Papado y el Imperio durante la guerra de los treinta años, I: Instrucciones a los Embajadores de España en Roma 1631—43" MCom 27 (1957) 291–437; A. Malvezzi, "Papa Urbano VIII e la questione della Valtellina. Nuovi documenti" Nuovo Archivio lombardo VIII:7 (1957) 5–113; H. Kiewning, *Die Nuntiatur des Palotto 1628–*30, 2 vols. (Berlin 1895–97); V. Kybal–G. Incisa Della Rocchetta, La Nunziatura di F. Chigi 1640–51, 2 vols. (Rome 1943–46); W. Friedensburg, "Regesten zur deutschen Geschichte aus der Zeit des Pontifikates Innocenz' X." QFIAB 4 (1902) 236–285; 5 (1903) 60–124, 207–222; 6 (1904) 146–173; 7 (1905) 121–138; Acta Pacis Westfalicae, ed. M. Braubach–K. Repgen, Series IV, Abt. D., Vol. 1 (Münster 1964).

LITERATURE

Pastor XIII (Urban VIII), XIV:13–299 (Innocent X); Seppelt V:275–321. Pastor's criticism of Ranke and Gregorovius is not without justification, yet he stands too strongly under the influence of Leman in spite of the harsh judgement of Richelieu; See also the unfavorable judgement of J. Grisar, "Päpstliche Finanzen, Nepotismus und Kirchenrecht unter Urban VIII" Misc. Hist. Pont. 14 (1943) 205–366; K. Repgen, "Finanzen, Kirchenrecht und Politik unter Urban VIII" RQ 56 (1961) 62–74; A. Kraus, "Amt und Stellung des Kardinalnepoten zur Zeit Urbans VIII" RQ 53 (1958) 238–243; id., Die Päpstliche Staatssekretarie unter Urban VIII (Freiburg 1964); A. Malvezzi, "Papa Urbano VIII e la questione della Valtellina" Archivio storico lombardo 84 (1957) 5–113; P. Blet, Le Clergé de France et la Monarchie I (Rome 1959); id., "La congrégration des affaires de France de 1640" Mélanges E. Tisserant IV:59–105.

EDICT OF RESTITUTION: EARLY HISTORY: Pastor XIII:1, 354f.; K. Repgen, "L. Holstenius als politischer Gutachter in Rom" QFIAB 39 (1959) 342–352; H. Günter, Das Restitutionsedikt von 1629 und die katholische Resauration in Alt-Württemberg (Stuttgart 1901); For a list of restored church properties: Th. Tupetz, Der Streit um die geistlichen Güter und das Restitutionsedikt von 1629 (Vienna 1883) 523–566; Comprehensive survey and lit. in K. Repgen, Die Römische Kurie und der Westfälische Friede I:157–189 (vide infra).

THE PEACE OF WESTPHALIA: M. Braubach, Der Westfälische Friede (Münster 1948); F. Dickmann, Der Westfälische Frieden (Münster 1959) (basic); L. Steinberger, Die Jesuiten

und die Friedensfrage 1635–50 (Freiburg 1906) (Wangnereck and his opponent 63f., 78f.); D. Bötticher, "Propaganda und öffentliche Meinung im protestantischen Deutschland 1628–36" ARG 44 (1953) 181–203; G. Schmid, "Konfessionspolitik und Staatsräson bei den Verhandlungen des Westfälischen Friedenskongresses über die Gravamina ecclesiastica" ARG 44 (1953) 203–222; K. Repgen, "Die Hauptinstruktion Ginettis für den Kölner Kongress 1636" QFIAB 34 (1954) 250–287; id., "Fabio Chigis Instruktion für den Westfälischen Friedenskongress" RQ 48 (1953) 79–166; id., Die Römische Kurie und der Westfälische Friede I (Tübingen 1962); H. Bücker, "Der Nuntius Fabio Chigi in Münster 1644–49" WZ 108 (1958) 1–90; S. Cultrera, Per la pace di Westfalia. Missione alle corti di Francia e di Spagna del P. Innocenzo Marcinò da Caltagirone 1647–48 (Milan 1955); P. Frischauer, The Imperial Crown (London 1939); M. Roberts, The Political Objectives of Gustavus Adolphus in Germany, 1630–32 (London 1957); J. J. Poelhekke, De Vrede van Munster (The Hague 1948); E. A. Beller, Propaganda in Germany during the Thirty Years War (Princeton 1940).

RICHELIEU AND MAZARIN: G. Hannoteaux, Histoire du card. Richelieu, 6 vols. (Paris 1893–1947); C. J. Burckhardt, Richelieu. Der Aufstieg zur Macht (Münich 1947); E. Hassinger, "Das politische Testament Richelieus" HZ 173 (1952) 485–503; C. V. Wedgewood, Richelieu and the French Monarchy (London 1949); L. Dedouvres, Le P. Joseph de Paris Capucin. L'Éminence grise, 2 vols. (Paris 1932); U. Silvagni, Il Card. Mazzarino (Turin 1928); V. Tornetta, "La politica del Mazzarino verso il papato" AstIt 99 (1941) 86–116; 100 (1942) 95–134; R. Derricau-M. Laurain, La mort du Card. Mazarin (Paris 1960).

MISCELLANEOUS: G. Marañón-L. Pfandl, Olivares. Der Niedergang Spaniens als Weltmacht (Munich o. J. 1939); G. Albion, Charles I and the Court of Rome (London 1935); W. Brulez, "La crise dans les relations entre le Saint-Siège et les Pays-Bas au XVII^{e} siècle" Bulletin de l'Institut historique belge de Rome 28 (1953) 63–104; M. J. Havran, The Catholics in Caroline England (Stanford 1962); W. M. Southgate, John Jewel and the Problem of Doctrinal Authority (Cambridge, Mass. 1962); W. S. Knight, The Life and Works of Hugo Grotius (London 1925); J. Laures, The Political Economy of Juan de Mariana (New York 1928); C. V. Wedgewood, A Coffin for King Charles (New York 1964).

50. Denominationalism and Secularization

LITERATURE

IRENICISM AND TOLERANCE: F. W. Kantzenbach, Das Ringen um die Einheit der Kirche im Jahrhundert der Reformation. Vertreter, Quellen und Motive des "ökumenischen" Gedankens von Erasmus von Rotterdam bis Georg Calixt (Stuttgart 1957); R. Rouse–St. Ch. Neill, Geschichte der ökumenischen Bewegung I (Göttingen 1957); N. Paulus, Protestantismus und Toleranz im 16. Jh. (Freiburg 1911); J. Lecler, Toleration and the Reformation, 2 vols. (New York 1960); L. Cristiani, "Tolérance et intolérance religieuses au XVI^{e} siècle" Journal of World-History 5 (1959) 857–878; E. Hassinger, "Wirtschaftliche Motive und Argumente für religiöse Duldsamkeit im 16. und 17. Jh." ARG 49 (1958) 226–245; H. Conrad, "Religionsbann, Toleranz und Parität am Ende des alten Reiches" RQ 56 (1961) 167–199; K. Goldammer, "Friedensidee and Toleranzgedanke bei Paracelsus und den Spiritualisten" ARG 46 (1955) 20–46, 47 (1956) 180–211; K. Jordan, The Development of Religious Toleration in England, 4 vols. (London 1932–40); A. Räss, Die Convertiten seit der Reformation I–VI (Freiburg 1866–68) (until 1653); H. Bainton, The Travail of Religious Liberty (Philadelphia 1951); H. Bainton–B. Becker, et al., Castellioniana, Quatre études sur Sebastien Castellion et l'idee de la tolerance (Haarlem 1954).

POLITICAL THEORY AND ABSOLUTISM: P. Meinecke, Die Idee der Staatsräson in der neueren Geschichte I (Munich 1960); H. Lutz, Ragione di stato und christliche Staatsethik im 16. Jh. (Münster 1961); M. Beloff, The Age of Absolutism (New York 1962) (a schematic treatment of the period); P. Mesnard, L'essor de la philosophie politique an XVI^{e} siècle (Paris 1951); R. v. Albertini, Das politische Denken in Frankreich zur Zeit Richelieus (Marburg 1951); L. Firpo, Il pensiero politico del Rinascimento e della Controriforma (Milan 1948); T. Bozza, Scrittori politici italiani dal 1550 al 1650 (Rome 1949) (Bibliography); M. d'Addio, Il pensiero politico di G. Scioppio e il Machiavellismo del Seicento (Milan 1958); J. Spörl, Widerstandsrecht und Grenzen der Staatsgewalt (Berlin 1955); C. J. Friedrich, The Age of the Baroque (New York 1952); J. W. Allen, A History of Political Thought in the 16th Century (New York 1928); B. Hamilton, Political Thought in 16th Century Spain (New York 1963); R. H. Murray, The Political Consequences of the Reformation (London 1926); B. Reynolds, Proponents of Limited Monarchy in 16th Century France (New York 1931); H. Butterfield, The Statecraft of Machiavelli (London 1940); R. H. Tawney, Religion and the Rise of Capitalism (New York 1926). D. Ogg, Europe in the Seventeenth Century (New York 1962).

LITERATURE ON ABSOLUTISM: W. Hubatsch, "Das Zeitalter des Absolutismus in heutiger Sicht" AKG 33 (1953) 342–371, suppl. M. Schlenke: AKG 39 (1957) 112–129; L. Just, "Stufen und Formen des Absolutismus" HJ 80 (1961) 143–159; St. Skalweit, "Das Zeitalter des Absolutismus als Forschungsproblem" DVfLG 35 (1961) 298–315.

THE SECULARIZATION OF THOUGHT: W. Dilthey, Weltanschauung und Analyse des Menschen seit Renaissance und Reformation (Leipzig–Berlin 1914); G. Saitta, Il pensiero italiano nell'Umanesimo e nel Rinascimento III (Bologna 1951); H. E. Weber, Reformation, Orthodoxie und Rationalismus, 2 vols. (Gütersloh 1940).

PHILOSOPHY: Ueberweg III (Darmstadt 1957); F. Copelston, History of Philosophy III–IV (London 1958–68). For the Italian emigrants the following works are basic: D. Cantimori, Eretici italiani del Cinquecento (Florence 1939); D. Cantimori-E. Feist, Per la storia degli Eretici italiani del secolo XVI in Europa (Rome 1937) (Texts). Since the appearance of these works there have been numerous monographs about individual personalities, e.g.: G. Spini, A. Bruccioli (Florence 1940); Giacomo Aconcio, Stratagematum Satana ll. VIII, ed. G. Radetti (Florence 1946); Ch. Donald O'Malley, Jacopo Aconcio (Rome 1955); L. Firpo, Gli scritti di F. Pucci (Turin 1957); A. Bertini, "Giovanni Bernardino Bonifacio, Marchese d'Oria" Archivio Storico napoletano 76 (1958) 191–265; St. Dunin Borkowski, "Die Gruppierung der Antitrinitarier des 16. Jh." Scholastik 7 (1932) 481–523; E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarism (Cambridge, Mass. 1945); B. Stasiewski, Reformation und Gegenreformation in Polen (Münster 1960) 52f.; G. Schramm, "Neue Ergebnisse der Antitrinitarierforschung" Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas NF 8 (1960) 428f.; L. Febvre, Le problème de l'incroyance au XVI^{e} siècle (Paris 1942), also the remarks of P. Jourda: RHEF 29 (1943) 262–275; id., Au coeur religieux du XVI^{e} siècle (Paris 1957); A. Klempt, Die Säkularisierung der universalhistorischen Auffassung (Göttingen 1960).

GALILEI: A. Favaro (ed.), Le Opere di G. Galilei, 20 vols. (Florence 1890–1909); L. Olschki, Galilei und seine Zeit (Florence 1927); A. Koyre, Etudes Galiléennes, 3 vols.

(Paris 1939); Nel terzo centenario della morte di G. Galilei. Saggie conferenze (Milan 1942); F. Dessauer, Der Fall Galilei und wir (Frankfurt a. M. 1949).

FOR THE TRIAL PROCEDURE: Pastor, XII:203–214; XIII:1, 616–630; F. A. Yates, Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (London 1964); G. De Santillana, The Crime of Galileo (Chicago 1959).

SUPPLEMENT TO BIBLIOGRAPHY

Part One

Handbuch der Europäischen Geschichte III: Die Entstehung des neuzeitlichen Europa, ed. J. Engel (Stuttgart 1971); St. Skalweit, Reich und Reformation (Berlin 1967). H. J. Hillerbrand (ed.), Brennpunkte der Reformation. Zeitgenössische Texte und Bilder (Göttingen 1967); J. Delumeau, Naissance et Affirmation de la Réforme (Paris 1968); J. Lortz–E. Iserloh, Kleine Reformationsgeschichte (Freiburg ^{2}1971); R. Stupperich, Die Reformation in Deutschland (Munich 1972); R. Kottje–B. Moeller (eds.), Ökumenische Kirchengeschichte II (Mainz 1973); K. Kupisch, Kirchengeschichte III: Politik und Konfession. Die Reformation in Deutschland (Stuttgart 1974); A. Laube, M. Steinmetz, G. Vogler, Illustrierte Geschichte der deutschen frühbürgerlichen Revolution (Berlin/DDR 1974).

CHAPTER 1: H. Oberman, Forerunners of the Reformation (New York 1960); A. Schroer, Die Kirche in Westfalen vor der Reformation (Munster 1967); R. Bäumer, Nachwirkungen des konziliaren Gedankens in der Theologie und Kanonistik des frühen 16. Jahrhunderts (Münster 1971).

CHAPTER 2: 1. R. Friedenthal, Luther (Munich 1967); G. Zschäbitz, Martin Luther. Grösse und Grenze I (1483–1526) (Berlin 1967); R. García-Villoslada, Martin Lutero, 2 vols. (Madrid 1973); G. Ebeling, Luther (Tübingen 1974).—2. P. Hacker, Das Ich im Glauben bei M. Luther (Graz 1966); F. Gogarten, Luthers Theologie (Tübingen 1967); W. Joest, Ontologie der Person bei Luther (Göttingen 1967); O. H. Pesch, Die Theologie der Rechtfertigung bei M. Luther und Thomas v. A. (Mainz 1967); J. Wicks, Man Yearning for Grace. Luther's Early Spiritual Teaching (Wiesbaden 1969); R. Damerau, Die Demut in der Theologie Luthers (Giessen 1970); G. Ebeling, Lutherstudien I (Tübingen 1971); K. H. Zur Mühlen, Nos Extra Nos. Luthers Theologie zwischen Mystik und Scholastik (Tübingen 1972); E. Iserloh, Luther und die Reformation. Beiträge zu einem ökumenischen Lutherverständnis (Aschaffenburg 1974).—3. P. Manns, Lutherforschung heute (Wiesbaden 1967); H. G. Koch, Luthers Reformation in kommunistischer Sicht (Stuttgart 1967); R. Wohlfeil (ed.), Reformation oder frühbürgerliche Revolution? (Munich 1972); A. Friesen, Reformation and Utopia. The Marxist Interpretation of the Reformation and Its Antecedents (Wiesbaden 1974); M. Bogdahn, Die Rechtfertigungslehre Luthers im Urteil der neueren katholischen Theologie. Möglichkeiten und Tendenzen der katholischen Lutherdeutung in evangelischer Sicht (Göttingen 1971).—4. R. Stauffer, Die Entdeckung Luthers im Katholizismus (Zurich 1968); W. Beyna, Das moderne katholische Lutherbild (Essen 1969); G. Ph. Wolf, Das neuere französische Lutherbild (Wiesbaden 1974); K. Aland, Martin Luther in der modernen Literatur (Witten 1973); H. Jedin-R. Bäumer, Die Erforschung der kirchlichen Reformationsgeschichte (Darmstadt 1975).–-5. A. Zumkeller, "Martin Luther und sein Orden" AA 25 (1962) 254–290; A. Kunzelmann, Geschichte der deutschen Augustiner-Eremiten. Teil V: Die Sächsich-Thüringische Provinz und die Sächsiche Reformkongregation bis zum Untergang der beiden (Würzburg 1974).—6. E. Kleineidam, Universitas Studii Erfordiensis (Leipzig 1964); E. Iserloh, "Sacramentum et Exemplum. Ein augustinisches Thema lutherischer Theologie" Reformata I (Münster 1965) 247–264; G. Baring, "Luther und die "Theologia Deutsch" in der neuesten Forschung" ThZ XXIII (1967) 48–62; St. E. Ozment, "Homo Viator: Luther and Late Medieval Theology" Harv. ThR 62 (1969) 275–287; H. Hilgenfeld, Mittelalterlich-traditionelle Elemente in Luthers Abendmahlschriften (Zurich 1971); K. H. Zur Mühlen, "Zur Rezeption der Augustinischen Sakramentsformel 'Accedit Verbum ad Elementum. et Fit Sacramentum' in der Theologie Luthers" ZThK 70 (1973) 50–76.—7. H. Vossberg, Im Heiligen Rom. Luthers Reiseeindrücke 1510–1511 (Berlin 1966).—8. J. Vercruysse, Fidelis Populus (Wiesbaden 1968); S. H. Hendrix, Ecclesia in Via. Ecclesiological Development in the Medieval Psalms Exegesis and the Dicta Super Psalterium (1513–1515) of Martin Luther (Leiden 1974).—9. D. Demmer, Lutherus Interpres. Der theologische Neuansatz in seiner Römerbriefexegese unter besonderer Berücksichtigung Augustins (Witten 1968); E. Plutta-Messerschmidt, Gerechtigkeit Gottes bei Paulus. Eine Studie zu Luthers Auslegung von Römer 3–5 (Tübingen 1973).—11. H. Feld, Martin Luther und Wendelin Steinbachs Vorlesungen über den Hebräerbrief (Wiesbaden 1971).—12. B. Lohse (ed.), Der Durchbruch der reformatorischen Erkenntnis bei Luther (Darmstadt 1968); O. Modalski, "Luthers Turmerlebnis 1515" StTh XXII (1968) 51–91; R. Schäfer, "Zur Datierung von Luthers reformatorischer Erkenntnis" ZThK 66 (1969) 151–170; O. Bayer, "Die Reformatorische Wende in Luthers Theologie" ZThK 66 (1969) 115–150; id., Promissio. Geschichte der reformatorischen Wende in Luthers Theologie (Göttingen 1971); A. Franzen (ed.), Um Reform und Reformation. Zur Frage nach dem Wesen des "Reformatorischen" bei Martin Luther (Münster 1972).

CHAPTER 3: K. V. Selge, Normen der Christenheit im Streit um Ablass und Kirchenautorität (Diss. theol. habil. Heidelberg 1968); R. Bäumer, Die Diskussion um Luthers Thesenanschlag: A. Franzen (ed.), Um Reform und Reformation (Münster 1968) 53–95.

CHAPTER 4: G. Hennig, Cajetan und Luther (Stuttgart 1966); G. Müller, "Die römische Kurie und die Anfänge der Reformation" ZRGG XIX (1967) 1–32; U. Mauser, Der Junge Luther und die Häresie (Gütersloh 1968); W. Borth, Die Luthersache (Causa Lutheri) 1517–24 (Lübeck 1970); R. Bäumer, Martin Luther und der Papst (Münster 1971); id. (ed.), Lutherprozess und Lutherbann. Vorgeschichte, Ergebnis, Nachwirkung (Münster 1972); E. Iserloh, Aufhebung des Lutherbannes?; R. Bäumer (ed.), Lutherprozess und Lutherbann (Münster 1972) 69–80; D. Oliver, Der Fall Luthers. Geschichte einer Verurteilung 1517–1521 (Stuttgart 1972); W. Delius, "Der Augustinerorden im Prozess Luthers" ARG 63 (1972) 22–42. M. O'Connell, "Cardinal Cajetan: Intellectual and Activist" The New Scholasticism L, no. 3 (1976) 310–322.

CHAPTER 5: F. Mann, Das Abendmahl beim Jungen Luther (Munich 1971).

CHAPTER 6: E. W. Kohls, Luthers Entscheidung in Worms (Stuttgart 1970); F. Reuter (ed.), Der Wormser Reichstag von 1521. Reichspolitik und Luthersache (Worms 1971); H. Steitz, Martin Luther auf dem Reichstag zu Worms 1521 (Frankfurt a. M. 1971); E. W. Kohls, "Die Deutungen des Verhaltens in Worms innerhalb der neueren Historiographie" ARG 63 (1972) 43–71; F. T. Bos, Luther in het orded van de Sorbonne (Amsterdam 1974).

CHAPTER 7: C. F. Wiesløff, Abendmahl und Messe. Die Kritik Luthers am Messopfer (Berlin 1969); F. Pratzner, Messe und Kreuzesopfer. Die Krise der sakramentalen Idee bei

Luther und in der mittetalterlichen Scholastik (Vienna 1970); J. Rogge, Gratia und Donum in Luthers Schrift gegen Latomus. Theolog. Versuche II (Berlin 1970); E. Iserloh, "Gratia und Donum, Rechtfertigung und Heiligung nach Luthers 'Wider den Löwener Theologen Latomus' (1521)" Luther und die Reformation (Aschaffenburg 1974) 88–105.

Chapter 8: W. Hammer, Die Melanchthonforschung im Wandel der Jahrhunderte, 2 vols. (Gütersloh 1966–68); W. Maurer, Der Junge Melanchthon, 2 vols. (Göttingen 1967–69); H. H. Holfelder, Tentatio et Consulato. Studien zu Bugenhagens "Interpretatio in Librum Psalmorum" (Berlin 1974).

Chapter 9: R. E. McNally, "Pope Adrian VI (1522–23) and Church Reform" AH Pont 7 (1969) 253–285; K. H. Ducke, Das Verständnis von Amt und Theologie im Briefwechsel zwischen Hadrian VI und Erasmus von Rotterdam (Leipzig 1973).

Chapter 11: R. J. Sider, Andreas Bodenstein von Karlstadt. The Development of His Thought 1517–1525 (Leiden 1974); F. Kriechbaum, Grundzüge der Theologie Karlstadts (Hamburg 1967); G. Franz (ed.), Thomas Müntzer. Schriften und Briefe (Gütersloh 1968); G. Wehr (ed.), Thomas Müntzer, Schriften und Briefe (Frankfurt 1973) (lit.); M. Steinmetz, Das Müntzerbild von M. Luther bis Friedrich Engels (Berlin 1971); Th. Nipperdey, "Theologie und Revolution bei Th. Müntzer" ARG 54 (1963) 145–181; P. Wappler, Müntzer in Zwickau und die Zwickauer Propheten (Zwickau 1908, Neudruck Gütersloh 1966); M. Bensing, Thomas Müntzer und der Thüringer Aufstand 1525 (East Berlin 1966); H. J. Goertz, Innere und äussere Ordnung in der Theologie Th. Müntzers (Leiden 1967); E. W. Gritsch, Reformer without a Church. The Life and Thought of Thomas Muentzer (1448–1525) (Philadelphia 1967); G. Goldbach, Hans Denck und Thomas Müntzer (Diss. Theol. Hamburg 1969); E. Iserloh, "Revolution bei Thomas Müntzer. Durchsetzung des Reiches Gottes oder Soziale Aktion" H. J. 92 (1972) 282–299; G. Wehr, Thomas Müntzer in Selbstzeugnissen und Bilddokumenten (Reinbeck 1972); K. Ebert, Theologie und Politisches Handeln. Thomas Müntzer als Modell (Stuttgart 1973); H. J. Goertz, "Der Mystiker mit dem Hammer. Die Theologische Begründung der Revolution bei Thomas Müntzer" KuD 20 (1974) 23–53; W. Elliger, Thomas Müntzer. Leben und Werk (Göttingen 1975).

Chapter 12: A. Waas, Die Bauern im Kampf um Gerechtigkeit 1300–1525 (Munich 1964); H. Angermeier, "Die Vorstellung des Gemeinen Mannes von Staat und Reich im Deutschen Bauernkrieg" VSWG 53 (1966) 329–343; A. Franke (ed.), Das Buch der hundert Kapitel und der vierzig Statuten des sog. oberrheinischen Revolutionärs. Historische Analysen von G. Zschäbitz (Berlin 1967); H. Buszello, Bauernkrieg von 1525 als politische Bewegung (Berlin 1969); K. Kaczerowsky (ed.), Flugschriften des Bauernkrieges (Reinbeck 1970); D. W. Sabean, Landbesitz und Gesellschaft am Vorabend des Bauernkrieges (Stuttgart 1972); H. Vahle, "Der dt. Bauernkrieg als politische Bewegung im Urteil der Geschichtsschreibung" GWU 23 (1972) 257–277; R. Endres, "Der Bauernkrieg in Franken" BDLG 109 (1973) 31–68; P. Blickle, Landschaften im Alten Reich (Munich 1973); id., Die Revolution von 1525 (Munich 1975); M. Brecht, "Der theologische Hintergrund der zwölf Artikel der Bauernschaft in Schwaben von 1525" ZKG 85 (1974) 174–208; R. Wohlfeil (ed.), Der Bauernkrieg 1524–1526. Bauernkrieg und Reformation (Munich 1975); W. Lenk (ed.), Dokumente aus dem dt. Bauernkrieg (Leipzig 1974) (lit.); G. Seebass, "Bauernkrieg und Täufertum in Franken" ZKG 85 (1974) 284–300; W. Becker, Reformation und Revolution (Münster 1974); M. Bemsing–S. Hoyer, Der deutsche Bauernkrieg 1524–1526 (Berlin ^{3}1975); G. Heitz, A. Laube, M. Steinmetz, G. Vogler (eds.), Der Bauer im Klassenkampf (Berlin 1975); M. Kabusch–E. Müller, Der deutsche Bauernkrieg in Dokumenten (Weimar 1975); Flugschriften der Bauernkriegszeit, ed. Christel Laufer et al. (Berlin 1975).

CHAPTER 13: Lewis W. Spitz, The Renaissance and Reformation Movements (Chicago 1971); W. P. Eckert, Erasmus von Rotterdam: Werk und Wirkung II: Humanismus und Reformation (Cologne 1967); H. J. McSorley, Luthers Lehre vom unfreien Willen (Munich 1967); R. D. Jones, Erasmus and Luther (Oxford 1968); Colloquia Erasmiana Turonensia I–II, Douzième Stage International d'Etudes Humanistes (Tours 1969); G. Faludy, Erasmus of Rotterdam (London 1970); R. H. Bainton, Erasmus. Reformer zwischen den Fronten (Göttingen 1972); A. G. Dickens, The Age of Humanism and Reformation. Europe in the Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Sixteenth Centuries (Englewood Cliffs, N.J. 1972); M. Hoffman, Erkenntis und Verwirklichung der wahren Theologie nach Erasmus von Rotterdam (Tübingen 1972); A. Rabil, Jr., Erasmus and the New Testament. The Mind of a Christian Humanist (San Antonio, Tex., 1972); H. Holeczek, "Die Haltung des Erasmus zu Luther nach dem Scheitern seiner Vermittlungspolitik 1520–21" ARG 64 (1973) 85–112; G. B. Winkler, Erasmus von Rotterdam und die Einleitungsschriften zum NT (Münster 1974); W. Hentze, Kirche und Kirchliche Einheit bei Desiderius Erasmus von Rotterdam (Paderborn 1974); M. Brod, Johannes Reuchlin und sein Kampf (Stuttgart 1965); L. Borinski, Englischer Humanismus und deutsche Reformation (Göttingen 1969); Willibald Pirckheimer 1470–1970, Dokumente, Studien, Perspektiven, ed. W. Pirckheimer-Kuratorium (Nuremberg 1970); W. P. Eckert–Eh. von Imhoff, W. Pirckheimer, Dürers Freund, im Spiegel seines Lebens, seiner Werke und seiner Umwelt (Cologne 1971).

CHAPTER 14: F. Büsser, Das katholische Zwinglibild (Zürich 1968); U. Gräbler, "Die Zwingli-Forschung seit 1960" ThLZ 96 (1971) 481–490; R. Pfister, Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz II: Von der Reformation bis zum Zweiten Villmerger Krieg (Zürich 1974); J. Courvoisier, Zwingli als reformierter Theologe (Neukirchen 1966); R. C. Walton, Zwingli's Theocracy (Toronto 1967); R. Hauswirth, Landgraf Philipp von Hessen und Zwingli (Tübingen 1968); M. Haas, Huldrych Zwingli und seine Zeit. Leben und Werk des Zürcher Reformators (Zürich 1969); G. W. Locher, Huldrych Zwingli in neuer Sicht (Zurich 1969); K. Maeder, Die Via Media in der Schweizerischen Reformation (Zurich 1970); W. Jacob, Politische Führungsschicht und Reformation. Untersuchungen zur Reformation in Zürich 1519–1528 (Zurich 1970); O. Scheib, "Die Theologischen Diskussionen Huldrych Zwinglis, in: Von Konstanz nach Trient, ed. R. Bäumer (Munich 1972) 395–417.

CHAPTER 15: Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer: Vol. 11 Österreich I, ed. G. Mecenseffy (Gütersloh 1964); Vol. 12 Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter, ed. R. Friedmann (Gütersloh 1967); Vol. 13 Österreich II, ed. G. Mecenseffy; R. Friedmann (ed.), Die Schriften der Huterischen Täufergemeinschaften (Graz 1965); H. G. Williams, The Radical Reformation (Philadelphia 1962); R. Friemann, "Das Täuferische Glaubensgut" ARG 55 (1964) 145–161; C. P. Clasen, Die Wiedertäufer im Herzogtum Württemberg (Stuttgart 1965); id., Anabaptism. A Social History 1525–1618 (London 1972); F. H. Littel, Das Selbstverständnis der Täufer (Kassel 1966); W. Schäufele, Das missionarische Bewusstsein und Wirken der Täufer (Neukirchen 1966); J. H. Yoder, Täufertum und Reformation im Gespräch (Zurich 1968); C. Krahn, Dutch Anabaptism (1450–1600) (The Hague 1968); H. D. Schmid, "Das Hutsche Täufertum" HJ 99 (1971) 327–344; H. D. Plümper, Die Gütergemeinschaft bei den Taufen des 16 Jahrhunderts (Göppingen 1972); E. Geldbach, "Toward a More Ample Biography of the Hessian Anabaptist Leader Melchior Rinck" MQR 48 (1974) 371–184; G. H. Williams, "German Mysticism in the Polarization of Ethical Behavior in Luther and the Anabaptists" MQR 48 (1974) 275– 304; R. von Dülmen (ed.), Das Täuferreich zu Münster 1534–1535 (Munich 1974) (lit.); R. Stupperich (ed.), Die Schriften Bernhard Rothmanns (Münster 1970); J. W. Porter, Bernhard Rothmann (1495–1535) (Diss. Wisconsin 1964); G. Brendler, Das Täuferreich zu Münster 1534–35 (East Berlin 1966); O. Rammstedt, Sekte und Soziale Bewegung (Cologne 1966); K. H. Kirchhoff, Die Täufer in Münster 1534–35 (Münster 1973); G. List, Chiliastische Utopie und radikale Reformation (Munich 1973); C. Bornhäuser, Leben und Lehre Menno Simons': Ein Kampf um das Fundament des Glaubens (ca. 1469–1561) (Neukirchen-Vluyn 1973); M. Barbers, Toleranz bei Sebastian Franck (Bonn 1964); H. Weigelt, Sebastian Frank und die lutherische Reformation (Gütersloh 1972); E. W. Gerdes, "Pietistisches bei Kaspar von Schwenckfeld" Miscellanea Historiae Ecclesiasticae (Louvain 1967) 105–137.

CHAPTER 16: J. Lortz, "Wert und Grenzen der Katholischen Kontroverstheologie" A. Franzen (ed.), Um Reform und Reformation (Münster 1968) 9–32; F.-J. Kötter, Die Eucharistielehre in den katholischen Katechismen des 16 Jahrundert (Münster 1969); P. Fraenkel, "John Eck's Enchiridion of 1525 and Luther's Earliest Arguments Against Papal Primacy" StTh 21 (1967) 110–163; id., "Johann Eck und Sir Thomas More 1525 bis 1526," in: Von Konstanz nach Trient, ed. R. Bäumer (Munich 1972) 519–545; K. Rischer, Johann Eck auf dem Reichstag zu Augsburg 1530 (Münster 1968); H. A. Oberman, "Wittenbergs Zweifrontenkrieg gegen Prierias und Eck" ZKG 80 (1969) 331–358; G. Epiney-Burgard, Jean Eck et le Commentaire de la Théologie Mystique du Pseudo-Denys. Bibliothèque d'Humanisme et Renaissance 34 (1972) 7–29; E. Iserloh, "Die Verteidigung der Bilder durch Johannes Eck zu Beginn des Reformatorischen Bildersturms: Aus Reformation und Gegenreformation" Würzburger Diözesan-Geschichtsblätter 35–36 (1974) 75–85; J. Beumer, "Friedrich Nausea und seine Wirksameit zu Frankfurt, auf den Colloquien zu Hagenau und Worms und auf dem Trienter Konzil" ZKTh 94 (1972) 29–45; R. Bäumer, "Das Kirchenverständnis Albert Pigges" Volk Gottes (Freiburg 1967) 306–322; J. Rouchausse, La Vie et l'Oeuvre de John Fisher, Évêque de Rochester, 1496–1535 (Nieuwkoop–Angers 1972); E. Surtz SJ, The Works and Days of John Fisher. An Introduction to the Position of St. John Fisher (1496–1535), Bishop of Rochester, in the English Renaissance and the Reformation (Cambridge, Mass., 1967); J. Rouchausse (ed.), Erasmus and Fisher. Their Correspondence, 1511–1524 (Paris 1968); A. Bodem, Das Wesen der Kirche nach Kardinal Cajetan. Ein Beitrag zur Ekklesiologie im Zeitalter der Reformation (Trier 1971); M. W. Anderson, "Thomas Cajetan's Scientia Christi" ThZ 26 (1970) 99–108; J. P. Massaut, Josse Clichtove: l'Humanisme et la Réforme du Clergé (1472–1520), 2 vols. (Paris 1969); G. Chaintraine SJ, "Josse Clichtove: Témoin de l'Humanisme Parisien. Scolastique et Célibat au XVI^{e} Siècle" RHE 66 (1971) 507–528; R. Braunisch, Die Theologie der Rechtfertigung im "Enchiridion" (1538) des Johannes Gropper (Münster 1974); O. Müller, Bischof. J. Pflug von Naumburg-Zeitz in seinem Bemühen um die Einheit der Kirche. Beiträge zu Gesch. des Erzb. Magdeburg (Leipzig 1968) 155–178; Julius Pflug, Correspondence, ed. J. V. Pollet, 2 vols. to date (Leiden 1969–73); J. V. Pollet, "Gropper und J. Pflug nach ihrer Korrespondenz" Paderbornensis Ecclesia (Paderborn 1972) 223–244; W. Kaliner, J. Pflugs Verhältnis zur "Christlichen Lehre" des Johann von Maltitz (Leipzig 1972).

THOMAS MURNER, Werke (German), ed. F. Schultz, 9 vols. (Strassburg–Berlin 1918–1928); "Des alten christl. Bären Testament," ed. M. Scherer: Anzeiger für Schweizer. Gesch. 50 (Bern 1919) 6–38; "Des Jungen Bären Zahnweh," ed. J. Lefftz: AElsKG 1 (1926) 141–167; "Purgatio Vulgaris," ed. J. Lefftz: AElsKG 3 (1928) 97–114; Die gottesheilige Messe, ed. W. Pfeiffer-Belli (Halle 1928); M. im Schweizer Glaubenskampf, ed. W. Pfeiffer-Belli (Münster 1939); "De Immaculata Virginis Conceptione. Eine unvollendete Jugendschr.," ed. F. Landmann: AElsKG 15 (1941–42) 73–128.—Lit.: Th. von Liebenau, Der Franziskaner Dr. Th. M. (Freiburg 1913); J. Lefftz, Die Volkstüml. Stilelemente in M.s Satiren (Strassburg 1915); E. Fuchs, "M.s Belesenheit, Bildungsgang u. Wissen" FStud 9 (1922) 70–79; P. Scherer, M.s Verhältnis zum Humanismus (Basel 1929); F. Landmann, "M. als Prediger" AElsKG 10 (1935) 295–368; M. Sondheim, M. als Astrolog (Strassburg 1938); R. Newald, "Wandlungen des M.bildes: Beitr. z. Geistes- u. Kulturgesch. der Oberrheinlande," ed. H. Gumbel (Fr 1938) 40–78; id., Elsässische Charakterköpfe aus dem Zeitalter des Humanismus (Colmar 1944) III:185; A. Erler, M. als Jurist (Freiburg 1956). P. L. Nyhus, "Caspar Schatzgeyer and Conrad Pellican: The Triumph of Dissension in the Early Sixteenth Century" ARG 61 (1970) 179–204; J. Beumer, "Erasmus von Rotterdam und G. Witzel" Cath 22 (1968) 41–67; G. Scholtz, Die Aufzeichnungen des Hildesheimer Dechanten Johan Oldecop (1493–1574). Reformation und katholische Kirche im Spiegel von Chroniken des 16. Jahrhunderts (Münster 1972).

CHAPTER 17: E. Fabian (ed.), Quellen zur Gesch. der Reformationshindernisse und der Konstanzer Reformationsprozesse 1529–1548 (Tübingen 1967); O. Scheib, Die Reformationsdiskussionen in der Hansestadt Hamburg 1522–28 (Münster 1975).

CHAPTER 18: H. Kunst (ed.), Martin Luther und die Kirche (Stuttgart 1971); H. W. Krumwiede, Zur Entstehung des landesherrlichen Kirchenregiments in Kursachsen und Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel (Göttingen 1967); H. H. Schrey (ed.), Reich Gottes und Welt. Die Lehre Luthers von den zwei Reichen (Darmstadt 1969); U. Duchrow, Christenheit und Weltverantwortung. Traditionsgeschichte und syst. Struktur der Zwei-Reiche-Lehre (Stuttgart 1970); A. Hakamies, Eigengesetzlichkeit der natürlichen Ordnungen als Grundproblem der neueren Lutherdeutung. Studien zur Geschichte der Problematik der Zwei-Reiche-Lehre Luthers (Witten 1971); G. Ruhbach (ed.), Die Vorstellung von zwei Reichen und Regimentern bis Luther (Gütersloh 1972); G. Wolf, Luther und die Obrigkeit (Darmstadt 1972); R. Ohlig, Die Zwei-Reiche-Lehre Luthers in der Auslegung der deutschen lutherischen Theologie der Gegenwart seit 1945 (Diss. Theol. Münster 1974); J. Haun (ed.), Zur Zwei-Reiche-Lehre Luthers (Munich 1973) (lit.); K. Trüdinger, Luthers Briefe und Gutachten an weltliche Obrigkeiten zur Durchführung der Reformation (Münster 1975); J. Aarts, Die Lehre Martin Luthers über das Amt in der Kirche. Eine genetisch-systematische Untersuchung seiner Schriften von 1512 bis 1525 (Hämeenliena–Helsinki 1972); P. Manns, "Amt und Eucharistie in der Theologie Martin Luthers," in: Amt und Eucharistie, with additions by P. Bläser et al. (Paderborn 1973) 68–173; W. Stein, Das Kirchliche Amt bei Luther (Wiesbaden 1974).

CHAPTER 19: P. Johannsen, "Gedruckte deutsche und undeutsche Messen für Riga" Zschr. f. Ostforschung 8 (1959) 523–532; E. W. Kohls (ed.), Evangelische Katechism in der Reformationszeit vor und neben Martin Luthers Kleinem Katechismus (Gütersloh 1971).

CHAPTER 20: G. Müller, Die römische Kurie und die Reformation 1523–34. Kirche und Politik während des Pontifikats Clemens VII. (Gütersloh 1969).

CHAPTER 21: G. Mog (ed.), Das Marburger Religionsgespräch (Gütersloh 1970); S. Hausmann, Römerbriefauslegung zwischen Humanismus und Reformation (Zurich 1970); Heinrich Bullinger, Werke. Zweite Abteilung. Briefwechsel. Bd 1 Brr. der Jahre 1524 bis 1531, updated by Ulrich Gabler and Endre Zsindely (Zurich 1973); J. Staedtke, Beschreibendes Verzeichnis der gedruckten Werke von Heinrich Bullinger (Zurich 1972); Ph. Melanchthon, Apologia Confessionis Augustanae, ed. H. G. Pöhlmann (Gütersloh 1967).

CHAPTER 22: W. Günther, Martin Luther und die Reichsverfassung (Diss. Phil. Freiburg 1972); W. Maurer, "Zur Entstehung und Textgeschichte der Schwabacher Artikel" The- ologie in Geschichte und Kunst. Walter Elliger zum 65 Geburtstag (Witten 1968) 134–151; K. Rischar, Johann Eck auf dem Reichstag zu Augsburg (Münster 1968), W. Maurer, "Erwägungen und Verhandlungen über die Geistliche Jurisdiktion der Bischöfe vor und während des Augsburger Reichstags von 1530" ZSavRGkan 55 (1969) 348–394; L. Grane, Die Confessio Augustana (Wiesbaden 1970); G. Müller, 'Kardinal Lorenzo Campeggio, die Römische Kurie und der Augsburger Reichstag von 1530" NAKG 52 (1972) 133–152; E. Honée, "Die Theologische Diskussion über den Laienkelch auf dem Augsburger Reichstag 1530. Versuch einer historischen Rekonstruktion" NAKG 52 (1972) 1–96; H. Immenkötter, Um die Einheit im Glauben (Münster 1974); M. Bucer, Opera Omnia. Ser. I: Deutsche Schriften. Vol. 3: Confessio Tetrapolitana und die Schriften des Jahres 1531, ed. R. Stupperich (Gütersloh 1969); A. Engelbrecht, "Abconterfeytung Martin Butzers" (1546), ed. W. Bellardi (Münster 1974): CCath 31; E. W. Kohls, "Martin Bucers Katechismus vom Jahre 1534 und seine Stellung innerhalb der Katechismusgeschichte" ZBKG 39 (1970) 83–94; W. P. Steffens, The Holy Spirit in the Theology of Martin Bucer (Cambridge 1970).

CHAPTER 23: H. Scheible (ed.), Das Widerstandsrecht als Problem der deutschen Protestanten 1523–46 (Gütersloh 1969) (lit.); W. von Loewenich, Duplex Iustitia. Luthers Stellung zu einer Unionsformel des 16. Jahrhunderts (Wiesbaden 1972); P. Matheson, Cardinal Contarini at Regensburg (Oxford 1972).

CHAPTER 24: Hermann von Wied, Einfältiges Bedenken. Reformationsentwurf für das Erzstift Köln von 1543, ed. H. Gerhards–W. Borth (Düsseldorf 1972); A. Franzen, Bischof und Reformation. Erzb. Hermann von Wied in Cologne (Münster 1972); id., "Zur Vorgeschichte des Reformationsversuchs des Kölner Erzbischofs Hermann von Wied" HJ 88 (1968) 300–324; id., "Hermann von Wied, Kurfürst und Erzbischof von Köln" Der Reichstag zu Worms von 1521 (Worms 1971) 297–315; H. Buck–E. Fabian, Konstanzer Reformationsgeschichte in ihren Grundzügen (Tübingen 1965); H. C. Rublack, Die Einführung der Reformation in Konstanz von den Anfängen bis zum Abschluss 1531 (Gütersloh 1971); B. Caspar, Das Erzbistum Trier im Zeitalter der Glaubensspaltung (Münster 1966); M. M. Chrisman, Strasbourg and the Reform (New York 1967); H. Stratenworth, Die Reformation in der Stadt Osnabrück (Wiesbaden 1971); J. Vögeli (ed.), Schriften zur Reformation in Konstanz, 1519–38 (Tübingen 1973); Interim: Acta Reformationis Catholicae IV (Regensburg 1974) 255–348; J. Mehlhausen (ed.), Das Augsburger Interim von 1548. Nach den Reichstagsakten Deutsch und Lateinisch herausgegeben (Neukirchen 1970); H. Jedin, Interim statt Konzil: Gesch. d. Konzils v. Trient III (Freiburg 1970) 197–215; H. Rabe, Reichsbund und Interim. Die Verfassung und Religionspolitik Karls V. und der Reichstag von Augsburg 1547–1548 (Cologne 1971); M. Stupperich, "Das Augsburger Interim als apokalyptisches Geschehnis nach den Königsberger Schriften Andreas Osianders" ARG 64 (1973) 225–245; W. Bellardi, "Bucers 'Summarischer Vergriff' und das Interim in Strassburg" ZKG 85 (1974) 64–76.

CHAPTER 26: Ausgewählte Quellen zur Kirchengeschichte Ostmitteleuropas, ed. Ostkirchenausschuss Hannover (Ulm 1959); B. Geissler–G. Stöckl, in: Oriente Crux. Versuch einer Geschichte der reformatorischen Kirchen im Raum zwischen der Ostsee und dem Schwarzen Meer (Stuttgart 1963); K. Juhasz, Das Tschanad-Temesvarer Bistum im Spätmittelalter 1307—1572 (Munich-Paderborn 1964); P. Kawerau, "Die Reformation in Ost- und Südosteuropa" Reformation und Gegenwart, ed. H. Grass (Marburg 1968); C. Bonorand, "Joachim Vadians Beziehung zu Ungarn" Zwingli 13 (1969) 97–131; D. Caccamo, Eretici Italiani in Moravia, Polonia, Transilvania (1558–1611) (Florence 1970); U. Arnold, "Luther und Danzig" (lit.) Zschr. f. Ostforschung 21 (1972) 94–121.

CHAPTER 27: Ph. Hughes, Theology of the English Reformers (London 1965); W. P. Haugaard, Elizabeth and the English Reformation (London 1968); J. Ridley, John Knox (London 1968).

CHAPTER 28: E. O. Reichert, "In Tanta Ecclesiarum Mestitia" ZKG 78 (1967) 253–270; Andreas Osiander d. Ä. Gesamtausgabe Bd. 1. Schriften und Briefe 1522 bis März 1525, in Zusammenarbeit mit Gottfried Seebass, ed. Gerhard Müller (Gütersloh 1975); J. Seebass, Bibliographia Osiandrica (Nieuwkoop 1971); G. Seebass, Das Reformatorische Werke des A. Osiander (Nuremberg 1967).

CHAPTER 29: R. Stauffer, Calvins Menschlichkeit (Zurich 1964); J. I. Packer, Calvin the Theologian: Courtenay Studies in Reformation Theology I (Abingdon 1966) 149–175; Fr. Wendel, Calvin. Ursprung und Entwicklung seiner Theologie (Neukirchen 1968); A. Ganoczy, Ecclesia Ministrans. Dienende Kirche und kirchlicher Dienst bei Calvin (Freiburg 1968); D. Schellong, Das Evangelische Gesetz in der Auslegung Calvins (Munich 1968); J. Staestke, Johannes Calvin (Göttingen 1969); D. Schellong, Calvins Auslegung der synoptischen Evangelien (Munich 1969); J. Cadier, "La Conversion de Calvin" Bull-SocHistPrFr 116 (1970) 142–151; T. W. Casteel, "Calvin and Trent" HTR 63 (1970) 91–117; W. Neuser, Calvin (Berlin 1971); U. Schmidt (ed.), Johannes Calvin und die Kirche. Ein Lesebuch (Stuttgart 1972); T. Stadtland, Rechfertigung und Heiligung bei Calvin (Neukirchen 1972); H. Schützeichel, Die Christologie Calvins (Munich 1972); id., Die Glaubenstheologie Calvins (Munich 1972); W. Bahkle, Calvijn en de Doperse Radikalen (Amsterdam 1973); J. Bratt (ed.), The Heritage of John Calvin. Heritage Hall Lectures 1960–70 (Grand Rapids, Mich. 1973); U. Plath, Calvin und Basel in den Jahren 1552 bis 1556 (Zurich 1974).

CHAPTER 30: K. J. Seidel, Frankreich und die deutschen Protestanten (Münster 1970); J. N. Bakhuizen van den Brink, "De Bartholomeusnacht" NAKG 54 (1973) 77–105; J. Railt, The Eucharistic Theology of Theodore Beza. Development of the Reformed Doctrine (Chambersburg, Pa. 1972); O. de Jong, "Die Emder Generalsynode vor dem Hintergrund der Westeuropäischen Reformationsgeschichte" Jb. d. Gesellsch. für Niedersächsische KG 68 (1970) 9–24; W. Reinhard, Die Reform in der Diözese Carpentras unter den Bischöfen J. Sadoleto, P. Sadoleto, J. Sacrati, und F. Sadoleto 1517–1596 (Münster 1966); C. A. Tucker, De Classis Dordrecht van 1573–1609 (Leiden 1965); O. Press, Calvinismus und Territorial-Staat. Regierung und Zentralbehörden der Kurpfalz 1559–1619 (Stuttgart 1970); M. Schaab, "Die Wiederherstellung des Katholizismus in der Kurpfalz in XVII und XVIII Jh" ZGObrh 114 (1966) 147–205; W. Hollweg, Neue Untersuchungen zur Geschichte und Lehre des Heidelberger Katechismus II (Neukirchen 1968); G. Güldner, Das Toleranz-Problem in den Niederlanden im Ausgang des 16. Jahrhunderts (Lübeck 1968); H. J. Hillerbrand, "The Spread of the Protestant Reformation of the 16th Century" The South Atlantic Quarterly 47 (1968) 265–286; H. Schilling, Niederländische Exulanten im 16. Jahrhundert (Gütersloh 1972); U. Beyer, Abendmahl und Messe. Sinn und Recht der 80. Frage des Heidelberger Katechismus (Neukirchen 1965); Mélanges d'Histoire du XVI^{e} Siècle: Offers à Henri Meylan (Geneva 1970); D. Nugent, Ecumenism in the Age of the Reformation: The Colloquy of Poissy (Cambridge, Mass., 1974); E. Droz, Chemins de l'Hérésie: Textes et Documents. 2 vols. (Geneva 1970–71); N. M. Sutherland, The Massacre of St. Bartholomew and the European Conflict, 1559–1572 (New York, 1973); P. Bietenholz, Basle and France in the 16th Century: The Basle Humanists and Printers (Toronto 1971); H. Salmon, The French Wars of Religion (Boston 1967).

CHAPTER 31: E. Hassinger, Religiöse Toleranz im 16. Jahrhundert (Basel 1966); F. Schrader, Die Visitationen der kath. Klöster im Erzbistum Magdeburg durch die evgl. Landesherren 1561–1651 (Münster 1969); id., Reformation und katholische Klöster (Leipzig 1973); E. W. Zeeden (ed.), Gegenreformation (Darmstadt 1973); H. J. Köhler, Obrigkeitliche Konfessionsänderung in Kondominaten (Münster 1975).

Part Two

Basic Ideas and General Descriptions

The two components of the ecclesiastical renewal of the Tridentine Era, "Catholic Reform" and "Counter Reformation," have found in historiography, if not in general, a more univocal significance in so far as, since the Second Vatican Council, one speaks of the end of the Counter Reformation. From the copious body of literature accepting this assumption we list the following selections: F. Molinari, "La Riforma Cattolica" Scuola Cattolica 97 (1969) 163ff. (lit.); I. C. Olin, The Catholic Reformation (New York 1969); R. Garcia Villada–B. Llorca, Historia de la Iglesia Católica III: Edad Nueva. La Iglesia en la Época del Rinacimiento y de la Reforma Católica (Madrid 1967); Sacramentum Mundi II 1078ff.; M. Marocchi provides evidence for the continuance of reform efforts within the Church in La Riforma Cattolica, Documenti e Testimonianze, 2 vols. (Brescia 1970). That Luther and Ignatius of Loyola and the Tridentine Reform really belong to the world of the Middle Ages is the theme of F. Rapp, L'Église et la Vie Religieuse en Occident à la Fin du Moyen Âge (Paris 1971). Although the author is close to our position, he nevertheless maintains the traditional distinction: H. D. Evennett, The Spirit of the Counter-Reformation, edited by I. Bossy (Cambridge, 1968), lecture on the subject in: I. W. O'Malley, "Recent Studies in Church History 1300–1600" CHR 55 (1969) 394–437; the widest survey of bibliography is in AHPont; M. B. O'Connell, The Counter Reformation: 1559–1610 (New York 1974).

SECTION ONE

Origin and Breakthrough of the Catholic Reform to 1563

EARLY PHASES IN ITALY AND SPAIN: Italian reform bishops of the 15th cent.: L. Pesce, Ludovico Barbo, Vescovo di Treviso 1437–1443, 2 vols. (Padua 1969); St. Orlandi, S. Antonino. Studi Bio-bibliografici, 2 vols. (Florence 1960); id., "Gli Ultimi Otto Anni di Episcopato di S. Antonino secondo il Registro di Entrata e Uscita e Molti Altri Documenti Inediti" Memorie Domenicane NS 36 (1960) 169–248; G. Dufner, "Antonio Bettini, Jesuat und Bischof von Foligno" RSTI 18 (1964) 399–428 (B., +1487, personally pious and an active publicist, he was of little importance in Foligno); A. Prosperi, Tra Evangelismo e Controriforma: G. M. Giberti, 1495–1543 (Rome 1969), presently the most comprehensive biography of the famous bishop; V. Meneghini, "Due Compagnie sul Modello di Quelle del Divino Amore Fondate da Francescani a Feltre e Verona 1499–1503" AFH 62 (1969) 518–564; N. H. Minnich, "Concepts of Reform Proposed to the Fifth Lateran Council" AHPont 7 (1969) 163–251.—Important for Savonarola's influence: R. Creytens, "Les Actes Capitulaires de la Congregation Toscano-Romaine OP (1496–1530)" AFP 40 (1970) 125–230.

CHURCH REFORM IN SPAIN AT THE TURN OF THE FIFTEENTH TO SIXTEENTH CENTURIES: I. Garcia Oro, La Reforma de los Religiosos Españoles en Tiempo de los Reyes Católicos (Valladolid 1969); id., Cisneros y la Reforma del Clero Español en Tiempo de los Reyes Católicos (Madrid 1971); Tarsicio de Ascona, "Reforma de la Provincia Francescana de la Corona de Aragón en Tiempo de los Reyes Católicos" EstFranc 7 (1970) 245–344.—J. P. Massaut, Josse Clichtove. L'Humanisme et la Réforme du Clergé, 2 vols. (Paris 1968). On the Bishop of Albi's not too successful efforts to reform the French Carmelites: L. van Wijnen, La Congrégation d'Albi (1499–1602) (Rome 1971).

NEW ORDERS: G. Llompart, Caetano de Thiene. Estudios Sobre un Reformator Religioso (Wiesbaden 1969); C. Linari, "Il Beato Giovanni Marinoni" Regnum Dei (1962) 7–46, biography of the Theatine of Venice; Ph. Caraman, Sant'Angela Merici. Vita della Fondatrice della Compagnie di Sant'Orsola e della Orsoline (Bresica 1965); L. Moletta, La Compagnie di S. Angela Merici a Chiari e le Sue Opere (Bresica 1966); T. Ledóchowska, Angèle Merici et la Compagnie de Sainte-Ursule à la Lumière des Documents, 2 vols. (Rome 1967).

IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA AND THE FOUNDING OF THE SOCIETY OF JESUS: Bibliography AHSJ 35 (1966) 420ff. and the following volumes, finally 43 (1974) 399ff.; I. Iparaguirre, "Desmitificación de S. Ignacio" AHSJ 41 (1972) 357–87; A. Jiménez Oñate, El Origen de la Compañia de Jesús (Rome 1966).—On the constitutions of the orders: G. Philippart, "Visiteurs, Commissaires, et Inspecteurs dans la Compagnie de Jesus de 1540 à 1615" AHSJ 37 (1968).—Important on pedagogical methods: G. Codina, Aux Sources de la Pédagogie des Jesuites. Le "Modus Parisiensis" (Rome 1968); the sources in the early period from 1500 to 1556 in the Monumenta Paedagogica Soc. Jesu I, edited by L. Lukács (Rome 1965); M. Foss, The Founding of the Jesuits (London 1969), in AHSJ 43 (1974) 176ff., not adequately evaluated; E. M. Buxbaum, Petrus Canisius und die kircheiche Erneuerung des Herzogtums Bayern 1459–1556 (Rome 1973).

THE COUNCIL OF TRENT: The edition of the Acts has been continued by Th. Freudenberger VII:2 (1975); Vol. III of Jedin's Council of Trent, treating the Bologna period and the second period at Trent, appeared in 1970; Vol. IV, on the conclusion, 1562–63, appeared in 1975; H. Rabe, Reichsbund und Interim. Die Verfassungs- und Religionspolitik Karls V. und der Reichstag von Augsburg 1547–48 (Cologne 1971).—On the position of the Protestants at Trent, 1551–52, see M. Brecht, "Abgrenzung oder Verständigung. Was wollten die Protestanten in Trient" Blätter f. Württembergische Kirchengeschichte 70 (1970) 148–175; F. Schrader, "Die Beschickung des Konzils von Trient durch die Diözesen Magdeburg, Halberstadt, Merseburg, Naumburg und Meissen. Ein Briefwechsel aus den Jahren 1551–52" AHC 2 (1970) 303–352.—The debate on the Constitution on Divine Revelation at Vatican II produced a copious body of literature on the subject of the relationship between scripture and tradition, especially by Ortigues, Congar, Bévenot, and others, cited by J. Ratzinger in: Das Zweite Vatikanische Konzil II (Freiburg 1967) 498ff.; M. Midali, "Rivelazione, Chiesa, Scrittura, e Tradizione alle IV Sessione del Concilio di Trento" Salesianum 34, 607–650; 35 (1973) 3–51, 179–246.—Other difficult issues, especially in the postconciliar discussions on the sense and importance of the Tridentine decrees were those on original sin (Sess. V); Z. Alszeghy–M. Flick, "Il Decreto Tridentino sul Peccato Originale" Gregorianum 52 (1971) 595–635; B. A. Vanneste, Het Dogma van de Erfzonde (Utrecht 1969).—On the Eucharist (Sess. XIII), J. Wohlmuth, Realpräsenz und Transsubstantiation im Konzil von Trient, 2 vols. (Bern–Frankfurt 1975); G. Fahrnberger, Amt und Eucharistie auf dem Konzil von Trient, in: P. Bläser, Amt und Eucharistie (Paderborn 1973) 174–207.—On the sacrament of penance (Sess. XIV): H. Jedin, "La Nécessité de la Confession Privée selon le Concile de Trente" La Maison Dieu 104 (1970) 88–115; K. J. Becker, "Die Notwendigkeit des vollständigen Bekenntnisses in der Beichte nach dem Konzil von Trient" Theologie und Philosophie 47 (1972) 161–228, on canon 3 and 10; Fr. Rodriquez: Burgense 13 (1972) 69–84; 14 (1973) 107–136; reaching further back, L. Braekmans, Confession et Communion au Moyen Âge et au Concile de Trente (Gembloux 1971).—On the decree on orders (Sess. XXIII): G. Fahrnberger, Bischofsamt und Priestertum in den Diskussionen des Konzils von Trient (Vienna 1970); P. F. Franzen, Das Konzil von Trient und das Priestertum: Priester-Beruf im Widerstreit, ed. A. Descamos (Innsbruck 1971) 101–137; more on this by I. A. De Aldama, B. Jacqueline, J. Saraiva Martins in: Teologia del Sacerdocio V (Burgos 1973); J. Galot, "Le Caratère Sacerdotal selon le Concile de Trente" NRTh 93 (1971) 123–946.—The sacrament of marriage and the Tametsi: H. Jedin, Die Unauflöslichkeit der Ehe nach dem Konzil von Trient: K. Reinhard–H. Jedin, Ehe–Sakrament in der Kirche des Herrn (Berlin 1971) 61–109, 123–135; G. Di Mattia, "La Dotrina sulla Formazione Canonica del Matrimonio e la Proposta per un Suo Esame" Apollinaris 44 (1971) 471–522.—Material especially on the origin and implementation of the reform decrees of Trent in: Il Concilio di Trento. Atti del Convegno Internazionale Trento 2-6 Settembre 1963, 2 vols. (Rome 1965); H. Jedin, Kirche des Glaubens—Kirche der Geschichte II (Freiburg 1966) (this contains the largest collection of essays by the author on the history of the Council of Trent).

SECTION TWO

The Papacy and the Implementation of the Council of Trent (1565–1605)

THE PAPACY, ROME, AND ITALY: H. Jedin, "Nuntiaturberichte und Durchführung des Konzils von Trient" QF 63 (1973) 180–213; in the same volume are contributions by H. Lutz, G. Lutz, G. Müller, and H. Goetz on the criticisms and evaluations of the reports of the papal nuncios; of special interest here is K. Repgen, "Die Finanzen des Nuntius Fabio Chigi. Ein Beitrag zur Sozialgeschichte der römischen Führungsgruppe im 17. Jh." Geschichte—Wirtschaft—Gesellschaft. Festschrift Clemens Bauer (Berlin 1974) 220–280; J. Krasenbrink, Die Congregatio Germanica und die Kath. Reform in Deutschland nach dem Tridentium (Münster 1972) (=RST 105); H. Jedin, Papst Pius V., die Heilige

Liga und der Kreuzzugsgedanke: Il Mediterraneo nella Seconda Metà del '500 alla Luce di Lepanto (Florence (1974) 193–213; A. Walz, "S. Tommaso d'Aquino Dichiarto Dottore della Chiesa nel 1567" Angelicum 44 (1967) 145–173; P. Hurtubise, "Comment Rome apprit la Nouvelle du Massacre de la Sainte Barthélemy" AHPont 10 (1972) 187–210; J. Mieck, "Die Bartholomäusnacht als Forschungsproblem" HZ 216 (1973) 73–110; N. Sutherland, The Massacre of St. Bartholomew and the European Conflict 1559–1572 (New York 1973); H. D. R. Veroliet, "Robert Granjou à Rome 1578–1589. Note Préliminaire à une Histoire de la Typographie Romaine à la fin du XVI^e^ Siècle" Bull. de l'Institut Belge de Rome 38 (1967) 177–231; H. Jedin, Die Autobiographie des Kardinals G. A. Santorio (Wiesbaden 1969) (=Akademie der Wiss. und der Literatur Mainz, Abh. d. Geistes- und Sozialwiss. Klasse; Jg. 1969, 2); V. Peri, "La Congregazione dei Greci e i Suoi Primi Documenti" Studia Gratiana 13:129–256; V. Peri, Chiesa Romana a "Rito" Greco. G. A. Santoro e la Congregazione dei Greci 1566–1596 (Brescia 1975); J. Krajčar, "The Greek College under the Jesuits for the First Time 1591–1604" OrChrP 31 (1965) 85–118; A. Gasparini, Cesare d'Este e Clemente VIII (Modena 1960); P. Bartl, "Marciare Verso Constantinopoli. Zur Türkenpolitik Klemens' VIII" Saeculum 20 (1969) 44–56.

CHARLES BORROMEO: P. Prodi, "Charles Borromée, Archévêque de Milan et la Papaute" RHE 62 (1967) 379–411; G. Alberigo, "Carlo Borromeo come Modello di Vescovo nella Chiesa Posttridentina" RSIt 79 (1967) 1031–1052; R. Robres Lluch, "La Congregación del Concilio y S. Carlos Borromeo en la Problemática y Curso de la Contrarreforma 1593–1600" Anth. An. 14 (1966) 101–171; a brief compilation with a digest of the canonization decrees and the extensive investigations of E. Cattaneo, C. Marcora, and A. Rimoldi: H. Jedin, Carlo Borromeo ed il Card. Agostino Valier 1566–84 (Verona 1972), contains the correspondence.

ITALY: Examples of apostolic and episcopal visitations in Marocchi, La Riforma Cattolica II:13–44; also S. Tramontin, "La Visita Apostolica del 1581 a Venezia" St. Ven. 9 (1967) 453–533; for the Kingdom of Naples: Nunziature di Napoli II (1577–1587), ed. P. Villani–D. Veneruso (Rome 1969), and III (1587–1591), ed. B. Bettoni (Rome 1970); D. Fenlon, Heresy and Obedience in Tridentine Italy: Cardinal Pole and the Counter Reformation (Cambridge 1972).

SPAIN: B. Llorca, "Acceptación en España de los Decretos del Concilio de Trento" EE 39 (1964) 341–360, 459–482; J. L. Santos Diez, Politica Conciliar Postridentina en España. El Concilio Provincial de Toledo 1565 (Rome 1969); A. Marin Ocete, "El Concilio Provincial de Granada en 1565" ArchTeolGran 25 (1962) 23–178; J. Villegas, Die Durchführung der Beschlüsse des Konzils von Trient in der Kirchenprovinz Peru 1564–1600; Die Bischöfe und die Reform der Kirche (Cologne 1971); Introduction at the parish level: J. I. Tellechea Idigoras, La Reforma Tridentina en San Sebastián. El Libro de Mandatos de Visita de la Parroquia de San Vicente 1540–1670 (San Sebastián 1970).

FRANCE: In addition to the Acta Nuntiaturae Gallicae, Vol. VII which contains the correspondence of the Nuncio G. B. Castelli, 1581–83, edited by R. Toupin in 1967, the most important accounts are: Lettres de Henri IV concernant les Relations du St. Siège et de la France 1595–1609, ed. B. Barbiche (Città del Vaticano 1968) (=Studi e Testi 250); R. Mousnier, The Assassination of Henry IV. The Tyrannicide Problem and the Consolidation of the French Absolute Monarchy in the Early XVII Century (London 1973).

ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND: From the ever-growing body of literature on the establishment of the Anglican Church and the fate of the Catholic minority we can offer only a small selection here: W. P. Haugaard, Elizabeth and the English Reformation. The Struggle for a Stable Settlement of Religion (Cambridge 1968), on the approval of the 39 Articles; for southern England, R. B. Manning, Religion and Society in Elizabethan Sussex. A Study of the Enforcement of the Religious Settlement 1558–1603 (Leicester 1969), with many notes on the Catholic recusants; H. Davies, Worship and Theology in England I: From Cranmer to Hooker 1534–1603 (Princeton 1970).—For the beginning based on the study of the letters of Bentham, see: R. O'Day, "Thomas Bentham" Journal of Eccl. History 23 (1972) 137–159; P. MacGrath, Papists and Puritans under Elizabeth I (London 1967).—C. Cross, The Royal Supremacy in the Elizabethan Church (London 1969), tones down the severity of the execution of the anti-Puritan act and shows that two-thirds of the property of the recusants was not actually confiscated by the Act of 1587, as it was turned over to relatives. The Welsh Elizabethan Martyrs: The Trial Documents of Saint Richard Gwynn and of the Venerable William Davies, ed. A. Thomas (Cardiff 1971), Document; Letters of William Allen and Richard Barret 1572–1598, ed. P. Renold (London 1967), 120 letters of the first two presidents of the Douay College; The Seminary Priests. A Dictionary of the Secular Clergy of England and Wales 1558–1850, Vol. I: Elizabethan, ed. G. Anstruthe (Ware–Durham 1969); L. Rostenberg, The Minority Press and the English Crown. A Study in Repression 1558 to 1625 (Nieukwoop 1971); K. L. Lindley, "The Lay Catholics of England in the Reign of Charles I" Journal of Eccl. History 22 (1971) 199–221; R. J. Bradley, Blacklo and the Counter Reformation. An Inquiry into the Strange Death of Catholic England: Essays in Honour of Garrett-Mattingly, ed. C. H. Carter (London 1966) 366–370, reaches beyond Jedin's periodization; M. O'Connell, Thomas Stapleton and the Counter Reformation (New Haven 1964).

SCOTLAND: The biographies of P. Janton, John Knox. L'Homme et l'Oeuvre (Paris 1967) and J. Ridley, John Knox (Oxford–New York 1968); L. Hammermeyer, "Herrschaftlich-staatliche Gewalt, Gesellschaft und Katholizisimus in Irland vom 16. bis 18. Jh. Aspekte des Postreformatorischen Katholizisimus auf den Britischen Inseln während der Penal Times" Festgabe Karl Bosl (Munich 1969) 191–218.

EASTERN EUROPE: Rich material on the post-Tridentine synods in Poland in Sawickis Concilia Poloniae. An example of a Tridentine visitation in the archdiocese of Cracow in 1599, although there was actually such a visitation in 1565–70: Materly do Dziejow Kosciola w Polsce II, ed. Cz. Skowron (Lublin 1965); Erectici Italiani in Moravia, Polonia, Transilvania 1558–1611, ed. D. Caccamo (Florence–Chicago 1970); L. Szilas, Der Jesuit Alfons Carillo in Siebenbürgen 1591–99 (Rome 1966); Documenta Unionis Berestensis Eiusque Auctorum 1590–1600, ed. A. G. Welykyj (Rome 1970).

CENTRAL EUROPE, THE EMPIRE, AND THE HABSBURG HEREDITARY LANDS: A great deal of information in the continuing editions of the reports of the Cologne Nunciature by B. Roberg (II:2 and II:3: O. M. Frangipani 1590–1593, Munich 1969–71), K. Wittstadt (IV:1: A. Amalteo 1606–7) and W. Reinhard (V:1: A. Albergati 1610–14, Munich 1972); an excellent summary of this research by W. Reinhard in: RQ 66 (1971) 8–65 and by K. Wittstadt in: Festgabe Franzen 695–711. The reports of the nuncios at Graz, G. Malaspina and A. Possevino, 1580–82, were edited by J. Rainer (Vienna 1972); he had previously prepared the reports of G. Delfino and G. F. Commendone, from the imperial court, 1571–72 (NB II:8, Graz–Cologne 1967). On the significance of the Peace of Augsburg: M. Heckel, "Autonomie und Pacis Composito. Der Augsburger Religionsfriede in der Deutung der Gegenreformation" ZSavRGMan 45 (1959) 141–248; H. Raab, "Die oberdeutschen Hochstifte zwischen Habsburg und Wittelsbach in der frühen Neuzeit" Blätter f. Deutsche Landesgesch. 109 (1973) 69–101.

EXAMPLES OF THE WORKS IN VARIOUS TERRITORIAL HISTORIES ON CHURCH RENEWAL: Julius Echter und seine Zeit, ed. F. Merzbacher (Würzburg 1974); O. Schaffrath, Fürstabt Balthasar von Dernbach und seine Zeit. Studien zur Geschichte der Gegenreformation in Fulda (Fulda 1967); H. G. Molitor, Kirchliche Reformversuche der Kurfürsten und Erzbischöfe von Trier im Zeitalter der Gegenreformation 1567–1648 (Wiesbaden 1968); E. Camenzin, Weihbischof Balthasar Würer von Konstanz 1574–1598 und die kirchl. Reformbewegung in den Fünf Orten (Fribourg 1968); J. Bücking, Frühabsolutismus und Kirchenreform in Tirol 1565–1665 (Wiesbaden 1972); J. Köhler, Das Ringen um die Tridentinische Erneuerung im Bistum Breslau vom Abschluss des Trienter Konzils bis zur Schlacht am Weissen Berg (Cologne–Vienna 1973); Die Protokolle des Geistlichen Rates in Münster 1601–1612, ed. H. Immenkötter (Münster 1972).—A hitherto neglected area is covered by U. Eisenhardt, Die Kaiserliche Aufsicht über Buchdruck, Buchhandel und Presse im Hl. Römischen Reich deutscher Nation 1496–1806 (Karlsruhe 1970); H. Raab, "Apostolische Bücherkommission in Frankfurt a. M." HJ 87 (1967) 326–354, where the Index of recommended Catholic books that first appeared in 1614 is mentioned; R. Becker, "Die Berichte des kaiserlichen und apostolischen Bücherkommissars Joh. Ludwig von Hagen an die röm. Kurie 1623–1649" QF 51 (1971) 422.

SECTION THREE

Religious Forces and Intellectual Content of the Catholic Renewal

Literature on the rise of Spanish theology by C. Pozo in: Arch. Teol. Granatino 29 (1966) 87–124; E. Llamas Martinez, "Orientaciones Sobre la Historia de la Teologia Española en la Primera Mitad del Siglo XVI" Repertorio de Historia de la Ciencias Eclesiásticas en España I (Salamanca 1967) 95–174; V. Beltran de Heredia, Domingo Bañez y la Controversia Sobre la Gracia. Textos y Documentos (Madrid 1968); B. Hamilton, Political Thought in Sixteenth Century Spain. A Study of the Political Ideas of Vitorio, De Soto, Suárez, and Molina (Oxford 1963); M. A. Huesbe Llanos, Henning Arnisaeus 1575–1636. Untersuchungen zum Einfluss der Schule von Salamanca auf das Lutherische Staatsdenken (Mainz 1965); G. Galeota, Bellarmino Contro Baio a Lovanio. Studio e Testo di un Inedito Bellarminiano (Rome 1966), also G. Colombo in: La Scuola Cattolica 95 (1967) 307–338; J. Stöhr, Die theologische Wissenschaftslehre des Juan de Perlin (1569–1638) (Münster 1967). A survey of the development of the training of the clergy in the late sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in: M. Arneth, Das Ringen um Geist und Form der Priesterbilding im Säkularklerus des 17. Jhs. (Würzburg 1970).

SPIRITUALITY: A survey in L. Cognet, La Spiritualité Moderne (Aubier 1966) 15–230; F. Chiwaro, Bernardino Rossignoli SJ (1547–1613). Orientamenti della Spiritualità Post-Tridentina (Rome 1967). For a biography of St. Theresa of Avila based upon wider sources and more chronologically precise: Efren de la Madre de Dios—O. Stegink, Tiempo y Vida de Santa Teresa (Madrid 1968); On the struggle over the reform of the Carmelite Order: O. Steggink, La Reforma del Carmelo Español. La Visita Canonica del

General Rubeo y su Encuentro con S. Teresa 1566–67 (Rome 1965); H. J. Prien, Francisco de Ossuna. Mystik und Rechtfertigung (Hamburg 1967); A. Barrado Manzano, San Pedro de Alcántara (Madrid 1965); A. Cistellini, "S. Filippo Neri e la sua Patriá" RSTI 23 (1969) 54–119, on the influence of San Marco and Savonarola: R. Razzi, Vita di S. Caterina di Ricci (Florence 1965); Donna Battista Vernazza da Genova, Commento al Paternoster, ed. G. J. Scatena (Rome 1968), contains a detailed introduction and bibliography; P. Lopez, Riforma Cattolica e Vita Religiosa e Culturale a Napoli dalla Fine del Cinquecento ai Primi del Settecento (Napoli 1964); id., "Le Confraternità Laicali in Italia e la Riforma Cattolica" Rivista di Studi Salernitani 4 (1969) 153–238; H. Reifenberg, Sakramente, Sakramentalien und Ritualien im Bistum Mainz seit dem Spätmittelalter I (Münster 1971), to 1671; K. Pörnbacher, Jeremias Drexel. Leben und Werk eines Barockpredigers (Munich 1965); L. Intorp, Westfälische Barockpredigten in volkstümlicher Sicht (Münster 1964); B. Hubensteiner, Vom Geist des Barock. Kultur und Frömmigkeit im alten Bayern (Munich 1967); Friedrich Spee, Guldenes Tugendbuch, ed. Th. G. M. van Oorschot (Munich 1968).

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGIOUS ORDERS: From the Storia della Compagnia di Gesù in Italia IV on the end of the generalship of Laynez has appeared a comprehensive review of works on the Jesuit theater by M. Scaduto in: AHSJ 36 (1967) 194–215; an account of the same in German-speaking lands by R. G. Dimler, "A Geographic and Genetic Survey of Jesuit Drama in German-Speaking Territories 1555–1609" AHSJ 43 (1974) 133–146; A. Rodríguez Gutiérrez de Ceballos, Bartolomé de Bustamente y los Orígenes de la Arquitectura Jesuítica en España (Rome 1967). For especially wide-ranging and extraordinary literature one might consult the bibliographies in AHSJ.—The reform of the Capuchins is placed within the overall reform movement in: Optat de Veghel, "La Réforme de Frères Mineurs Capucins dans l'Ordre Franciscain et dans l'Église" CollFr 35 (1965) 5–108; Carmelo de la Cruz, "Derecho Reformatorio de Trento en los Primeros Pasos de su Aplicación a la Reforma Teresiana" MonteCarm (Burgos 1965) 49–97; H. Schwendenwein, Franz von Sales und die Entwicklung neuer Formen des Ordenslebens (Eichstätt–Vienna 1966); J. Grisar, Mary Wards Institut vor römischen Kongregationen (1616–1630) (Rome 1966) (=Misc. Hist. Pont XXVII).

SECTION FIVE

European Counter Reformation and Confessional Absolutism (1605–55)

PONTIFICATE OF PAUL V: J. Semmler, Das päpstliche Staatssekretariat in den Pontifiken Pauls V. und Gregors XV. (1605–1623) (Rome 1969); on the Gunpowder Plot see Ph. G. Caraman, Henry Garnet and the Gun-Powder-Plot (London 1964); on the conflict with Venice, W. J. Bouwsma, Venice and the Defence of Republican Liberty. Renaissance Values in the Age of the Counter-Reformation (Berkeley–Los Angeles 1968); P. Sarpi, Opere, ed. G. and L. Cozzi (Mailand 1969). On the editor of Sarpis' Istoria: A. Russo, Marcantonio De Dominis, Arcivescovo di Spalato e Apostata 1560–1624 (Naples 1965); W. Reinhard, "Ein Römisches Gutachten vom Juli 1612 zur Strategie der Gegenreformation im Rheinland" RQ 64 (1969) 168–190; F. Neuer-Landfried, Die Katholische Liga. Gründung, Neugründung und Organisation eines Sonderbundes 1608–1620 (Kellmunz 1968); E. A. Seils, Die Staatslehre des Jesuiten Adam Contzen, Beichtvater Kurfürst Maximilians I. von Bayern (Lübeck–Hamburg 1968).

PONTIFICATE OF CLEMENT VIII: A. Gasparini, Cesare d'Este Clemente VIII (Modena 1960); B. Barbiche, (ed.), Correspondence du Nonce en France Innocenzo del Bufalo, Évêque de Camirno, 1601–04; id., "L'Influence Française à la Cour Pontificale sous le Regime Henri IV" MAH 77 (1965), 277–299; J. de Lamar, Diplomacy and Dogmatism: Bernardino de Mendoza and the French Catholic League (Cambridge, Mass., 1964).

PONTIFICATE OF URBAN VIII: A. Springhetti, "Urbanus VIII. P. M. Poeta Latinus et Hymnorum Breviarii Emendator" AHPont 6 (1968) 163–190. On the significance of the "Politics of Neutrality" of Urban VIII: G. Lutz, Kard. G. Fr. da Bagno. Politik und Religion im Zeitalter Richelieus und Urbans VIII. (Tübingen 1971); A. Kraus, "Der Kardinalnepot Francesco Barberini und das Staatssekretariat Urbans VIII." RQ 64 (1969) 191–208; French nuncio reports: Ranuccio Scotti 1639–41, ed. P. Blet (Rome 1965). On the case of Galileo: G. G. Celebrazioni (Rome 1965); Galilée. Aspects de sa vie et de son oeuvre (Paris 1968); G. Galli, "Il Card. Maculano al Processo di Galileo" Memorie Domenicane NS 41 (1965) 24–42, 65–101; W. Brandmüller, "Der Fall Galilei—im Konflikt Naturwissenschaft und Kirche?" StdZ 162 (1968) 333–342, 399–411; E. Gentili, "Bibliografia Gallileana fra i due Centenari 1942–1964" SC 17 (1964) 267–309; P. Blat, (ed.), Correspondence du Nonce en France Ranuccio Scotti, 1639–41 (Rome 1965); L. von Meerbeeck, (ed.), Correspondence du Nonce Fabio de Lagonissa, 1627–34 (Brussels 1964); questioning Pastor's interpretation of Urbino's politics of neutrality based on his correspondence is Q. Aldea, "Instrucciones de los Ambajadores en Roma, 1631–43" Misc. Comillas 29 (Comillas 1958).

CONVERSIONS: G. Christ, "Fürst, Dynastie, Territorium und Konfession. Beobachtungen zu Fürstenkonversionen des ausgehenden 17. und beginnenden 18. Jh." Saeculum 24 (1973) 367–387; H. Tüchle, "Zum Kirchenwesen fürstlicher Konvertiten des 17. und 18. Jh." Festschrift Ferdinand Maas (Vienna 1973) 231–247.

WITCHCRAFT IN ITALY: C. Ginzburg, I Benendanti. Ricerche sulla Stegoneria e sui Culti Agrari Cinquecento e Seicento (Turin 1966); see also the literature on the subject in: RSCI 25 (1971) 231–237. Against the traditional concept "secularization" see: H. Blumenberg, Säkularisierung und Selbstbehauptung (Frankfurt 1974).

TOLERANCE AND SECULARIZATION OF THE STATE AND OF THOUGHT: F. Dickmann, "Das Problem der Gleichberechtigung der Konfessionen im Reich im 16. und 17. Jh." HZ 201 (1965) 265–305; H. Bornkamm, "Die religiöse und politische Problematik im Verhältnis der Konfessionen im Reich" ARG 56 (1965) 209–218; H. Lutz, "Die Konfessionsproblematik ausserhalb des Reiches und in der Politik des Papsttums" ibid. 218–227; E. Hassinger, Religiöse Toleranz im 16. Jh. Motive, Argumente, Formen der Verwirklichung (Brussels 1966); F. Raab, The English Face of Machiavelli: A Changing Interpretation 1500–1700 (London 1964); G. Lewy, Constitutionalism and Statecraft during the Golden Age of Spain. A Study on the Political Philosophy of Juan de Mariana SJ (Geneva 1961).

INDEX

Aachen 626
Aarhus, bishopric of 302
Abyssinia 589
Abo, bishopric of 302
Absconditas, Luther's doctrine 24
Absolution 42, 352, 423
Absolution, princely 637ff
Acarie, Barbe 559
Accolti 72
Acontius, Jacobus 640
Acosta, José de 585
Acquaviva, Claudius 543, 553, 568f, 586, 639
Acta Sanctorum 551
Ad Dominici gregis curam, bull of (1536) 463
Ad ecclesiae regimen, bull of (1560) 489
Adelphi (Johannes Müling) 171
Aden 589
Adiaphora 293, 351, 424, 427
Adiaphoristic Dispute 350f
Adolf VII, bishop of Merseburg 50, 63
Adrian VI, pope 7, 104–14
—acknowledges responsibility of church and curia 109f
—and Germany 107f
—briefs and instructions on Luther's reformation 108f
—church reform 107
—curia reform 107f
Adrian of Utrecht, cardinal of Tortosa 72
Adult baptism 178
Afonso, king of the Congo 592
Africa 589ff, 614
—missionary work in 591ff
Agazzari 566
Agenda 168, 475
—of the Palatinate 410
Aegidius of Viterbo 438, 439, 458
Agricola, Johannes 231, 289, 294, 342, 344, 349
—Mikael, bishop of Abo 310
—Rudolf 537
Agustín, Antonio, bishop of Alife 485, 552
Ailly, Pierre de 14, 16, 40
Aix 398
Akbar, Great Mogul 597
Accommodation controversy 604
Alba, Duke of 401f, 403, 513
Albarcina, Capucine chapter of (1529) 438f
Alber, Matthäus 247f
Albergati 619
Albrecht, Archduke 513
Albrecht V, Duke of Bavaria 491, 524, 531
Albrecht of Brandenburg-Ansbach 312ff, 353
Albrecht, Duke of Brandenburg-Prussia 211
Albrecht II, Elector of Mainz 10, 44f, 47, 50, 52, 84, 211
Albrecht, Count of Mansfeld 211, 267
Albrecht Alcibiades of Brandenburg-Kulmbach 295
Albret, Jeanne d' 393
Albuquerque, Joao de 595
Alcalá, university of 329, 444, 535, 541, 543, 571
Alcantarius 570
Alciati, Andrea 362, 552
—Terenzio 551, 624
Aldeas 586, 607
Aldobrandini, Cinzio, cardinal 509
Aldobrandini, Ippolito, see Clement VIII
Aldobrandini, Pietro, cardinal 509, 615
Aleander, Girolamo 72, 75f, 76f, 79, 105, 145, 434, 457, 458, 463
Alençon, Duke of 396
Alexander VI, pope 6f, 439, 456, 461, 483, 576f, 590, 608
Alexander VII (Fabio Chigi), pope 568, 627f, 631
Alfons of Bolano 575, 592
Algemene Doopsgezinde Societeit (Dutch Mennonites) 188
Algiers, attack of Charles V on (1541) 280
Allen, William, cardinal 517
Alliances, confessional 211
Alms 56
Alonso de Orozco 556
Alphons of Burgos 443
Alsted, Johann 123f, 130, 133f, 408
Altar, Sacrament of, see Eucharist
Altar tabernacle 563
Altdorf 533

Altenburg, religious discussion of (1568–69) 346
Althammer, Andreas 236
Althaus, P. 220
Althusius, Johann 408
Alting, Menso 404
Altötting 564
Altzelle 293
Alvarez, Balthasar 558
—Diego 543
Alvarez de Paz, Jacob 558f
Alvarez de Toledo, Juan 458
Alveldt, Augustine 67, 69, 203
Amandus, Johannes 312f
Amboina 596
—mission work in 598f
Amboise, palace of 364 —edict of (1563) 395, 514
Ambrosian Library 554
Amerbach 548
Amida 597
Aemiliani, Hieronymus 437
Amling, Wolfgang 409
Ampudias, Pascual de, bishop of Burgos 443
Amsdorf, Nikolaus of 97, 281f, 294, 346f, 348, 349f, 355
Amsterdam 184
Amsterodamus, see Timann
Anabaptism 131, 166, 178–89, 191, 214, 242f, 256, 263, 311, 324, 420, 637 —concept of mission 181f
—condemnation 473
—in Austria 179f
—in England 480
—in Netherlands and Northern Germany 182–88
—in Southern Germany 179
—in Switzerland 178f
—see also Mennonites, Münster, Müntzer
Anchieta, José de, apostle of Brazil 608
Andalusia 454
Andelot, François d' 393
Andersson, Lars 306, 308
Andreä, Jacob 425, 633
Andrea de Novellis, bishop of Alba 440
Andreas of Austria, cardinal 510
Angamale, bishopric of 597
Anger 409
Angers, university of 329
Anglican Church 327, 511, 518, 629
—Apologia ecclesiae Anglicanae (1562–64) 339
—under Elizabeth I 338f
Anglican College in Rome 504
Angola, mission work in 593f
Anhalt, Reformation 409
—church order 410
Anhalt-Dessau, Reformation 268
Ann, Queen of Hungary 208 —daughter of Emperor Ferdinand I 286
Anne of Cleves 334, 335
Ann of Austria 616
Annam, mission work in 606
Annates 106f
Annecy 365
Ansbach 236
Antequera, bishopric of 581
Anthropology, theological 198
Antichrist 9, 60, 64f, 67, 73f, 78, 110, 166, 240, 257, 325, 334, 351f, 371
Antilatomus 82f
Antilles, mission work in 578
Antinomial controversy 341ff
Antiromanism 463
Antitrinitarians, antitrinitarianism 311, 326f, 641
Anthony of Padua 564
Anton, duke of Lorraine 142
Antoninus of Florence 433, 439
Antwerp 542, 553
—bishopric of 512
Äpinus, Johannes 346
Apocalypse 96
Apologia Anhaltina 409
Apologia of the Augsburg Confession 263, 420
Apostolate 433
Apostolic Canons 548
Apostolic Constitutions 548f
Appellants 518
Appeals 462
Appenzell, Reformation 170, 175
Aquila, Caspar 231, 341
Aquino, d', Nuncio 533
Aragón 443, 454
Araoz, P. 453
Arason, Jon, bishop of Holar 305f
Araucans 584
Archinto, Filippo 442, 452, 471, 472
Arequipa, bishopric of 583
Arévalo 446
Arigoni, cardinal 544, 616
Aristotle, in Luther 15ff, 19, 41
Aristotelianism, new Protestant-humanistic 104
Armenian College in Rome 504
Arminians 640
Arran, count of 411
Arras, bishopric of 512
—union (1579) 402
Art decree of Tridentine Council 565
Arthur, brother of Henry VIII 328f
Artois 238, 402
Artolatry 360
Arts 642
Arts and literature, post-Tridentine development 565f
Aschhausen, bishop of Bamberg 510, 526, 626
Asia, mission work in 595–606
Aske, Robert 332f
Astalli 631
Astete 561
Astorga 466, 481
Astrology 424, 639
Atahualpa 582

Audet, Nicholas 438, 460
Auger, Edmond 561, 569
Augsburg 175, 179f, 266, 270, 293, 294, 317, 421, 526, 530, 621
—Diet (1518) 55, 200
—Diet (1530) 181, 192, 254–65, 352, 435
  —apologia by Melanchthon 263ff
  —confutation of Charles V 260ff
  —creation of the Confession 255ff
  —development 259–260
—Diet (1547) (Violent Diet) 288f
—Diet (1550–51) 294
—Diet (1555) 295ff
—Diet (1566) 407, 522
—Reformation 268
—synod of martyrs (1527) 181
Augsburg Confession, Confessio Augustana 9, 204, 222, 255f, 260f, 265, 269f, 272, 275f, 297f, 334, 357, 386, 402, 407, 410, 420, 425, 633ff
—in Denmark (1538) 304
—in Livonia 317
—in Poland 319
—in Sweden 310
Augsburg interim see Interim
Augsburg "Reform" 476
Augsburg, religious peace of (1555) 295ff, 421, 484, 488, 489, 499, 522f, 620, 626f, 626
August I, Elector of Saxony 346, 361f, 425
Augustinians 469
—chapter in Heidelberg (1518) 53
—mission in Brazil 608
——in Japan 601
——in Mexico 580
——in New Granada 584
——in Peru 582
Augustinian Discalceati (Discalced) 570
Augustinian Eremites (Hermits) 445, 459, 570
—mission in the Philippines 587
Augustinian Recollects
—mission in the Philippines 588
Augustinian schools, 535, 541
Augustinianism 535, 541, 644
Augustine 10, 32, 36, 38, 40, 54, 70, 117f, 159
—Luther's view of 14ff
Austria 428, 499, 622
—development of denominations 421
Authority, spiritual 138
Authority, spiritual and temporal —division according to Luther 217
Authors, ecclesiastical 549
Autos Sacramentales 563
Avignon 570
—Exile 5
Ayamonte 502
Azpilcueta, Martín de 552
Aztecs, empire of 580
Azzolini, Decio 631

Badajoz 466
Baden (Switzerland)
—Disputation (1526) 172ff, 203, 256
——Real Presence of Christ 174
——Verdict of Baden 175
—religious colloquy (1589) 633
—Treaty (1583) 533f
Baden-Baden, Margraviate 524, 531f
Badia, cardinal 457f
Baglione 632
Bagno, nuncio 625
Baía, see São Salvador
Baius, Michael 535, 541f, 631
Balboa, Vasco Nuñez de 578
Bamberg 242, 626
—priest seminary 526
Báñez, Dominicus 538, 539, 543, 557
Ban (excommunication) 233, 258f, 352
Baptism, sacrament 250, 271, 278, 292, 314, 335, 337, 415, 472
—liturgy, Lutheran 229f
—Luther's views 65, 69
——external sign of the Church 214
—Müntzer's view 131
Baptist movement, see Anabaptists
Baptists, community of 183
Barbaro, Francesco 440
Barberini, family 623, 665f
—Antonio the Elder, cardinal 623
—Antonio the Younger, cardinal 623, 628
—Francesco, cardinal 554, 623, 624, 631, 633
—Maffeo, see Urban VIII
Barbosa, Agostino 552
Barcelona, peace (1529), 240
Barnabites 435, 436, 562
Barnes, Robert 329, 334, 336
Baroque, art 565f
—piety 564
Baronius, Caesar, cardinal 509, 540, 544, 550f, 554, 555, 567, 615, 617
Barozzi, Pietro, bishop of Padua 440
Barreto, Nuñez 455
Bärwalde, treaty of (1631) 625
Bartfeld, school 322
Bartholomaeus a Martyribus 556
Bartholomew, massacre of St. (1572) 395, 514
Bartolomé de Olmedo 580
Basel 167, 175, 176, 252, 267, 382, 553
—bishopric 533
—diocesan synod (1581) 533
—peace (1499) 156
—Reformation 172ff
——Reformation regulation (1528) 174
Basilians 521
Bastida 544
Bathory, Stephan, prince of Siebenbürgen 326, 519f
Baume, Pierre de la, bishop of Geneva 365
Bautista, Pedro 601
Bavaria 268, 269, 273, 286, 428, 532, 621
—concordat (1583) 524
Beaton, David, cardinal 411
—James, archbishop of Glasgow 518

Beaulieu, peace (1576) 396, 514
Becanus, Martin 637
Beccadelli, Ludovico 466
Beccaria 544
Beda, Natalis 362
Beier, Leonhard 53
Belgium 376
Belgrade 108, 208
Bellarmine, Robert, cardinal 428, 508, 536f, 539f, 543, 545, 549, 560, 605, 616f, 637, 643
Bellay, cardinal 636
Beltrán, Louis 584
Bemburg 410
Bencedi Szekely, Stephan 325
Benedictus deus, bull (1564), affirming Tridentine Council 497
Benedict XIV, pope 540
Benedictines 427, 459
—Austrian congregation 572
—congregation of Montecassino 572
—mission in Brazil 608
—post-Tridentine development 571
—Spanish 535
—Swabian congregation 572
—Swiss congregation 572
Benefices, accumulation of 7f, 292, 441, 472
Berchmans, John 568
Bergamo 434, 437
—bishopric 502
Bergen, bishopric 302
—assembly of nobles (1539) 304
Berlin 357
Bern 167, 175f, 177, 267, 366, 368, 382, 639
—Disputation (1528) 172, 385
—Disputation (1535) 366
—Reformation 174
—religious colloquy (1527) 175
—religious mandate (1528) 176
—synod (1537) 385
Bernardin de Sahagún 581
Bernerio, cardinal 545
Bernard of Clairvaux 32, 105
Bernard, bishop of Canary Islands 575
Bernhardi, Bartolomäus 85
Bernardino of Asti 438
Bernardino of Feltre 434
Bernini 565, 631
Bertano, cardinal 482
Bertini, Antonio, bishop of Foligno 440
Bérulle, Pierre de 559, 567
Beuckelsz, Jan 185
Béza, Theodore 376, 394, 490
Biandrata, Giorgio 320, 326
Bible 138f, 510, 536, 546f
—Christian's 304
—editions 202
—explanation 546
—translations 311, 468, 546
— —Eck's 196
— —German 94
— —Luther's 94ff
— —Polish 520
— —see also Vulgata
Biberach 267
Bibliotheca Angelica 554
Bibliotheca Sanctorum Patrum 548
Bidermann, Jakob 566
Biel, Gabriel 10, 14, 16f, 39
Bigne, Marguerin de la 547
Billick, Eberhard 283, 477
Binewald, Matthias 317
Bini(us), Severin 529, 548
Birckmann, Johann 553
Birgitta 301
—Order 301
Bíró, Mátyás Devai
Bishop's Book of Henry VIII 335
Bistriz 323
Bishoprics, secularization 298
Bizer, E. 31, 36, 37, 478
Black Acts 417f
Blackwell, George, archpriest 518, 620
Blackwater, victory by O'Neill (1598) 519
Blandrata, Giorgio 641
Blankenfeld, Johannes, archbishop of Riga 316
Blarer, Jakob Christoph, bishop of Basel 533
Blaurer, Ambrosius 269
Blois, assembly of Estates General (1577/78) 515
Blondel 548
Blosius, see Louis de Blois
Bloodbath of Stockholm (1520) 302, 306
Bluecoat, see Jörg of the House of Jacob
Blyssem 532
Bobadilla, Nicholas 448, 453
Boeckbinder, Bartel 184f
Bodenstein, Andreas Rudolf, see Karlstadt
Bodin, Jean 636, 637, 638
Bohemia 499, 621
—development of denominations 421
Bohemian Brothers 311
—in Poland 319
Böhmer, H. 128, 453
Bohoric, Adam 325
Boleyn, Anne 154, 328, 330, 338
Bologna 240, 254, 454, 463, 469, 502
—transfer of Council of Trent (1547) 288, 473
—university 329
Blognetti, papal nuncio 519
Bolsec, Jérôme 381f, 383
Bonaventure 49, 569
Boncompagni, Ugo, see Gregory XIII
Bonhomini, Giovanni Francesco 504, 528, 533
Boniface of Colle 436
Boniface VIII, pope 5
Bonuccio 460, 468
Book of Common Order 415
Book of Common Prayer (1549) 337, 517
Book of Discipline by John Knox 414ff
— — by Melville 416
Book of Homilies (1562) 339

Book of Martyrs 338
Bora, Katharina von 143
Borghese, Camillo, see Paul V
—Gasparo 623
—Scipione 616
Borgia, Francis 454, 558, 568, 593
Börglum, bishopric 302
Bornemisza, P., bishop of Weissenburg 326
Bornkamm, H. 264
Borromeans 574
Borromeo, Charles 437, 489, 498, 499, 502f, 511, 533, 556, 561, 563, 619, 637
—activity in Milan 502
Borromeo, Federigo, cardinal, archbishop of Milan 489, 502, 554
Bosio, Antonio 548
Botero, Giovanni 637
Bothwell, count 414
Bourbon, House of 514, 616
—Antoine de 393
—Charles de 515f
Bourdoise 516
Bourges, university 329
Bovio, 545
Boyl, Bernal 578
Braga 492
Braganza, House of 628
—revolt (1640) 614
Brahe, Tycho 505
Braitmichel, Kaspar 183
Brandenburg 298, 477, 529, 616, 626
—electoral 621
—established church 274
—Protestant church regulation (1539–40) 274
Brandenburg, Johann Georg von, bishop of Strasbourg 528
Brandenburg-Ansbach 255, 266
Brandenburg-Nürnberg church regulation (1533) 352
Brazil 576, 589, 614
—mission to 606ff
Brask, Hans, bishop of Linköping 307
Braun, Conrad 550
Braunsberg, Jesuit college 520
Braunschweig 267, 273, 286
—school regulation (2528) 235
Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel, Reformation 281
Bray, Guido de 399, 400f
Brébeuf, Jean de 609
Breitenfeld, victory of Gustavus Adolfus (1631) 625
Bremen 267, 298, 356, 358, 529, 626, 627
—Calvinism 409
—Philippism 409
Brendel, Daniel, archbishop of Mainz 527
Brenner, bishop of Seckau 525
Brenz, Johannes 53, 172, 236, 269f, 275, 343, 352, 359
Brescia 435, 437
—Oratory 435
Breslau 357
—bishopric 531, 622
Brest, synod (1596) 521
Brest Bible (1563) 320
Brethren of the Common Life 399
Breviarium Pianum 547
—Romanum (1568) 500
Breviary, reform of 485, 495, 501, 561, 624
Brieg in Silesia, Reformation 269
Briesmann, Johannes 312f, 316
Broët 448
Brötli, Johannes 178
Brück, Electoral Saxon chancellor 259, 263f, 350
—A.Ph. 528
Brotherly love 216
Brothers Hospitallers 573
Bruges 399
—bishopric 512
Brully, Pierre 399f
Brunner, Jörg 174
—P. 222
Bruno, Giordano 509, 642
Brunotte, W. 222
Brussels 399, 401, 403, 454
Bucer, Martin 53, 84, 154, 181, 184, 189, 249f, 267, 270, 275f, 277, 280, 283f, 291, 307, 337, 359, 364, 370ff, 373, 385, 398, 399
Buchholzer, Georg 357
Bucovice 183
Buda 320, 321, 324
—Diet (1523) 322
Buenos Aires, bishopric 583
Bufalini 507
Bugenhagen, Johann 98, 137, 231, 233, 236, 249, 270, 281, 304, 315, 356
Bullinger, Heinrich 127, 253, 326, 356, 359, 364, 370, 386ff, 407
Bünderlin, Hans 189
Buonarotti, Michelangelo 457
Burali 503
Burckhardt, Georg, see Spalatin
Bure, Idelette de 370, 399
Burg bei Stein, Reformation 170
Burgos, chapter (1506) 445
Burgundy 238, 295
Burma (Pegu) 590, 605
Bursfeld Union O.S.B. 572
Bus, César de 561
Busaeus 633
Butigella 459

Caballero, Antonio de S. Maria 605
Cabral, Francisco 576, 589, 600
Cabrini, Francesco 435
Caetani, cardinal 624
Cajetan, Thomas (de Vio), cardinal 43, 53, 54ff 60ff, 72, 200f, 438f, 458f, 538
Cajetan (Gaetano) of Thiene 436, 483
Calahorra 466, 481
Calender reform of Gregory XIII 504f
Calenius, Gerwin 553

Caligari, papal nuncio 519
Calixtus III, pope 43
Calixt, George 635
Calvi 459
Calvin, Jean 253, 275, 284, 319f, 325, 356ff, 386, 387ff, 391, 399, 403, 405, 412, 425, 543
—and France 391ff
—and the Netherlands 398
—church service regulation for Strasbourg 369f —concept of the church 364
—establishment of church rule in Geneva (1541–1564) 373ff
—eucharistic doctrine and attempts to establish church and eucharistic agreements among Protestants 383ff, 387ff
—in Geneva (1536–38) 365ff, 371f
—in Strasbourg (1538–41) 369ff
—Institutio 365, 369, 377, 380, 383f
—outlines of his theology 376ff
—personality and work 361–405
—relationship to Luther 370
—second eucharistic dispute 356ff
—teaching procedures 379ff
—youth, studies, first writings (1509–36) 361ff
Calvinism, Calvinists 253, 299, 311, 356, 425, 488, 499, 511, 628, 632, 635, 644
—and development of denominations 427
—and Lutheranism 425
—and power of the state 422
—completion of the Reformation 410f
—spread in western Europe 390–419
——in France 391ff, 514
——in Germany 402ff
——in Poland 320
——in Sweden 309
——in the Netherlands 398ff
Camaldoli 435
Camaldolese 571
Cambodia, mission to 606
Cambrai 464, 465
—archbishopric 512
—treaty (1529) 240
Cambridge 333
—university 329
Camillus de Lellis 573
Camillians 573
Camin 298
Campanella, Tommaso 642
Campeggio, Lorenzo, cardinal 209, 210f, 254, 259f, 271, 329, 439, 463
—Tommaso, legate 275, 457, 471
Campion, Edmund 517
Camus, J. P. 641
Canada 608
—mission to 609
Canary Islands, mission to 575
Candia 629
Canigiani, archbishop of Aix 516
Canisio, Egidio 458
Canisius, Peter 425, 453, 455, 484, 487, 497, 532, 534, 537, 550, 554f, 560, 635
Cano, Melchior 454, 477, 537f
Canon law 552, 644
Canterbury, archbishopric 327, 480
—provincial synod (1555–56) 480
Cão, Diogo 592
Cape Verde Islands, bishopric 592
Capito, Wolfgang Fabricius 84, 172, 181, 189, 275f, 364, 370
Capodiferro, legate 479
Capranica, cardinal 442
Capuchins 438, 532f, 562, 570, 614, 622
—mission in Brazil 608
——in Near East 609f
Carafa, family 489
—Alfonso 487
—Antonio, cardinal 500, 503, 507, 546, 554
—Carlo 483, 487, 489, 622
—Gian Pietro, see Paul IV
—Oliviero, cardinal 436, 439, 458, 483
Cardinal College, Oxford 327, 334
Cardinals, college of 439, 506
—at beginning of reform 458ff
—congregations of 506f
——for proselytizing infidels 610
Carillo, Sancha 556
Carinthia 525, 622
Caritas, 433
—Luther's view 15f
Carmelites 438, 460, 512, 614
—mission in Brazil 608
——in Mexico 581
—mysticism 557f
Carnesecchi, Pietro 500
Carolina 106, 280
Carpi, Rodolfo Pio, cardinal 450, 460, 463
Carranza, Bartolomé 503, 538, 549
Cartagena, bishopric 585
Carthusians 571
Cartier, Jacques 608
Cartwright 339, 518
Casa, Giovanni della 486
Casaubonus, Isaac 550
Casimir, margrave of Brandenburg-Kulmbach 405
Cassander, Georg 154, 523, 634, 635
Castagna, Gian Battista, see Urban VII
Castelberger, Andreas 178
Castellani, Alberto 479
Castelli 501
Castellio, Sebastian 381, 383, 640
Castello, Castellino da 502
Castelnuovo 437
Castile 444, 454
Castro, Alfonso de 477
Castro war 624
Castro Mahalo, Matteo de 612
Catacombs 548
Câteau-Cambrésis, peace (1559) 488, 489
Catechetics 206, 559ff
—reformatory 234ff

Catechisms 202, 205, 311, 420, 425f, 475, 496, 537
—Bellarmine's Large (1598) 540
— —Small (1597) 540
—Calvin's 367
—Catholic 561
—Laski's (1554) 356
—Luther's 236f
—Malabaric 596
—reformatory 236f
—Roman (1566) 425, 500, 560
Catharine of Aragon, queen of England 241, 328ff, 480
Catharine of Genoa 434
Catharine de Médicis, see Medici
Catharine, queen of Sweden 519
Catharinus, Ambrosius 78, 201, 334
Cathedral chapters 494
Catherine, duchess of Camerino 438
Catholics 420, 632, 643
Catholic Bible of Mainz 546
Catholic places (Switzerland) 533
Catholic Prayer Book, Polish 520
Catholic reform 615, 631f
—and council 456
—beginnings in Rome under Paul III 456–65
—continuity under Paul V and Gregory XV 619
— —under Marcellus II 483
— —under Paul IV 483ff
—definition 431f
—implementation of Tridentine decrees under Pius V, Gregory XIII, Sixtus V, and Clement VIII (1565–1605) 499–534
—in Germany 524–32
—origin and realization (to 1563) 433–98
—preliminary stages in Italy and Spain 433–46
—principle 439
—realization (1551–59) 479–88
Cauvin, Gérard, Calvin's father 362
Cave, peace (1557) 483, 485
Cebu, bishopric 588
Cegled Mako 324
Celebes, mission to 598
Celibacy 85ff, 119, 335
—obligation and monastic vows 85ff
Celio 632
Censorship 210
—see also Index
Centuries 550f
Ceporinus, Jakob 169
Ceremonies 246, 258f, 276, 290, 293, 423, 427, 547, 562
—Lutheran 227
Cervini, Marcello, see Marcellus II
Cesi, Paolo Emilio, archbishop of Lund 303
Ceva 631
Ceylon, mission to 598
Chacon, Alphons 548
Chamber, papal 462, 498, 644
—reform 497
Chambord, treaty (1552) 294
Chambre ardente 391
Champlain, Samuel 609
Chancellery, papal 462, 505, 506, 644
—reform 497
Chantal, Jane Frances Frémiot de 559, 574
Chao-ch'ing 603
Chapters 298, 627
—secularization 298
Charcas, bishopric 583
Charles, archduke 525
Charles of Bourbon 239
Charles of Lorraine, cardinal 391
Charles I, king of England 629
Charles IX, king of France 393, 395, 489, 513, 514
Charles IX, king of Sweden 310
Charles V (I of Spain), emperor of Germany 55, 62, 71, 75, 76f, 80, 104f, 106, 111, 114, 208f, 211, 238f, 242, 244, 253, 258, 260ff, 266f, 271, 273, 279f, 284, 293, 294ff, 299, 302, 321, 329, 335, 398ff, 402, 445, 451, 453, 463f, 474, 480, 485, 488, 496, 513, 580, 585, 633 —alliance policy 273, 278, 289
—and Clement VII 237–41
—and Council of Trent 286
—and Paul III 285ff
—and Schmalkalden 287
—campaign against France 284
—coronation (1530) 240
—council plans 239ff
—fight against Reformation in the Netherlands 398ff
—journey to Italy (1529) 241
—leaves Germany (1553) 295
—resigns imperial crown (1556) 299
—Schmalkaldic War 283
Charron, Pierre 641
Chastity 86
Chelm 521
Chemnitz, Martin 523
Chiapas, bishopric 580
Chichester, bishopric 337
Chieregati, Francesco, legate 108f
Chieti, bishopric 483
Chigi, Fabio, see Alexander VII
Chile, mission to 584
China 576, 596
—mission to 602ff
Chioggia 468
Cholinus, Maternus 553
Christ Church College, Oxford 327
Christian, prince of Anhalt 410
Christian II, king of Denmark 119, 302f, 305
Christian III, king of Denmark 303
Christian IV, king of Denmark 304
Christian I, elector of Saxony 361
Christian Wilhelm, margrave of Brandenburg 633
Christian research of antiquity 548

Christian understanding (1530) 252
Christian Union of Catholic towns in Switzerland and Austria 244
Christian militia 590
Christians, persecutions of
—in Canada 609
—in Japan 601f
Christ's human nature 246, 353
Christoph, duke of Württemberg 269, 296, 407
Chronology 552
Chur
—bishopric 533
—Reformation 171
Church 278, 290, 371f
—abuses on eve of Reformation 6f
—and spiritual office in Luther's view 220ff
—and state, see State —authority and power 201, 202, 203f
—definition (ecclesiology) 9f, 195, 337, 541
——according to de Bray 400
——according to Calvin 383f
——according to Luther 69f, 78, 195, 213–17
——after Council of Trent 496
—hierarchical order 278
—literary opponents of Luther 191–207
—reform 208ff
——see also Catholic reform
—survival in western and eastern Europe 511–22
—under influence of formation of denominations 427
Church, Catholic 425
—after peace of Westphalia 643
—and power of state 421f
—centralism 644
—episcopalism 644f
—formalism 644
—in England 630
—in Ireland 630
—post-Tridentine 644
Church constitution, Protestant 217
—Lutheran, expansion 230ff
Church councils, see Consistories
Church discipline 217, 233
—Calvin's 366f
—Luther's view 223
Church fathers 536, 546
—editions 547ff
Church history 550ff
—as academic discipline 552
Church hymn, German 131, 206, 428, 562
Church law 644
Church ordinance for Denmark 304
—for Norway 304
Church, people's, Lutheran 228, 231
Church property 262, 263, 279, 284, 291, 296, 301, 462, 638ff
—regulation 225–27
—secularization 225f
Church reform 162, 208, 465
—and Adrian VI 106f, 109, 111
Church regimen 217
—by state 219–25, 229ff
—according to Calvin 373ff
Church regulations, Protestant 420, 426
—Lutheran 223, 229ff
—see also individual countries
Church schism 456, 464
Church visitation, see Visitation
Cicada 471f
Cisneros, abbot of Montserrat 452
Cistercians 459, 572
—formation of congregations 572
—post-Tridentine development 572
Civil servants, state of 637
Clandestine marriage 494
Clement VI, pope 575
Clement VII (Giulio Medici), pope 209, 237, 261, 329, 435, 436, 438, 442, 456, 479ff, 500, 504, 540
—and Charles V 237–41
—and France 237ff
Clement VIII (Ippolito Aldobrandini), pope 205, 397, 509ff, 515, 519, 543, 549, 561, 593, 610, 615, 623 —and dispute over grace 543f
Clément, Jacques 396, 515
Clericalism 6
Clergy 6f
—education 426
—monopoly of instruction 6
—native in mission areas 612ff
—privileges of position 6
Cleves 281, 284f, 399, 403, 404
Coburg 427
Cocchi, Angelo 605
Cochin, bishopric 596, 614
Cochinchina, mission to 606
Cochläus, Johannes 6, 46, 50, 79, 96, 193f, 197, 202, 204, 261, 262, 275, 547
Condure 448
Coelho 600
Coello 451
Cognac, league of (1526) 212, 238
Coimbra 454, 535
Colet, John 154, 327
Coligny, Gaspard, admiral 393f, 514
—Odet de, cardinal 393
Colleges, English 517
Collegium Germanicum in Rome 504, 530
Cologne 531, 535, 554, 571
—bishopric 528, 531
—diocesan synod (1589) 528
—diocesan synod (1662) 529
—electors, assembly of (1530) 266
—Jesuit college 532
—peace congress (1636–40) 627
—priest seminary 528
—reform synods 292
—reformation attempts 283f

—university 198
—war (1583) 528
"Cologne Reformation" 283
Colombia 584
Colonna, family 239
—Marc Antonio, cardinal 508
—Pompeo, cardinal 239
—Sciarra 5
—Vittoria 439, 457
Columbus, Christopher 576, 579, 589
Commandments and vows 86f
Commendone, Giovanni Francesco, cardinal 489, 504, 522, 541
Common penny 113
Communero rebellion 445
Communion of both kinds 89, 120, 257, 259, 290, 337, 428, 477, 491
—actual 356, 389
—of one kind 335
—see also Lay chalice
Community box 90, 226f
Commutatio idiomatum 28f, 32, 359
Commutations 42
Compagnia delle dimesse di S. Orsola, see Ursulines
Compagnie des pasteurs 373, 381
Complutensian Polyglot 444, 546
Concepción de la Vega, bishopric 579
Conciliarism 5, 239, 317, 462, 467
Conclave, reform 481
Concomitance 202
Concord, Book of (1580) 237, 425
Concord, formula of (1577) 355, 361
Concordat of Leith 416
Concordats 5
Concubinage 7, 86, 161, 496, 523
Concupiscence
—Luther's views 25f, 201
—at the Council of Trent 468f
Condren, Charles de 559
Confessio Anhaltina 409
Confessio Augustana, see Augsburg Confession
Confessio Augustana Variata 356, 359, 386, 405, 410
Confessio Belgica 400, 401, 426
Confessio Gallicana 392, 425f
Confessio Hafniensis 303
Confessio Helvetica Posterior (1566) 326, 408, 425
Confessio Negativa 417
Confessio Pentapolitana 322
Confessio Scotica 413, 417, 425
Confessio Virtembergica 269
Confession 257, 271, 278, 335, 562
Confessional 562f
Confessing Church 228
Confessions 420, 425f
—reformed 425f
Confirmation 278, 293, 472, 562
Confraternities 433, 562, 563
—of Christian Doctrine 561
—of Christian Instruction 501, 561
—of Divine Love, Naples 434
—of the Eucharist 441
Confutatio Lutheranismi Danici 303
Confutation of Charles V 260–63
Congo 501, 592
—mission to 592
Congregation
—Calvin's concept 383
—Luther's concept 215–221
—Lutheran, expansion 225–37
Congregations, papal 644
—of bishops 505
Congegation of Propaganda 553, 571, 605, 610–14
—difficulties as supreme missionizing office
——with Orders 614
——with patronage powers 613f
——within the Curia 614
—establishment of Propaganda college in Rome 612
—founding (1622) 618
—planning center of Counter-Reformation 619
—renunciation of limiting missionary work to Europe 613
Conquistadores, Spanish 577ff
Conscience, freedom of conscience 298, 350
Consensus Bremensis 409
Consensus Tigurinus (1549) 253, 356, 361, 386, 389ff
Consilium de emendanda Ecclesia (1537) 461, 483
Consistories 233f, 374f, 427
Consistory, regulations (1542) 233
Consistory, plenary session of cardinals 481, 505f
Constance 175, 176, 243, 258, 267, 270, 293, 526, 530, 621, 626
—diocesan synod (1560) 533
—diocesan synod (1567) 526
—diocesan synod (1609) 527, 562
Constitution of congregation, Calvinistic 366f, 425
Consul, Stephan 325
Consultatio de articulis inter Catholicos et Protestantes controversis (1564) 634
Contarini, Gasparo, cardinal 203, 205, 277ff, 434, 440, 448, 458, 459, 461, 464
Controversies, doctrines of 199, 495
Controversies, sermons 560
—writings 634
Controversy, theologians, Catholic 191–207, 539
—John Fisher 334
Controversy, theology 535, 547
Conventuals 438, 459f, 569, 571
Conversions 632f
Copenhagen
—assembly of lords (1530).303f
—assembly of lords (1533) 304

Copernican system 642f
Copernicus, Nicholas 642
Cordatus, Conrad 34, 321, 348
Cordeses, A. 558
Coria
—reform synod (1537) 512
—synod (1606) 512
Cornelius a Lapide (van Steen) 547
Coronel 543
Corpus Catholicorum 191
Corpus Christi 293
—procession 563
Cortés, Hernán 580
Cortese, Gregorio 458
Corvinus, Anton 281
Cosimo, duke of Florence 489, 500
Cosimo I, grand duke of Tuscany 615
Coster 451
Coton, Pierre 616
Council 200, 259, 285, 291
—agreement of Paul III 279
—attempts of Charles V 261
—authority 244
—call by Paul III to Mantua (1537) 271
—calls for 462ff
—demands of Catholic and Protestant estates 270
—plans of Diet of Speyer (1529) 243
—Protestant appeals to 259
—rejection of Protestant participation 271ff Councils, ecumenical
—editions 549
—of Basel (1431–45) 5, 444
—of Constance (1414–18) 5, 444
—Fifth Lateran (1512–17) 10, 439, 441f, 461
—of Trent (1545–63) 286f, 295, 425, 637
——agenda 467
——beginnings 286, 466ff
——confirmation 497
——congregation 506
——controversial doctrines 495
——convocation of 464f
——crisis 491ff
——decree of justification 469ff
——episcopate 492ff, 497
——eucharist, doctrine of 474, 477
——first session (1545–48) 466–76
——historical significance 496f
——implementation (1565–1605) 499–534
——marriage reform decree 494
——move to Bologna 288, 473ff
——orders, reform 495
——ordination, sacrament 493
——participants 466
——reform 492ff
——reform negotiations 478
——residence crisis 491f
——residence decree 493
——sacrament of penance 474, 477
——sacrificial nature of mass, decree 492
——second session (1551–52) 476–479
——suspension 464, 476
——third session (1562–63) 490–98
——voting rights 466f
Counter-Reformation 621f, 624, 637, 643f —beginnings in central Europe 615–23
—definition 431f
—European and denominational absolutism 615–45
—in Bohemia 622f
—in Hungary 622
—in the German Empire 626f
—see also Catholic reform
Court practice 462
Covarruvias, Didacus de 552
Covenant (1557) 412
Crabbe 549
Cracow 318, 320, 571
—peace (1525) 314
Cracow, Georg 361
Crafftheim, Crato von 357
Craig, John 417
Cramer, Samuel 184
Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury 329ff, 334, 336, 337, 338, 339
Credulitas 201
Crell, Paul 361
Cremona 435
Crépy, peace of (1544) 285, 399, 464
Crescenzio, Marcello 476, 478
Croatia, Reformation 325f
Crockaert, Petrus 537
Cromer, Martin 519
Cromwell, Oliver 332, 334, 336, 629
Cromberg, Schweikard von 527
Cross, breviary of the Holy 485 —sacrifice 492
Crotus, Rubeanus 144
Cruciger, Caspar 275, 340, 348f
Crusade, indulgence 42
Crusade idea 443
Cryptocalvinism 356, 360, 426
Csanad 322, 324
Cuius regio eius et religio 421, 522
Cult 246
—see also Ceremonies
Culvensis, Abraham 319
Cum ad tollenda, bull (1550) 476
Cumaná 585
Cum occasione, bull (1563) 631
Cum postquam, constitution 59
Cum sicut maiestas, bull (1500) 590
Cuper, Willem 184, 185
Curaeus, Joachim 361
Curia, Roman 193, 644
—and peace of Augsburg 299f
—and Reformation in Sweden 307f
—in Luther's reform writings 67f
—reform
——attempts by Julius III 481f
——beginnings under Paul III 461
——under Adrian VI 106ff

——under Paul IV 485
——under Pius IV 497
——reorganization under Sixtus V
—see also Dataria, Congregations, Penitentiary
Curione, Celio Secundo 641
Customs 210, 290, 291, 424, 428
Cuzco, bishopric 582f

Daimyos 599f, 601f
Dainichi 599
Dalberg, archbishop of Mainz 527
Dalmatin, Jurij 325
Dandino, cardinal 465, 479, 482
Danzig 318, 356
—attack on monasteries (1524) 318
Darnley, Henry 413
Dataria, papal 461f, 485f
Dati, Julian 434
Dávid, Ferenc 324, 326
Deacons (Calvinist church service regulation) 375
Dead, mass for 314
Debrecen 325
—synod (1567) 326
De captivitate Babylonica ecclesiae praeludium, by Luther 68ff, 83, 87, 92, 98, 193
Decet Romanum Pontificem, bull (1520) 76f
Declaratio Ferdinandea 297, 298, 626
Decretum Gratiani, see Gratian
Decretum pro Armenis (1439) 473
Defensor Pacis 331
Decalogue 341ff
Delfino, Giovanni Antonio 459
—Pietro 435
—Zaccaria, cardinal 296, 484f, 489, 504
Del Monte, Antonio 479
—Giovanni Maria, see Julius III
—Innocenzo 482
Delrío, Martin Anton 640
Denck, Hans 181f, 189
Denifle, H. 39
Denmark 301, 305, 309, 317
—Reformation 302ff
Denominations, creation of 644
Denominations, development of Protestant 255–58
—in 16th and 17th centuries 419–29
—see also Augsburg Confession, Professio fidei Tridentina
Denominationalism 632–37
Dernbach, abbot of Fulda 526
De Rossi 548
Descartes, René 641
Dessau 410
—alliance (1525) 211
Determinism 345
Devai Biro, Matthias 324
Deventer, bishopric 513
Devil 639
Devonshire 338
Devotio moderna 3, 444, 452
Devotion, popular 9, 534
—post-Tridentine 563f
Devotional literature 311
Deza, archbishop of Seville 444
Diamper, provincial synod (1599) 597
Diaz, Bartolomeo 589
Didacus of Alcala 575
Dieckhoff, A. W. 221
Dietenberger, Johannes 96, 202, 205, 546, 561
Dietrich, Veit 344
Dietrich von Erbach, archbishop 8
Dietrich von Schönberg 312
Dietrichstein, cardinal 510, 622
Dillenburg, synod (1578) 408
Dillingen 526, 536
—diocesan synod (1567) 526
—Jesuit college 455, 526
—priest seminary 526
—university 455, 526
Dilthey, Wilhelm 639
Diogo, king of the Congo 593
Diocesan synods 292, 426, 475f, 494, 497f, 501f, 530
Discalceates 570
Disputatio contra scholasticam theologiam (1517) 40
Disputations, see Baden, Bern, Emden, Heidelberg, Lausanne, Leipzig, Valladolid, Weimar, Zürich
—in the Antinominalist controversy (1537 and 1538) 343
Dissenters 419
Discipline, Calvinistic 425
Diu 589
Divine service order 206
—Luther's 221, 223
—of the Lutheran congregation 226–30
Divine services of congregation
—Müntzer's concept 131
—regulation by Luther 92f
——by Wittenberg 87
—Reformation 119ff
Divorce 494
Doctrinas 586
Doctrine 291
—mark of denomination 425
Dogmas, history of 552
Doménech 454
Dominici gregis, bull (1564) 497
Dominican brotherhood, Bologna 433
Dominicans 438, 445, 469, 535, 570f
—chapter (January 1518) 52f
——(May 1518) 54
—dispute over grace 542ff
—mission in America 579
——in China 605
——in East Africa 594
——in India 595ff
——in Indochina 605
——in Japan 601
——in Mexico 580

——in New Granada 584f
——in Peru 582
——in the Philippines 587
——in West Africa 592
—reform 556
—theologians opposing Luther 199ff
Dominis, Marcantonio de 636
Donatio Alexandrina 576
Donation of Constantine 67
Donauwörth 620
Doornik, see Tournai
Dordrecht
—national synod (1617–18) 402
—synod (1618–19) 407
Dorpat 316f
—Jesuit college 519
Douai 517
Doutrinas 607
Dragffy, family 324
Draskovich, bishop of Fünfkirchen 491
Drechsel, Thomas 89f
Driedo, Johannes 198, 535
Dualism 189
Dubiecko 319
Dublin 571
Duc, Fronton du 548
Du Feynier 459
Duisburg 403, 404
—university 404
Dum nuper, papal brief 55
Du Moulin, Calvinist 515
Du Perac 507
Duperron, cardinal 545
Dury, John 635
Dutch rebellion 511, 513
Dzierzkowski, primate of Gnesen 484

East Africa 594
Eastern Europe, Reformation 311–27
East Friesland 404
East Prussia 312
Eber, Paul 361
Eberhard von der Mark, prince bishop of Liège 401
Eberlin von Günzburg 138
Ecclesia Anglicana, see Anglican Church
Echter von Mespelbrunn, Julius, prince bishop of Würzburg 525
Eck, Johannes 43, 46, 53, 63f, 72f, 74, 76, 79, 102, 111f, 118, 174f, 192, 196, 204f, 256f, 260, 274f, 277f, 540, 546, 560
—Enchiridion 195
Eder 554
Eder, K. 432
Edict of Nantes (1598) 397f, 421, 515, 620, 636
Edinburgh 518
—meeting of Scottish Estates (1560) 412
Education 426
—and Reformation 233ff
—religious 537
Edward VI, king of England 327, 336ff, 480
Egmont, count 401
Egnazio, humanist 435
Egranus, Johann Sylvius 129
Ehrenberger Klause (pass) 287, 295, 469
Eichhorn, Joachim, abbot of Einsiedeln 533
Eichsfeld 527
Eichstätt 526
—priest seminary 526
Einarsson, Gissur 305
Einbeck 267
Einsiedel, electoral councillor 121
Einsiedeln 533, 564
Eisleben 235
—school 322
Ecclesiology, see Church
Elders, Presbyters (Calvinist church regulation) 373f
Electors 266
Ebert, W. 222
Elgard, Nicolaus 527
Elizabeth I, queen of England 327, 338f, 395, 418, 484, 517ff —excommunication (1570) 517
Ellwangen 639
Eltz, Jakob von, archbishop of Trier 527
Elzevir 546
Emden 356, 401, 403, 404
—disputation (1544) 187
—synod (1571) 401, 404
Emigration, right to 297
Emmendingen
—religious colloquy (1590) 633
Emmerich 403
Empires, spiritual and secular 4f
Emser, Hieronymus 46, 50, 76, 82, 95, 192, 194, 199, 202, 547
Engelbriktsson, Olav, archbishop of Nidaros (Trondheim) 304
England 238, 267, 280, 488, 499, 511, 514, 609, 615, 621, 643
—Anglicanism 629
—Calvinism 418f
—Catholic restoration under Julius III 480
——end under Paul IV 484
—Catholicism 629
——under James I 619
—Confiscation of church treasures 338
—Convocation of the clergy (1563) 339
—Dissolution of monasteries 332f
—Established church 327
—New liturgy 337ff
—Pastoral care 517
—Predominance of Protestantism 629ff
—Popular devotion 328
—Protestant articles of faith 333
—Protestant wave under Edward VI 336ff
—Puritanism and high church 419
—Reformation 327–39
—Rite of ordination 338
—Schism (1534) 330ff

— —Renewal 484, 499, 517
—Separation from church 241
—Test Oath (after 1655) 630
—under Elizabeth I 517ff
English Free Churchmanship 191
English Ladies 573
Entfelder, Christian 189
Eperies 322
Episcopalism, episcopal system
—in England 417f, 629
Episcopate (bishops) 265, 291f
—appointment 503
—at Council of Trent, 493f, 541
— —strengthening 496
—authority 260
—baptismal authority 473
—interference with work 471
—Italian, beginning of reform 439f
—jurisdiction 209f, 259, 262, 296, 298
— obligation of residence 471f, 491f, 619
— office 314
— —according to Luther 233
— office regulation 472
— ordination according to Luther 221f
—power 257
—reform 433
—revelation of faith 469
—right of ordination 472
—visitation right 472
Epistle of James 96, 119
Erasmus, Desiderius 12, 71, 75, 94, 98, 101f, 111, 144–56, 160, 170, 173, 189f, 202, 234, 321, 326, 327, 362, 421, 446, 450, 486, 546f, 556, 561, 634
—and Luther 144f
—and Reformation 144ff, 152f
—Christiani Hominis Institutum (1512) 154
—Ciceronianus (1528) 153
—De libero arbitrio 146f
—De praeparatione ad mortem (1534) 156
—De puritate ecclesiae christianae (1536) 154
—Explanatio Symboli (Catechism; 1533) 154
—Hyperaspistes diatribae (1526–27) 152
—Institutum 154f
—Liber de sarcienda ecclesiae concordia (1533) 154
Erdeödy, family 325
Erich I, duke of Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel 211
Erik XIV, king of Sweden 309
Erlau 323
Ermland, bishopric 312
Ernst, duke of Bavaria 504, 528
Ernst, duke of Braunschweig-Lüneburg 211, 243, 259, 267
Ernst, landgrave of Hesse-Rheinfels 633
Ernst, archbishop of Magdeburg-Halberstadt
Escorial, Hieronymite monastery 512
Esseg, defeat of Charles V against Turks (1538) 273
Esslingen 267
Established church, Lutheran 5, 143, 213, 217, 224, 233, 299
Estates
—protest at Diet of Speyer (1529) 242f
—Protestant 263
—right to Reformation 628
Este, family 509
—Ippolito d' 482, 490
Estienne, Robert 546
Estoile, Pierre de l' 362
Estonia 315, 317
Eu 517
Eucharist, doctrine 194f, 201, 202, 244, 248, 250, 258, 272, 276, 278, 314, 323, 335, 337, 356ff, 371, 386, 387, 388, 394, 403, 406, 415
—at Council of Trent 474, 477
—Calvin's 366, 385f, 393f
— —attempts to create Protestant agreement 383ff
—Dispute
— —between Lutherans and Calvinists 356ff, 386, 390
— —concensus of Zürich 356f
— —Marburg Disputation (1529) 249ff
—in both kinds 250, 323
—Karlstadt's 122ff
—Liturgy 630
—Luther's 65, 124ff
—reception 210
—Reformed 405ff
—Report on institution of, Zwingli's interpretation 247ff
—Veneration 562
—Zwingli's 245–49
—see also Holy Communion, Lay Chalice, Lord's Supper, Mass, Real Presence, Transsubstantiation
Eudes 559
Eudists 516
Eugene IV, pope 562, 575
Eugene VI, pope 328
Europe marked by denominational pluralism 301–429
Evangelical liberty 85f
Evangelical Mass 87
Evangelism, in Italy 457
—in Spain 446
Eternal prayer 563
Exegesis, see Bible explanation
Exemptions 8, 462, 469
—papal privileges 471
Exercises, Exercitia spiritualia by Ignatius of Loyola 452, 569
Ex omnibus afflictionibus, bull (1567) 542
Exsurge Domine, bull (1520) 71, 72ff, 119, 144, 147, 256
Extreme unction, see Sick
Eyb, Gabriel von, bishop of Eichstätt 53

Faber, Johannes (Augustanus) 202

—Peter (Pierre Lefeure) 448f, 453
Fabri, Johann, vicar general of Constance, bishop of Vienna (1530) 153, 161, 163f, 174, 197f, 260, 275
—Johannes, polemicist 202, 204
Facchinetti, Gian Antonio, see Innocent IX
Faith 201, 341f, 344, 470
—and sacrament according to Luther 32f
—and works 65, 347, 469
— —see also Justification, Works —certainty of 56f, 470
—community of, according to Luther 214
—formulas 425f
— —see also Confessions
—justification 65f
—justifying 201, 345
— —Luther's view 16
—revelation of 194, 205f, 425, 469, 559f
— —according to Luther 215
Fanson, abbot 572
Farel, Guillaume 362, 365, 369f, 371f, 375, 385, 387
Farnese, Alessandro the Elder, see Paul III
—Alessandro the Younger, cardinal 8, 275, 284, 285, 456, 458, 464, 465, 471, 473, 479, 482, 495, 500f, 505
—Alessandro, governor of the Netherlands 402, 513
—Costanza 456
—Odoardo, duke of Parma 624
—Ottavio 456, 479f
—Pierluigi 288, 456, 474
Favre, François 375
Felix V, anti-pope 10
Ferber, Eberhard 318
—Mauritius, bishop of Ermland 313
Ferdinand I, emperor 107, 112, 177, 180, 197, 206, 208, 209, 211, 212, 242, 244, 266f, 268, 273, 274, 280, 286, 287, 294f, 295f, 299, 322f, 326, 407, 425, 455, 457, 485, 489, 496, 525, 633, 634
Ferdinand II, emperor 615, 620ff, 625
Ferdinand III, emperor 627
Ferdinand II the Catholic of Aragon 105, 443, 444, 576
Ferdinand of Bavaria, elector of Cologne 528, 626
Ferrara 454, 464, 465, 509
Ferrari, jurist 436
Ferreira 542
Ferrier, conciliar legate 493
Feudal state 637
Fideism 641
Fidelis von Sigmaringen 569
Filles de la Charité, see Vincentians
Finland 301
—Reformation 310f
— —liturgy 311
Fisher, John, bishop of Rochester 199, 330, 331f, 334, 458, 547
Fiscalism 8
Fitzmaurice, count 518
Flacius (Illyricus), Matthias 293, 346f, 348f, 351, 355, 550, 633
Flanders 238
Fleck, Johannes 50
Flemish 403
Florence 237f, 240, 454, 492
Florimonte, bishop of Sessa 559
Flügi, Johann V, bishop of Chur 533
Fontaine, Nicolas de 382
Fontana, Domenico 507
Fonte Colombo 570
Foreiro, Francisco 500
Forer, Lorenz 626
Formula Concordiae (1577) 405
Formula Instituti, see Society of Jesus
Formula Missae 228
Formula missae et communionis 92
Formula reformationis 293
Foscarari, Egidio 452, 501
Foundation masses 9, 225
Fox, John 329, 338
Foxe, Edward, bishop of Hereford 332
Fracastoro, conciliar physician 473
France 237ff, 251, 267, 269, 273, 281, 285, 294f, 336, 376, 456, 457, 463f, 466, 474, 476, 479, 483, 488ff, 499, 511, 567, 614, 615, 623f, 628, 630, 633, 638f, 643f
—and Spain 628, 631
—beginnings of reform 442
—Calvinism 391ff, 490
— —church regulation (1559) 392
— —formation of communities 391ff
—Catholic reform 513ff
—decrees of Council of Trent 516f
— —rejection of Council of Trent by Estates General (1614–15) 619
—development of denominations 422
—education of priests 516
—entrance into Thirty Years War (1635) 625 —missionary work 608ff
— —in Near East 609
— —in North America 608
—provincial synods 516
—reforms of Council of Trent through episcopate 516
Francis I, king of France 112, 115, 141, 237f, 247, 252, 288, 335, 364, 391, 393, 412, 463f, 608
—aid to Turks 285f
Francis II, king of France 489
Francis, duke of Lorraine 391
Francis de Sales 502, 537, 540, 545, 559, 573, 641
Francis Regis 569
Franciscans 438, 469, 536, 570f, 581
—conventuals 512
—mission to the Antilles 578
— —to Brazil 606
— —to Celebes 598
— —to Ceylon 598

——to China 605
——to India 595ff
——to Indochina 605
——to Japan 601
——to Malabar 597
——to Mexico 580
——to New Granada 585
——to Peru 582
——to Philippines 588
——to West Africa 592
—Recollects 445
—theologians opposing Luther 199ff, 203ff
Francisco de Osuna 556
Francisco de Toledo 467, 478, 509, 536, 539, 542, 546, 560
Franck, Sebastian 187, 189, 190f
Francken-Sierstorff, Heinrich 546
Franconia 526
Frangipani, Ottavio, nuncio in Cologne 528, 542, 563
Frankenhausen (1525) 136, 141
Frankfurt/Main 338, 357, 401, 403
—religious colloquy (1539) 370
Frankfurt/Oder 424
—Reformation 268
Frankfurt Armistice 273f
Franz, duke of Braunschweig-Lüneburg 211, 259
Franzen, August 528
Fraternitas divini amoris sub divi Hieronymi protectione, Genoa 434
Frederick I, king of Denmark 302
Frederick the Wise, see Friedrich III, Elector of Saxony
Freedom of belief 191
Freedom of Christian Man 4, 113–207, 161, 201, 225, 457
—see also Will, freedom of, Predestination
Freiburg i. Breisgau 173
Freiburg (Switzerland) 167, 175
Freising 524
French Revolution 191
Friedrich, landgrave of Hesse 633
Friedrich von Holstein 529
Friedrich II of Liegnitz 189
Friedrich II, Elector Palatine 282
Friedrich III, Elector Palatine 299, 358, 405f, 407, 408, 422, 423
—fight against Catholicism and Lutheranism 408
Friedrich IV, Elector Palatine 423
Friedrich V, Count Palatine 621
Friedrich III the Wise, Elector of Saxony 46, 54f, 58, 61f, 71, 75f, 77, 78, 91f, 95, 99f, 120, 128, 133f, 145, 211, 302
Frith, John 334
Fritz, Joss 140
Froben, Johannes 65, 172
Froschauer, Christopf 160
Froschauer Bible 170
Frundsberg, Jörg von 239
Fuchs, Johannes 323
Fuertaventura, bishopric 575
Fugger, banking house 45
—Jakob von, bishop of Constance 527, 626
Fukien 605
Funai, bishopric 600, 614
Funchal, bishopric 590, 595
Fürstenberg, Dietrich (Theodor), bishop of Paderborn 626

Gaetani, nuncio 543
Galaza, bishop of Coria 512
Galen, Christoph Bernhard von, bishop of Münster 529
Galicia, union of orthodox bishops with Rome (1681) 521
Galileo, Galilei 540, 639, 642
Galli, Tolomeo 503
Gallicans, Gallicanism 535, 540, 553
Gallican liberties 59
Gallus, Nikolaus 346f, 348f, 358
Gama, Vasco da 589
Gansfort, Wessel 246
Garasse, François 642
Gardiner, Stephen, bishop of Winchester 328, 332, 334, 335f, 338, 480
Garnet, Henry 619
Gattinara, Mercurio Arborio di, chancellor 238, 254
Gavanti,. Bartolomeo 624
Gebeck, bishop of Freising 524
Gebhard, count of Mansfeld 267
Gebsattel, bishop of Bamberg 526
Geldenhauer, Gerhard Eobanus 408
Geldern 281f
—war of succession 283
Gelenius, vicar general in Cologne 529
Génébrard, Gilbert 550
General Assembly 416f, 418
General council, see Councils
Geneva 372, 391, 400, 503
—Calvin's church regulation 366ff
—Calvin's confession of faith 367f
—Calvin's founding of university 376
—Calvin's Reformation 365ff
—church regulation (1541) 373f
—church regulation (1561) 376
—Company 392
—divine service order (1542) 373
—libertines 375
—theocracy 368
—university 408
Geneva Catechism 375, 401, 425
Gennep 403
Gentile, Giovanni 641
Gentillet, Calvinist 515
Gentine, Valentino 320
Genoa 238, 454
Georg, margrave of Brandenburg-Ansbach 243, 259, 321
Georg von Braunschweig, archbishop of

Bremen 529
Georg, duke of Saxony 44, 46, 50, 63, 142, 196f, 211, 242, 273f
Georg, Truchsess von Waldburg 116, 142f
Gerard, John 517
Gerhard, Johann 636
Gerhardt, Paul 428
German Mass 89, 92, 94, 120, 131, 227f, 236, 370, 420
Germany 333, 420, 506
—beginnings of reform 442
—Calvinism 402ff
—delimitation of denominations 523f
—reception of Tridentinism 523, 524f
—see also Reformation
Gerolshofen 639
Gerstmann, Martin, bishop of Breslau 531
Ghent 399
—bishopric 512
—pacification of (1576) 402, 513
Ghinucci, Girolamo, cardinal 54, 448, 458, 461
Ghislieri, Michele, see Pius V
Giberti, Giovanni Matteo, bishop of Verona 434, 440
Gift 354
—see also Justification
Giglio, brothers 505
Gilds 564
Ginetti, cardinal 627
Giorgi, Sebastian 435
Giovio 465
Giustiniani, Lorenzo 439, 458
—Paolo 435f
—Vincenzo 503
Glamorgan 630
Glanaeus, Jodocus 409
Glapion, Johann 71
Glarus 157, 175
—Reformation 171
Gliczner, Erazm 319
—Luther's view 41
Gnesiolutherans 349, 352, 358, 361
Goa 455, 501, 590, 597
—bishopric 595f
Goch, 403
Gondi, cardinal 516
Gonesius, Petrus 641
Gonzaga, Ercole, cardinal 440, 490, 491, 493
—Ferrante 474
—Luigi 568
Gönzi, Matthäus, bishop 224
Gorka, Andrej 318
Goslar 267
Gospel 214, 342f
—see also Faith, revelation of, Word
Gotha-Torgau, alliance (1526) 211
Göttingen 267
Government, secular, Luther's 217ff
Grabmann, M. 538
Grace, doctrine of grace 151, 342, 344ff, 353, 387f, 457, 542, 631
—and freedom 469
—as viewed by Calvin 379
——Erasmus 146ff
——Karlstadt 118f
——Luther 40, 345
—certainty 470f
—disputation 509, 539, 542ff
—means toward 251
—see also Justification, Council of Trent
Graduale Romanum 566
Gran 326, 498
—archbishopric 323f
Granada 454, 492
—conquest (1492) 443
—provincial synod (1565–66) 512
—university 329
—victory (1492) 576
Granvella, Nicolas 275f, 464
Grassi, G. P., bishop of Viterbo 440
Gratian 644
—decree 323, 552
Gratia and Donum according to Luther 82f
Graubünden, Reformation 171f
Gravamina of the German Nation 8, 67, 110
Graz 268, 532
—Jesuit college 532
Grebel, Konrad 165, 166, 178f, 183
Gregory XIII (Ugo Boncompagni), pope 437, 466, 502, 503ff, 507, 514, 518, 529, 542, 552f, 564, 569ff, 583, 601
—founding of colleges in Rome 504
Gregory XIV (Niccolò Sfondrato), pope 508, 515
Gregory XV (Alessandro Ludovisi), pope 573, 596, 597, 611, 618, 621
Gregorius of Valencia 536, 538
Greiffenklau, Richard von, archbishop of Trier 61, 78, 115f
Gretser, Jakob 536, 539, 617, 634
Gribaldi, Matteo 641
Greek college San Atanasio in Rome 504
Grisar, Heinrich 37
Groningen, bishopric 513
Gropper, Johann 203f, 275ff, 283f, 289, 477
—Kaspar 504
Grosswardein 322, 326
—peace (1538) 322
Grotius, Hugo 537, 552, 635
Grynaeus, Simon 321, 364
Guadalajara, bishopric 580
Gualterio, bishop of Viterbo 493
Guarino 440
Guatemala 580
Guerrero, Pedro 443, 454
Gueux 401, 513
Guibert 558
Guidiccioni, Bartolomeo, cardinal 448, 457, 458, 461, 463
Guise, House of 489, 514
—Charles, cardinal of Lorraine 479, 487, 488,

493ff, 496, 516
—Charles II, cardinal 528
—Francis, duke of 391, 393, 395
—Henry I de 396, 515
—Louis I de, cardinal 396
—Louis II de, cardinal 515, 516
—Mary de 411f
Güns, victory over Turks (1532) 268
Gustavus Adolfus 625f, 627, 630
Gustavus Erikson Vasa, king of Sweden 302, 306ff
Güttel, Caspar 343
Gyula 324

Haarlem, bishopric 513
Habitus, Luther's view 16f
Habsburg 241, 244, 286, 288, 299, 456, 463, 499, 531f, 564, 616, 620, 624
Hacker, P. 56
Hagenau, religious colloquy (1540) 274, 370
Hagiography 551
Haiti 578f
Halberstadt, bishopric 286, 529, 626f
Haldrein, Arnold 261
Hall, Jesuit college 532
Haller, Berchtold 156, 174f, 175
—Johannes 5
Hamar, bishopric 302
Hamburg, Reformation 268
—school regulation (1528) 235
Hamilton, John, archbishop of St. Andrews 518
Hamilton's Catechism 411
Hammermayer 631
Hanover, Reformation 268
Hans von Küstrin 196
Hardenberg, Albert Rizaeus 356, 358, 409
Harlay, François de 516
Harrach, archbishop of Prague 622
Hasenmüller 532
Hätzer, Ludwig 178, 181f, 189
Hausen, bishop of Regensburg 524
Hausmann, Nikolaus 230
Havelberg 298
Heath, archbishop of York 484
Hebler, Matthias, bishop of Weissenburg 324
Heckel, Joh. 220
Heerbrand, Jakob 633
Hegendörfer, Christoph 318
Hegge, Jakob 317
Heidelberg 358
—Disputation (1560) 405
Heidelberg Catechism (1563) 401, 406ff, 408f, 423, 425
Heiligenstadt, Jesuit college 527, 532
Held, Matthias, vice chancellor 272
Helding, Michael 204, 205, 289, 466
Helgesen, Paul 303
Heltai, Kaspar 324
Helvetian college in Milan 533
Helvetic Confession (1536) 253
Henckel, Johannes 321
Hennegau 402
Henriette Maria, daughter of Louis XIII 629
Henrique, titular bishop of Utica 592
Henten, Johann 546
Herborn, general synod (1586) 409
—academy 408
Herborn (Ferber), Nikolaus 203
Herborn regulation 409
Heresy Act of Henry VIII 330
Hermannstadt 323
Hertogenbosch, bishopric 512
Hervet, Gentian 551
Hessels, Johannes 477, 535, 541f
Hesse 244, 287
Hesshus(en), Tilemann 358, 390, 403, 405f
Heinrich II, duke of Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel 211, 281
Heinrich von Mecklenburg 211
Heinrich, duke of Saxony 274
Heinrich of Sachsen-Lauenburg 529
Heinrich Julius von Braunschweig-Wolfenbüttel 529, 639
Henry VII, king of England 327
Henry VIII, king of England 71, 112, 146, 199, 241, 288, 327, 338, 637
—Act of Supremacy 329ff
—alliance policy and creeds 333ff
—Bishop's Book (1537) 335
—dissolution of monasteries 332f
—divorce 328ff
—fight against the council 334f
—King's Book (1543) 336
—relations to German Protestantism 334f
—Six Articles (1539) 335
—Ten Articles of Faith (1536) 334f
Henry II, king of France 295, 391, 393, 479
Henry III, king of France 396f, 514f, 639
Henry IV, king of France 395ff, 508, 515, 608, 616, 632, 636
Henry of Navarre 515f
Henry of Orléans 241
Hideyoshi 600
Hierarchy 265
Hieronymites, Florence 434, 512
—Orvieto 434
Hilarius, Lutheran preacher 181
Hildesheim, bishopric 529, 531
Hirsch, Emanuel 104
Historical-critical method 552f, 572
Historical sciences 642
Hoen, Cornelis 247
Hoffaeus, Paul 532, 569
Hoffmeister, Johann 205, 560
Höfler, Constantin 431
Höfling, J. W. F. 222
Hofmann, Melchior 183f
Hofmeister, Sebastian 172
Hohenems, Mark Sittich von, cardinal 490, 526, 572
Hohenzollern, Eitel Friedrich von, bishop of Osnabrück 529

Holar, bishopric 302
Holbein 170
Holland 401, 438, 640
Holle, bishop of Lübeck 529
Holstein 187
Holstenius, Lucas 554, 633
Holy Scripture 202f, 205, 536, 546
—as viewed by Erasmus 147ff
—as viewed by Luther 150f
—as viewed by Müntzer 133f
—canonicity 119
—translation by Luther 93ff
Honduras 580
—bishopric 580
Honter, Johannes 323f
Hoogstraeten, Jakob van 201f
Hooker, Richard 339, 518
Hoorne, admiral 401
Hospitals 573
Houghton, John 331
Hoya, Johann von, bishop of Münster 529
Hozjusz (Hosius), Stanislaw, cardinal 206, 490, 519, 540
Hren, Thomaz, bishop 325
Hsü Kuang-ch'i (Paul Hsü) 603
Hubmaier, Balthasar 136, 140, 180f
Huguenots 394ff, 489, 620, 635, 636
Huguenot Wars (1562–98) 394ff, 511, 514f, 534, 553
Hugo of St. Cher 43
Huguccio 43
Humanism 317, 444, 536f, 546
—and Reformation 144ff
— —according to Melanchthon 103
—Christian 442
—in England 327
Hungary 212, 280, 376, 499, 620
—Counter-Reformation 622
—development of denominations 422
—Reformation 321ff
Hunnius, Helferich 633
Hurons 609
Hus, Jan 64, 197
Husitism 317
Hut, Hans 181f
Hutten, Ulrich von 67, 114f, 145
Hutter, Jakob 182
Hutterites, see Moravian Brethren
Hyacinth of Casale 533, 621

Iceland 301, 303
—Reformation 305f
Iconoclasm 89ff, 120, 125, 165f, 167, 173, 314
Iconography 566
Idalcan 613
Ieyasu, Tokugawa 601
Ignatius of Loyola 446ff, 564, 595, 619
Ilanz, Ilanz Article (1526) 171
—religious colloquy (1526) 175
Images, veneration of 335
Immaculate conception of Mary 468f
Immortalis (1627) 612
Imperiale (Chile), bishopric 583f
Imperial cities 262, 298, 299
Imperial estates 267, 297
Imperial executive council 106
—religious trials 274
Imperial idea 299
Imperial knights 298
—feud (1522–23) 113ff
Imperial rein and papacy 104f, 208, 285ff
—under Charles V and Clement VII 237–41
Imputation of Christ's justice 380
In Coena Domini, bull (1568) 500
Independents 629
Index of forbidden books
—of Liège 399
—Protestant 426
—Roman 486, 496, 497, 509, 554, 638, 643
Index congregation 506
Indians, christianization 577ff, 580, 582ff, 586, 607, 609
Indian state, Christian 586
India 590
—mission to 595ff
—provincial synod 597
Indochina, mission to 605
Indulgence, indulgence doctrine 59, 84, 111, 157, 195, 199, 258, 475
—controversy 42–51
—deals with Albrecht of Mainz 44ff
—for St. Peter's Church 44
—for the dead 43
—history 42ff
—in practice 42ff
—monies 8
—preachers 49f
—privilege of sovereigns 44
—trade 8
Indult, bull (1548) 293
Infallibility, papal 199
Infant baptism 90, 122, 178
Infralapsiarianism 402
Ingoli, Francesco 611
Ingolstadt 287, 455, 536, 554
—university 455
Inhambane (Zambezi) 594
Initio nostri huius pontificatus, bull (1542) 464
Incas, empire of, conquest and mission to 582
Innocent IX (Gian Antonio Facchinetti), pope, 508
Innocent X (Gianbattista Pamfili), pope 574, 628ff, 631f, 643
Innsbruck 258, 287, 295, 478, 532
Inquisition, Roman 382, 446, 456, 483, 486f, 500, 506, 638, 640
—Galilei's case 642f
—in the Netherlands 399ff
—Spanish 447, 486, 511
Inscrutabili divinae providentiae arcano, bull (1622) 611

Inspiration 542
Institutio Religionis Christianae by Calvin (1559) 389, 425
Instruction religious —Lutheran 233ff
—public 559ff
Interim, Augsburg (1548) 289ff, 292ff, 345, 476
—Leipzig (1548) 293, 345, 348, 352, 356
—Torgau negotiations 351
Irache 535
Irenics, irenicism 633ff
—see also Cassander, Erasmus, Grotius, Witzel
Ireland 511
—preservation of Catholicism 518
—persecution of Catholics 630
Iroquois 609
Isabella, archduchess 513
Isabella of Castile 443, 576
Isachino 485, 487
Isenburg, Salentin von, archbishop of Cologne 528
Isny 267
Italy 433, 568, 615
—beginnings of reform 433ff
Ivan the Terrible 520

Jacobus a Voragine 455
Jakob, margrave of Baden-Hachberg 633
James I, king of England (VI of Scotland) 339, 414, 417, 518, 540, 619
James V, king of Scotland 411
Jansenists 542, 552
Jansenius, Cornelius 535, 631
Janssen, Johannes 640
Japan 576, 596
—mission to 599ff
Java 590
—mission to 598
Jedin, Hubert 10, 284, 425
Jena 357
—compact 18
Jeremias II, ecumenical patriarch 520
Jerin, Andreas von, bishop of Breslau 531
Jesuits, see Society of Jesus
Jesuit colleges 455, 504, 530, 532, 561, 563, 568
Jesuit reductions, see Reductions
Jesuit theater 566
—see also Autos sacramentales, spiritual drama
Jesuit theology 538ff
Jewel, John, bishop of Salisbury 339
Joachim I, elector of Brandenburg 79, 108, 211, 242
Joachim II, elector of Brandenburg 274, 276f, 344
Joachim of Fiore 131
Joachim Ernst, prince of Anhalt 409
Johanna, Infintin 451
Jogues, Isaac 609
Johann of Nassau 402, 408
Johann, elector of Saxony 101, 132, 150, 211, 230, 242f, 254, 255ff, 259, 265, 267, 274, 281
Johann, archbishop of Weeze 273
Johann Albrecht von Mecklenburg 294
Johann Friedrich, duke of Braunschweig-Lüneburg 633
Johann Friedrich, elector of Saxony 132, 233, 288, 474
Johann Friedrich II, duke of Saxony 406
Johann Georg I, prince of Anhalt 410
Johann Kasimir, count Palatine 423
Johann Ludwig, count of Nassau-Siegen 633
Johann Sigismund, king 326
Johann Sigismund, elector of Brandenburg 404
Johann Wilhelm, duke of Saxony 346
Johannes a Lasco 187
Johannes Makarios 548
John of the Cross 537, 556, 557, 570
John of God 573
John of Tossignano, bishop of Ferrara 440
John II, king of Portugal 589
John III, king of Portugal 454, 595
John IV, king of Portugal 628
John III, king of Sweden 309ff, 511, 519
Jolo 588
Jonas, Justus 98f, 144, 233, 257, 264, 348
Jörg vom Hause Jakob 179
Jörg von Frundsberg 111
Joseph of Calasanza 561, 568f
Joseph of Paris 570, 609
Joyeuse, cardinal 615, 617f
Juan de Avila 443, 512, 555, 573f
Juan de los Angeles 556
Jubilee (1600) 509
Jud, Leo 165, 166, 169f, 247
Julian calender, reform by Gregory XIII 504f
Jülich-Kleve-Berg 281, 404, 421, 616
Julius II (Giuliano della Rovere), pope 7, 43, 328, 439, 577, 578, 590f
Julius III (Giovanni Maria del Monte), pope 294, 296, 299, 465, 466, 471, 472, 476, 479ff, 485, 489, 495
Junius, Franziskus 635
Jurisdiction, spiritual 298
—according to Luther 215
—see also Episcopate, Papacy
Jus reformandi 213, 230
Justification, justification doctrine 195, 201, 202, 217, 225, 250, 257, 265, 271, 274, 276ff, 285, 290f, 293, 323, 333, 335f, 344, 347f, 350, 353, 371, 457, 469ff, 633
—and good works 347ff
—and sanctification 82
——Luther's view 27
—at the Council of Trent 469ff
—Calvin's 379f
—Karlstadt's 118
—Luther's 15, 17f, 26, 34f, 83
—Melanchthon's 341ff
—Müntzer's 135

—Osiander's 352ff
Justice 342
—double 204, 371, 470
—God's, Luther's concept 34f
—Christ's, see Justification
Justus ex fide 27
Juusten, Paulus, bishop of Viborg (Viipuri) 311

Kaaden near Eger, peace (1534) 269
Kalkbrenner, Gerhard 283
Kalkoff, P. 61, 62
Kalmancsa 324
Kalmancsehi 326
Kalmar, union (1397) 301
Kampen, Johann van 204
Kappel, first peace (1529) 177, 252
—second peace (1531) 253
—skirmish (1531) 267
Karlstadt, Andreas von 58, 63f, 85, 87, 89f, 93, 97, 116–28, 189, 196, 217, 226, 234, 247ff, 302
—doctrine of Holy Communion 119
Karnkowski, bishop of Wloclawek 519
Karolyi, Kaspar 326
Kaschau 322, 324
Kassel, compromise (1534) 270
Kathelyne, Georges 400
Kautz, Lutheran preacher 181f
Kepler, Johannes 505, 639, 642
Kerker, Joseph 431
Kerle, Jacobus de 566
Kessel 532
Kessler, Johannes 170
Kettler, Gotthard, master of Teutonic Order 317
Kevelaer 564
Kilger, L. 611
Kilkenny, treaty (1645) 630
Kindermann 566
King's Book of Henry VIII 336
King's Confession 417
Kircher, Athanasius 644
Kirk Session 415, 416
Kis, Stephan Szegedi 324, 326
Klagenfurt 525
—Jesuit college 532
Klaus von Merwitz, governor of Iceland 305
Klausenburg, academy 326
Klebitz, Wilhelm 358, 406
Kleinhöchstetten 174
Klein-Zeben 322
Klesl, Melchior, cardinal 525, 621, 623
Knights, see Imperial Knights
Knipperdolling 185, 186
Knoeringen, Heinrich von, bishop of Augsburg 526, 627
Knopken, Andreas 315f
Knox, John 376, 411ff, 418
Koblenz, Jesuit college 532
Köhler, Walther 159
Kolb, Franz 175
Koellin 538
Komander, Johannes 171f
Konarski, bishop of Poznan 519
Königsberg 294, 312ff, 318, 355
—alliance (1550) 294
—university 319
Kostka, Stanislaus 568
Köthen 410
Kozminek 320
—union (1555) 320
Krain 525, 622
Kranganore 596, 597
Krechting, Bernhard 186
Krelj, Sebastian 325
Krell, Nikolaus 361
Krems, Jesuit college 532
Kreuznach, meeting of Charles V with A. Farnese (1544) 284
Kronstadt 323
Kröw 422
Kulm, province 312
Kumer 34
Kuncewicz, Josaphat, uniate bishop of Poland 521
Kunz, Othmar, abbot of St. Gallen 533
Kurland 315, 317
Kuss, Otto 29

Laderchi 550
Ladislaus IV, king of Poland 521, 634
Laetare Jerusalem, bull (1544) 285, 465
Laibach, Jesuit college 532
Lainez, Diego 394, 448f, 451, 453, 454f, 538
Laicism 6
Lalemant, Charles 609
—Gabriel 609
Lambert, Franz 203
Landau 180
—assembly of knights (1522) 115
Lang, A. 538
—Johann 48, 87
Language, common 428, 491
La Plata countries, christianization 584
La Rochefoucauld, bishop of Clermont 516
La Rochelle 395
—national synod of Calvinists (1571) 395
Las Casas, Bartolomé de 579, 585, 586, 607
Laski, Jan 320f, 356f, 403
Lasko 324
Las Palmas, bishopric 576
Lasso, Orlando di 566
Latalski, Jan 317
Latin schools 234
Latimer 336
Latomus, Jakob 82, 172, 198, 535
Laud, archbishop of Canterbury 419
Laue, Max von 643
Lauffen on the Neckar, victory over Austrians (1534) 269
Laurentius of Brindisi 533, 537, 569
Laureo, papal nuncio 518

Laurerio, cardinal 457, 460
Lauretan litany 564
Lausanne 376
—bishopric 534
—disputation (1536) 366
Law 342ff
Law, international 642
Lawrence, Robert 331
Lay chalice 89, 119, 205, 212, 260, 262f, 291, 293, 428, 491, 523, 622
—see also Communion of both kinds
Laymann, Paul 552, 626, 640
Laymen 457
— coming of age 4, 6
—Karlstadt's view 121
—participation in liturgy 206
Layton 332
Le Blas, Bertrand 399
League
—Catholic in France (1576, 1584) 396f, 514f
— of Cognac (1526) 212, 238
— of German Catholic princes 569, 615, 621f, 625
Lebus 298
Leckow, Johann von 626
Le Clerc du Tremblay, see Joseph of Paris
Leeuwarden, bishopric 513
Lefèvre d'Etaples (Faber Stapulensis) 19, 20, 362f, 546
Legh 332
Leiden, Jan van 185
Leiden, university 401, 408
Leipzig 317
—disputation 35, 63–64, 119, 196, 256
—interim, see Interim
Leisnig 227f
Lejay, 448, 453
Lejeune, Jean 560
Le Jeune, Paul 643
Lemberg 521
Lemgo 409
Leo X, pope 5f, 44, 51, 53, 54f, 59, 62, 71, 74, 104, 105f, 201, 238, 328, 434f, 479ff, 504, 590
Leo XI (Alessandro Ottaviano De Medici), pope 505, 615
León 481
León, Luis de 556
—Pablo de 445, 556
Leonardi, Giovanni 567
Leopold V, archduke of Austria 527, 531
Leopold Wilhelm, archduke 531, 627
Lepanto, victory over Turks (1571) 503, 564
Lessius, Leonard 542
Letter of Majesty (1609) 620, 622
Lettner 562
Leunis, Johannes 563
Leutschau 322
Lewis 517
Leyenda negra 579
L'Hôpital, Michel de, chancellor of Catherine de Médicis 394, 490, 635
Libraries 553f
Licet ab initio, bull (1542) 457
Lichetto, Francesco 438
Liège, bishopric 531
Liegnitz, Reformation 268
Lima 582f
—archbishopric 582
Lincoln, bishopric 327, 480
— county 332
Lindau 175, 258, 267
Link, Wenceslaus 52, 58, 60, 86
Linköping, bishopric 302
Linz 295, 525
Lipgens, W. 289
Lippe, county 409
—church regulation 409f
Lippomani, Luigi 296, 470, 476, 484, 551, 641
Lipsius, Justus 637
Lismanini, Franceso 318ff
Lissa 320
Lissa, Andreas von der 319
—Raphael von der 320
Lisbon, Jesuit college 454
Lissies, abbey 571
Lithuania 320, 520
Literature, ascetic 556ff
—mystical 556ff
Literature, history of, Christian 547ff
Liturgy 206, 644
—Roman 510
Livingstone, David 593
Livonia 309, 311, 319
—church regulation (1529–30) 316
—Reformation 315f
Loanda 594
Loaysa, García de 438, 459
—Jerónimo de 582
Loci theologici 537f
Lodron, bishop of Salzburg 524
Lollards 327
London 401
London, priest 332
Longo, Maria Laurenza 434
Lonicer, Johannes 67
Lord's Supper 491
—see also Eucharist, Mass
Lorenzo of Brindisi 560
Loreto 564
Lorini 642
Lortz, Joseph 11, 20, 45
Losonczy 324
Lotzer, Sebastian 141
Louis, prince de Condé 393, 395
Louis XIII, king of France 609, 616
Louis XIV, king of France 628
Louis II, king of Hungary 241, 322
Louis of Blois 559, 571
Louise of Savoy 240
Louvain, university 198, 329, 401, 486, 535, 541

Love 347
Lowicz, provincial synod 484
Loyola, Iñigo López de, see Ignatius
Lübeck 267, 298
—bishopric 529
Lubiniecki, Stanislaus 641
Lublin, Jesuit college 520
Lucca 457, 567
—meeting of Paul III with Charles V (1541) 280, 464
Luck 521
Luder, Hans 12f
Ludolf of Saxony 446
Ludovico da Fossombrone 438
Ludovisi, Allessandro, see Gregory XV
—Ludovico, cardinal 618, 623
Ludwig, duke of Bavaria 209f
Ludwig VI, Elector Palatine 407, 423
Ludwig, Count Palatine 532f
Luis of Granada 555f
Lukaris, Cyrill, ecumenical patriarch 521
Lukas of Bruges 546
Luna, count 495f
Lund, archbishopric 302
Lunelli, Vincenzo 438, 459
Lupus 509, 560
Lussy, Melchior 533
Luther, Martin 7, 9f, 14–41, 110, 128f, 137, 138f, 156, 172, 174, 183, 188, 191, 193ff, 197, 199f, 213ff, 233, 244, 249f, 255, 262, 265, 270, 271f, 274, 276f, 280, 282ff, 285, 306, 310, 312, 317, 321, 325, 329, 340ff, 344f, 348, 354, 359f, 370, 386, 390, 398, 421, 435, 450, 488, 535, 543, 561, 642
—life
——and the Leipzig debate 63f
——appeal to the council (1518) 59
——at Diet of Augsburg (1518) 55ff
——at the fortress of Coburg 257
——at Wittenberg (1522) 91
——at Worms 71–80
——doctor of Holy Scripture 18f ——experience in the tower 33
——excommunication 76f
——home and youth 12f
——journey to Rome 18
——lecture on Paul's epistle to the Galatians 29f
——lecture on Paul's epistle to the Romans (1515–16) 24ff
——lecture on the epistle to the Hebrews 30ff
——lecture on the psalms (1513–15) 20ff
——marriage to Katharina von Bora 143
——meeting with Karl von Miltitz (1519) 61
——posting of theses 48
——Roman trial 52ff
——stay at Wartburg and reformatory movement at Wittenberg 81–97
——university studies and entry into monastery 13ff
—personality 11
——language 65
——popular religious instructor 237
—teaching
——absconditas, doctrine of 24
——antinomism controversy 342ff
——and Agricola 342f
——and Augustinism 41
——and beginning of Reformation (1517–25) 3–112
——and council 64, 270f
——and Karlstadt 116ff
——and Müntzer 129ff
——and Ockhamism 14ff, 39ff
——and Peasants' War 138f, 140ff
——and scholastics 16, 27
——and Thomism 41
——and Zwingli (eucharist controversy) 244, 247f, 248
——bible translation 94ff
——catechisms 236f
——catechism sermons 236f
——Christology 21ff
——church concept 213–17
——congregation, expansion of 225–37
——denomination, development of 255
——ecclesiology 21, 66ff, 78
——faith and works 66
——freedom of will 148ff
——grace, doctrine of 27, 82f
——indulgences 46ff, 199
——justice and justification 22f, 24ff
——justification by faith 29ff
——Justitia Dei 33ff
——Reformation 11
——rejection of humanism 144ff
——right doctrine, struggle for 340–61
——Roman primacy 63
——sacrament dispute with Swiss 386
——sacraments, doctrine of 65f, 69f
——soteriology 21
——synergist controversy 344
——two kingdoms, doctrine of 217–20
—writings
——Adversus execrabilem Antichristi Bullam (1520) 74f
——Against the rebellious and murderous Peasants 142
——Assertio (1520) 147
——De abroganda missa privata (Of the Abuse of the Mass) 87
——De captivitate Babylonica 78, 80, 85
——De servo arbitrio 146, 149
——Letter to the Princes of Saxony on the Mutinous Spirit 123, 133f
——Of Eck's New Bulls and Lies (1520) 74f
——Of Secular Authority 138
——Of the Freedom of a Christian (1520) 71, 73
——Of the Papacy in Rome . . . 67ff
——Open Letter to Pope Leo X 73
——reformatory writings of 1520 64–70

——To the Christian Nobility of the German Nation 85, 113, 138
——Why the Books of the Pope and his Followers were Burned (1520) 75f
Lutherans, Lutheranism 97, 255, 269, 311, 426, 534, 550, 632, 635, 644
—and Calvinism 409, 426
—and development of denominations 423
—and power of the state 422
—in Electoral Palatinate 407
—in France 391
—in Poland 319
—see also dispute over Eucharist
Luther's bible 202
Luther's opponents 191ff
Lucerne 175, 533
—city council session (1522) 161
—city council session (1524) 167
—Jesuit college 533
Luzon 587
Lyon 502, 543, 553

Mabillon 552
Macao 455, 602, 614
—bishopric 600, 602
Machiavelli 637
Maciejowski, bishop of Luck 521
Maderna 565
Madrid, peace (1526) 211, 238
Madruzzo, Cristoforo, cardinal 465, 468, 475, 504
Maffei, Bernardino, cardinal 460, 481
Magalotti 631
Magdaleno, Diego 445
Magdeburg 211, 267, 273, 286, 293, 358, 626f
—archbishopric 529
—centurions 548, 550f
—surrender (1551) 294
Magellan, Ferdinand 576, 587f
Magic 639
Magisterium 194
Magna Carta of Church of Scotland 418
Magni, Valerian 533, 622
Magyars 311
—Reformation 324
Maidalchini, Olimpia 628
Mailapur 614
—bishopric 596
Mainz 242
—bishopric 531
—Jesuit college 527
—plan of union (1660) 635
—reform synods 292
Mair (Major), John 362
Major, Georg 98, 323, 346, 347, 349f
Majorist controversy 347ff
Malabar 596f
Malacca 589, 596, 605
—bishopric 596, 605
Malayan archipelago, mission to 598f
Maldonado, Juan de 445, 536, 547
Maletius, Jan 319
Malvenda, Pedro 289
Man, original state of 277, 290
Mancini 632
Manderscheid, Johann von, bishop of Strasbourg 527
Manducatio impiorum 270
Manducatio indignorum 270
Manila 588
—archbishopric 588
—bishopric 587, 602
Manresa 447
Mansfeld, Agnes von 528
Mansson (Magni), Peder, bishop of Västeras 307f
Mantua 271, 334, 463f
Mantuan war of succession (1628) 625
Mantz, Felix 178f
Manuel I, king of Portugal 590f, 593
Manutius, Paulus 497, 553
Maranhão 608
Marburg articles 251f
—religious colloquy (1529) 162, 249–52, 352
Marcellus II (Marcello Cervini), pope 458, 460, 465, 467, 470, 481, 482f, 540, 554
Margaret of Austria 398
Margaret of Navarre 252
Margaret of Parma 240, 401, 513
Margaret of Valois 395
Margotti, cardinal 616
Maria of Habsburg, queen of Hungary 321, 326
Maria of Hohenzollern, 405
Maria de Piedrahita 445
Mariana, Juan 638
Marian congregation 455, 564
Marie de l'Incarnation 609
Marienburg, provincial diet (1526) 318
Marignano, battle (1515) 156f
Marini, Leonardo 500f
Mark 404
Mark, county 407
Marnix, Philip 376
Maronite college in Rome 504
Marot, Clemens 370
Marriage 278, 292, 474f
—and chastity 86
—courts 233f
—Luther's view 230
—sacrament of 493, 494, 563
—see also Clandestine marriage, Tametsi
Marschalk, Nikolaus 99
Marsiglio 617
Marsilius of Padua 332
Martelli, bishop of Fiesole 469
Martinuzzi, see Utjesenovich 326
Martyrologium Romanum 552
Marvels, craving for 424
Mary, regent of the Netherlands 398
Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland 411, 412, 517, 518

Mary Tudor, queen of England 327, 328, 338, 403, 412, 480, 484, 517
Masaniello rebellion (1647) 629
Masius, Andreas 481
Mass, sacrifice of the mass 10, 123, 194ff, 200ff, 205ff, 210, 212, 242ff, 246, 251, 257, 259f, 262, 271f, 276, 278, 290f, 293, 314, 323, 337f, 371, 406, 475, 547, 562
—Luther's views 69ff, 87f, 221
—sacrificial character 491
—Zwingli's view 246
—see also German Mass, Private Mass
Massachusetts 419
Massarelli, Angelo 466
Matteo da Bascio 438
Matthew, Thomas, see John Rogers 336
Matthias, emperor 620, 621
Matthias of Salo 569
Matthijs, Jan 184f
Maurenbrecher, W. 431
Maurer, W. 103
Maurice of Orange 513
Maurice, elector of Saxony 282, 286, 287, 293ff, 478
Maurillac 636
Mauriner 571f
Maximilian, elector (duke) of Bavaria 531, 554, 574, 620, 627, 633
Maximilian I, emperor 54, 61, 95, 105, 114, 435
Maximilian II, emperor 206, 294, 326, 407, 520, 522, 525
Mayer, Sebald 554
Mazarin, Jules 628
Meaux 395
Mechelen, archbishopric 512
—provincial council (1607) 619
Mecklenburg 530
Mediasch 323
Medici, family 237, 239
—Alessandro Ottaviano de, see Leo XI
—Catherine de 241, 391, 394ff, 489, 514f, 635
—Gian Angelo de, see Pius IV
—Giuliano, cardinal 113
—Giulio de, see Clement VII
Medina, Bartolomeo de 538
Medina del Campo, Jesuit college 454
Megander, Kaspar 385
Meissen, bishopric 298, 530
—provincial diet (1548) 293f
—Reformation 282
Meissinger, K. A. 45
Melanchthon (Schwartzert), Philip 9, 29, 48, 64, 75, 82f, 83f, 87, 90f, 99f, 101ff, 110, 116, 120, 126, 131, 137, 143f, 192, 195f, 224, 230f, 233f, 235f, 244, 256f, 258ff, 263ff, 270ff, 275ff, 280, 283, 293f, 319, 323ff, 335, 340ff, 345f, 347ff, 350, 353f, 356, 358, 370f, 381f, 405, 633, 635, 642
—apologia for the Augsburg Confession 263ff
—church visitation 231ff
—eucharist controversy 359ff
—justification, doctrine 341ff
—majorist controversy 347ff
—Osiander controversy 352ff
—theology 341ff
—visitors, instructions for 340, 342
Melchiorites 184f, 187
Melius, Peter 326
Melun, assembly of clergy (1579) 515
Melville, Andrew 416, 417, 418
Memmingen 175, 258, 267
Mendicant Orders 301, 441, 444, 457, 469, 497
—exemption 469
—post-Tridentine development 570f
—reform 437ff, 459f
—see also Dominicans, Franciscans
Mendoza, Diego Hurtado de 467, 471
—Dominicus de 445
—Juan Hurtado de 445
—López de, cardinal, bishop of Burgos 446
—Pedro González de, cardinal 443
Mengersdorf, bishop of Bamberg 526
Mengin 532
Mening, Marcus 409
Menius, Justus 275, 349, 355
Mennonites 184, 188
Mensing, Johannes 201, 276
Mentuato 484
Mercedarians 512
—mission in Mexico 581
— —in Peru 582
Mercurian, Eberhard 569
Merici, Angela 435, 437
Merlin 548
Merseburg, bishopric 298, 530
Messina, Jesuit college 455
Mestizos 583
Method doctrine, theological 537
Metz 295, 465
—siege (1553) 295
Meurer, Michael 318
Mexico (New Spain) 501, 578
—bishopric 580f
—conquest and mission to 580
—council (1555) 581f
—Twelve Apostles 580
Meyer, Gerald 165
—Sebastian 161, 174
Micanzio 617
Michael von Eggendorf, abbot 171
Michoacán, bishopric 580
Middle Ages 3ff
Middleburg, bishopric 513
Mignani, Laura 435
Milan 237f, 284, 289, 436, 456f, 464, 502f, 554
—major and minor seminaries 502
Millini, cardinal 616, 623
Miltitz, Karl von 46, 55, 61f, 63, 71, 73

—meeting with 35
Mindanao 588
Minden 523
—bishopric 529, 627
Miracles, books of 564
Miraeus (Le Mire) 549
Miron 454
Missals, reform 485, 496, 501, 561, 624
Missale Romanum (1570) 500
Mission
—at beginning of modern time 575–614
——in Portuguese sphere 589–610
——in Spanish sphere 575–89
—native clergy 612f
—to the people 569
—training of missionaries 612f
Mission districts 612
Mission congregations 610
Mission method 578f, 581, 607
—adaptation in China 603ff
——in India 597
——in Japan 599f
—in Peru 583
Mission patronage 575ff, 610
—opposition of patronage states to Propaganda congregation 613f
—Portuguese 589f
—Spanish 575ff
Mission sermons 559
Modena 240, 457, 492, 624
—Jesuit college 454
Modrezewski, Andrzej Frycz 317, 634
Mogrovejo, Toribio Alfonso de 583
Mohács, Turkish victory over Hungary (1526) 212, 241, 322
Molanus 409
Molina, Luis de 538, 542ff
Molinism 542ff
Molinist controversy 631
Moluccas 589, 596
—mission to 598f
Mömpelgard 269
Monasteries 299
—dissolution 225f
—in England 339
Monastic vows 119, 257, 262, 271, 335
—and evangelical freedom 85ff
Monastic prebens 478
Monastic property 263, 301, 626
Monomotapa 594
Montaigne 641
Montalto, cardinal 615
Montanus, Arias 546
Monte Corona 436
Montesa, Ambrosio 446
Montesino, Antonio de 579
Montezuma II 580
Montfaucon 552
Montfort, count 478
Montmorency, duke of, constable of France 391, 394, 636
Montorio, nuncio 626
Montserrat 447
Moors 443
Morality, private 220
Moravian Brethren (Hutterites) 182, 188
More, Thomas 153, 199f, 327, 330ff
Morigia 436
Mörlin 355
Mornay Duplessis, Philip de 635
Morone, Giovanni, cardinal 274, 277, 296, 457, 464, 481, 487, 489, 493ff, 496, 500, 504, 522f
Morosini, papal legate 515
Mossul 596
Mosvidius, Martin 319
Motolinía, see Toribio
Mount, Christopher 335
Mozambique 594
Mühlberg on the Elbe, victory of Charles V over Schmalkaldic League (1547) 287f
Mühldorf, reform convention (1522) 442
Mulattos 583
Mülhausen 176
Müling, Johannes, see Adelphi
Müller, Hans, peasant leader 140
Munich 532f
—Jesuit college 455
Münster in Westphalia 183
—Anabaptists 184ff
——"Empire of Münster" 186
—bishopric 281, 529, 626
—Jesuit college 532
—peace congress (1645–48) 627f
Münter, W. O. 222
Müntzer, Thomas 92, 97, 116, 122, 128–38, 142f, 178, 183, 189
—Ausgedrückte Entblössung des falschen Glaubens . . . 133, 135
—Church office 137
—Church regulation 131, 137
—German church office 130, 137
—German Evangelical Mass 131
—Hochverursachte Schutzrede . . . 134
—mysticism of the cross 134
—protestation 131
—social revolution (Peasants' War) 136f
Murner, Thomas 44, 71, 174, 199, 203
Murzynowski, Stanislaus 318
Musso, Cornelio 560
Mutianus Rufus 99f, 144
Myconius, Friedrich 230, 275
—Oswald 128, 168, 364
Mysticism 556ff

Nadal, Jerónimo 449, 454
Nadasdy, family 324
Nájera 446
Namur, bishopric 512
Nan-ch'ing 603
Nancy 574
Nanking 603

Nantes, edict (1585), see Edict
Naples 237f, 240, 434, 436, 457, 466, 483, 501, 503, 567, 629
—General chapter of Augustinians (1539) 460
—Jesuit college 454
—university 329
Nardini, cardinal 442
Narva 316
Nassau 408
—Calvinism 408f
— —church regulation 408
Nassau Confession 408
Nassau-Oranien 406
Nathin, Johann 18
Nationalism 6
National council 243, 273
—attempt to have German (1523ff) 208ff
Natural law 642
Natural sciences 639f, 642
Naumburg, bishopric 281, 298, 530
Naumburg, bishopric 281, 298, 530
—convention (1554) 355
—Reformation 281f
Nausea, Friedrich 197, 204, 205, 275
Navigation Acts 643
Nedelisce 325
Nemours, edict (1585) 396
Nepotism 500, 623
—of Paul IV 487f
Neri, Philip 435, 501, 507, 509, 548, 550, 567, 615, 619
Netherlands 287, 289, 295, 333, 407, 511, 512, 534, 615, 619, 621
—Calvinism 398ff
—established church, Reformed 401
—peace with Spain 630
Neuenburg 173
Neuser, Adam 407
New Granada 578
—mission to 584f
New Mexico 580
New Spain, see Mexico
Nevers 570
Nicaragua (Leon), bishopric 583
Nice, armistice between Charles V and Francis I (1538) 273, 463
Niedzwiedz 319
Nikolaus von Herborn 303
Nikolsburg (Moravia) 180
Ninguarda, Felician 504, 524f, 563
Nobili, cardinal 482
—Roberto de 597
Nóbrega, Manuel da 606
Nobunaga 600
Nogaret 5
Nominalism 10, 194, 264, 536
Norman, Georg 308
Norway 301, 303
—Reformation 303f
Novara, battle (1513) 156
Novitiate 495
Nueva Cáceres, bishopric 588
Nueva Segovia, bishopric 588
Nunciatures, papal, under Gregory XIII 504f
Nuño 543
Nürnberg 243f, 255, 259, 265f, 317
—church visitation 352
—diet (1522–23) 106
—diet (1524) 208f
—diet (1542) 281
—diet (1543) 281
Nürnberg Anstand (armistice) (1532) 268f
Nürnberg, league of (1538) 273
—Mass 308
—peace 273
—visitation articles (1528) 224

Obedience 348
Obbenites 186
Oberg, bishop of Münster 529
Oblates of St. Ambrose 567
Obligatory communion 562
Observants 437, 445, 459, 570f
Observance 444, 512
Ochino, Bernardino 439, 641
Ockham, William of 10, 16, 39f
—Luther's views 12, 14ff, 27
Odense, bishopric 302
—assembly of nobles (1526) 303
—assembly of nobles (1527) 303
Oecolampadius, Johannes 101, 136, 153f, 156, 171ff, 174, 202, 247, 249f, 398
Ofen, occupation by Suleiman (1541) 280
Office, spiritual 195, 250, 278, 291
—according to Luther 215f, 220ff
—regulations of 478
Official morality 220
Olahus, Nikolaus, archbishop of Tyrnau 326
Olesnicki, Mikolaj 319
Olevianus, Kaspar 376, 405f, 407f, 408
Olier 559
Olivarez, Spanish official 628
Olmütz, bishopric 531, 622
O'Neill, Hugh 519
Opus operatum—opus operantis 65, 70f
Orange, see William of Orange
Oratorians 567
—mission in Brazil 608
Oratory of Divine Love, Rome 434f
Oratory of Divine Wisdom, Milan 434
Oratory of St. Jerome, Vicenza 434
Orders, life in Orders 314, 532, 534, 612, 621
—new foundings 436f
—post-Tridentine development 567–74
—reform 458, 495
— —pre-Tridentine 459ff
Ordination 293, 374
—licenses 472
—right to 478
— —at Council of Trent 493
—sacrament 271, 294, 474f, 478, 491f
Örebro, provincial synod (1529) 308, 310

Orlamände 121ff, 217
Orléans, university 329
Ormaneto, vicar 501, 511
Ormuz 589
Ortiz 453
Orvieto 328
Ösel 316
Osiander, Andreas 249, 275, 312, 351, 352ff, 380, 642
—doctrine of justification 352ff
—controversy 352ff
Oslo, bishopric 302
—assembly of nobles (1539) 304
Osnabrück, bishopric 523
Ostrog, academy 520
—Bible 520
Ostrogski, Constantine, prince 52f
Ostroróg, Jakub 320
Oswald, J. 524
Otto Heinrich, Elector Palatinate 282, 352, 405, 423
Otto von Waldburg, bishop of Augsburg, cardinal 296, 455, 504
Oxford, university 329
Ozorai, Imre 325

Pacheco of Jaén, cardinal 466, 468, 471
Pacherneker, Leonhard 325
Pacis compositio (1629) 626
Pack, Otto 242
—affair 242
Paderborn, bishopric 281, 531, 626
—Jesuit college 532
Padua, university 329, 435
Páez, Esteban 586
Palatinate 376
—development of denominations 423
Palatinate, church regulation (1543) 352
Palatinate, Electoral, Reformation 282
—Calvinism 405ff
—church regulation, Calvinistic (1563) 406
Palatinate/Neuburg 616
—Reformation 282
Paleario, Aonio 500
Palencia, diocese 444
Paleotti Gabriele, cardinal 494, 502, 565
Palermo, Jesuit college 454, 567
Palestrina 566
Paliano, defeat of Paul IV (1557) 483
Pallavicino, Pietro Sforza 551f
Pallium fees 108
Palsson, Ögmundur, bishop of Skalholt 305
Pamfili, family 632
—Camillo 628, 631
—Gianbattista, see Innocent X
Pamplona 446
—bishopric 512
—diocesan synod (1590) 512
Panama, bishopric 583, 585
Panciroli, cardina 628, 631
Panigarola, Francesco, bishop of Asti 509, 560
Panvinio, Onofrio 548
Papa 325
Papacy, pope 4f, 9f, 204, 266, 271
—and council 493f
—and princely absolutism 637
—and reform 433
—concordat policy 5
—defenders of liberty and independence of the church 638
—implementation of Tridentine decrees 499–534
—Luther's views 63, 66ff, 78, 215, 257
—position under Paul V and Gregory XV 615
—primacy 195, 199, 201, 330ff, 336, 496, 547, 644f
— —and episcopate 492f
—rejuvenation since Council of Trent 498, 510
Papal state 237, 240, 483, 509, 624, 629
—regulation by Sixtus V 506
Paraguay
—bishopric 583
—christianization 584
—Jesuit reductions 585f
Paraver 595f
Paravicini 533
Paris 364, 396, 397, 553, 571
—assembly of clergy (1615) 516
—assembly of Estates General (1614–15) 619
—Jesuit college 454
—reformed national synod (1559) 392
—university 329, 535
Parishes, appointments to 495
—concursus for nominations 444
Parisio, Pietro Paolo 457, 464
Parker, Matthew, first anglican archbishop of Canterbury 328, 338, 518
Parma 237, 456, 479
Paschini, P. 431
Pasor, Georg 408
Passau 295, 524
—bishopric 531
—treaty (1552) 295f, 627
Pastor, Ludwig von 431, 499, 502, 618, 628
Pastoral care 7f, 472, 475, 496, 537
Pastors (Calvinist church regulation) 373
Pastoris, Adam 641
Patristics 547
Patronage, right 8, 217, 233, 478, 495
—Portuguese in colonies 589–610
—Spanish in colonies 511, 575–89
Paul III (Alessandro Farnese), pope, 8, 271, 279, 284f, 288, 334, 433, 439, 448, 451, 456, 458f, 461f, 474, 479ff, 485, 489, 495, 497, 504, 563, 582, 595
—and Charles V 464, 474
—and Henry VIII 334
—council convocations 462f
—reforms of curia 460f
—trailblazer of Catholic reform 456ff
Paul IV (Gian Pietro Carafa), pope, 299, 401,

411, 436, 440, 442, 450f, 459, 461, 483ff, 496, 500
Paul V (Camillo Borghese), pope 507, 522, 540, 544, 549, 566, 567, 569, 615ff, 619, 643
—conflict with Venice 616ff
—grace controversy 544
Paul of Burgos 443
Paul of Siglieri 436
Pauli (Pawel), Gregor 320
Paulins 319
Pavia, defeat of the French (1525) 238
—university 329
Pazmany, Peter, archbishop of Gran 327, 622
Pazzi, Maria Magdalena de 558
Peasants' War 126, 136, 138–43, 211, 217, 227, 234
Pedro de Villa Creces 445
Pegau 293
Pegu, see Burma
Peking 603
Pelargus, Ambrosius 202, 477
Pellikan, Konrad 169, 172
Penance 195, 200, 201, 232, 271, 335, 341f, 353
—Luther's view 69
—practice 42f
—sacrament 56
——Luther's view 65ff
——at Council of Trent 474, 477
Penitentiary 462, 481, 483
—reform 497, 501
Peraudi, Raimund 43
Perenyi, family 324
Peretti of Montalto, Felice, see Sixtus V
Pérez de Valdivia 556
Perrin, Aimé 375
Persons, Robert 517
Peru 578
—council (1567) 583
—mission to 582ff
—provincial council (1583) 584
Pescara 491
Petavius, Dionysius 552
Peter of Alcántara 556, 570
Peter of Ghent 580, 581
Petow 484
Petri, Adam 172
—Laurentius, archbishop of Uppsala 308f
—(Pederson), Olavus 306ff
—Suffridus 549
Petrikau
—provincial synod (1577) 519
—diet (1526) 318
—diet (1558) 484
Petrovics, Peter 324
Peter Lombard, discussed by Luther 14ff
Peucer, Kaspar 361
Peutinger, Conrad 144
Pezell, Christoph 361f, 408
Pfeddersheim (1525) 142
Pfeffinger, Degenhard 61
—Johannes 346f
Pfeiffer, Heinrich 135f
Pflug, Cäsar 50
—Julius von 97, 204, 205, 275, 277, 281f, 289
Pfyffer, Ludwig 533
Philip, duke of Braunschweig-Grubenhagen 211, 267
Philip II, king of Spain 294, 395f, 401f, 453, 489, 503, 508, 511, 535, 541, 546, 569, 570, 593
Philip III, king of Spain 543, 616, 639
Philip II of Wittelsbach 531
Philip the Magnanimous, landgrave of Hesse 142, 203, 211f, 241ff, 251, 254, 259f, 267, 269f, 274f, 280f, 281f, 288, 294, 474
—and Marburg colloquy (1529) 249f
Philip the Fair of Burgundy 435
Philip Ludwig of Palatinate-Neuburg
Philippines 576
—christianization 587ff
—conquest by Spain 587
Philippinos 588
Philippists 349, 352, 361
Philips, Dirk 186f
—Obbe 184, 186f
Philosophy 642
Piacenza 238, 288, 456, 463, 474, 479
Piarists 561, 568
Piccolomini, Francesco 458
Pietra 501
Piety, see Baroque piety
Pigge, Albert (Pighius) 199, 540
Pighino, reform nuncio 466, 471, 476f
Pilgrimages 9, 258, 314, 424, 563f
—to seven principal churches in Rome 507
Pinczow 319
Pirckheimer, Willibald 144, 145, 172, 234
Piscator, Johann 408
Pistorius, Johannes 277, 526, 633
—Johannes the Younger 634
Pithou, Pierre 553
Pius II, pope 461, 592f
Pius IV (Gianangelo Medici), pope 428, 437, 450, 455, 488ff, 497, 499f, 530, 553
—conclusion of Council of Trent 489–98
Pius V (Michele Ghislieri), pope 339, 457, 487, 500, 503f, 507, 509, 514, 517f, 538, 542, 546, 552, 564, 568, 573, 608, 610
Pius XII, pope 300
Pizarro, Francisco 582
Planitz, Hans von der 110
Plantin 553
Plettenberg, Wolter von, master of Teutonic Knights 316f
Pociej, bishop of Vladimir 521
Poggiano, Giulio 500
Poissy
—assembly of clergy (1561) 490
—national council (1561) 394f
—religious colloquy (1561) 454, 490, 634

Poitiers, assembly of Calvinists (1558) 392
Polanco 449, 569
Poland 311f, 317, 376, 484, 488, 499f, 511, 534, 630
—Catholic reform 511, 519
—development of denominations 421
—Reformation 317ff, 519
—religious freedom of nobility 319
—union of orthodox churches with Rome 521
Pole, Reginald, cardinal 332, 338, 435, 458, 464f, 480f, 484
—Margaret 332
Polentz, Georg, bishop of Samland 313ff
Poliander, Johannes 315
Politicians 635, 636f
Polish brothers 641
Polock, Jesuit college 520
Polyglots 546
Pomerellen 312
Pomerania 530
—Reformation 268
Pontifical reform (1644) 624
Poor Laws 169, 314
Poor Konrad (1514) 140
Popayán, bishopric 583, 585
Porta, Giacomo della 507
Portia, papal nuncio 524
Portugal 481, 535, 613, 629
—age of discovery 575f
—conquest and christianization of discovered lands 589ff
Porzia 504
Possevino, Antonio 310, 519f, 549
Post, R. R. 8
Potestas directa 540
Poullain, Valérand 403
Poverty 495
Power, spiritual and secular 617
—see also Office
Power, state 637
Poznan 318, 320
—Jesuit college 520
Prague 497
—manifesto (1521) 129f
—peace (1635) 625
— —with Saxony (1635) 627
—university 622
Prayer, confraternity of 564
Prayerbook 318, 564
Prayer, forty-hour 437, 563, 569
Prayer for the Dead 335
Prayer picture 564
Prayers 563f
Preaching of the law 232
Prebends, system of 112, 486
Predestination, and doctrine 336, 402, 406, 457, 542
—according to Calvin 378f
Premonstratensians 512f
Presbyterianism 629
—in England 419
—in Scotland 417f
Presbyterian synod 416
Presbyterian system 415
Press 457
Prierias, Sylvester 52, 54, 61, 67, 199f
Priests, priestly office 202, 215, 291f
—free selection of 122f
—general 119, 121, 222, 428
—in Luther's reform writings 68f
—marriage 205, 212, 257, 259f, 262f, 271, 290f, 337, 491, 523
—ordination, see Ordination, sacrament of —professional 428, 547
—seminaries 442, 493, 501
— —Tridentine in Germany 530f
—see also Office
Primacy, see Papacy
Princes 289
—reform 481, 495
—Reformation 143
—revolution 294ff
Printing shops 553f
Printing permits 210
Private confession 352, 423
Private feud 113
Private mass 87ff, 120, 259, 335, 492
Pro excellenti praeeminentia, bull (1514) 590
Professio fidei Tridentina (1564) 425, 497
Propaganda fide, see Congregation of Propaganda
Protestants, Protestantism 242ff, 256, 286, 420, 539, 635
—and council 288
—development of denomination 255ff
—disunity 265, 269f
—during beginnings of Counter-Reformation 620
—German 626
—see also Calvinism, Lutheranism, Zwinglians, etc.
Providence, divine, according to Calvin 378
Provincial synods 292, 426, 475f, 494, 502f, 530
Processions 9, 314, 428, 563
Prussia, duchy 311
—church regulation (1525) 315, 318
—constitution (1525) 316
—diet (1525) 316
—Reformation 312ff
Przemysl 521
Psalterium Qincuplex 19f
Public peace 263
Pucci, grand penitentiary 459
Puente, Luis de la 558
Puerto Rico 579
Purgatory 201, 250, 257, 259, 335, 475, 495
Puritans 419
Pürstinger, Berthold von Chiemsee 198
Puteo, cardinal 482f, 490
Pütter, J. St. 431

Pyhy, Georg von 309
Pyrenees, peace (1659) 643

Québec 609
Queis, Ehrhard von, bishop of Marienwerder 315f
Quesada 584
Quiñónez, Francisco, cardinal 337, 438, 460, 485
Quinzani, Stefana 435
Quirini, Vincenzo 435f
Quito, bishopric 583

Rabelais, François de 641
Rackeve 324
Radziwill, George, cardinal 519
—Mikolaj, prince 320, 484
Ragazzoni, 501
Rahner, Hugo 447
Raienau, Dietrich von, archbishop of Salzburg 524
Rakau Catechism (1605) 320
Rakow 320, 641
Ramser, Matthias 323
Ranchin, Gallican 515, 516
Rangoni, nuncio 522
Ranke, Leopold von 186, 241, 431f, 446, 624
Rapagelan, Stanislaus 319
Raesfeld, cathedral dean in Münster 529
Ratio studiorum 553, 554, 568
Ravaillac 616
Ravenna 240
Ravensberg 404
Ravesteyn, Josse 198, 477
Raynald 550
Real Presence 119, 123f, 169, 246, 337, 356, 359f, 389, 393, 403, 474, 477, 547
—view of Erasmus 155f
—see also Holy Communion, Eucharist, Transsubstantiation
Rebiba, cardinal 485, 487
Recollects 570
Reconquista 443, 576
Redemptions 42f
Reductions 585
—in Brazil 607
Rees 403
Reform, clerical 3, 8ff, 192, 208ff, 279, 292
—of church and nation 64
—see also Catholic Reform
Reformatio in capite et membris 8ff, 496
Reformatio Sigismundi 140
Reformation 3–429
—and humanism 144ff
—and Peasants' War 143
—as church reform 420f
—as church schism 429
—as seen by Calvin and Calvinism 384, 391f
—beginning (1517–25) 3–112
—causes 3–11
——historical 3ff
——immediate 6
—education 233ff
—German Reformation of princes 208–300
—in Eastern Europe 311–27
—in England 327–39
—in hand of authorities 143
—in Switzerland 156–77, 365f
—in the northern countries 301–11
—in Württemberg and other territories 268f
—privileges of the Estates 628
—politicization of reformatory movement 265–74
—progress 281–83
—religious instruction 233ff
—theology of controversy 191–207
—see also individual countries
Reformers around Luther 97–104, 138f
Reformed 299, 534, 635
—see also Calvin, Calvinism, Geneva
Reform cardinals and bishops 439ff, 458f
—Catholicism in Scandinavian countries 301 —constitutions (1513–14) 441
—councils 239f, 444, 459
—nunciatures 504
—popes, from Pius V to Clement VIII 499–510
—synods 530
Regensburg 287, 524, 620
—assembly of abbots (1631) 572
—Book 276f, 371
—convention (1524) 174, 209f
—diet (1541) 277ff, 280
—diet (1545) 286
—diet (1576) 522
—peace (1630) 625
—reform regulations (1524) 210
—religious colloquy (1541) 204, 277ff, 370f, 386, 464, 470
—religious colloquy (1545) 286, 465
—religious colloquy (1601) 633
—union (1524) 210
Reggio 240
Regimini militantes ecclesiae, bull (1540) 448
Register of baptisms and marriages 494
Regular clerics, Tridentine decree 570f
Regular Clerics of the Mother of God 567
Reims 398, 517
—provincial synod (1564) 516
Reinhardt, Anna 161
Relatio status dioecesis 506
Relicts, veneration 495
Religiosity, on eve of Reformation 9
Religious peace 295
—colloquies (1540–41) 273, 274–79, 633f
—see also Frankfurt/Main, Hagenau, Ilanz, Leipzig, Marburg, Poissy, Regensburg, Torun, Worms
—concession of Maximilian II (1568) 525
—instruction 235
—parties 421
—wars 265, 511f, 632, 643

— —see Schmalkaldic War
Repentance 341f, 348
Reprobation 379
Requeséns, Spanish ambassador 500, 502
Reservatum ecclesiasticum 665
Residence obligation 461, 469, 471f, 494, 628
—at Council of Trent 491f
—see also episcopate
Resistance, active and passive 219
—right 265f, 393, 638
Restitution, edict (1629) 626f
Rethius 532
Reublin (Röubli), Wilhelm 178, 180f
Reuchlin, Johannes 101, 114f, 144
Reumani, cardinal 485, 487
Reunion negotiations between Charles V and Protestants 464
Reunion, Christian 634f
Reutlingen 259, 267
Reval 316f
Revelation, revelation sources 536, 546
—Tridentine decree (1546) 468
Revolution 3, 10, 116f, 122, 128, 132ff, 138, 144, 150, 186, 196, 294, 340
Reynolds, Richard 331
Rhine, lower 406, 426ff, 523
—development of denominations 421f
Rhode, Heine 246
Rhodes 112
Rhodes, Alexandre de 606f
Ribadeneira 450
Ribe, bishopric 302
Ribier, Gallican 516
Riccardi, Niccolò 624, 643
Ricci, cardinal 479, 500
—Catherine 558
—Matteo 603f
Rice 332
Richelieu, cardinal 609, 615, 624, 630, 638
Richer, Edmund 516, 553
Riedenstein, bishop of Sitten 533
Rieger, U. 275
Riformati 570
Riga 316f
—Jesuit college 519
Rites 292
—of baptism 92, 228
—dispute 604, 605
Ritter, Erasmus 171
—Moritz 431
Rituale Romanum 561f
Rocca, Angelo 549, 554
Rochester 329
Rodez, Jesuit college 454
Rodinus, Thomas 103
Rodríguez, Alonso 448, 454f, 558
Rogers, John 336
Rohan, duke of 638
Rome 434, 465, 506, 517, 535, 553
—beginnings of Catholic reform 433, 455ff
—construction during Baroque 506f, 631f
—Jesuit college 454
Romanov, Michael 522
Romeo 459
Roman catechism, see Catechisms
Rorer 34
Roermond, bishopric 513
Rosary confraternities 564
Roser, Isabel 451
Roset, Michael 368
Roskilde, bishopric 302
Rossi, Carmelite general 570
Rossignoli, B. 558
Rosweyde, Heribert 552
—reform 497
Rota Romana 462
Rothmann, Bernhard 185
Rouen, edict (1588) 515
Rovere, Francesco della, see Sixtus IV
—Giuliano della, see Julius II
—Giulio 624
Royal Polyglot 546
Roz, Francisco, bishop of Angamale 597
Rubicon, bishopric 575
Rudolf II, emperor 525, 620, 642
Ruggieri, Michele 603
Ruiz 536
Rural population and development of denominations 422
Russia, attempts to approach by Rome 520
Ruthenians, union with Rome 521
Rutskij, uniate metropolitan 521
Ruysbroek 556

Sablons 541f
Sacco di Roma (1527) 240, 442
Sacerdotale Romanum 562
Sacra Congregatio de Propaganda Fide, see Congregation of Propaganda
Sacramental words 388
Sacramentals 314
Sacramentarians 242, 255, 263
Sacraments, and sacramental doctrine 204, 210, 212, 246, 278, 290f, 292, 314, 335, 337, 372, 387ff, 470, 472
—dispensation 219, 561f
— —abuses 475
—efficacious signs 473
—external sign of the church (Luther) 214
—fraternities 563
—institution 473
—receptacle 563
—seven 472f
Sacrosanctis salvatoris et redemptoris, bull 45
Sadoleto, Jacopo, cardinal 153, 372, 434, 458
Saganus, Georg 247
Salamanca 535f
—provincial synod (1565–66) 512
—school 537
—university 329, 445f, 542f, 642
Salazar, Domingo de 587

Salesians 573
Salmasius 552
Salmerón, Alfonso 448, 453, 538
Salò 435
Salviati, nuncio 459, 515
Salzburg 242, 273, 530, 532
—assembly of bishops (1576) 524
—provincial synod (1512) 442
—provincial synod (1569) 542
—provincial synod (1573) 542
—reform synods 292
—Tridentine reform 524
—university 572
Samson, indulgence preacher 158
Samuel, Andrzej 318
Sánchez, Alonso 603
—P. 558
Sanctification 16, 347
—according to Calvin 379f
Sandomir, agreement (1570) 319
Sanfelice 465
San Juan 579
Sanseverino, cardinal 610
Santa Fe de Bogotá, archbishopric 585
Santa María Antigua del Darién, bishopric 579
Santa Maria della Pace, union of secular priests 435
Santa Marta, bishopric 585
Santiago de Cabo Verde, bishopric 590
Santiago de Chile, bishopric 583f
Santo Domingo, bishopric 578
Santonio 533
Santori, cardinal 561
Santorio 503, 508
San Salvador 592
—bishopric 593f
São Salvador (Bahía), bishopric 607
São Salvador de Angra, bishopric 590
São Tomé, bishopric 590, 592
Saragossa 536
—Jesuit college 454
—provincial synod (1565–66) 512
Sardinha, Pedro Fernandes 607
Sardinia 466
Särkilathi, Petrus 310
Sarpi, Paolo 510, 551, 617f
Sattler, Michael 180, 181
Savona 434
Savonarola 435, 445, 556, 558
Savoy 284, 289
Saxony, duchy 273, 293, 298
—Reformation (1539) 274
Saxony, Electoral 244, 255, 287f, 477
Scandinavian countries, Christianity 301ff
Scarga 519, 520
Schaffhausen 166f, 175, 382
—Reformation 171
Schall von Bell, Johann Adam 604
Schappeler, Christoph 141
Schässburg 323
Schatzgeyer, Kaspar 194, 203
Schaumburg, Adolf von, archbishop of Cologne 283, 528
—Hermann von 529
—Martin von, bishop of Eichstätt 526
Scheel, Otto 11
Scheiner, Christoph 644
Scherer, Georg 532, 640
Schertlin von Burtenbach, Sebastian 287
Scheuri, Christoph 50, 144
Schiner, cardinal 106, 160
Schism, western 5, 10f
—English, see England
Schlaginhaufen 34
Schlegel, Theodul, abbot 171f
Schleitheim, meeting of Anabaptists (1527) 179
—Articles 180
Schleswig-Holstein school regulation (1542) 235
Schmalkalden 264
—convention of theologians (1540) 189f
—diet (1537) 272
Schmalkaldic, League 266ff, 270, 273ff, 280ff, 282, 287, 334, 463, 465, 473
—Articles 271f
—first constitution (1533) 267
—second constitution (1536) 267
—treaty of union (1530–31) 267
—war 284–288, 469
Schmidlin, J. 431, 506
Schnepf, Erhard 269, 357
Schola Disciplinatorum divini amoris 434
Scholastics 39, 194, 538
—Luther and scholastics 16, 27
—renewal 535ff
—see also Salamanca
Schönberg, Nikolaus von 438
Schönborn, Johann Philip von, elector 527, 636
Schönenberg, Johann von, archbishop of Trier 527
Schools, decline during Reformation 233
Schools for boys 480
Schott, Kaspar 644
Schröer, A. 529
Schütz, court preacher 361
Schwabach 224, 251
—Articles 249ff, 255, 257
—Confession (1529) 255
Schwäbisch Hall 236, 269
Schwärmer (fanatics) 217f, 222, 255f, 258, 420
—Karlstadt and Müntzer 116–37
Schwarz, Theobald 370
Schwenckfeld, Kaspar von 185, 189f
Schwerin 298
Schwyz 175, 176, 533
Scotland 499, 511
—Calvinism 410ff
—catechism 411
—church discipline and regulation 414ff
—national synod (1549) 410

—provincial synod (1552) 411
—ruin of Catholic Church 518
Scotti, Bernardino, cardinal 436, 485f, 500
Scotus 40
Scripture
—principle of 276, 335
— —at Council of Trent 468, 476
— —Luther's 194
— —Zwingli's 162
Seclusion, monastic 495, 501
Secularization 5, 298, 638, 639–45
—of thought 639ff
Sega, nuncio 557
Segovia 481
Seklucian, Jan 318
Semgallen 317
Seminaries, see Priest seminaries
Separation of church and state 191
Septuaginta 546
Seripando, conciliar legate, archbishop of Salerno 438, 460, 466, 470, 482, 490f, 492ff, 536, 541, 559
Sermon 276, 537, 559f, 560
—collections 311
—public 469
—reform 441
—Tridentine reform 469
Sermoneta, cardinal 411
Servet(us), Michael 377, 382f
Servites 460
Severoli 466
Seville
—Jesuit college 454
—national council (1478) 443
Seyssel, Calude de, bishop of Turin 446
Sfondrato, Celestino, cardinal 548
—Francesco, cardinal 458
—Niccolò, see Gregory XIV
—Paolo Emilio 508
Sforza, family 105
—Bona 317
—Francesco II 105, 239
—Guido Ascanio 458, 482
Shanghai 604
Shaxton 336
Shimabara rebellion (1637–38) 602
Siam 590, 605
Sicily 466
Sick, extreme unction 278, 293, 337, 562
—at Council of Trent 474, 477f
—care of 573
Sickingen, Franz von 114ff
Siebenbürgen 322, 324
—Reformation 326
Siena
—war (1552) 479
—university 329
Sigismund I, king of Poland 44, 318
Sigismund II Augustus, king of Poland 309, 317, 319f, 484, 519, 635
Sigismund III Vasa, king of Sweden 310, 519f
Sigmund, count 140
Signature, papal 481, 483
—practice of dispensation under Paul IV 487
Sigüenza, university 543
Silesia 622
—Reformation 189
Silveira, Gonçalo da 594
Simon VI, count of Lippe 409
Simonetta, Giacomo, cardinal 461
—Ludovico, council legate 463, 490f, 493
Simons, Menno 183f, 186, 186f
Simony 44f, 441f, 461, 485
Sin 271, 277
—according to Luther 82f
Sinclair, John, bishop of Brechin 518
Sirleto, Guglielmo, cardinal 485, 500, 505, 507, 547, 552, 554
Sixto-Clementina (1592) 508, 546
Sixtus IV (Francesco della Rovere), pope 43f, 439, 461, 469, 504
Sixtus V (Felice Peretti of Montalto), pope 396, 503, 505ff, 514, 515, 520, 542, 549, 554, 564, 568, 573, 610, 631
—building activity 506f
—reform of Curia 506f
Sixtus of Siena 547
Skalholt, bishopric 301
Skarga, Peter 569
Skytte, Marten, bishop of Abo 310f
Slave trade 585, 591, 594
Sleidanus, Johannes 399f, 477
Slovenia, Reformation 325f
Society of Jesus (Jesuits) 283, 293, 442, 446, 446ff, 456, 502, 525, 532f, 535, 539, 562, 565, 568f, 611, 622, 626, 629, 638
—and dispute over grace 542ff
—and education 427
—and witch trials 639
—constitutions 449f
—expansion 453ff
— —in Brazil 455
— —in China 455
— —in Germany 455
— —in France 454
— —in India 455
— —in Italy 454
— —in Portugal 454f
— —in Spain 454
— —in the Netherlands 454
—expulsion from Venice (1606) 617f
—Formula Instituti 448f
—founding of Order 447f
—mission to Angola 593
— —Brazil 606f
— —Canada 609
— —Celebes 598
— —Ceylon 598
— —China 602ff
— —Congo 593
— —East Africa 594
— —East Java 598

——India 595f
——Indochina 605
——Japan 599ff
——Mexico 581
——Moluccas 598
——Paraguay 585ff
——Peru 582
——Philippines 588
—work in Hungary 327
—see also Ratio studiorum
Socinians 311, 320
Soderini, cardinal 112f
Söderköping, diet (1595) 310
Solano, Francisco 582
Sola scriptura, principle of Reformation 64
Solor 599
Solórzano 613
Solothurn 175
Somasca 437
Somaschi 437
Somerset, duke of 336, 337
Sommerlath, E. 222
Songbooks 311
Soranzo 498
Sorbonne 59, 396, 454, 486, 639
—appeal of council (1518) 59
Soreth, John 438
Soto, Domingo de 201, 445, 477, 539, 556
—Pedro de 289
South America 575–608
Souza, Tomé de 606
Sovereigns 298
—"emergency bishops" (Luther) 223f
—and Luther's Reformation 229f
Sozzini, Fausto 320, 641
—Lelio 641
Spada 631
Spalatin (Burckhardt), Georg 36, 46, 54, 58ff, 64, 66ff, 75, 78, 81, 84, 86, 88, 90, 92, 99ff, 144f, 221, 230f
Spangenberg, Cyriakus 318
Spain 433, 481, 483, 488, 503, 506, 511, 514, 534, 535, 567, 615, 625, 628, 631, 638, 644
—age of discovery 576f
—beginnings of reform 442ff
—Catholic reform 511
—church and state under Philip II 512
——iconoclasm (1566) 513
——new church provinces 512
——religious edicts of Charles V 513
—mission to newly discovered lands 577
—provincial synods 512
—rivalry with France 615f
—Tridentine seminaries 512
Sparre, Aage Jepsen, Master, archbishop of Lund 303
Spaur, bishop of Brixen 525
Speciano 511
Spee, Friedrich von 539, 562, 640f
Spengler, Lazarus 265, 352
Spenlein, Georg 37
Speratus, Paul 314, 321
Speyer 209, 422
—diet (1526) 211f, 241
——recess 212, 230, 242
—diet (1529) 242
——recess 181, 243f
—diet (1542) 280, 282
—diet (1544) 284, 464
—national council (1524) 208
Spina 201
Spiritual drama 427
Spiritual estates 297
Spiritual life 556ff
Spiritual regimen 218ff
Spiritual reservation 297, 298, 522
Spiritualism, spiritualists 188–91, 420
—Obbe Philips 186
Spirituality, Spanish 556ff
St. André, marshall 394
St. Asaph 329
St. Denis 571
St. Gallen 166, 176, 243, 533
—Reformation 170
St. Germain-des-Prés 572
St. Germain-en-Laye, edict (1562) 394
—peace (1570) 395f, 514
St. Nicholas fraternity 433
St. Omer 517, 574
—bishopric 512
St. Vanne, congregation OSB 572
State and church 637ff
—according to Calvin 381
State church 639
State secretariat, papal 631
State, theory of 637ff
Stadler, Ulrich 182
Stammheim 171
Stancarno (Stancarnus), Francesco 326, 355
Standonck 442
Stans 533
Staphylus, Friedrich 355, 633
Stapleton, Thomas 541
Status reports 506
Staupitz, Johann von 18f, 51, 53, 58, 71, 117
Stavanger, bishopric 302
Stegmüller, F. 537, 539
Stein, Wolfgang 125
Stella, Bartolomeo 435
Stengel, Georg 640
Sten Sture the Younger 302
Stobaeus, bishop of Lavant 525
Stöckel, Leonhard 322
Storch, Nikolaus 89f, 129
Stössel 361
Stoyb, diocesan priest 533
Strängnäs, bishopric 302
Strasbourg 175f, 179f, 243f, 252, 258, 266, 338, 370, 391, 399ff, 403, 477
—bishopric 527, 531
—synod (1533) 184
Stravius, vicar general in Cologne 529

Strigel, Victorin 346f
Stuart, Erné, Lord D'Aubigny 417
Stübner, Markus (Thomas) 89f
Stunica 446
Sturm, Jakob 249, 266
—Johannes 369, 376, 399
—Kaspar 78
Stuttgart 269
—Accord 269
—synod (1559) 359
Styria 325, 525, 622
Suárez, Francisco 536, 539, 558, 617, 642
Subjectivism 6
Succession Act of Henry VIII 330
Suleiman II, sultan 105, 268, 280
Sulpicians 516
Sumatra 590
Sunda Islands, Large, mission to 598
—Small, mission to 598
Superintendents 233f
Superstition 9, 424, 639f
Supralapsiarianism 402
Supremacy Act (1534) 241, 329
—(1559) 338
Supreme Court 263, 265, 266, 272, 279, 280, 284
Surius, Laurentius 549, 551
Svenichen, Alexander 318
Swabian League 241, 268, 289
Sweden 301f, 305, 317, 615, 630
—attempt to re-Catholicize 519f
—church regulation (1571) 309
—new church regulation (1575) 309
—Reformation 306ff
Swedish Mass 308
Switzerland 420, 499
—Christian union (1529) with Austria 177
—established church 156
—Reformation 156, 170–77, 253
— —Zwingli and beginnings of Swiss Reformation 156–70
—reformers 249
—religious war (1529) 176
—Tridentine reforms 533f
Syllogismus practicus 379
Sylvanus, Johannes 407
Sylvester, Johannes 324
Synergism, synergist controversy 98, 344ff
Synodal system 112
Synods, see Diocesan synods, Provincial synods
Szegedi, Gregor 326
Sztarai, Michael 325

Tacchi Venturi 439
Talavera, Hernando, archbishop of Granada 443
Tametsi, marriage decree (1563) 494, 528, 563
Tanner, Adam 536, 539, 634, 640
Tapper, Ruard 198, 477, 540
Tarragona, Benedictine congregation 512
Tarugi, cardinal 567
Tauler 131, 556
Tausen, Hans 344
Teaching benefices 469
Tegetmeyer, Sylvester 316
Temesvar 324
Tenochtitlán 580
Teresa of Avila 556, 557f, 564, 570, 619
Terlecki, bishop of Luck 521
Ternate 596
—mission to 598f
Territorial princes 638
Territorial states 299
Territories and development of denominations 421f
Tetrapolitana 258, 267
Tetschen 341
Tetzel, Johannes 8, 46f, 50, 52f, 54, 61f, 73
Teutonic Order, state of 312, 314
Textus receptus 546
Thamer, Theobald 633
Theatines 436f, 483, 502, 562
Theocracy 218, 368, 374
Theology 194f, 218, 291, 534
—mystical 558
—of controversy and polemics 428
—positive 536
— —rise 546–55
Theophanos, patriarch of Jerusalem 521
Thesaurus ecclesiae 43, 56
Third Order 562
Thirty Years War, beginning 620ff
—church policies 624f
Thodenus 409
Thomas a Jesu 570f, 611
Thomas Aquinas 10, 32, 40, 49, 69f, 445, 536f
Thomas de Vio, see Cajetan
Thomas of Silvestro 434
Thomas Christians 595f, 597f
—union with Rome 597
Thomism 538, 542ff
Thou, Jacques Auguste de 516
Thüngen, bishop of Bamberg 526
Thurgau, Reformation 170
Tiepolo, Nicolò 435
Tillet, Louis du 364
Tilly 626
Timann (Amsterodamus), Johannes 357
Tintzmann 560
Tithing 233
Tlaxcala, bishopric 580
Toggenburg, Reformation 170
Toledo 502
—provincial synod (1565–66) 512
Toledo, cardinal 457
Tolerance 298, 632, 635
—by state 636, 637
Tolna 324
Tonkin, mission to 606
Torczyn 521
Torda, provincial diet (1557) 324

Tordesillas, treaty (1494) 576
Torelli, Luisa 437
Torgau 249, 265
—Articles 255f, 257
—convention (1527) 342
—Eucharistic Confession (1574) 361
—expert opinion of (1549) 351
—visitation regulation (1527) 231f
Toribio de Benavente 580
Török, family 325
Torres, Cosme de 599
—Franciscus 548
Totti 632
Toul 295
Toulouse, university 329
Tournai 399
—bishopric 399
—Jesuit college 454
Tournon, Jesuit college 454
Tradition 194, 276, 536, 546
Transubstantiation, and doctrine 69, 120, 194f, 245, 278, 335, 360, 371, 385, 386, 388, 477
—see also Eucharist, doctrine of Trapper 535
Trappists 572
Traubüchlein, Luther's 229
Trautmannsdorf, count 627
Treason Act of Henry VIII 331
Trembach, Urban von, bishop of Passau 524
Trent 288, 294, 295, 464
—Council of, see Councils
Treptow (Pomerania) 315
Trevisani, Jerome, bishop of Cremona 440
Trials 478
Tridentine reform, see Catholic reform
Trie, Guillaume de 382
Trier 405, 527, 639
—Jesuit college 454
Trinitarians 512
Trinity, trinity doctrine 250, 271, 640
—Calvin's 377
—Servet's 382
Tritheists 641
Trithemius, Johannes 549
Trivius 529
Trolle, Gustav, archbishop of Uppsala 306
Trondheim (Nidaros), archbishopric 302
Trubar, Primoz 325
Trujillo, bishopric 583
Tschudi, Valenti 171
Tübingen
—monastery 269
—university 269f, 426, 642
Tucumán (Santiago de Estero), bishopric 583
Turin 463
Turks, threat from Turks 212, 239ff, 241, 254, 261, 268, 280, 285, 295, 322
Turkish wars 106, 108, 112, 218f, 268, 273
Tuscany 624
Twelve Chief Articles of the Peasantry 141
Two natures, doctrine 250, 271
Two powers theory 5
Tyburne 331
Tyndale, William 333, 336
Tyrants, assassination of 638f
Tyrnau 326f
Tyrol 295, 525, 532
—anabaptists 182

Ubaldini, papal nuncio 616, 619
Ubiquity, doctrine 124, 356, 359f, 389
Ubi unus dominus, ibi una sit religio 297
Uchanski, archbishop of Gnesen 484, 519
Ujsziget near Savar, academy 324
Ukraine 520
Ulenberg, Caspar 546, 562, 633
Ulm 175, 243, 244, 267, 293, 424
Ulrich, duke of Württemberg 114, 141, 241, 268, 287, 633
Unam sanctam, bull 5
Ungnad, family 325
Ungnad Freiherr zu Sonneck, Johann 325
Uniformity Acts (1554) 418
—(1559) 338, 517
Union of Arras (1579) 402
—of Brest (1596) 521
—Protestant 621
Unio sacramentalis 270, 385
Unitarians, unitarianism 311, 637, 641
Unity, religious 258
Universalis Ecclesiae, bull (1508) 577
University
—effects of Reformation 233ff
—see also individual cities
Unterwalden 175
Upper Palatinate 524
Uppsala, archbishopric 302
—national synod (1593) 310f, 519
Urban V, pope 575
Urban VII (Gian Battista Castagna), pope 508, 511
Urban VIII (Matteo Barberini), pope 551, 565, 571, 572f, 605, 612, 615f, 619f, 623ff, 628ff, 643
—neutrality policy 624f
Urbanus Rhegius 180
Urbino 624
Urdaneta, Andrea de 587
Uri 175
Ursinus, Zacharias 405ff
Ursulines 437, 573
Uruguay, christianization 584
Usodimare 459
Utjesenovich (Martinuzzi), George 326
Utrecht 402, 513
—union (1579) 402, 513

Vadian Joachim 156, 170, 179
Vadstena, convent of St. Bridget 310, 519
Valdez, Alfonso 258, 445
—Juan 445
Valencia, provincial synod (1565–66) 512

Valencia, Gregory of 538
Valenciennes 399
Valier of Verona, cardinal 502
Valignano, Alessandro 600
Valladoilid 444, 517, 535
—Benedictine congregation 571
—Disputation: Grace controversy (1594) 543
Vallière, Jean 362
Valverde, Vicente 582
Varela, María 557
Västeras, bishopric 302
—diet (1527) 307, 310
Vatican library 554
—printing house 553
Växjö, bishopric 302
Vázquez, Gabriel 536, 539f
—Michael 543
Vega, Andrés de 445, 469
Vehe, Michael 206
Velázquez, Diego 628
—Juan 446
Veltlin 625
Veltwyk, Gerhard 276
Veneration of saints 9, 195, 201, 257, 276, 278, 335,371, 495, 547, 551, 624
Venezuela 584f
—christianization 585
Venice 238f, 435, 436, 437, 456, 492, 500, 503, 509, 540, 550, 553, 624, 629
—conflict with Paul V 616ff
—Jesuit college 454
—peace (1177) 629
—Turkish war 629
Verallo, nuncio 474
Verden 294, 298
—bishopric 529, 627
Verdun 295
Vergara, Juan 446
Vergerio, Pietro Paolo the Younger 463, 510
Vernazza, Ettore 434
Verona 436, 437
Verrazzano, Giovanni de 608
Vervins, Spanish-French peace (1598) 508, 609
Viborg, bishopric 302
Vice curates 8
Vicenza 436, 463
Victoria, Fr. de, bishop of Tucumán 586
Vienna 571
—bishopric 525
—Jesuit college 455
—peace (1606) 620
Vignaux, P. 17
Vignola 507
Villach 295
Viller 532
Villoslada, G. 432
Vilna, Jesuit college 519, 520
Vinghe, Philip de 548
Vincentians 574
Vincent de Paul 560, 574
Violent Diet (1547), see Augsburg
Viret, Peter 376, 385
Visitatio liminum 506, 644
Visitations, canonic (episcopal) 292, 494, 497, 530
—commissions 233
—Melanchthon's regulation 231f
—Protestant 231f, 236, 421, 424, 426
Visitors, instructions for 233, 235f
Vita communis 460
Vitelleschi, Mutius 569
Vitoria, Francisco de 329, 445, 535, 537, 642
—Thomas de 566
Vitus von Windsheim 321
Volkertszoon 184
Volmar, Melchior 363
Volta, Gabriel della 53
Vondel, Jost van den 633
Volusius, Adam Gottfried 633
Vorst, Peter van der, papal nuncio 272, 273
Vossler, K. 557
Vows 195
Vulgate 468, 510
—revision 507

Waadt, Reformation 175
Wadding, Luke 624
Wagner, Valentin 323
Waldberg, Gebhard Truchsess von, archbishop of Cologne 528
—Otto Truchsess von, cardinal 526
Waldeck, Franz von, bishop of Münster 185
Wallenstein 626, 627
Wallis 534
Walloons 402
Wallon-Flanders 402
Wangnereck 627
War against priests 114ff
Ward, Mary 574f
Warham, William, archbishop of Canterbury 327
Warsaw confederation (1573) 319, 519
Wartenberg, Franz Wilhelm von, bishop of Osnabrück 529, 627
Wassenberg preachers 185
Webster, Augustin 331
Wegelin, Georg 572
Weimar, disputation (1560) 346
Weimar Confutation Book (1559) 346
Weissenburg, bishopric 322f, 326
Weissenhorn 554
Welser, merchants 585
Werl 564
Wesel 401, 402f
—classes 404
—convention (1568) 401, 403
West Africa, mission to 592f
Westphalia, peace (1648) 529, 615, 627ff, 643
Westphal, Joachim 356ff, 390
Wetterau 409
Whitgift, John, Anglican archbishop of Canterbury 339, 518

Wied, Friedrich von, archbishop of Cologne 528
—Hermann von, archbishop of Cologne 283f, 528
Wiener, Paul, bishop of Weissenburg 323
Wiener Neustadt, bishopric 525
Wild 560
Wilhelm, archbishop of Riga 316
Wilhelm IV, duke of Bavaria 196, 209f
Wilhelm V, duke of Bavaria 524, 531
Wilhelm von Fürstenberg, Master of Teutonic Order 316
Wilhelm of Hesse 294
Wilhelm V, duke of Jülich-Cleve-Berg 426, 523
William of Ockham 217
William of Orange 401, 408, 513
Wiiliamists in Geneva 371
Will, freedom of 277, 336, 346f 541
—according to Erasmus 146ff
—according to Luther 149ff
—lack of 344
—see also Predestination, Synergism
Willaert 536
Wimpina, Konrad 52
Winzet, Ninian 518
Wirsberg, bishop of Würzburg 525
Wishart, George 411
Witch trials, witch persecution 425, 639f
Wittelsbach, House of 286, 499, 503, 531, 564
Wittenberg 120, 210, 227, 245, 255f, 282, 293f, 324, 329, 423, 426
—accord (1536) 98, 269f, 385
—accord negotiations (1536) 270
—capitulation 288
—church regulation (1521) 226
—city ordinance (1522) 120
—faculty of arts 64
—people and Karlstadt 122
—reformatory movement 81ff
—school regulation (1533) 235
—see also Lutherans
Witzel, Georg 154, 204, 205ff, 273, 276, 523, 561, 634f
Wolf, E. 642
Wolfenbüttel Psalter 20
Wolfgang, prince of Anhalt-Bernburg 211, 243, 259, 267
Wolfgang, duke of Zweibrücken 407
Wolfgang Wilhelm, count Palatinate 626, 633
Wölfflin 157
Wolsey, Thomas, archbishop of York 327f, 334
Women, religious associations, post-Tridentine development 573
Word (gospel) 246, 387
—external sign of the church (Luther) 214f
—liturgy of the 337
—proclamation of 219
Works, good 98, 347ff, 349
—according to Calvin 379
—see also Faith and works
Work piety 9, 66
Worms 181, 422, 465
—assembly of princes (1539) 273
—colloquy (1557) 633
—diet (1521) 77ff, 202, 435
—diet (1545) 285
—edict (1521) 79, 105, 108, 208ff, 211ff, 230, 241, 243, 254f, 263, 626
—religious colloquy (1540–41) 275, 370
Wotton, English ambassador to Venice 617
Wujek 520
Württemberg 293, 477, 627
—church regulation of Duke Ulrich 269
—Reformation 268
Würtzburg, bishop of Bamberg 526
Würzburg 242, 525, 621
—university 525
Wyclif, John 148
Wyclifism 327
Wyttenbach, Thomas 157, 173

Xanten, treaty (1614) 405
Xavier, Francis, apostle to India 448, 453, 564, 569, 594, 595f, 598, 599, 602, 619
Ximénes de Cisneros, archbishop of Toledo 106, 443, 445, 535

York 332
—archbishopric 327
Yucatán 580
—bishopric 580
Ypres, bishopric 513

Zabardy, Matthias, bishop of Wardein 326
Zabern (1525) 142
Zaccaria, Anton Maria 435, 437
Zapolya, John, king of Hungary 242, 268, 280, 322f, 324f
—John II 322
Zasius, Ulrich 144
Zeeland 401
Zelanti, at Council of Trent 493f
Zerbst 409
Zeys, Joh. 130
Zichem, Eustachius van 199
Zini, secretary 441
Zips 323
Zollern, cardinal 623
Zollikon 179
Zoepfl, Friedrich 526
Zrinyi, family 325
—Georg 325
Zug 175, 533
Zuleger, Wenceslaus 406
Zumárraga, Juan de 581
Zürich 176, 178, 252, 267, 338, 382
—abolition of images, relics, etc. 167
—Bible 170
—church order 169
—defense treaties 176

—diet (1531) 253
—Eucharist, doctrine of 386ff
—first debate (1523) 163, 245
—iconoclasm 165f
—marriage court regulation 169
—morals court 169
—poor law 169
—Reformation 157
—second debate (1523) 166
—synod regulation (1523) 253
—Zwinglian reform 159ff
Zweibrücken 422
Zwickau prophets 89f, 129
Zwilling, Gabriel 85, 87, 89f, 120
Zwingli, Ulrich 4, 9, 84, 116, 127, 138f, 144, 156, 157–70 174, 175f, 178, 185, 189, 192, 195, 196, 244, 249ff, 255f, 259f, 267, 359, 364f, 386, 398, 488
—and council 164
—and Luther 158
—break with church 160–70
—break with papacy 159ff
—death and succession 252f
—divine service regulation 165
—education reform 165
—Eucharistic doctrine 166ff, 245–49
—iconoclasm 165f
—life 157f
—Marburg colloquy 249–52
—reform sermons 158, 163
—Scripture, principle 162ff
—social revolution 139
—spiritualism 246f
—state theory 163
—word, liturgy of the 168
—writings
——prophecy 169
——Regulation of the Christian Church in Zürich 168
Zwinglians, Zwinglianism 243, 253, 255f, 269
—Eucharist, doctrine 386ff
Zwingli's Christian right to defense 244

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

VI

HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

Edited by HUBERT JEDIN and JOHN DOLAN

Volume VI

THE CHURCH IN THE AGE OF ABSOLUTISM AND ENLIGHTENMENT

by

Wolfgang Müller

Quintín Aldea

Johannes Beckmann

Louis Cognet

Patrick J. Corish

Oskar Köhler

Heribert Raab

Burkhart Schneider

Bernhard Stasiewski

Translated by

Gunther J. Holst

Crossroad · New York

1981
The Crossroad Publishing Company
18 East 41st Street, New York, NY 10017

Translated from the Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte
Vol. V: Die Kirche im Zeitalter des Absolutismus und der Aufklärung
© Verlag Herder KG Freiburg im Breisgau 1970

English translation © 1981 by The Crossroad Publishing Company

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise,
without the written permission of The Crossroad Publishing Company.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Kirche im Zeitalter des Absolutismus und der Aufklärung.
English.
The Church in the age of absolutism and enlightenment.
(History of the Church; v. 6)
Translation of: Die Kirche im Zeitalter des
Absolutismus und der Aufklärung.
Includes bibliographies and index.
1. Church history—17th century. 2. Church history—
18th century. I. Müller, Wolfgang, 1905–
II. Series: Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte. English; v. 6.
BR145.2.J413 1980, vol. 6 [BR440] 270s 81-5056
ISBN 0-8245-0010-5 [270.7] AACR2 Previously: 0-8164-0445-3

CONTENTS

Preface ix
Preface to the English Edition xi
Introduction xiii
List of Abbreviations xxi

PART ONE: THE LEADERSHIP POSITION OF FRANCE

SECTION ONE: ECCLESIASTICAL LIFE IN FRANCE (Louis Cognet) 3

Chapter 1: Christian Renewal after 1615 3
  French Catholicism under Louis XIII 3
  Richelieu and the Milieu Dévot 11
  The Reform of the Clergy 16

Chapter 2: Origin and Development of Jansenism to 1653 24
  Augustinianism in Louvain and Jansen 24
  Augustinianism in France: Saint-Cyran and Port-Royal 28
  The Beginnings of the Jansenist Conflict; The Bull In eminenti 31
  The Five Theses and the Bull Cum occasione 37

Chapter 3: The Jansenist Conflict to 1713 41
  The quaestio juris and the quaestio facti; The Provinciales 41
  The Formulary 45
  The Clementine Peace 49
  The Way to the Bull Unigenitus 53

Chapter 4: Gallicanism and Protestantism 57
  Gallicanism at the Beginning of the Seventeenth Century 57
  Richelieu and the Holy See 61
  The Gallicanism of Louis XIV 65
  Protestantism in Seventeenth-Century France 70

Chapter 5: Spirituality in Seventeenth-Century France 75
  Major Trends in Seventeenth-Century Spirituality 75
  The Great Christian Works 80
  Christian Life 84
  From Cartesianism to Quietism 88

Chapter 6: Christian Thought in Seventeenth-Century France 93
  Systematic and Scholastic Theology 93
  The Development of Historical Theology 97
  Cartesianism and Religious Thought 101

SECTION TWO: THE PAPACY IN THE PERIOD OF FRENCH HEGEMONY (Burkhart Schneider) 107

Introduction 107

Chapter 7: The Popes from Alexander VII to Clement X 109
  Alexander VII (1655–67) 109
  Clement IX (1667–69) 114
  Clement X (1670–76) 115

Chapter 8: Innocent XI 118

Chapter 9: The Popes from Alexander VIII to Clement XI 126
  Alexander VIII (1689–91) 126
  Innocent XII (1691–1700) 127
  Clement XI (1700–1721) 129

SECTION THREE: THE END OF THE DENOMINATIONAL ERA IN EUROPE—PROGRESS AND STAGNATION OF THE WORLD MISSION (ch. 10: Heribert Raab; 11: Quintín Aldea; 12: Patrick J. Corish; 13 and 14: Bernhard Stasiewski; 15–17: Johannes Beckmann) 135

Chapter 10: Reconstruction and Constitution of the Church of the Empire . . 135

Chapter 11: Spain and Portugal to 1815 161
  The General Intellectual Situation 161
  The Geographic, Sociographic, and Economic Situation 162
  The Development of Ecclesiastical Institutions 163
  Church and State 168

Chapter 12: The Condition of the Catholics in Great Britain and Ireland in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries 172
  The Early Stuarts 172
  Commonwealth and Restoration 174
  The Penal Code of the Eighteenth Century 177
  Catholic Emancipation 181

Chapter 13: The Russian Orthodox Church 183
  Moscow the Third Rome 183
  The First Moscow Patriarchate 185
  The Dissolution of the Patriarchate and the Establishment of the Holy Synod 193
  The Russian Established Church under the Holy Synod 198
  Protestants and Catholics in Russia 203

Chapter 14: The Autonomous and the Uniate Churches in the East 207
  The Autonomous Eastern Churches 208
  The Orthodox Churches 209
  The Oriental National Churches of the Nestorians and Monophysites . . . 217
  The Uniate Churches 223

Chapter 15: The Propagation of the Faith in America 232
  The Waning of the Missionary Spirit and the Decline of the Missions . . . 232
  The Revival of the Missionary Spirit and the Expansion of the Missions . . 247
    The Franciscans 247
    The Jesuits 252
    Other Orders 259
  The Enlightenment and Its Consequences 264

Chapter 16: The Propagation of the Faith in Africa 270

Chapter 17: The Propagation of the Faith in Asia 279
The Propaganda and the Portuguese Padroado 280
Development and Decline of the Missions in the Asian Countries 290
India 290
Indochina 301
China 303
Japan 317
The Philippines and the South Seas 321

PART TWO: THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH AND THE ENLIGHTENMENT

SECTION ONE: CONCEPTS (Oskar Köhler) 329

Chapter 18: Foundations and Forms of the Established Church in the Bourbon States of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries 329

Chapter 19: The Enlightenment 342
Concept 342
The Enlightenment within the Political and Social Conditions of Individual Countries 347
Creation and Natural Law—The History of Salvation and the World of History 372

SECTION TWO: CHURCH LIFE UNDER THE INFLUENCE OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH AND THE ENLIGHTENMENT (ch. 20–22: Louis Cognet; 23, 24, 26 and 27: Heribert Raab; 25: Bernhard Stasiewski; 28 and 29: Wolfgang Müller) . . 381

Chapter 20: Jansenism in Eighteenth-Century France 381
The Bull Unigenitus 381
The Appellation 392
The Defeat of Jansenism 404
Jansenism and the Religious Mentality of the Eighteenth Century 413

Chapter 21: Spirituality and Its Development in Eighteenth-Century France . 428
Christian Life 428
The Continuance of Mysticism 430
Popular Devotions 433

Chapter 22: Anglican Spirituality in the Eighteenth Century 435
John Wesley (1703–91) and Methodism 439

Chapter 23: Episcopalism in the Church of the Empire from the Middle of the Seventeenth Century to the End of the Eighteenth Century 443
Practical Episcopalism from the End of the Seventeenth Century to the Beginning of the Eighteenth Century 443
The Canonical and Theological Foundation of Episcopalism in the Church of the Empire 449
Febronius and Febronianism 453
The Coblenz Gravamina of 1769 458
The Nunciature Dispute and the Congress of Ems 465

Chapter 24: The Established Church and the Enlightenment in the Temporal Territories of the Empire—Theresianism and Josephinism 469
Theresianism and Josephinism 472
The Established Church in Electoral Bavaria 482

Chapter 25: State and Church in Poland-Lithuania to the End of the Republic of the Aristocracy 489

Chapter 26: The Decline of the Church of the Empire in the Great Secularization 491

Chapter 27: Attempts at Church Reunion 509

Chapter 28: Ecclesiastical Learning in the Eighteenth Century—Theology of Enlightenment and Pietism 524
Catholic Theology 524
Scholarship in Italy 532
Jansenism in Italy; The Synod of Pistoia, 1786 534
Protestant Theology 535
Catholic Universities 538
Academies 543
Education 545

Chapter 29: Liturgy and Popular Piety—New Religious Orders 547
The Liturgy 547
New Religious Orders 554

SECTION THREE: THE PAPACY UNDER THE INCREASING PRESSURE OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH (Burkhart Schneider) 558

Chapter 30: The Popes from Innocent XIII to Clement XII 560
Innocent XIII (1721–24) 560
Benedict XIII (1724–30) 560
Clement XII (1730–40) 563

Chapter 31: Benedict XIV 566

Chapter 32: Clement XIII and Clement XIV 573
Clement XIII (1758–69) 573
Clement XIV (1769–74) 577

BIBLIOGRAPHY 583

General Bibliography 584

Bibliography to Individual Chapters 591

INDEX 645

PREFACE

As the list of contributors to this volume demonstrates, it was necessary to take into account the increasing complexity of the life of the Church in the period treated by calling upon more experts from other countries. The number of contributors could not but make it more difficult to maintain the uniformity within the total concept of this work. Therefore the editor and the coordinators have decided to preface this volume with an introduction to facilitate its synthesis.

At this time we announce with great sadness the death of Louis Cognet on 29 July 1970. The stamp of his greatness appears in this volume. Although it was only two years ago that he was invited to collaborate with us, he has produced an account of the life of the Church in France during and following the Grand Siècle to the great revolution which far surpasses any such account of similar size available in Germany till now. Drawing on his most profound expertise, he has done this with admirable precision. He was able to read the proofs of the chapters he authored, but prevented from seeing this volume appear in print.

Hubert Jedin

PREFACE TO THE ENGLISH EDITION

Few periods in the history of the Church offer such a striking variety of currents and counter currents, of triumphs and failures, as in what is known as the Age of the Baroque. Not only had a reformed, triumphant, and centralized Curia to maintain its counter offensive against a Protestantism increasingly vitalized and supported by the new maritime powers, it was now also faced with growing resistance from within on the part of an episcopate and princes who saw its once needed direction as being tantamount to interference. This was especially true in France where the decrees of Trent were only belatedly accepted. It can be said that all the movements that plagued the Church from the Reformation to the Revolution—Gallicanism, Jansenism, episcopalism, and absolutism—originated in Europe's most Catholic nation.

While Jansenism and Gallicanism held center stage, it was the nascent Enlightenment, spreading from Protestant Europe, that posed the real challenge to the post-Reformation Church. Many of its earlier disciples were from among the educated clergy and many of its basic principles—the idea of progress, religious freedom, recognition of the basic rights of man—form the very foundation of modern society. It was the alleged divorce of the use of reason from a humble dependence on God that turned the Church against it. It was perhaps Protestantism's adaptation to the new movement that made it, rather than Catholicism, the more dynamic of the Christian bodies in eighteenth-century Europe. Evangelism and Pietism would wait another two centuries to touch the Church of Rome seriously.

While the Church declined in religious leadership, it also continued to lose what was left of its prestige in political Europe. The failure of Louis XIV to restore the Catholic Stuarts to the English throne was as indicative of this as was the dissolution of the Jesuits in 1773 by Clement XIV. We might add to this list the disintegration of the Baroque. Perhaps nothing more strikingly demonstrates the secularized temper of the time and the profound cultural change than the fact that there is hardly a major painter, sculptor, or architect after 1700 who was primarily a religious artist.

John P. Dolan

INTRODUCTION

The century and a half of church history after the Peace of Westphalia, treated in this volume, is a particular epoch in the formation of the "modern world," but regarding the Church this period is difficult to characterize in a general way if the requisite criteria are gleaned from its own historical existence.

Concerning the relationship between the Church and the temporal world it must be stated that in the area of political forces the Church lost its participation and its leadership in the intellectual development of Europe. This loss, while especially marked in the case of the Catholic Church because of its significance within the context of Western history and its intrinsic predisposition for a universal world order, was also sustained by the Protestant and the Eastern Churches. Not only was Christianity split into denominations, it also began to lose more and more of its congruence with the society in which it lived. To be sure, "published" history commonly overlooked the fact that in this period of roughly 150 years and far beyond broad segments of the general population remained anonymous and continued to live within the Christian tradition until even the last retreats of traditional Christianity were confronted with the "modern world." This volume occasionally makes reference to the endurance of this order of life, grown throughout the centuries, which has been obscured to the view of history by the spectacular events of the "great" and mighty aspects of history, which were, however, shaped by a mere small segment of actors. To sharpen that view is one of the tasks of church history which must make use of the recently developed sociohistorical methods for that purpose.

The complexity of the period from 1648–1789, customarily designated as "the Age of Absolutism and Enlightenment," is equally significant in its bearing on church history. The assertion that the Church lost its role of intellectual leadership is indeed justified. Yet one must hasten to add that in the construction and interior design of churches and monastic establishments the period of the Baroque has given the general public a number of magnificent representations of a spirit which melded mathematical rationality and an awareness of the Christian faith. If one considers Voltaire as a representative of the spirit of his time, one must also be aware—regardless of cultural differences—that Johann Sebastian Bach and George Frederick Handel, both masters in the field of church music, represented high points in the history of music, and that such architects and artists as B. Neumann and Tiepolo were his contemporaries. Our general view of the history encompassing that century and a half is excessively determined by phenomena which "even then" presaged the arrival of modern society, whereas elements which tended to retain and preserve any religious creations in art and music have been undervalued. The degree of this distortion is heightened by the fact that the history of the Church of this period (even in church historiography itself) is treated too much within the framework of political history, while the history of Christian spirituality, both in Catholicism and Protestantism, has been neglected. This volume therefore pays particular attention to the latter element.

A final task for the determination of church history within the universal history of this period was the need to modify the prevailing opinion formed by nineteenth-century church historians concerning the age of Enlightenment. Its growing anti-Church and even anti-Christian tendencies are unequivocal. But the so-called Second Enlightenment in our present age has permitted us to see the strong effect exerted by the unbroken existence of Christian tradition upon the intellectual movements of the seventeenth and eighteenth century, regardless of all their polemical rhetoric (Chap. 19). To be sure, the "crisis of European intellectuality" was underway, but the old categories of order and the spirituality of the masses stayed alive.

The shift in the relationship between church history and general history is hardly more apparent than in the fact that the Thirty Years' War and the Peace of Westphalia were of necessity natural topics for discussion in Volume V, Reformation and Counter Reformation, while the present volume can only highlight the international relations and changes in the European balance of power. The last religious war lost its denominational character in 1635 when France under Cardinal Richelieu intervened formally against the Catholic powers. In the period after 1648 the fight of France for European hegemony relegated the denominational issue to a role of mere political propaganda. A case in point was the war between France and Holland (1672–78) in which Pope Clement X let himself be deceived regarding the intentions of Louis XIV (Chap. 7); in the Peace of Nijmegen (1678/79), in which France consolidated its hegemony at the expense of Spain and the Empire, the legate of Innocent XI merely played a minor role. Even before that, in the negotiations for the Peace of the Pyrenees between France and Spain (1659) the Holy See was completely excluded. On the other hand, an alliance of a different kind united the Emperor and the Protestant powers of Holland and England against France, which had invaded the Palatinate in 1688. Louis XIV, all the while, was giving the appearance of furthering the aims of the Catholic Church by supporting James II of the Stuarts and then, after James's flight, making the subsequent unsuccessful Irish rebellion (1690) an object of his political calculations (Chap. 12). The Pope was not officially represented at the Peace of Rijswijk (1697). "The Rijswijk Clause," stipulating that Catholic towns, whenever they came under Protestant dominion, would have to be tolerated, continued to be a recurring problem given the subsequent shifts in the balance of power. This was the case in the Peace of Utrecht (1713) and Rastatt (1714), in the Spanish War of Succession and again during Prussia's expansion in the Silesian wars and the Polish partitions (Chap. 24).

The fact that its residual political power over the Papal States would merely serve to embarrass the Holy See is demonstrated in exemplary fashion by the Spanish War of Succession. After Innocent XII had pleaded the cause of the Bourbon candidate and Clement XI had tried in vain to stay out of the conflict, war broke out between the troops of Emperor Joseph II and those of the Pope (1708). In retrospect this is reduced to a mere momentary specter which had nothing at all to do with the dualism of the highest representatives of Catholic Christianity (Chap. 9). What was left were the disputes with the radical regalism of the Spanish Bourbons (Chap. 11). Reduced to a state of helpless neutrality, Benedict XIV had to watch the farce performed by the history of the Western Empire some fifty years before its end in the Austrian War of Succession (1740–48) between Maria Theresa and the Wittelsbachs, who by the grace of France were able to furnish an Emperor in the person of Charles VII (1742). Benedict XIV was just as impotent when Frederick II reached out for Silesia (Chap. 31). And once again the conflict was ended by an alliance between the house of Habsburg and the Protestant powers of England and Holland against France.

The fact that the rights of the Papal States were ignored in war as well as in the bargaining surrounding the conclusion of peace was the lesser of the evils in comparison to their domestic shortcomings. These could simply not be overcome, because in an era of the modern state their political structure had become anachronistic. Yet the greatest damage to the Church itself was done by the rivaling influence of the Catholic powers of France, Spain and the Habsburgs on the papal elections from one pontificate to the other. Since the time of Constantine the Great these elections, to be sure, had been more or less exposed to the varying conditions of temporal history, not least among them the rivalries of Italian families. But diplomatic moves in an age of totally secularized abolutism—regardless of the political divine right ideology of the respective rulers—largely determining the election of the highest dignitary of Catholic Christianity was a perversion of the relationship between political and eccesiastical power in the former corpus christianum. While there were no unworthy persons on the throne of Saint Peter in this period and, indeed, Innocent XI (1676–89) and Benedict XIV (1740–58), one as pontiff, the other as scholar, were far above average, there is reason to doubt whether the political circumstances allowed the optimal candidate to prevail in each case (Chaps. 7–9, 30–32). Closing this volume with the suppression of the Society of Jesus (1773) during the pontificate of Clement XIV, brought about by the pressure of the Catholic powers, emphasizes a characteristic feature of this period.

But even though the papacy—in accordance with the facts—does recede into the background in the organization and structure of this book, we must emphasize one achievement which was significant for all of Europe and yet often too little recognized: the diplomatic initiative and financial support of the Popes in resisting and repulsing the Turks. In 1664 when Vienna was threatened by them, Alexander VII was politically in a very weak position opposite Louis XIV. Yet he asked for the King's help and, indeed, French troops had a part in the victory on the Raab River. But this victory could not be exploited because Leopold I justifiably distrusted the subsequent attitude of Louis XIV. Clement X deserves considerable credit for the victory of John Sobieski (1673), at a time when Louis XIV was conducting his Dutch war of conquest (Chap. 7). Above all others it was his successor Innocent XI who deserves a place of honor in the history of Europe. In the face of international adversities he worked undeterred towards the alliance which brought about the successful turn of events for central eastern Europe in the Turkish War 1683–99 (Chap. 8). The fact that this decisive victory initiated the rise of the Austro-Hungarian power was the motive for Louis XIV's inconstant policy towards the Turks and his formation of a front on the Rhine which paralyzed Emperor Leopold I. Following the example of France, from where the Crusades had once emanated, Spain, the land of reconquista, also betrayed Prince Eugene's victory at Peterwardein (1716) when it led its fleet, financed in large part by the Pope to be used against the Turks, in an attack against the imperial possessions in Italy (Chap. 9). A final chapter in the common history of Europe which was coauthored by the papacy was ended in the last third of the eighteenth century when Turkey was on the brink of collapse: In 1763 Austria entered into a defensive alliance with Turkey against the combination formed by Prussia and Russia upon the death of Augustus III, King of Poland.

The period discussed in this volume no longer had a Catholic Europe in the sense of a universal historical subject. For this reason the present volume could discuss connections common to all of Europe only from the viewpoint of a history of the papacy, while the major accents had to be put on the presentations of the individual countries. This necessitated dividing the volume among a number of authors. A guiding topic had to be the seventeenth- and eighteenth-century established Church (Chaps. 11, 18, 24). Overlaps with the history of the papacy were unavoidable, as was a separate discussion of Gallicanism (Chap. 4), because the latter could not be separated from its close connection with the Jansenism of this period if we were to demonstrate the complexity of the prevailing situation in which Jansenists were as anti-Gallican as the papacy, which in turn condemned the theology of Jansenism. At the same time the Gallican court was playing off its anti-Jansenism politically against the papacy and its policy, leading to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) against the Calvinists. Ecclesiopolitical embarrassments were thus added to the temporal political plights of the Popes. The concept of the "established Church" must be differentiated according to the various countries as well as the progressive theories and radicalism of the canon law of the established Churches. Connected with the established Churches is their religious evaluation, for which there is no common denominator even though the factor of political secularization is undeniable. A historical judgment must take into account the prevailing contradiction between the concept of a modern state and a Church historically endowed with political freedoms as well as the tensions between an extreme episcopalism and an extreme papalism.

The episcopalism of the Church of the Empire, like Gallicanism, had its roots in the late Middle Ages. The history of the Church of the Empire within the span of this volume (Chaps. 10, 23, 26) therefore provides an especially informative view of the historical situation in which the Church had to exist for these 150 years because it was a case of a "carry-over" from the period of Otto the Great into totally different conditions. No matter how scant the political reality one may be willing to grant the imperial patriotism of the ecclesiastic princes, especially since the Emperor had made Austria conspicuous, the memory of the Empire, which can still be experienced in the residences and monasteries, is a magnificent phenomenon—sentimentality aside—if history is not merely taken to represent the history of power. But the conflicts are obvious: In spite of all the attempts at reform there were the prevailing contradictions between the strange dual structure of the ecclesiastical principality and the Tridentine program; the tensions with the papal nuncios which intensified the more the threats to the ecclesiastical states receded after the Peace of Westphalia and church reform proceeded, raising the self-assurance of the ecclesiastic princes of the Empire whose episcopalism till the middle of the eighteenth century was rooted in the religiopolitical fundament of their existence, in the loyalty to the Empire. The radically Gallican theories of Enlightenment of those regarding the canon law of the established Church did not come into the episcopalism of the Empire until the turn to Febronianism. If we add the modernization of the ecclesiastical territories in the sense of enlightened absolutism, it becomes obvious that the history of these strange institutions was approaching its end long before the general secularization in 1803, which had actually been underway since 1648.

If in view of these ecclesiastical phenomena, "overtaken" by world history and yet respectable in their persistence, we search for elements pointing to the future we encounter the history of spirituality and foremost the history of religiosity in seventeenth-century France (Chaps. 1–3,5), which was deliberately chosen to start the present volume. Corresponding to the intellectual connections, this presentation reaches back to draw a line from Pierre de Bérulle (d. 1629), the founder of the French Oratory and friend of Saint Francis de Sales (d. 1622)—both of them religious inspirers of Saint Vincent de Paul (d. 1660)—through the Basque Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, abbot of Saint-Cyran (often called by that name; d. 1643), to the leader of Jansenism in its classical time, Antoine Arnauld (d. 1694), the brother of Mother Angélique, Abbess of the Cistercian convent Port-Royal in Paris. Originally the French Augustinianism of Bérulle had nothing to do with the problem of grace which was at the center of the Augustinianism of Cornelius Jansen (d. 1638) in Louvain. The basic common bond of all these religious movements and also the root of Blaise Pascal's (d. 1662) involvement on the side of Port-Royal was their protest against a purely political ecclesiasticism of the ruling segment and the search for a new Christocentric piety. Precisely this protest provoked not only the reaction of the political power structure—although one should not argue that Church and state acted in concert in the brutal destruction of the convent of Port-Royal, given the complex motivation for it—but also led to a politicization of Jansenism, noticeable especially in its expansion abroad in Italy (Chap. 28) and the Empire (Chaps. 23–24). It may well be called a tragedy of church history that the religious energies, engendered with such great promise in seventeenth-century France were consumed in the eighteenth century by the Jansenist controversy—a battle fought on the wrong fronts. A universal history of piety, yet to be written, which would make up for the lead of French research on this subject, will have to point out very heterogeneous currents, decisively influenced by the Baroque and Enlightenment (Chap. 29).

The history of Anglican spirituality and its remarkable connections with the French continent (Chap. 22) and German pietism (Chap. 28), which in many respects had parallels to Jansenism, shows that there was in the seventeenth and eighteenth century a sort of common search for a Christian answer to the modern world, regardless of all the denominational and especially ecclesiological differences. The different development in the Russian Orthodox Church (Chap. 13) is exemplified by the fate of Patriarch Nikon (1652–66). His church reforms after the Greek model provoked resistance within the clergy and, on the other hand, his attempts to make the Russian Church independent of the state made the tsar remove him from his office. The joint resistance of the Old Believers and the patriarchal Church against Peter the Great (1682–1725) and his policy of Europeanizing Russia failed. The persecution of the Old Believers had serious consequences especially for the monastic system in Russia. The year 1700 marked the end of the independent patriarchate.

With some few exceptions the systematic theology of the period was merely heir to previous achievements (Chaps. 6, 28). It established no contact with the intellectual movements of its time, either Christian spirituality or the Enlightenment. This was essentially the case in all the denominations. A few notable exceptions were the attempt by the Oratorian Malebranche (d. 1715) to combine Descartes with Augustinianism and the search by Protestant physicotheologists to achieve a concordance with the natural sciences. The theology of Wolff was an unproductive adaptation and the extreme rationalism in the theology of the late eighteenth century the initial step towards surrender. Except for the contemporary accentuation of moral and pastoral theology the main concentration was on historical theology, for Catholicism primarily in France (Chap. 6) and Italy (Chap. 28), for Protestantism in Germany (Chap. 28) where the church history by L. Mosheim also started the exclusion of this discipline from the field of theology. The assertion that this period marked the beginning of a golden age of historical theology is worth considering in connection with a well-known statement by Hegel even if one does not share the dogmatic objections over which that field of research had to prevail.

The fate of the Catholic Church in territories under non-Catholic rule, in England and Ireland (Chap. 12), in Russia (Chaps. 14 and 25), and in Prussia after its annexations corresponded as much as the eviction of Protestants from Salzburg (1731–32) to the conditions of a time which was still struggling to reach a state of practical toleration. The efforts towards an ecclesiastic reunification in France (Chap. 4) and in the Empire (Chap. 27) took place partly under the sign of toleration (like the latter they were threatened by the danger of indifferentism) and partly under the sign of politics. But at the same time they were a first sign of religious reason which was ultimately promoted by the Enlightenment.

The history of the missions was deliberately placed in the middle of the volume (Chaps. 15, 16, 17) since it provides an essential indication of the historical situation of the Church, within and without, during the different periods. The fact that the royal missionary patronages became increasingly problematic was an outgrowth of absolutism. In spite of its regression in the seventeenth and eighteenth century, ultimately caused by the history of the European states, the mission work received a new impetus thanks to the initiative of the religious orders, the Propaganda and the seminars of the Paris Foreign Mission Society (founded in 1660). The farsightedness of the Propaganda was manifested by its emphasis on the education of a native clergy and its efforts to depoliticize the missions. The jailing of Propaganda missionaries by the Padroado inquisition in Goa corresponds to the overall image of this period of established Churches. The lack of coordination with the Church, as in the relationship of the secular and regular clergy or in the undelineated juxtaposition of the Propaganda and the Padroado missionaries, was distressing. The differentiation of the rites issue, attempted in this volume, may contribute towards a reevaluation of judgments too hastily made.

In an attempt to characterize this century and a half of the Church in spite of the many different and contradictory elements one can perhaps call it a period of transition, from a Church which—despite the schism in the sixteenth century—existed in a society seeing itself as a corpus christianum, to one which was forced to reduce itself more and more unto itself. The difficulty of this process was manifest in all the vital areas of the Church, in its adherence to outmoded positions as well as its helplessness against the forces of a new age. The French Revolution which initiated the nineteenth century aggravated these problems. Contrary to the original design they will be discussed in Volume VII.

The contributions in this volume have deliberately refrained from any references to the present Church. But the scientist who makes use of them and the readers of whom we hope to have many will discover without any effort that the Church's past even if one would like to cast it off will inevitably affect the present and the future. The contributors and editors of this volume also hope to provide a contribution to overcoming the present crisis of the Church.

Hubert Jedin
Oskar Köhler
Wolfgang Müller

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

AAM	Abhandlungen der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Phil.-hist. Klasse, Munich 1835ff.
AAS	Acta Apostolicae Sedis, Rome 1909ff.
AAug	Analecta Augustiniana, Rome 1905ff.
AcLinceiMem.	Atti di Accademia nazionale dei Lincei, Rome.
AcModena	Atti e memorie della Accademia di scienze, lettere e arti, Modena.
AcTorino	Atti di Accademia di scienze di Torino, Turin 1865ff.
AE	Analecta ecclesiastica, presbyterorum s. Ludovici de Urbe curis edita, Rome 1893–1911.
AElsKG	Archiv für elsässische Kirchengeschichte, Gesellschaft für elsässische Kirchengeschichte, ed. J. Brauner, Rixheim im Oberelsaß 1926ff.; 1946ff., ed. A.M. Burg, Strasbourg
AFrH	Archivum Franciscanum Historicum, Florence 1908ff.
AHPont	Archivum Historiae Pontificiae, Rome 1963ff.
AHSI	Archivum historicum Societatis Iesu, Rome 1932ff.
AHVNrh	Annalen des Historischen Vereins für den Niederrhein, insbesondere das alte Erzbistum Köln, Cologne 1855ff.
AkathKR	Archiv für Katholisches Kirchenrecht, (Innsbruck) Mainz 1857ff.
AKG	Archiv für Kulturgeschichte, (Leipzig) Münster and Cologne 1903ff.
ALW	Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft (previously: JLW), Regensburg 1950ff.
AMrhKG	Archiv für mittelrheinische Kirchengeschichte, Speyer 1949ff.
AnGr	Analecta Gregoriana cura Pontificiae Universitatis Gregorianae edita, Rome 1930ff.
Annales E.S.C.	Annales: Économies, sociétés, civilisations, Paris 1946ff.
Anthropos	Anthropos. Internationale Zeitschrift für Völker- und Sprachenkunde, Mödling 1906ff.
Antonianum	Antonianum, Rome 1926ff.
AÖG	Archiv für österreichische Geschichte, Vienna 1865ff.
Aportes	Aportes. Revista de estudios latinoamericanos, Paris 1966f.
APraem	Analecta Praemonstratensia, Tongerloo 1925ff.
ArSKG	Archiv für schlesische Kirchengeschichte, ed. K. Engelbert, I–VI, Breslau 1936–41; VIIff., Hildesheim 1496ff.
ASRomana	Archivio della Reale Scoietà Romana di Storia Patria, Rome 1878–1934 (1935: ADRomana).
Astraín	A. Astraín, Historia de la Compañía de Jesús en la Asistencia de España I–VII, Madrid 1902–25.

Augustiniana	Augustiniana. Tijdschrift vor de studie van Sint Augustinus en de Augustijnenorde, Louvain 1951ff.
BAE	Biblioteca de Autores Españoles, Madrid 1846ff.
BÉCh	Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes, Paris 1839ff.
BLE	Bulletin de littérature ecclésiastique, Toulouse 1899ff.
BullRom	Bullarium, Diplomatum et Privilegiorum Romanorum Pontificum, ed. G. Tomassetti et al., Turin 1857ff.
Catholicisme	Catholicisme. Hier—Aujourd'hui—Demain, ed. G. Jacquemet, Paris 1948ff.
CH	Church History, New York and Chicago 1932ff.
Ciaconius	A. Ciaconius, Vitae et res gestae Pontificum Romanorum et S.R.E. Cardinalium, 2 vols., Rome 1601f., completed by F. Cabrera Morales; 1630 ibid., continued to Clement VIII by A. Victorelli; 1677 ibid., 4 vols., continued to Clement IX by A. Oldoini; 1751 ibid., 6 vols., continued to Clement XII by Guarnacci; Vol. 7 ibid., 1787.
Cîteaux	Cîteaux. Commentarii cisterciences, Westmalle (Belg.) 1950ff.
CivCatt	La Civiltà Cattolica, Rome 1850ff. (1871–87 Florence).
CollFr	Collectanea Franciscana, Rome 1931ff.
D	H. Denzinger and A. Schönmetzer, Enchiridion Symbolorum, Definitionum et Declarationum de rebus fidei et morum, Freiburg i. Br. 1967.
DHGE	Dictionnaire d'histoire et de géographie ecclésiastiques, ed. Baudrillart, et al. Paris 1912ff.
DSAM	Dictionnaire de Spiritualité ascétique et mystique. Doctrine et Histoire, ed. M. Viller, Paris 1932ff.
DThC	Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, ed. A. Vacant and E. Mangenot, continued by É. Amann, Paris 1930ff.
DZKR	Deutsche Zeitschrift für Kirchenrecht, Tübingen 1861–1917.
ED	Euntes docete (Commentaria urbana), Rome 1948ff.
ÉO	Échos d'Orient, Paris 1897ff.
Études	Études, Paris 1856ff. (until 1896: Études religieuses)
FDG	Forschungen zur Deutschen Geschichte, 26 vols., Göttingen 1860–86.
Feine RG	H. E. Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte I: Die katholische Kirche, Cologne and Graz 1964.
FreibDiözArch	Freiburger Diözesan-Archiv, Freiburg i. Br. 1865ff.
Gebhardt-Grundmann	B. Gebhardt, Handbuch der deutschen Geschichte, 8th printing, ed. H. Grundmann, Stuttgart, I, 1954; II, 1955; III, 1960.
GGA	Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen, Berlin 1738ff.
Gr	Gregorianum, Rome 1920ff.
Grabmann	G. M. Grabmann, Die Gerschichte der katholischen Theologie seit dem Ausgang der Väterzeit, Freiburg i. Br. 1933.
GWU	Geschichte in Wissenschaft und Unterricht. Zeitschrift des Verbandes der Geschichtslehrer Deutschlands, Stuttgart 1950ff.

Heimbucher	M. Heimbucher, Die Orden und Kongregationen der katholischen Kirche, 3 vols., Paderborn 1907–8; 1932–34 ibid., 2 vols.
HH.ST.A. Wien	Haus-, Hof-und Staatsarchiv Wien (Vienna).
Hinschius	P. Hinschius, Das Kirchenrecht der Katholiken und Protestanten in Deutschland, 6 vols., Berlin 1869–97.
Hisp. Am. Hist. Rev.	Hispanic American Historical Review, Durham 1918ff.
HJ	Historisches Jahrbuch der Görres-Gesellschaft (Cologne 1880ff.), Munich 1950ff.
Hochland	Hochland, Munich 1903ff.
HPBl	Historisch-politische Blätter für das katholische Deutschland, ed. F. Binder and G. Jochner, 171 vols., Munich 1838–1923.
Hurter	H. Hurter, Nomenclator literarius theologiae catholicae, 6 vols., Innsbruck 1903–13; I, 1926, ed. F. Pangerl.
HZ	Historische Zeitschrift, Munich 1859ff.
IKZ	Internationale Kirchliche Zeitschrift, Berne 1911ff.
IPO	Instrumentum Pacis Osnabrugense et Monasteriense.
Irénikon	Irénikon, Amay-Chevetogne 1926ff.
JGO	Jahrbücher für die Geschichte Osteuropas, Munich 1953ff.
JKölGV	Jahrbuch des Kölnischen Geschichtsvereins, Cologne 1912–41, 1950ff.
JLW	Jahrbuch für Liturgiewissenschaft, Münster 1921–41 (now: ALW).
Jugie	M. Jugie, Theologia dogmatica Christianorum orientalium ab ecclesia catholica dissidentium I–V Paris 1926–35.
KRA	Kirchenrechtliche Abhandlungen, founded by U. Stutz, Stuttgart 1902ff. (so far 118 vols.).
Kyrios	Kyrios. Vierteljahresschrift für Kirchen- und Geistesgeschichte Osteuropas, Berlin 1960ff.
LJ	Liturgisches Jahrbuch, Münster 1951ff.
LThK	Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, Freiburg 1957ff.
Maaβ	F. Maaβ, Der Josephinismus. Quellen zu seiner Geschichte in Österreich I–IV, Wien 1951ff. (Fontes rerum Austriacarum II/71–74).
MAH	Mélanges d'archelologie et d'histoire, Paris 1880ff.
Mansi	J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 31 vols., Florence and Venice 1757–98; reprint and continuation, ed. L. Petit and J. B. Martin, 60 vols.; Paris 1899–1927.
MCom	Miscelánea Comillesa, Comillas/Santander 1943ff.
MF	Miscellanea francescana, Rome 1886ff.
MH	Missionalia Hispanica
Mid-America	Mid-America. An Historical Review, Chicago 1918ff.
MIÖG	Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung, (Innsbruck) Graz-Cologne 1880ff.
MiscMercati	Miscellanea Giovanni Mercati, 6 vols., Rome 1946.
Monumenta Nipponica	Monumenta Nipponica. Studies on Japanese culture past and present, Tokyo 1938ff.
MÖSTA	Mitteilungen des Österreichischen Staatsarchivs, Vienna 1948ff.
MthSt(H)	Münchener theologische Studien, ed F. X. Seppelt, J. Pascher, and K. Mörsdorf, Historical Section, Munich 1950ff.
MThZ	Münchener Theologische Zeitschrift, Munich 1950ff.

NDB	Neue Deutsche Biographie, Berlin 1953ff.
NZM	Neue Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft, Beckenried 1945ff.
Orbis	Orbis. Bulletin international de documentation linguistique, Louvain 1952ff.
OrChr	Oriens Christianus, (Leipzig) Wiesbaden 1901ff.
OrChrA	Orientalia Christiana (Analecta), Rome (1923–34: Orientalia Christiana; 1935ff.; Orientalia Christiana Analecta).
OrChrP	Orientalia Christiana periodica, Rome 1935ff.
OstKSt	Ostkirchliche Studien, Würzburg 1951ff.
Pastor	L. v. Pastor, Geschichte der Päpste seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters, 16 vols., Freiburg i. Br. 1885ff.
QFIAB	Quellen und Forschungen aus italienischen Archiven und Bibliotheken, Rome 1897ff.
Quétif	J. Quétif and J. Echard, Scriptores Ordinis Praedicatorum, 2 vols., Paris 1719–21; 3 suppl. vols., 1721–23; continued by R. Coulon, Paris 1909ff.
RAM	Revue d'ascétique et de mystique, Toulouse 1920ff.
RET	Revista Española de teología, Madrid 1941ff.
Rev. Arch. Bibl. y Museos	Revista de Archivos, Bibliotecas y Museos, Madrid 1871ff.
RevÉAug	Revue des Études Augustiniennes (cont. of: L'Année Théologique Augustinienne), Paris 1955ff.
RevSR	Revue des Sciences Religieuses, Strasbourg 1921ff.
RF	Razón y Fe, Madrid 1901ff.
RGG	Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, Tübingen 1909–13; 1927–32; 1956ff.
RH	Revue historique, Paris 1876ff.
RHE	Revue d'histoire ecclésiastique, Louvain 1900ff.
RHEF	Revue d'histoire de l'Église de France, Paris 1910ff.
RHM	Revue d'histoire des missions, Paris 1924ff.
RHR	Revue de l'histoire des religions, Paris 1880ff.
RömHM	Römische Historische Mitteilungen, Graz and Cologne 1958ff.
RQ	Römische Quartalschrift für christliche Altertumskunde und für Kirchengeschichte, Freiburg i. Br. 1887ff.
RQH	Revue des questions historiques, Paris 1866f.
RSIt	Rivista storica Italiana, Naples 1884ff.
RSR	Recherches de science religieuse, Paris 1910ff.
RSTI	Rivista di storia della chiesa in Italia, Rome 1947ff.
Saeculum	Saeculum. Jahrbuch für Universalgeschichte, Freiburg i. Br. 1950ff.
SAW	Sitzungsberichte der (from 225, 1, 1947: Österreichischen) Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien, Vienna 1831ff.
Schnabel G	F. Schnabel, Deutsche Geschichte im 19. Jahrhundert I, Freiburg i. Br. 1948; II, 1949; III, 1954; IV, 1955.
SEER	The Slavonic and East European Review, London1922.
Seppelt-Schwaiger	F. X. Seppelt, Geschichte der Päpste von den Anfängen bis zur Mitte des 20. Jahrhunderts I, II, IV, V, Leipzig 1931–41; I, Munich 1954; II, ibid. 1955; III, ibid. 1956; IV, ibid. 1957; V, ibid. 1959.
SM	Studien und Mitteilungen aus dem Benediktiner- und Zisterzienserorden bzw.

	zur Geschichte des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, Munich 1880ff. (1911ff., n.s.).
SPM	Sacrum Poloniae Millennium, Rome 1954ff.
Stamer	L. Stamer, Kirchengeschichte der Pfalz I, Speyer 1936; II, 1949; III, 1 1955.
StdZ	Stimmen der Zeit (prior to 1914: Stimmen aus Maria-Laach), Freiburg i. Br. 1871ff.
StG	Studia Gratiana, ed. J. Forchielli and A. M. Stickler, I–III, Bologna 1953ff.
StL	Staatslexikon, ed. H. Sacher, Freiburg i. Br. 1926–32 (StL: ibid. 1957ff.).
StMis	Studia Missionalia, Rome 1943ff.
Streit	Bibliotheca Missionum, founded by R. Streit, continued by J. Dindinger, (Münster, Aachen) Freiburg i. Br. 1916ff. (to 1968: 26 vols.).
StudFr	Studi francescani, Arezzo-Florence 1903ff.
ThGl	Theologie und Glaube, Paderborn 1909ff.
ThLZ	Theologische Literaturzeitung, Leipzig 1878ff.
ThQ	Theologische Quartalschrift, Tübingen 1819ff.; Stuttgart 1946ff.
ThSt	Theological Studies, Baltimore 1940ff.
Tr	Traditio, New York 1943ff.
TThZ	Trierer Theologische Zeitschrift (to 1944: Pastor Bonus), Trier 1888ff.
Veit-Lenhart	L. A. Veit and L. Lenhart, Kirche und Volksfrömmigkeit im Zeitalter des Barock, Freiburg i. Br. 1956.
Werner	K. Werner, Geschichte der katholischen Theologie. Seit dem Trienter Konzil bis zur Gegenwart, Munich and Leipzig 1889 (= Geschichte der Wissenschaften in Deutschland. (Modern Times, Vol. 6).
WZ	Westfälische Zeitschrift. Zeitschrift für vaterländische Geschichte, Münster 1838ff.
Zagaglia	Zagaglia. Rassegna di scienze, lettere ed arti, Lecce 1959ff.
ZBLG	Zeitschrift für Bayerische Landesgeschichte, Munich 1928ff.
ZGObrh	Zeitschrift für die Geschichte des Oberrheins, Karlsruhe 1851ff.
ZHTh	Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 45 vols., Leipzig-Gotha 1832–75.
ZKG	Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, (Gotha) Stuttgart 1876ff.
ZMR	Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 34 ff., Münster 1950ff. (Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft 1–17, ibid. 1911–27; Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 18–25, ibid. 1928–35; Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft 26–27, ibid. 1935–37; Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 28–33, ibid. 1938–41, 1947–49).
ZRGG	Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte, Marburg 1948ff.
ZSavRGgerm	Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Germanistische Abteilung, Weimar 1863ff.
ZSavRGkan	Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, Weimar 1911ff.
ZSKG	Zeitschrift für Schweizer Kirchengeschichte, Fribourg 1907ff.
ZSTh	Zeitschrift für systematische Theologie, (Gütersloh) Berlin 1923ff.

PART ONE

The Leadership Position of France

SECTION ONE

Ecclesiastical Life in France

CHAPTER 1

Christian Renewal after 1615

French Catholicism under Louis XIII

When Henry IV was assassinated on May 14, 1610, France had again become a great Catholic nation which was not only tied closely to the Roman Catholic religion, but had even begun to put religious sentiment above national considerations. Proof of this can be perceived in the unpopularity of the war against Spain prepared by Henry IV at the time of his assassination. However obscure the background of the regicide may be, religion was a definite motivating factor in Ravaillac's crime. Spain—hitherto an obstacle in the path of French expansionism—was at this time already on the decline. Under these conditions, waging war to confirm the hegemony of France would have been politically justified. Public opinion in France was nonetheless opposed to it since the most pressing obligation of the Catholic states was considered to be an alliance against the Protestant Reformation.

Although Protestantism still occupied a powerful position, it was evident that in France the Reformation had to end in failure. The conversion of Henry IV had no doubt been a mere gesture of political opportunism by a rule indifferent to the faith. But it became obvious that no Huguenot ruler could be forced upon the kingdom. Calvinism had reached its pinnacle about the year 1571. Although its outward manifestations seemed unimpaired, it was in a process of irreversible retrogression. It became a minority party and was conscious of that fact. After the religious wars the real basis for the appeal of Protestantism was the intensive religious life of many of its members, which hardly found a counterpart in the politicized Catholicism of the Holy League. Towards the end of the reign of Henry IV, however, the Reformation had lost this advantage. Endeavors by the great Catholic spiritual leaders—Francis de Sales, Benedict of Canfield, Father Coton, Bérulle, and many others—had brought about a Catholic climate whose piety and inward orientation was equal to that of the Reformed Churches. At this time, this milieu dévot or parti dévot, as it was also called, was still a compact group firmly united by common ideals revolving around the triumph of Catholicism and the defeat of Protestantism. On the other hand, the Protestants found themselves more and more hampered by becoming socially disadvantaged. Following the King's example, other conversions had taken place among the aristocracy and the upper bourgeosie—with equal lack of sincerity. Now it was obvious that being Catholic would henceforth be an indispensable prerequisite for achieving high positions. For a long time Sully was to be the last Protestant minister of France and the death of Henry IV forced him to resign, albeit not until he had calmly amassed a fortune. For quite some time France, along with the rest of Europe, was far from reaching the maturity needed for a tolerant attitude.[1] The attitude of public opinion toward the Edict of Nantes was symptomatic in this regard. No one perceived in it a laudable attempt at achieving religious peace. The Catholics considered it a concession required by necessity, a despicable and offensive infringement on the immutable rights of the true religion, while the Protestants saw it as something fundamentally too unjust and precarious to be permanent. Although the two blocs had for the time being abandoned the violence of the religious wars, beneath the surface the antagonism remained unchanged. Given another opportunity, it could break out into open warfare once again.

Materially speaking, the situation of the Church steadily improved under the reign of Henry IV. Of course not all the devastation caused by the religious wars could be repaired. Even today more than a few abbeys and parish churches are still in ruins. The possessions of the Church however had regenerated very quickly and—since their parts by definition cannot be lost—increased steadily. In a memorandum written around 1625 Richelieu estimated that one-third of the national property was in the hands of the clergy.[2] This financial aspect was preeminent in the eyes of many Catholics. This was true especially for members of high society who felt and advocated quite openly that the possessions of the Church should be used to make up for the insufficiencies of family fortune. As late as 1647, President Molé—against the express advice of Vincent de Paul—had his patently incompetent son invested as bishop of Bayeux in order to "shield him from any and all want," and he added that his son could always compensate for his incompetence by calling upon capable advisers. The same view was held by the lower class, for whom the priesthood represented the only possibility for social advancement: the father of Vincent de Paul had sold a pair of oxen to finance his son's education, and the son himself was already received by the Queen. As a matter of fact, the sees continued to be the appanage of the aristocracy. Although Richelieu appointed a few bishops from among members of the upper bourgeoisie, he no doubt did so hoping they would submit to him more readily than the members of the high aristocracy. The distribution of the social origin of the bishops was not broadened appreciably until Louis XIV and even then the richest dioceses were reserved for the very prominent families. But the selection of the bishops was always made within the circle of the royal court. A cleric unknown at the court had no chance to rise to the bishopric. Many great families moreover acted as if an episcopate once possessed were a kind of inheritance which was to be retained at any price by means of a royal warrant authorizing it to be handed on from uncle to nephew. The bishopric of Reims was thus perpetuated as a regular de Guise dynasty and in the period from 1568 to 1662 four members of the Gondi family held the office of bishop of Paris. Philippe de Gondi, General of the Galleys, friend of Vincent de Paul and later on an Oratorian, developed a personal interest in this matter in order to secure for his son Paul, who later became Cardinal de Retz and who called himself "possibly the least ecclesiastical soul in the universe,"[3] the succession to the bishopric of his uncle. The nominations of bishops were made by the King and were generally decided by the Conseil de Conscience, but even Vincent de Paul, a member of this council from 1643 to 1652, could not prevent some scandalous appointments, such as that of Beaumanoir de Lavardin, bishop of Mans (1684), who was held to be a complete unbeliever and probably justifiably so. There were indeed very distinct differences in the quality of individual appointees. The first few bishops dedicated to reforms and a sense of duty are found under Louis XIII—yet they were exceptions. Many prelates continued their propensities and interests in contradiction with their priestly role. Numerous bishops remained in the service of the court or pursued literature, warfare or diplomacy and never actually set foot in their respective dioceses.

---

[1] J. Leclerc, Toleration and the Reformation, 2 vols. (New York 1960): contains important general views of the beginnings of the seventeenth century.

[2] G. d'Avenel, Richelieu et la monarchie absolue (Paris 1884–90), III, 277.

The condition of the parish clergy as well had hardly improved since the religious wars. The root cause for this stagnation lay in the almost total lack of education of the clergymen. In France, the pertinent regulations established by the Council of Trent remained largely unimplemented and the few timid attempts at establishing seminaries undertaken after 1610 extended to only a small number of persons. For the purpose of ordination, most bishops were satisfied with mere rudimentary knowledge and only a few demanded even as much as a few days of spiritual retreat. Since the bishops rarely resided in their dioceses, the candidates for priesthood had themselves—if possible with the written consent of the appropriate bishop—ordained by another bishop. This situation was even further aggravated by the innumerable bishops in partibus who were roaming the realm ordaining any and everyone. The deplorable consequences of such practices are not surprising. In 1643 an archdeacon of Bourges ascertained that many priests did not know Latin, several could hardly read and some were incapable of administering the Holy Sacraments validly and did not even know the words of absolution. Concubinage and drunkenness among the clergy were widespread and in some dioceses were looked upon as common practice. Besides their clerical duties many priests held common jobs and frequented taverns. In certain areas they frequently practiced exorcism.[4] Most of them never preached a sermon, no longer taught catechism and abandoned their churches to a state of scandalous neglect and squalor. As late as 1660, the archdeacon of Evreux, Henri-Marie Boudon, was horrified at the condition of the tabernacles and ciboria he saw. But these shortcomings were rarely ever remedied. Intervention was very difficult because bishops could make appointments in only a few parishes of their diocese since most of them were controlled by abbeys or by lay patronage. Another impediment was the canonical regulation requiring three corresponding verdicts against an accused priest before he could be prosecuted, a situation that could be indefinitely extended. Clerics who were forced to leave their locality because of extremely serious scandals usually sought to hide out in Paris, which was teeming with priests who managed to evade the police and some of whom made their livelihood in transactions which were in flagrant contradiction to their vocation.

---

[3] M. Allem, ed., J. F. de Gondi, Cardinal de Retz, Mémories. La Pléiade (Paris 1956), 3.

Conditions among the members of religious orders were hardly better, although here sporadic attempts at reform had been introduced since the end of the sixteenth century and especially under Henry IV. By and by, the members of religious orders had no doubt relinquished their military habits of the time of the Holy League, but their morals had hardly improved. In fact, all orders were in need of reform, with the exception of the Carthusians, who at this time were relatively numerous and had their establishments in close proximity to the towns. They had retained their traditional obligations; their austerity impressed the masses and even led to conversions. And yet the image of the other orders should not be painted entirely black. To be sure, even now there were frequent and blatant scandals. In 1609 the parliament of Toulouse had to have the Augustinian superior Burdeu executed since he had been convicted as an accessory in the killing of the husband of his mistress, Violante du Chastel.[5] At the same time, a sister of the famous Belle [4] Especially characteristic cases were investigated by J. Bernou, La chasse aux sorciers dans le Labourd (Agen 1897).

---

[5] See A. Praviel, Violante et ses amants (Paris 1934).

Gabrielle, mistress of Henry IV, was the abbess of the Cistercian nuns of Maubuisson. She was Angélique d'Estrées, who had twelve children by twelve different fathers. But public opinion proved less and less prepared to accept these unbelievable conditions. The court, influenced by the parti dévot, began to deal with these matters and civil authorities intervened in order to eliminate the most flagrant abuses. But this happened only in exceptional cases. On the whole the monasteries deteriorated into physical and moral mediocrity; they hardly even kept up the appearance of monastic seclusion, which was to them merely a distant memory, for now outsiders came and went freely and casually. In 1614 at the occasion of the investiture of Charles Faure, who later reformed the Genovevians, the canons of Saint Vincent-de-Senlis received all the participants, even the women, in the refectory, where there was dancing. The young abbess of Port-Royal, Angélique Arnauld, intent on reform, had triggered quite a scandal on 25 September 1609 on the occasion of the famous "day of the grating" when she refused even her own family admission to the convent.[6] Often the vow of poverty existed in theory only; monks and nuns usually established their own financial resources aiming thereby to alleviate the deficiencies of a life which all too often was characterized by a distressing degree of penury.

This decadence which had become more and more noticeable since the end of the Middle Ages had its foremost cause—common to both men and women—in the quality of the vocation or rather in the lack of a true vocation. The number of those entering of their own accord was very small. The family commonly made the decision to enter their children in a monastery—and usually for financial considerations. Excess children who for lack of necessary family means could not be put into suitable positions, the later-born left without an inheritance, those unable to bear arms, girls who could not be given a dowry, all of them were simply pushed off on the Church. Girls especially were sent into convents at an irresponsibly young age. In 1599, the God-fearing Attorney General Simon Marion, grandfather of the famous Mother Angélique Arnauld, without hesitation had two of his granddaughters take the veil at seven and five years of age respectively. To make his decision more palatable to them he promised to make them abbesses. He kept his promise in as much as Angélique became abbess of Port-Royal at the age of eleven.

Another practice, but one that affected monasteries only, contributed to the mediocrity of the monastic environment. This was the fairly common custom of the commendam, which originated in France in the thirteenth century and was generally applied after the Concordat of

---

[6] See L. Cognet, La réforme de Port-Royal (Paris 1950), 114–21.

1516. The procedure consisted of separating the clerical functions of an ecclesiastical office from the secular income connected with it. The office was granted to a titular who was barred by canon law from executing its office and who was therefore dependent upon another person who had the necessary authority. The holder of the benefice, however, kept the greater part of the income and only gave the substitute and his subordinates a barely sufficient part, the portio congrua. In time, the beneficiary became accustomed to curtailing it even more so that the designation ultimately came to mean a "restricted and insufficient part." This practice had rendered the enormous properties of the Church back into the hands of the monarchy. The Kings used them unscrupulously for the purpose of rewarding loyal servants and supporting artists and literati: Sully, although a Protestant, was titular of four abbeys. When Louis XIII began his reign, some of the abuses of the commendam had disappeared; the system was no longer applied to bishoprics, but only to monasteries. And yet virtually all monasteries and priories were benefices and many of their titulars were mere tonsured people less than twenty years of age. Richelieu himself continued to reward the musicians of his orchestra with abbeys and priories. Indeed, up until the Revolution most bishops supplemented the income of their bishoprics by the proceeds from one or more abbeys. Bossuet added the abbey of Saint-Lucien-lès-Beauvais to his bishopric of Meaux, and Fénelon was accused of zealotry upon his appointment to the see of Cambrai when he relinquished his abbey of Saint Valéry at Caux. Even among the most conscientious clerics there were few who did not hold benefices. Duvergier de Hauranne remarked that the modest abbey of Saint-Cyran in Poitou which he had received in 1620 was his "disgrace";[7] yet he kept it till he died. Some, like the famous Philippe de Gamaches, professor at the Sorbonne, and even J.-J. Olier, the founder of the Society of the Priests of Saint Sulpice, practiced the accumulation of benefices forbidden by canon law. In most cases the titulars kept at least two-thirds of their incomes for themselves and many attempted to increase their portion by reducing the number of monks. They were therefore not at all inclined towards initiating any sort of reform or even to tolerating one that would have resulted in lowering their income. It was a rare titular, such as Barcos, the nephew of Saint-Cyran, who withdrew to his abbey in order to reform it. Even rarer were those who, like the famous Rancé, became titular abbot of their own abbey.

Overall the situation was further impaired by unpleasant differences of opinion between the secular clergy and the orders. The latter enjoyed the privilege of exemption and therefore could almost completely evade the jurisdiction of the bishops. This had a twofold disadvantage. For one, it caused reform bishops who were becoming more numerous in the course of the century to encounter insurmountable obstacles, which frustrated their attempts at abolishing certain scandalous conditions and enabled the large abbeys, including those of nuns, brazenly to defy those bishops. As late as 1690, for example, Bossuet was embroiled in a long and dramatic conflict with the abbess of Jouarre, Henriette de Lorraine.[8] In addition, some ardent and influential congregations used their status of exemption to establish a sort of parallel clergy. They did this by attracting to their chapels a great number of visitors who—frequently members of aristocratic families—deserted their own parish churches. This held true especially for the Jesuits and Capuchins. The diocesan and provincial synods attempted to alleviate this problem by obliging the faithful to attend Mass at their parish churches on a certain number of Sundays: the Council of Bordeaux, for instance, prescribed one Sunday in three (1582).[9] But these measures had virtually no success and worse, they often led to violent incidents such as the one in the spring of 1620, when the pugnacious bishop of Poitiers, La Rocheposay, collided with the Jesuits of that town. So it is not surprising that even the best representatives of the episcopate were somewhat reluctant to oppose the orders whose good qualities they otherwise valued. One of the most prominent champions of this cause was Jean-Pierre Camus (1584–1652), bishop of Belley, who was a friend of Francis de Sales and an extremely prolific spiritual writer.[10] Again and again he polemicized against the demands of the orders and was not afraid to compose works of unusual vehemence such as his polemic Rabat-joie du triomphe monastique (1634). At first he was encouraged by Francis de Sales, who wrote to him on 24 August 1614: "It redounds to the honor of God that our episcopal order be recognized as such and that this moss that constitutes exemption be torn from the tree of the Church on which it has inflicted such damage, as we have seen." Later, in 1632, Saint-Cyran also joined the fray. Under the pseudonym Petrus Aurelius he emphatically defended the rights of the hierarchy in a number of pamphlets which received official character, so to speak, by being approved by the Assemblées du Clergé. To be sure, the situation subsequently calmed down a bit, but difficulties of this sort nonetheless surfaced throughout the ancien régime.

---

[7] See L. Cognet, "La jeunesse d'Antoine Singlin," Chroniques de Port-Royal (1953), 10.

Negative aspects notwithstanding, French Catholicism had embarked on its renewal (see Chap. 5) with the beginning of the reign of

---

[8] See Y. Chaussy, Jouarre et Bossuet: L'abbaye royale de Jouarre (Paris 1961), 247–94.

[9] Text in: J. Godefroy, Le Mercure Jésuite (Geneva 1630–31), I, 25.

[10] See F. Boulas, Un ami de saint François de Sales, Camus évêque de Belley (Lyon 1878); R. Heurtevent, "Camus," DSAM 2, 62–73.

Louis XIII. The milieu dévot which had originated with the Holy League was an extremely eager and active Catholic group. Its central figure was a mystic from the highest level of society, Mme Acarie.[11] In her circle one could at times encounter a bishop in the person of Francis de Sales, more frequently such secular priests as Bérulle[12] and Gallement, or professors at the Sorbonne such as Duval,[13] Jesuits like P. Coton, father confessor to the King, Capuchin monks such as Benedict of Canfield,[14] Carthusians such as Dom Beaucousin, and ladies of high society including Mme de Sainte-Beuve or Mme de Maignelay, sister of Gondi. At first this group was primarily concerned with monastic reforms which had actually had definite results in only two convents, the Benedictine convent of Montmartre (1598) and that of the Cistercians of Port-Royal (1608). The movement subsequently encompassed other convents as well. Another effort concerned the introduction of orders from other countries, where they had already been reformed. Considerable success was achieved with the Carmelites who had been reformed in Spain by Saint Teresa: as early as 1610 the French branch of the order, founded in September 1604, had established eighteen houses and by 1630 as many as forty-six, whose members were predominantly from the aristocracy. The prioress of Paris, Madeleine de Saint-Joseph, née Fontaines-Marans, exerted an unusually strong spiritual influence upon the whole Parisian society. In 1610, through the combined efforts of Mme Acarie and Mme de Sainte-Beuve, the Ursuline order founded in 1596 in the Comtat-Venaissin, which had been dedicated to improving the often neglected education of young girls, was established in Paris. It developed rapidly and by the turn of the century had approximately 300 houses.[15] The male congregations fared less well with the exception of the two large orders, the Jesuits (1552) and the Capuchins (1573), introduced into France in the sixteenth century; they flourished and were able to maintain their influence in spite of all the attacks upon them. But in 1601 the Frères de la Charité of John of God were hard put to establish a hospital in Paris. Although the barefoot Carmelites managed to extend their order from Spain to France in 1611, they were opposed in this by the milieu dévot, who were afraid of their competition in directing the affairs of the Carmelites. Nevertheless Mme Acarie and her friends had an efficacious hand in a number of foundations. One of the most significant was the Order of the Visitation of Holy Mary in 1610 by Francis de Sales and Jane Frances de Chantal.[16] It was initially conceived as a partially active congregation without complete claustration, but in 1618, impelled by Marquemont, archbishop of Lyon, it had to change into a contemplative order with ceremonious public vows. But this did not impede its expansion in any way: at the death of its founder (1641) the Visitation of Holy Mary had more than 80 houses. Soon the sisters of the Visitation, as had many other claustrated convents (e.g., Port-Royal), took over educational tasks. School congregations were also founded, such as the Filles de Notre-Dame by Jeanne de Lestonnac[17] in Bordeaux (1606), the Soeurs de Notre-Dame de Lorraine of Saint Peter Fourier (1618), the Filles de la Croix,[18] established in Paris in 1641 by Mme de Villeneuve, and many others. Later we shall talk about the congregations devoted to the nursing of the sick.

---

[11] See Bruno de Jésus-Marie, La Belle Acarie (Paris 1942).

[12] See J. Dagens, Bérulle et les origines de la restauration catholique (Bruges and Paris 1952).

[13] See L. Cognet, "Duval," DHGE 14, 1213–16.

[14] See Optat de Veghel, Benoît de Canfield, sa vie, sa doctrine et son influence (Rome 1949).

[15] See Louise de Jésus, La Vénérable Madeleine de Saint-Joseph (Clamart 1935); Marie de Chantal Gueudré, Histoire de l'ordre des Ursulines en France, 3 vols. (Paris 1957–63).

After 1610 the milieu dévot, despite its vitality, began to dissolve. It was gradually weakened by internal dissention and the fact that Mme Acarie, having become a Carmelite in 1614, could no longer serve as its focal point. She was, moreover, personally embroiled in the controversies concerning the leadership of the Carmelites, which Bérulle, in opposition to Duval and Mme Acarie, wanted to transfer to the French Oratory.[19] This conflict, which had initially been confined pretty much to the level of the parties involved, became public after 1618 and was intensified by the appearance of two new opponents of Bérulle: the Carmelites, who wanted to take over the direction of the whole order, and the Jesuits, who in their various apostolates feared the competition of the Oratory founded by Bérulle in 1611. All these hostilities contributed toward putting Bérulle into a difficult situation; his approach was suspect, the milieu dévot was undermined and its slow deterioration became inevitable.

Richelieu and the Milieu Dévot

At the beginning of the regency of Marie de Médicis the milieu dévot was highly respected. It could easily impress the not so intelligent queen, who valued the piety, probity and unselfishness of its representatives. Bérulle, who by way of his mother belonged to the Séguier family, at the time one of the most important families of France by virtue of its position and wealth, was of course an important figure in this group. The queen's favorite, Concini, maréchal d'Ancre, willingly left all religious affairs to the parti dévot. He did not consider himself to have sufficient authority nor was he particularly interested in them. Because of these circumstances, Bérulle contributed considerably to advancing the career of a young cleric who had become bishop of Luçon in 1606; Armand du Plessis du Richelieu, ten years his junior and from a less distinguished family, but in whom he had discovered brilliant abilities. Ambitious and clear-sighted, Richelieu did not hesitate to seek contact with the queen mother and the parti dévot although later he was to turn against it. He began by flattering Bérulle and in 1612 he was one of the first to introduce the Oratory in his diocese. His widely noticed speech to the Estates-General in 1615 contained skillful encomia for Marie de Médicis, which gained him entrée to the affairs of state. In November 1616 he became minister of foreign affairs to Concini, whose assassination almost caused him to fall out of favor. That Richelieu was able to rehabilitate himself in 1619 was primarily due to the support of a member of the parti dévot, Sébastian Bouthilliers. Not until 1624 was he actually appointed to a first-rate position, but by that time his political ideas had fully matured and increasingly he conflicted with Bérulle and the latter's friends. In 1619, after Richelieu's brother Henry died a tragic death in a duel, Bérulle, moreover, made the somewhat naive mistake of taking Richelieu's protestations that he wanted to withdraw from politics seriously. Aggravating the relationship further was the fact that in 1621 Bérulle had a hand in Richelieu's being denied the cardinalship, which he subsequently did not receive until September 1622.

---

[16] See E. J. Lajeunie, Saint François de Sales, 2 vols. (Paris 1966); H. Bremond, Sainte Chantal (Paris 1912).

[17] L. Entraygues, La Bienheureuse Jeanne de Lestonnac (Périgueux 1940).

[18] See A. de Salinis, Mme de Villeneuve (Paris 1918).

[19] See Mme Acarie, Mémoire sur la fondation, le gouvernement et l'observance des Carmélites déchaussées, 2 vols. (Rheims 1894).

Bérulle and Richelieu indeed developed their respective political positions in totally opposite directions. Bérulle (see Chap. 5) above all else wanted the triumph of Catholicism over the Protestant heresy. Richelieu's unshakable goal was to provide the French monarchy with a firm national foundation and to insure France's hegemony in Europe—even at the price of Catholic interests. In this regard Richelieu was an heir to Philip the Fair and the French canonists. Bérulle and the parti dévot subordinated politics to the concerns of religion while Richelieu's position was the exact opposite. A clash between these contradictory tendencies could not be avoided for long. Gradually the supremacy of the state became Richelieu's basic argument.[20] The parti dévot on the other hand, reinforced by Port-Royal, demanded priority for the rights of religion over the claims of individual conscience. Richelieu's views, taking up, as they did, political ideas dating back to the Middle Ages, were without doubt reactionary, whereas those of the parti dévot showed the way into the eighteenth century and into the mentality of the modern era.

---

[20] See E. Thuau, Raison d'état et pensée politique à l'époque de Richelieu (Paris 1966).

Before Richelieu had firmly secured his position, the contradiction between the two positions became manifest as a result of several incidents. In the conflict between the new Emperor, Ferdinand, and the Protestant Elector Palatine Friedrich V, which broke out toward the end of 1619, President Jeannin, through mediation by Bérulle and Minister Luynes, succeeded in gaining the support of the Royal Council for the Catholic faction. But the victory of the Catholics at the end of 1620 had radicalized the claims of Austria and Spain, putting France into a difficult situation. As a consequence, Richelieu was moved to criticize the policies of Luynes and of the parti dévot by means of several anonymous pamphlets. The controversy became even more evident on the occasion of the marriage of Henriette de France, sister of Louis XIII, to Charles I of England. Bérulle favored this marriage because through it he hoped to save what was left of Catholicism in England. Richelieu wanted it as well, but hoped to secure through it the alliance with England against Spain. But both were soon disappointed. Bérulle—even at the price of war—wanted to realize those clauses in the marriage contract which would have favored the Catholics. But Richelieu, who had scant concern for the English Catholics and was governed by ruthless realism, dropped the contractual clauses without regrets and turned towards Protestant Germany. In 1626 Richelieu disapproved of Bérulle's action at the Treaty of Madrid, in which the Valtellina problem was solved in a manner far too favorable to Spain. But Bérulle, who in 1627 had also become a cardinal, continued to exert a powerful influence on the queen mother, who had remained well-disposed towards the parti dévot. After the conquest of La Rochelle the latter was planning an alliance with Spain and Austria which was finally to destroy Protestantism. But in 1629 Bérulle irrevocably fell out of favor when Richelieu succeeded against Bérulle's recommendation in inducing the Royal Council to come to the aid of Charles de Nevers, Duke of Mantua, who was under siege by the Spanish at Casal. On 15 September 1629 Bérulle refused his consent to the Treaty of Susa, which in the end sanctioned an alliance against England. Just as Richelieu was about to rid himself of his adversary by dispatching him to Rome as French ambassador, Bérulle suddenly died on 2 October 1629. On the following 21 November Richelieu was appointed first minister of the state.

The death of Bérulle was a heavy blow to the parti dévot. Although the minister of justice, Michel de Marillac, was now the most significant person in the party, he lacked the stature that would have enabled him to take the place of the dead cardinal. A final crisis which momentarily threatened Richelieu's power ended in the Journée des Dupes (Day of Dupes, 12 November 1630) and the queen mother being exiled. After this, Richelieu was in a position methodically to eliminate his opponents. Marillac was arrested and died in prison on 7 August 1632; he never received a proper trial, which would have proved his innocence. His brother Louis, marshal of France, was accused of misappropriation of public funds and was beheaded on 10 May 1632.[21] But Richelieu found himself confronted by yet another opponent who was all the less vulnerable in as much as he rarely involved himself in affairs of state. He was Jean Duvergier de Hauranne (1581–1643), of Basque origin, abbot of Saint-Cyran since 1620 (see Chap. 5). He had been a brilliant university student, friend and fellow student of Cornelius Jansen from Flanders. After finishing his studies, Saint-Cyran had embarked on a career as secular cleric which had led to ties of friendship with Richelieu. In 1618, on the occasion of his ordination, Saint-Cyran had undergone a moral crisis, from which he emerged a changed person, converted to an inner life. A chance meeting around 1620 soon led to a close friendship and occasional collaboration with Bérulle. Gradually Saint-Cyran identified himself with Bérulle's point of view and began to express his position against the latter's opponents, not only the Jesuits and Carmelites, but even Richelieu himself. After the death of Bérulle the Oratory, for fear of the cardinal-minister, hardly dared eulogize their founder. Yet Saint-Cyran on 5 October circulated an impressive letter to Fr. Bourgoing, the subsequent second successor to Bérulle in the generalship of the congregation, which contained unreserved praise of the deceased. In other respects, too, Saint-Cyran's keen intelligence was widely known: Guez de Balzac called him "the oracle of the monastery of Notre-Dame," after his place of residence. Without wanting to, Saint-Cyran quickly occupied an exposed position with the parti dévot and became an opponent of Richelieu. During the brief period in which the party held decisive power, immediately prior to the Journée des Dupes, the queen mother had even designated him bishop of Bayonne. Initially, Richelieu did not dare proceed against his former friend, because he either lacked sufficient grounds or was still hoping to win him back over to his side.

Saint-Cyran, knowing himself to be in a dangerous situation, behaved most cautiously while the cardinal's anti-Spanish policies intensified and in May 1635 culminated in a declaration of war. Yet the public was aware that Saint-Cyran condemned the hostility towards a great

---

[21] See G. Pagès, "Autour du Grand Orage, Richelieu et Marillac, deux politiques," RH 179 (1937); P. de Vaissière, Un grand proces sous Richelieu, l'affaire du Maréchal de Marillac (Paris 1924).

Catholic nation as well as Richelieu's alliance with the Protestants of Germany. In the course of the summer of 1635 Jansen, whose connection with Saint-Cyran was well-known, published his Mars gallicus, seu de justitia armorum et foederum regis Galliae, a blunt and cutting pamphlet against Richelieu's foreign policy. Saint-Cyran did not approve of this far too partisan comment. But Richelieu was offended; he reacted sharply and marked Saint-Cyran the victim of his revenge. At the same time, he was afraid that his opponent might openly resist him in a delicate matter of extreme importance to him. It involved the marriage of Gaston d'Orléans, brother of the King, who on 3 January 1632 had married Marguerite of Lorraine without the crown's consent.[22] This union interfered with Richelieu's policies because he was speculating on the properties of Marguerite's brother, the duke of Lorraine. By an edict of parliament (1634), the minister had the marriage dissolved on the strange pretext that Gaston had been the victim of an abduction. To buttress his case and to soothe the King's conscience Richelieu obtained—though not without difficulty—expert opinions from the Assembly of the Clergy, from fourteen Parisian congregations, and from sixty doctoral academicians, all of whom attested to the marriage being invalid. But the Holy See continued to consider it valid. This was also Saint-Cyran's opinion and in spite of using the utmost discretion he could not conceal it, particularly because he was a friend of Condren, general of the Oratory and Gaston's confessor. Richelieu, aware of this, was at once resentful and uneasy; he feared that Saint-Cyran might publicly express himself in this matter after Condren and even Vincent de Paul had already been neutralized. Richelieu, with newspaper writers in his paid employ, knew very well of the power of the press and of public opinion, which could have been reversed by an active intervention on the part of Saint-Cyran. At this time, moreover, the minister was making public his plan to establish a French patriarchate relatively independent of the Holy See. It was obvious from the beginning that Saint-Cyran would oppose with all his force this schismatical design in which Richelieu, as he was well aware, had most of the nation against him. So Saint-Cyran unintentionally became the cardinal's foremost antagonist. Once more Richelieu attempted to win him over by arranging to have the bishopric of Bayonne offered to him in the spring of 1637. The abbot refused because he did not want to relinquish his independence, but knowing full well that this refusal would expose him to greater danger. At this point Richelieu actually thought of using force. But the intellectual authority of the abbot, his reputation for piety and integrity, and the seclusion in which he dwelt made him a difficult target. It took the incidents at Port-Royal, with which we shall soon deal, to provide the cardinal with the seemingly religious pretext he was seeking. In any event, Richelieu could now assume that the arrest of Saint-Cyran would seal the disintegration of the already weakened parti dévot. He could not foresee that Port-Royal would endure as the strongest bastion of resistance against absolutism.

---

[22] See A. Degert, "Le mariage de Gaston d'Orléans," RH 143 (1901), 161ff.

The Reform of the Clergy

During the few years under the regency of Marie de Médicis in which the parti dévot enjoyed a full measure of power, its foremost aim was the reform of the secular clergy and that of the orders. This endeavor was supported and continued by Richelieu. After 1610 the efforts in behalf of monastic reform were not only sustained by the milieu dévot, but were indeed frequently pursued by civil authorities as well. It must be pointed out that the idea of monastic reform had a twofold significance. In some cases an outstanding religious personality at the head of a community was able to restore strict observance and to turn it into a center of spirituality simply by persuasive power and by setting an example. In other cases, the authorities intervened from the outside and when necessary applied force in order to do away with the most flagrant excesses and to bring about at least a minimum of observance of the rules. The religious significance of the reform is of course basically different in the two cases.

An amusing example of the second kind is represented by the Cistercian abbey of Maubuisson, headed, as we mentioned before, by the amorous Angélique d'Estrées. Age apparently had done nothing to moderate her since her well-known liaison with a nobleman continued to feed the chronicles already rich in scandals.[23] Finally, in 1617, the court ordered the abbot of Cîteaux, Dom Boucherat, to restore order to Maubuisson. Dom Boucherat made a canonical visitation. Consequently, on 5 February 1618, he had Mme d'Estrées arrested by royal police and interned with the Filles répenties. Then he sent for Mother Angélique Arnauld, abbess of Port-Royal, and three of her nuns to administer and reform the house. By 10 September 1619 the situation had improved, but now Mme d'Estrées, having escaped from the Filles répenties, stormed the abbey in company with a number of nobles devoted to her. Mother Angélique and the nuns loyal to her had to flee to Pontoise. It took a second expedition by the police to evict Mme d'Estrées, who had by the way managed to abscond, and to reinstall Mother Angélique. Subsequently and indeed on several occasions, the latter was in danger of being murdered. Not until the spring of 1623 was Mme d'Estrées finally replaced by another abbess so that Mother Angélique could return to Port-Royal. To be sure, this was an especially romantic episode, but by no means the only one in this period.

---

[23] See L. Cognet, La Mère Angélique et saint François de Sales (Paris 1951).

A decisive position in the movement for monastic reform was occupied by Cardinal François de la Rochefoucauld (1558–1645).[24] He had been court prelate and, at the time of the League, a combative bishop of Clermont. In his youth he had met Saint Charles Borromeo in Italy; now he was consumed with the idea of emulating Borromeo's reformatory zeal. La Rochefoucauld had close ties to the parti dévot and it was probably Henri de Gondi, bishop of Paris, who had recommended him to Louis XIII in about 1620 to work on monastic reform. A brief by Gregory XV, dated 8 April 1622, assigned him to the task; this was confirmed by royal letters patent on the following 13 July, setting him to work with the utmost vigor. La Rochefoucauld, who by the way was unscrupulous in his accumulation of church benefices, had among his acquisitions of abbeys that of Sainte-Geneviève in Paris, a monastery of the Canons Regular, which made him primarily interested in the reform of this particular branch. For this purpose he collaborated with Father Charles Faure (1594–1644), a pious monk from Senlis,[25] in establishing the Congrégation de France, which was to integrate all the abbeys of the Canons Regular. In accomplishing his goals the cardinal was not without ruthlessness, as in the case of the venerable Alain de Solminihac,[26] bishop of Cahors, who from his abbey at Chancelade had established his own branch of the Canons Regular. La Rochefoucauld was not as successful with other chapters, especially those of Clairvaux and Cîteaux. Dom Denis Largentier, abbot of Clairvaux, joined by several abbeys, had introduced reforms in 1615. Dom Nicolas Boucherat, abbot of Cîteaux, supported the reformed chapters and permitted them to elect their own vicar general. But in May 1622 at a conference chaired by La Rochefoucauld, he acceded to the latter's suggestions by allowing the reformed chapters to form their own congregation. But the following May the chapters general rescinded this decision.[27] When Dom Largentier and Dom Boucherat died shortly after one another (1624, 1625), their places were taken by abbots antagonistic to reform. Thereupon Dom Étienne Maugier, abbot of La Charmoye, took over the leadership of the reform movement. With the support of La Rochefoucauld he initiated a movement claiming independence for the reformed chapters. The ensuing dissension split the order until the end of the century. Even the constitution In suprema by Alexander VII, prescribing slightly more moderate statutes, could not restore harmony, but on the contrary evoked spirited resistance. Among the disputants was Armand-Jean Le Bouthillier de Rancé (1626–1700). After a checkered career as a wordly abbot he converted and in 1664 became titular abbot of his commendam La Trappe in Normandy,[28] where he embarked upon a reform of his abbey. While far exceeding the Cistercian ideal in its scope and severity, his reforms nonetheless caused an immense awareness because Rancé was known widely. But within the order it was greatly resisted by, among others, Dom Eustache de Beaufort, who had initiated the reform of his abbey of Sept-Fons in Bourbonnais in 1663.[29] The Cistercian nuns also joined the reform movement, which had been initiated in Port-Royal in 1608; by the end of the century several congregations of reformed Bernardine nuns had been founded. Among the most interesting was the one founded in 1618 at Tart in the diocese of Langres; it was suggested by Mother Jeanne de Courcelle de Pourlan and supported by Bishop Sébastien Zamet[30] and the nuns of Port-Royal. Another congregation founded by Mother de Ballon with support by Saint Francis de Sales was established in 1621 in Rumilly.

---

[24] See G. de la Rochefoucauld, Le Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld (Paris 1921).

[25] See L. Cognet, "Faure," DHGE 16, 714–19.

[26] See E. Sol, Le Vénérable Alain de Solminihac (Cahors 1928).

[27] See J. Canivez, "Cîteaux," DHGE 12 (1952), 950–97.

The Benedictines as well benefited from several attempts at reform emanating from Lorraine where the congregations of Saint-Vanne and Saint-Hydulphe had been formed in 1604. The reform of Saint-Vanne was transferred to France in 1613, mediated by Dom Bénard, prior of the Collège de Cluny in Paris. Several cloisters joined in, but since Lorraine at this time was part of the Empire, they had to form an autonomous congregation in 1618, the Congrégation de Saint-Maur; this was encouraged by Louis XIII and canonically sanctioned in 1921. In 1624 Dom Grégoire Tarrisse,[31] a superior administrator, became president of the congregation and gave it a strong centralized organization. Gradually most of the important Benedictine abbeys joined the congregation with the exception of Cluny and its chapters. In 1631 the renowned abbey of Saint-Germain des Prés in Paris emerged as the center of the Maurists.[32] In Cluny, Abbot Jacques de Veny d'Arbouze unsuccessfully attempted a reform in 1622. Richelieu, who had become commendam abbot of Cluny in 1629 and wanted to unite all French Benedictines in one body,[33] attempted to fuse the Cluniacs with the Maurists into the congregation of Saint-Benoît. But Rome never agreed and when the cardinal died, the plan was abandoned. A subsequent attempt by Mazarin to combine the reformed houses of Cluny with the congregation of Saint-Vanne failed as well. Indeed, the Cluny group remained rather undistinguished, whereas the Maurists flourished. Simultaneously, instances of reforms in the Benedictine convents also increased. Highly esteemed were the reforms introduced in 1619 by Marquerite de Veny d'Arbouze in her abbey of Val-de-Grâce and continued when the abbey was transferred to Paris in 1631. She was aided by the affection of Anne of Austria and her statutes were adopted by numerous houses. Some of these reforms adapted the Benedictine traditions to contemporary forms of piety, as was the case with the Benedictine nuns of Calvary. This chapter had been founded in 1617 in Poitiers by Antoinette d'Orléans[34] with support by the famous Capuchine Father Joseph du Tremblay, who later received the sobriquet "the gray eminence." The change was even more marked in the case of the Benedictine nuns of the Holy Sacrament founded in 1653 by Mother Mechtilde in Paris.[35] The atonement of injuries done to the Holy Sacrament by the Huguenots was then a central devotional act within the milieu dévot; after 1647 it was also practiced by the Cistercian nuns of Port-Royal.

---

[28] See H. Bremond, L'abbé Tempête, Armand de Rancé et la réforme de la Trappe (Paris 1926).

[29] See B. Martelet, "Dom Eustache de Beaufort et la réforme de Sept-Fons," Cîteaux 14 (1963), 4, 281–92.

[30] See L. Prunel, Sébastien Zamet, sa vie, ses œuvres (Paris 1912).

[31] See F. Rousseau, Un promoteur de l'érudition bénédictine, Dom Grégoire Tarrisse (Lille 1924).

[32] Collected contributions for the Centennial of the Abbey of Saint-Germain-des-Prés in RHEF 43 (1957).

During the first half of the seventeenth century almost all the old established orders in fact had to submit to reform for internal reasons. For the Dominicans, Sebastian Michaelis had managed in 1608 to establish a reformed congregation for the Toulouse region; in 1613 it expanded to Paris, where it assumed the name Congrégation de Saint-Louis. Seven years later Father Antoine Le Quieu founded a new, even stricter reform chapter also consecrated to the Holy Sacrament.[36] The reform of the Premonstratensians started in 1617 in Lorraine and spread to France in 1623. First indications of a Carmelite reform of Touraine appeared in 1604.[37] Reform of the clergy of the orders on the whole resulted from individual and private efforts, rather than from initiatives by the state. The commission under the chairmanship of La

---

[33] Cf. P. Denis, Le Cardinal de Richelieu et la Réforme des monastères bénédictins (Paris 1913).

[34] See P. Petit, Vie de la Mère Antoinette d'Orléans (Paris 1880).

[35] M. Hervin and M. Dourlens, Vie de Mechtilde du Saint-Sacrement (Paris 1883).

[36] See R. L. Oechslin, Une aventure spirituelle: Vie du Père Antoine Le Quieu (Paris 1967).

[37] See S. M. Bouchereaux, La réforme des Carmes en France et Jean de Saint-Samson (Paris 1950).

Rochefoucauld, in spite of his personal effort, achieved but very limited success. Later on Richelieu had the abbeys of Cluny, Cîteaux and Prémontré conveyed to himself in order to be in a position to intercede effectively. Yet he used them primarily for the income he derived from them. In reality, the leadership was making too much profit from the existing abuses to want to remedy them. But for all the difficulties they faced, the efforts by the reformers were not in vain. Many cloisters not only turned into places of sincere spiritual life, but also had a profound effect on the laity. Groups of friends gathered around the convents of Port-Royal, Val-de-Grâce, the Carmelites and the Visitation; at La Trappe, Rancé received the most important personages of his time. Even in houses at the periphery of reforms the most scandalous excesses were stopped; transgressions were no longer overt. Eventually the religious orders regained their dignity.

Reform of the secular clergy posed a completely different problem. From the outset, the whole milieu dévot agreed that it would be useless to undertake a reform of the present clergy, that it was necessary to start all over again by bringing up a new clergy. But from this point on, the proposed solutions diverged. One feasible idea was the creation of an organism whose sole function was to be the education of a clergy worthy of its duties. This had actually been prescribed by the Council of Trent when it ordered the establishment of seminaries. Yet in spite of efforts in this direction by many clerics including La Rochefoucauld, the council's decrees never became state law;[38] implementation was left instead to private initiative. So the bishops were quite late when they began to establish seminaries, which, moreover, were frequently forced to operate under very difficult conditions. Without a doubt the pioneer in this field was Adrien Bourdoise (1584–1665),[39] an impressive figure who lived outside the customary frame, passionately involved in the idea of clerical reform, a man of uncompromising severity and insufferable character whose vagaries even Vincent de Paul and Bérulle were not spared. In 1612 he formed a society for aspiring priests in Paris where he gave an education almost exclusively aimed at practical application and that was very limited intellectually.[40] Following a verbal approval in 1631, Bourdoise's seminary experiment finally received its official approval in 1643. His example was emulated: between 1622 and 1680 there appeared in twenty French towns seminary societies of this type, several of which were but short-lived. Initially Bourdoise's enterprise required true courage, for at that time even La Rochefoucauld did not dare open a seminary either in Clermont or in Senlis, the diocese he was given later on. Bourdoise's influence was to prove vital in connection with other foundings, such as the Oratory and Saint-Sulpice.

---

[38] See V. Martin, Le gallicanisme et la réforme catholique, essai sur l'introduction en France des décrets du Concile de Trente (Paris 1919).

[39] See J. F. Darche, Le saint abbé Bourdoise, 2 vols. (Paris 1884); J. Harang, Bourdoise (Paris 1949).

[40] See P. Schoenher, Histoire du Séminaire de Saint-Nicolas du Chardonnet, 2 vols. (Paris 1909–11).

In fact, there appeared to be another solution to the reform of the parish priests: the creation of a secular clergy to be both example and complement to the existing clergy. It was this solution Bérulle approved on 10 November 1611 when he founded the Oratory of Jesus, an unpretentious congregation of secular clerics without special vows. His model was the foundation of Saint Philip Neri in Rome. Neri had designed the Oratories in the various towns as autonomous houses without an organic connection. In contrast, Bérulle had planned his French Oratory from the beginning to be a single congregation structured under the authority of a superior general whose members could change houses if required by circumstances.[41] In this respect, Bérulle's design was better adapted to the requirements of France, which had the kind of political unity totally lacking in Italy. The members of the Oratory immediately took over the various forms of parish apostleship, to which they soon added educational duties. The Oratory developed swiftly. By the time of its first plenary session in August 1631 it already had seventy-one houses. This quantitative as well as qualitative achievement proved that the Oratory fulfilled the needs of a large segment of the religious public. In spite of its liberal attitude, expansion and centralization actually gave the Oratory the posture of a large national congregation, comparable in France to the Society of Jesus. Since the latter was actively dedicated to the same areas of endeavor, conflicts between the two were unavoidable; in 1620 an open quarrel ensued. In December 1623, after an exchange of highly aggressive memoranda, Bérulla and the Jesuits brought the matter before the papal nuncio, Corsini. Yet the hostility between the two congregations did not abate and later on led a significant group of Oratory members to join the Jansenists.

The role and influence of the Oratory and the priestly spirituality promoted by Bérulle and his successors,[42] contributed significantly to raising the level of the secular clergy. Meanwhile the Oratory and its followers were occupied also with the first of the above-mentioned solutions, to create institutions which were to insure the proper education of the clergy. While Bérulle was alive, the Oratory already took over seminaries, many of which were attached to secondary schools such as the seminary of Saint-Magloire, founded for the Paris diocese. But these institutions met with limited success in counteracting the problems within the secular clergy. Bérulle's successor at the head of the Oratory, Charles de Condren (1588–1641), an indecisive person who shunned responsibility, did not make an effort to continue the task of establishing seminaries within the Oratory although he recognized the need for them and recommended them to his students. One of them, Jean-Jacques Olier (1608–57), realized a work of fundamental significance.[43] Having become pastor of Saint-Sulpice in 1642, he established a seminary in his parsonage which soon brought forth the Compagnie de Saint-Sulpice, an association of secular priests. Following the model of the Oratory, it was dedicated to teaching at diocesan seminaries and directing them.[44] In Olier's lifetime four more such associations were established. Following his death numerous additional houses were either established or received into the association both in France and Canada. Before long the Sulpician seminaries were considered exemplary and their education became the prototype of clerical training. Educated in accordance with the spiritual principles of Bérulle regarding the eminence of the priesthood and its place in the hierarchy, a certain type of priest emerged from these seminaries. Pious, well educated and charitable, leading a dignified and retired life, they all came from a certain social stratum, which was to endure through the upheavals of the Revolution to the threshold of our century. However, the education and training was limited by the quality of the candidates. This improved, although a decision for the priesthood was not always in response to a true calling. The aristocracy continued to provide the recruits for the episcopate, but usually had its candidates, too, go through the seminaries. Talleyrand's Mémoires indicate that these clerical youths on the eve of revolution were prepared to upset the strict order of the seminaries. Among the lower levels of society, the priesthood remained as always the simplest means for social mobility. Parents would simply enter their most gifted children into the priesthood—whether the children wanted it or not. So it is easy to understand that the pseudophilosophy of the eighteenth century met with a great deal of concurrence among the rural clergy, for whom Rousseau's Vicaire Savoyard was by no means a mere mythical figure.

---

[41] See A. George, L'Oratoire (Paris 1928).

[42] See M. Dupuy, Bérulle et le sacerdoce (Paris 1969).

The reform movement also brought about other foundations which were concerned with clerical education. One of the most significant emanated from Vincent de Paul (1581–1660) (see Chap. 5). As a farmer's son from the area of Landes, Vincent's youth had been wanting in material things. Although his reputed stay in Tunisia must be considered a legend,[45] he nevertheless had to undergo a number of adventures before he settled in Paris at the end of 1608. After 1610 his life led him on the path to an even more demanding holiness under the influence of Bérulle. Yet he took many more years to discover his true destination. In 1618 he started to devote himself to the rural missions, but not until 1625, supported by one of the most powerful families of the milieu dévot, the Gondi, did he establish the Congrégation des Prêtres de la Mission, housed initially in the Collège des Bons Enfants and then in 1632 in Saint-Lazare, the former home for lepers and future center of the congregation. The new congregation, which initially occupied itself with the rural apostolate and later on with several foreign missions, developed so rapidly that by 1641 Vincent de Paul was able to use his priests in establishing some diocesan seminaries. At the time of his death there was a total of about a dozen houses. At the request of the archbishop, Vincent de Paul five or six times a year offered a week's contemplation at Saint-Lazare for candidates for ordainment. These retreats were highly frequented and very successful; in 1652 even Bossuet prepared for his ordination there and later returned four times to preach. In July 1633—also at Saint-Lazare—the renowned Tuesday conferences were initiated (Conférences du Mardi), at which gathered the foremost representatives of the Parisian clergy to instruct one another and to discuss the problems of the apostolate. The following years, the Vincentians established similar organizations in the large provincial towns. All of these institutions were objects of Vincent de Paul's constant occupation; at certain points he spent considerable time looking for the right solution to problems. This was true especially for the seminaries where the candidates for the priesthood unfortunately spent no more than a few months. This was too short a time to enable them to receive a solid education. Even at that, the results were positive as Vincent himself stated at the end of his life.

---

[43] See P. Pourrat, J. J. Olier (Paris 1932).

[44] See P. Boisard, La Compagnie de Saint-Sulpice, trois siècles d'histoire (n.p., 1959); not available commercially.

Vincent de Paul quickly freed himself from Bérulle's initial influence; this even led to some differences of opinion between the two. In addition to them, the Oratory brought forth another great founder in the area of rural mission and seminary work: Saint John Eudes (1611–80),[46] a member of the Oratory from 1623 to 1643. The sole reason for his leaving the Oratory in 1643 was the fact that he was opposed by the superior general, François Bourgoing, when he established a seminary in Caen. He founded the Congrégation de Jésus et Marie, which assumed the direction of numerous seminaries and remained dominated by a spirituality inspired by Bérulle. At the same time there were other experiments and foundings. One of them in the south of France was the Congrégation des Pères de la Mission by Christophe d'Authier de Sisgaud, which to some degree was at variance with Vincent de Paul's congregation; but all of these groups were limited in their range and duration. And yet these efforts did lead to a genuine, gradually expanding reform of the prevailing mentality. After 1650 most of the dioceses established seminaries; the conditions for ordination began more and more to conform with canonical norms with the result of raising standards among the parish clergy rapidly without, however, going beyond the above-mentioned limitations (see Chap. 5).

---

[45] See A. Dodin, Saint Vincent de Paul et la charité (Paris 1960); L. Cognet, Saint Vincent de Paul (Paris 1959); P. Debongnie, "Saint Vincent de Paul était-il à Tunis en 1606–1607?" RHE 58 (1963), 862–64.

[46] See D. Boulay, Vie du Vénérable Jean Eudes, 4 vols. (Paris 1905–08); Berthelot du Chesnay, Les missions de saint Jean Eudes (Paris 1967).

CHAPTER 2

Origin and Development of Jansenism to 1653

Augustinianism in Louvain and Jansen

The congregations De Auxiliis had not resulted in a condemnation of Molina's Concordia. While Paul V did not want to diminish the esteem enjoyed by the Jesuits, who had rendered to him inestimable political services, he was nonetheless determined to maintain the fundamental position of the Augustinian-Thomist system of grace. This is why he allowed the Dominican Diego Álvarez (d. 1635) to publish his monumental treatise De auxiliis divinae gratiae (1611) as a work of quasi-official character. In order to prevent works on the same topic by the Jesuits Lessius and Suárez to be published, he had the Holy Office issue a decision (not a decree!), which was communicated to those involved and forbade them to publish anything involving the subject of grace. In spite of this, the faculty of Louvain reaffirmed its censures of the Jesuits Lessius and Hamelius. In December 1614 the Jesuit General Claudius Acquaviva, fearing that the old quarrels would be revived, directed Thomism to be taught at the colleges of the society. Yet neither Paul V nor Acquaviva succeeded. Numerous works proclaiming to be commentaries on the Summa of Saint Thomas circumvented the prohibition of 1611; the Jesuits on the whole continued to defend Molina. Under those circumstances, Urban VIII—elevated to the papacy in 1623—reiterated the prohibition in December of the same year and acknowledged it by formal decree on 22 May 1625. But even he could not settle the quarrels about the concept of grace.

The Louvain group then remained identified with Augustinianism; Baius, whose condemnation was considered unfair, enjoyed continued sympathy especially among such famous professors as the Franciscan Florent Conry (Conrius) (1590–1629) and Jacques Jansson (1547–1629). It was in this atmosphere that Cornelius Jansen (Jansenius) (1585–1638) developed.[1] From 1602 to 1604 and from 1607 to 1609 he was a student in Louvain, the latter two years under the tutelage of Jansson. From 1609 to 1616 he resided for the main in France, where he met and for some time shared a domicile with Jean Duvergier de Hauranne, who later was to become abbot of Saint-Cyran (see Chap. 1). After his return to Flanders he dedicated himself to a peaceful and honorable university career. From 1617 until 1624 he was president of the Sainte-Pulchérie Seminary and was then appointed representative of the university at the court of Spain, where he successfully defended the monopoly of the faculty against the Jesuits, who were applying for the privilege to award degrees. In March 1630 he was rewarded with the regius chair of Sacred Scripture and wrote commentaries on numerous books of the Bible, which avoided the touchy issue of grace. In the meantime his ideas about this problem had taken on very definite form. In the course of his studies, he had read excerpts from Augustine, but without paying any special attention to him. Only after his return to Louvain—under the influence of Jansson—did he undertake a systematic study of Augustine's works, excerpting the essential theses and compiling them into a system of thought. In 1621 he allied himself with Conrius, who influenced him in like manner.[2] At this point Jansen began to secure various political connections—in France with the help of Saint-Cyran—who were to aid him in his intention to bring about a triumph of Augustinianism over Molinism. Since 1621 he had also been planning to write a comprehensive synthesis of the Augustinian doctrine of grace. To this end, he spent the years 1623–26 in a final systematic study of the works of Augustine. Obligations at the university and his trip to Spain delayed the start of the manuscript until 1627. After this it advanced with remarkable speed; his letters to Saint-Cyran offer insight into the various stages of progress. On 27 March 1630 he was able to send him the table of contents for the first volume. In spite of interruptions by his professorial duties and the anti-Protestant polemics in 1630–31, he started on the third volume in February 1635, hoping to finish it within a year. But in August 1635 he was appointed rector of the university; on 28 October 1636, he became bishop of Ypres and was occupied intensively with his episcopal duties. Under these circumstances he was unable to complete his great treatise. When he was about to finish it, he started worrying about its publication. With a caution understandable in a time that was aggravated by polemics, he had gone about his work with the utmost discretion. Rather than submit his writings, he decided to install a printing shop in his palace together with all the necessary materials. In April 1638 the work was finished, crowned by a dedication to Pope Urban III.[3] But he was not to see its publication. He died from the plague in God's peace on 6 May 1638, having placed his manuscript into the hands of his pupils Henri Calenus and Liber Froidmont.[4] [1] See J. Orcibal, "Jansénius," Catholicisme 23 (Paris 1963), 332–43; A. Vandenpeereboom, "C. Jansénius évêque d'Ypres," Ypriana VI (Bruges 1882).

---

[2] See L. Ceyssens, "Florence Conry, Hugh de Burgo, Luke Wadding and Jansenism," Festschr. Father Luke Wadding (Dublin 1957), 295–304.

In spite of Jansen's precautions, the Jesuits of Flanders had some knowledge of his undertaking. Since the Jesuits looked upon a resumption of the polemics on this topic as a potential disaster, they had mobilized support for themselves especially in France and Spain and had also kept the Jesuits of Rome informed. Soon they knew that Jansen had left behind a completed work and so did their utmost to prevent its publication. Through an internuncio in Brussels, Richard Stravius, they reminded Calenus and Froidmont of the prohibition of 1611 and the decree of 1625, which forbade publications on the subject of grace. But since these decisions were never officially communicated to the University of Louvain the latter considered them of no consequence.[5] When Jesuits appealed to the Council of Brabant and the Privy Council, Calenus and Froidmont countered by pointing to the enormous sums of money already invested by the printer, Zegers, and they finally prevailed. The treatise was made public in September 1640. This huge folio of more than thirteen hundred pages in small print of two columns per page was entitled simply Cornelii Jansenii Episcopi Yprensis Augustinus. It was no doubt with regard to the prohibitions by the Holy See that Jansen's representatives omitted his dedication to Urban III.

This extensive book, the work of a lifetime, was indeed in itself a remarkable synthesis of the Augustinian concepts on grace and predestination. But in it Jansen proceeded from the most extreme positions advocated by Saint Augustine in his fight against the Pelagians without taking into consideration the long history of their development. What evolved was a rigid system often sharply formulated. The first volume treats the positions of the Pelagians or Semi-Pelagians. In a "Liber proemialis" introducing the second volume, Jansen investigates the correlations between philosophy and theology; he opposes the methods of Scholasticism as being too rationalistic and claims Augustine's authority in regard to the issue of grace. He then talks about the state of fallen nature from a perspective characterized by Augustinian pessimism with special emphasis on the basic depravity which emanated from sin and about the power of concupiscence, which grants man no more than the freedom of evil. In the process he also addresses the classical problem of the state of pure nature, which he solves in a negative fashion. He concludes that by creation man was elevated to a supernatural calling. The third volume, by far the most significant, examines the healing of human nature and its restitution to true freedom by virtue of the redeeming grace in Christ. Jansen stresses emphatically that grace becomes unfailingly effective without however destroying Man's freedom and that this grace is accorded to him by God totally unowed by virtue of a decree of predestination. He passes over the classical explanation of the Thomists, which goes back to the praemotio physica; but he rejects the notion of freedom—also Thomist—which consists of the ability to posit opposite actions. In his view, freedom is identical with the unfathomable spontaneity of nature, which he calls will. Thus he disregards the Scholastic distinction between will as instinct and will as free choice. His will seeks fulfillment and pleasure spontaneously. But a fallen nature can find its fulfillment only in the creature, in egotistical self-love and therefore turns away from God perforce. It takes the intercession of grace in order to heal it, to breathe into it an inspiration of divine love which resurrects the will in this love and inclines it to a spiritual and holy pleasure through which he puts his whole happiness in God and in the fulfillment of His demand. This is his theory of victorious pleasure through which the will unfailingly enters into harmony with God. In all this, Jansen supposedly reflected the thoughts of Saint Augustine, but actually it is evident that he was influenced by the Baianistic atmosphere of his training. The work as such obviously avoids any and all polemics, but an appendix entitled Parallèle vigorously attacks the Molinists and compares their teachings with those of the Pelagians.[6] Jansen strove strictly to maintain the language of Augustinianism and, like Baius, rejected the concepts of the Thomists, which otherwise would have given strong impulses to his undertaking.

---

[3] See L. Ceyssens, "De dedicatiebrief van C. Jansenius aan Paus Urbanus VIII," AGAU 66 (1947), 203–22; 67 (1948), 13–14.

[4] See C. Callewaert and Q. Nols, Jansénius évêque d'Ypres, ses derniers moments (Louvain 1893); L. Ceyssens, "Libert Froidmont," BullSocAHLiège 43 (1963), 1–46; ibid., "Hendrik Calenus pastoor van Asse," Ascania, driemaandelijks tijdschrift voor Asse 4 (1961), 15–50; idem, "Henri Calenus évêque manqué," Bulletin de la Commission royale d'Histoire 127 (1961), 33–128.

[5] See L. Ceyssens, "La publication de l'Augustinus d'après la correspondance de Henri Calenus," Antonianum 35 (1960), 417–48.

---

[6] See A. de Meyer, "De Werkwijze van Jansenius en zijn Augustinus," Mededelingen der Kon. Vl. Academie van Belgie (1946), VIII, I.

Augustinianism in France: Saint-Cyran and Port-Royal

While it was torn by the religious wars, France paid scant attention to the controversy concerning divine grace. With peace restored, the universities, above all the Sorbonne, regained their former luster; the most famous professors lectured with great clarity concerning grace, openly adhered to Thomism and revered Augustine as their teacher; Molinism was either completely or almost unknown to them. From the beginning of his career, Bérulle appeared dominated by Augustinianism, but not exclusively because in 1612 he accepted Guillaume Gibieuf into the Oratory, who at that time was a confirmed Molinist and only under Bérulle's influence turned to Augustinianism. Duvergier de Hauranne, formerly a Jesuit pupil, too, did not at first oppose the new ideas. During the busy years he spent with Jansen at his estate Camp-de-Prats near Bayonne (1611–16) he did not seem to have been occupied with the issue of grace in any intensive way. But just about the time when Jansen in Louvain discovered Augustinianism, a similar range of perception opened up to the future abbot of Saint-Cyran under the influence of Bérulle. Yet the strictly intellectual mode of Augustinianism, which Jansson had disclosed to his pupil Jansen, was not identical to the Augustinianism provided to Saint-Cyran by Bérulle. The latter was not very much interested in abstracting a coherent theory of grace and predestination from the works of the bishop of Hippo. Involved in the practice of Christian spirituality, he sought to derive from Augustine a method that would make the souls realize their total dependence on God and their personal wretchedness. Saint-Cyran moved along the same lines. Yet, disregarding the difference in their individual outlook, Jansen and Saint-Cyran united in a common defense of Augustinianism. In the autumn of 1621 Saint-Cyran spent some time with Jansen in Louvain. At this meeting they decided to enlist political support in order to effect a breakthrough of Augustinianism against the Jesuits. After their meeting they started cultivating the proper connections. With this in mind, Jansen helped introduce Bérulle's Oratory into Flanders during the following years. But these political initiatives were unsuccesful: given Richelieu's attitude, the two friends realized that they could not hope for anything from him. On 10 May 1623, they met again in Péronne and decided upon a "change of plans," namely to start waging the battle in the universities and on the intellectual level. After 1621 they had made use of a secret code, a common practice at a time when the postal service was still very uncertain. This enabled them to carry on a regular and sufficiently secure correspondence until 1635, when it was interrupted by the war. Until this time, Saint-Cyran was thus in a position to follow the progress of this great treatise, to give data and advice to his friend and even to send him a first draft of the "Liber proemialis." Unfortunately he was unable to lend him his support in editing the third volume, the most important of all, whose content he did not learn until after it was published. Only Jansen's letters were preserved, but they show clearly that he and Saint-Cyran developed in two different intellectual worlds and that Augustinianism never meant the same to the two of them.

As mentioned already, Jansen's pamphlet against Richelieu, Mars Gallicus, was a sore point with the cardinal, yet Richelieu did not draw upon this pamphlet for his main argument against Saint-Cyran, who was at the pinnacle of his fame by 1634. Generally considered the indisputable head of the parti dévot, he maintained excellent connections through his friendship with the elite of French Catholicism. But by then another event involving him was unsettling his life. Since 1620 he had been a close friend of Robert Arnauld d'Andilly, a diplomat, active at the court. The eldest child of a family whose nobility derived from being in the King's service, he was a brother of the famous Mother Angélique, abbess and reformer of the Cistercian abbey of Port-Royal, which had formerly been located in the Chevreuse Valley and in 1625 transferred to Paris. Saint-Cyran had only had occasional slight connections with Mother Angélique and her sister Mother Agnès. Meanwhile Mother Angélique had left Port-Royal for a few years. Together with the bishop of Langres, Sébastien Zamet, she had founded a new order, the Institut du Saint-Sacrement.[7] But Zamet, a strange and uneven personality, soon incurred the enmity especially of the archbishop of Sens, Octave de Bellegarde. The latter, intending to damage the Institut, provided himself with a devotional text by Mother Agnès entitled Chapelet secret du Saint-Sacrement.[8] He represented it as the spiritual charter of the new foundation and managed to have it critically examined by eight professors of the Sorbonne on 18 June 1633. Upon Zamet's request, Saint-Cyran agreed to defend the text, in which he recognized Bérulle's influence. He won out totally and incurred Mother Angélique's deep gratitude. This established a closer relationship between them in the course of which Mother Angélique came to admire Saint-Cyran not only as a pure intellectual, but also as a great spiritual leader.

Yet in this area Saint-Cyran had some very personal convictions inspired in part by Francis de Sales and Bérulle. He rejected the idea that Christian life could alternate constantly between a state of grace and a state of sin. So he endeavored to lead his charges to a truly new life by a method designed to trigger a psychological shock. It consisted of going through the intermediate stage of penitence, yet during this period the penitent would deny himself Communion and delay receiving absolution. Only after this delay, generally lasting a few weeks, did he receive absolution and Communion. Following this he had to live in as much seclusion as possible in order to preserve the grace he had received. This method had been worked out prior to 1627, but until that time Saint-Cyran had had little opportunity to apply it. But he made the mistake of telling the nuns of Port-Royal and Saint-Sacrement about it. They were filled with enthusiasm for it, indeed all of them wanted to set out on this journey to self-renewal. But they also talked about it outside their monastic environs without considering that they were exposing Saint-Cyran to accusations of indulging in dangerous innovations and were providing Richelieu with weapons against him. Plagued by severe scruples, Mother Angélique remained without Holy Communion from Easter to Ascension Day 1635. That she did so in spite of reprimands by Saint-Cyran did not lessen his responsibility for it in the eyes of the public. But soon this affair concerning the recluses of Port-Royal took on a completely different significance. Mother Angélique had a nephew, Antoine Lemaistre, a brilliant young lawyer in whom high hopes were placed for a future in the Paris court of law. In 1634, following a sentimental disappointment, he wanted to commit suicide, but was stopped by Saint-Cyran. The sudden death of one of his aunts on 24 August 1637 brought about an enthusiastic wish for conversion. After a long probationary period, Saint-Cyran, on about 15 December 1637, permitted him to write an open letter to Chancellor Séguier in which he announced his decision henceforth to live in seclusion and penitence, but without wanting to become a priest or joining an order. It was common knowledge that Saint-Cyran was his spiritual guide and so he was accused of wanting to establish a new order, especially since other pupils of his began to join Lemaistre in his seclusion. Richelieu took this to be a budding resistance and decided to intervene severely. But before he did, he tried once again—and failed—to buy the benevolence of his erstwhile friend by offering him a bishopric in February 1637. In March 1638 Claude Séguenot, a member of the Oratory, published a translation of Saint Augustine's De Sancta Virginitate together with a commentary in which he violently attacked the religious orders and espoused a rigid uncompromising Augustinianism. Journalists in the pay of Richelieu designated Saint-Cyran as the actual author of the book, since his connection with the Oratory was well known. The arrest of Séguenot on 7 May was followed on 14 May by the incarceration of Saint-Cyran at the palace of Vincennes.

---

[7] See L. Prunel, S. Zamet, sa vie et ses œuvres, les origines du jansénisme (Paris 1912).

[8] See L. Cognet, "Le Chapelet secret du Saint Sacrement," Chroniques de Port Royal (1951), 3–14.

Public opinion initially considered Saint-Cyran guilty of aggravated heresy and Richelieu intended to compromise him by putting him on trial. But when his papers were scrutinized and his friends and pupils interrogated, the accused turned out to be completely innocent. For a while, Richelieu hoped to use the issue of attritionism against him since Saint-Cyran had always defended the need in the Sacrament of Penance for a contritio based on the love of God. Richelieu held this concept to be in contradiction to the decisions of the Council of Trent. But on 14 May 1640 Saint-Cyran, for whom this problem was actually of little practical importance, announced that he was prepared to draft a letter relatively favorable to attritionism. By doing so, he deprived Richelieu of his main charge. Nevertheless Saint-Cyran remained in custody without a trial. His only hope was that the unhealthy conditions of his jail at Vincennes would soon destroy his fragile health. By now the Catholic circles among the public knew what was going on and public opinion turned against the cardinal. Saint-Cyran, on the other hand, having acquired an aura of martyrdom was able to initiate from his jail a voluminous correspondence which influenced an ever more significant group of pupils. Seriously ill and threatened by blindness he was repeatedly near death. Yet he was destined to outlive Richelieu, who passed away on 4 November 1642. Saint-Cyran was able to leave his jail on 6 February 1643. But he remained in ill health and died of apoplexy on 11 October, without having resumed his activities. Yet he left a number of pupils who continued his work.

The Beginnings of the Jansenist Conflict

The Bull In eminenti

It was foreseeable that the publication of Jansen's Augustinus would ultimately result in a renewed controversy regarding the question of grace. So no one, least of all the Louvain group, was caught unprepared; in fact, everyone had carefully prepared his position ahead of time. The Jesuits started the campaign by disregarding the prohibitions (1611 and 1625) of publications on the topic of grace, in which they had originally concurred without reservations. On 22 March 1641 lectures were read at the Jesuit college of Louvain in which Jansen was accused of renewing the errors of Calvin and Baius, of reducing human freedom to nothing and of limiting salvation to the chosen few.[9] These theses met with spirited rejoinders and innumerable polemics. Henceforth the faculties were split into Jansenists and anti-Jansenists.

France, too, was a ready battlefield for renewed strife. Saint-Cyran had hoped that of his pupils his nephew Martin Barcos

---

[9] See L. Ceyssens, "Le jansénisme, considérations historiques préliminaires à sa notion: Nuove ricerche storiche sul giansenismo," AnGr 21 (1954), 3–32.

(1600–1678), who had studied with Jansen in Louvain, would continue his work. But Barcos quickly proved to be very unsettled in his judgment.[10] Saint-Cyran's spiritual heir turned out to be the youngest brother of Mother Angélique, Antoine Arnauld (1612–94), whom posterity accorded the sobriquet Le Grand Arnauld. Initially a student of law, he turned to theology in 1632. For a long time Saint-Cyran was disappointed by the young man's exclusively intellectual and all too worldly ambitions although he demonstrated remarkable abilities all along. At that time the short works by Augustine against the Pelagians were hardly available, but through Jansen's good offices Saint-Cyran had gotten about twenty copies of the Louvain edition of 1555.[11] He gave one of them to young Arnauld and was amazed at the quickness and depth with which the latter grasped the main points of the treatise. For the baccalaureate in theology on 14 November 1635, Saint-Cyran had him defend some clearly Augustinian theses whose content was close to that of Augustinus. The defense proved quite successful; it demonstrated that Augustinianism continued to have enthusiastic adherents at the Sorbonne and provoked no polemics of any kind. In December 1638 Arnauld received the subdeaconate; shortly thereafter he converted to an intensive and challenging life of the spirit under the exclusive guidance of Saint-Cyran. The latter had him continue his studies at the Sorbonne, where he was awarded his doctorate on 18 December 1641. By that time Saint-Cyran had already called on him to defend his ideas in several publications.

Since Augustinians as well as Molinists had correspondents in Louvain, several copies of Augustinus were sent to France when it appeared in September 1640. The following November and December six Parisian professors gave their approval for a reprint which appeared in 1641 in Paris, followed by another one in Rouen in 1643. It was in the nature of things that violent polemics ensued between the detractors and defenders of Jansen. Among the latter there were groups whose defense of Augustinianism had by then become a tradition: Oratorians, Dominicans, Carmelites and numerous professors at the Sorbonne. But several professors joined the fray on the side of the anti-Jansenists, among whom the Jesuits played an especially significant role. Foremost among Jansen's opponents was Richelieu, who had never forgiven him for his Mars Gallicus. Richelieu was inclined toward Molinism; in his Instruction du Chrétien of 1619 he had supported attritionism, whereas Augustinus represented a lively defense of contritionism. Yet he did want to spare the Jesuits, several of whom were rendering him great political service at the time. Although he showed his sympathies openly, he was very late in giving the signal for the start of the battle. No doubt he was aware of the power of the Augustinian party.

---

[10] See J. Orcibal, "Martin de Barcos abbé de Saint-Cyran et sa correspondance," RHE 52 (1957), 877–99.

[11] D. Aurelii Augustini opera contra Pelagianos, 2 vols. (Louvian 1555).

By the end of 1640 Saint-Cyran, too, had in his jail a copy of Augustinus. But weakened by illness and in danger of going blind, he was unable to analyze the large folio systematically. Apparently he read only the table of contents and a few chapters. No doubt he derived his knowledge of the work primarily from analyses given him by Arnauld or Barcos. He had had no connection with Jansen since 1635, so he was not familiar with the final projections of the work, especially of the third volume, in which he was astonished to find an attack on attritionism. He had been unable to keep his original agreement with Jansen, namely to go over the work before it was published. Now he found it dry, harsh, incongruous with its subject matter and out of touch with the spiritual aspects of the problem. Nevertheless he acknowledged it as a well-founded presentation of the fundamentals of Augustinianism. A short time later, for the benefit of informing Arnauld d'Andilly, he expressed his own ideas about it in a small treatise De la grâce de Jésus-Christ.[12] The continuous development of the relationship of grace and incarnation shows him to be thematically closer to Bérulle than to Jansen. At any rate, he desired no hasty polemics and impressed this upon his pupils. He confined himself to promoting other Augustinian writings which complemented the works of Jansen. The Paris edition of Augustinus contained an appendix with a treatise by Conrius in which he maintained that children who die without the benefit of baptism were condemned to hell. Shortly thereafter appeared the Pélerin de Jéricho by the same author, a somber depiction of the humiliation of man after his Fall. At the same time a small treatise by Jansen, Oratorio de interioris hominis reformatione (1627) was printed and translated into French by Arnauld d'Andilly in 1642. This prompted the Jesuits to have the anti-Jansenist theses, presented at the University of Louvain in March 1641, reprinted. Shortly before his death Richelieu initiated the altercation by ordering Isaac Habert, canon and professor at the Sorbonne, to attack Jansen in his sermons. Habert complied in sermons at Notre-Dame on 30 November, 21 December and another the following Septuagesima Sunday. This last attack was especially vehement. Thereupon the prisoner of Vincennes decided to let Jansen's defenders break their silence and charged Arnauld with a reply to Habert. Arnauld, under the direction of Saint-Cyran, then composed his extensive Apologie pour M. Jansénius, but the intervention by President Molés and the archbishop of [12] Text: J. Orcibal, Spiritualité, 233–40.

---

Paris, François de Gondi, who preferred continued silence, delayed its publication until September 1644. They could not prevent the appearance meanwhile of numerous polemics. The Feuillant Pierre de Saint-Joseph attacked Jansen in his Défense de Saint Augustin. The Oratorian Collin du Juanet replied with Saint Augustin enseignant par lui-même, an interesting collection of texts indirectly justifying the Augustinus. At the same time Jacques Sirmond, a learned Jesuit well known as a specialist in Christian antiquity, attempted to prove that Augustine had been accused of the heresy of so-called predestinarianism. This caused a vehement controversy.

The Flemish Jesuits and the internuncio, Stravius, had reported to Rome concerning the events surrounding Augustinus even before its publication. But it is improbable that this affair had a strong effect on Urban VIII. He was an old man consumed by illness and scruples who occupied himself mainly with poetry and politics, concentrating his efforts on the glory of his family, the Barberini, and leaving the government to his nephew, Cardinal Francesco Barberini. The latter—since he had been unable to prevent the publication of Augustinus—at the very least wanted to silence those involved in the controversy. On 1 August 1641 he published through the Holy Office a decree which condemned Augustinus as well as the theses of the Jesuits and numerous other publications of both parties. But the council of Brabant raised several legal obstacles allowing the University of Louvain to suppress the decree, which was thus left without any practical significance. Then the Jesuits started a comprehensive campaign aimed at having the teaching of Augustinus explicitly condemned. Several lists of anathematizeable theses were sent to Cardinal Barberini, but the Holy Office refused to condemn them before studying the work itself. However, Barberini superseded this decision and condemned the work on the grounds that it reiterated sentences condemned by Pius V and Gregory XIII. A corresponding bull dated 6 March was proposed. It was probably authored by Francesco Albizzi, an assessor in the Holy Office who took an especially active part in this affair. But additional negotiations ensued in which the nuncio of Cologne, Fabio Chigi, took a significant part because he expected to gain from them a reputation as a peacemaker. These negotiations delayed the publication in Rome of the bull In eminenti[13] until 19 June 1643. The circumstances associated with its publication were very debatable. The Belgian Jesuits had received copies of the bull from their Roman brothers and published it on their own responsibility even before the nuncios had been appraised of it.

---

[13] Text: BullRom 15, 92; Text and French trans.: Recueil historique des bulles, 36–45; see L. Ceyssens, "Les origines romaines de la bulle In eminenti," Jansenistica 3, 7–110.

Antonio Bichi, internuncio in Brussels, who had succeeded Stravius in that office in July 1642 and his uncle, Fabio Chigi, nuncio in Cologne, were officially informed of the bull shortly thereafter and published it, but they amended their own text and dated it 1643. Other editions were circulated, again offering different variations. Under these conditions the Dutch public for a while even doubted the authenticity of the bull. When it was finally recognized, the text contained so many doctrinal and juridical difficulties that in Flanders it was not effectively published until 1651.[14]

In Louvain the dean of theology, Schickelius, who had been won over to anti-Jansenism, tried to have the bull accepted before its publication. But he failed because most of his colleagues considered its motives erroneous, especially the assertion that Augustinus had stirred up trouble in the Church.[15] In order to change the Pope's decision, the Jansenists, in the name of the University of Louvain and the Brabant states, sent two representatives, Johannes Sinnich and Cornelius de Paepe, to Rome, where they arrived on 24 October 1643.[16] But this delegation proved useless since the Holy Office, in which Albizzi ruled supreme, let it be known at once that the bull would not be revised under any circumstances. De Paepe died in Rome. Sinnich received an audience with Urban VIII in the course of which the venerable Pope acknowledged that it was his intention not to have Jansen named in the bull. This indirectly implicated Albizzi as being responsible for the actual authorship of the bull. Taken aback by this development, Albizzi had the bull confirmed by a decree of the Holy Office on 16 June 1644.[17] Urban VIII died on 29 July 1644 and was succeeded by Innocent X (Pamfili). In several briefs[18] he demanded execution of the bull, but in reality he would have preferred to have things drag on. Sinnich returned to Louvain empty-handed in September 1645. The situation in the Netherlands gradually calmed down. It was in France that this matter was to take a decisive turn.

For some obscure reasons, the nuncio of Paris, Cardinal Hieronymus Grimaldi, did not receive his copy of the bull In eminenti which had been dispatched on 10 June 1643; the official documents regarding this problem did not reach him until September. In the meantime, the Jesuits of Rouen had had the text of the bull printed, which had already been disseminated by their fellow Jesuits in Flanders. But the numerous absurdities in it at first caused even Grimaldi to consider this publication a forgery. Arnauld, advised by Saint-Cyran, now gathered all possible arguments against the authenticity of the bull. These appeared in his Premières and Secondes observations sur la bulle in August 1643 and made a strong impression on public opinion. In the fall, after the authenticity of the bull had been acknowledged conclusively, the delegates from Louvain arrived in Paris on their way to Rome and coordinated their moves with the French Jansenists. With the help of efficacious parliamentary support Jansen's followers succeeded in preventing the adoption in France both of the bull and the decree of 16 June 1644. This was at the beginning of the regency of Anne of Austria and the unsettled state of the country marked by Mazarin's rise to power provided the Jansenists with opportunities for wide-ranging action. In September 1644 Arnauld circulated his Première apologie pour M. Jansenius; he followed it with a second in reply to renewed attacks by Habert. At the same time Arnauld replied to a Jesuit polemic against Saint-Cyran in his Apologie pour M. de Saint-Cyran, the first two parts of which had been composed by Lemaistre in 1639. It touches upon several problems of the doctrine of grace. But the basic problems of doctrine in Augustinus were hardly referred to at that time.

---

[14] Idem, "L'impasse de la bulle In eminenti en les années 1646–1649." A Praem 31 (1955), 227–52; 32 (1956), 5–59.

[15] Idem, "L'enquête officielle faite en 1644 sur le scandale causé par l'Augustinus," AFrH 43 (1950), 68–160.

[16] See Sinnich's report to the Louvain faculty in L. Ceyssens, "Verslag over de eerste Jansenistiche deputatie van Leuven te Rome, Bulletin de l'Institut historique belge de Rome 22 (1942), 31–111.

[17] Text, Recueil historique des bulles, 49.

[18] See the brief to Governor Castelrodrigo, ibid., 55–58.

This unstable period was above all affected by conflicts kindled by Arnauld's De la Fréquente communion. This voluminous quarto had originally been nothing more than a very brief refutation of an essay published in 1641 by the Jesuit Sesmaisons, who presented ideas regarding penance and the Eucharist which were diametrically opposed to those of Saint-Cyran. With the aid of Saint-Cyran, Arnauld's work had grown into a comprehensive defense of Saint-Cyran's theses concerning the practice of "renewals," which later were represented as a return to the discipline of the early Church. This in turn had to please the representatives of the milieu dévot and of the Counter-Reformation. In August 1643 the work appeared with an approbation by fifteen bishops and twenty-one professors. It triggered a spirited exchange of charge and countercharge; Father Nouet attacked it vehemently in sermons at the Jesuit professed house in Paris. Arnauld countered in 1644 by publishing a copious collection of texts translated by Lemaistre, La tradition de l'Église sur le sujet de la pénitence et de la communion. But governmental circles where Mazarin's anti-Jansenism was gaining ground were not well-disposed towards Arnauld. Mazarin considered himself to be in a position to initiate rapport with the Holy Sea by ordering Arnauld and Barcos personally to defend the work in Rome. Arnauld and Barcos preferred to withdraw from Mazarin's immediate sphere of influence, but the Gallican circles protested against the decision, which in the last instance remained inconsequential. Those bishops who had given their approval felt involved by the controversy and brought the matter before the Holy See through a letter of 5 April 1644. A professor of the Sorbonne who had been one of those who had given their approval also was dispatched to Rome. By the time he returned in 1646,[19] the Holy Office had examined the book thoroughly and declined to censure it. In 1647 it merely condemned—without reference to the work—one sentence from the preface written by Barcos. It speaks of Peter and Paul as two heads of the Church, but who are one.[20] Parallel to this quarrel, which actually was a mere diversion, the first attacks against the laxism of the Jesuit theory of morality in the Théologie morale des jésuites (coauthored by Arnauld and Hallier, a professor at the Sorbonne, whose arguments were later to be reiterated by the Provinciales) began.

The Five Theses and the Bull Cum occasione

By 1645 it became obvious that Mazarin was exercising complete control over the queen regent and was continuing Richelieu's policies, including the latter's anti-Jansenist orientation. At court several of the friends of Port-Royal grasped the situation and changed their position. Those who remained loyal to Port-Royal were considered part of the opposition and were excluded. Arnauld d'Andilly himself ended his secular career and in 1646 withdrew from court. Vincent de Paul, a member of the Conseil de Conscience since 1643 and formerly a friend of Saint-Cyran, to whom he was indebted for many services, no longer dared oppose his fellow councilors; in 1648 he came out against Jansenism. Several others thought it wise to do the same. Finally Port-Royal remained the last bastion of resistance, which first Mazarin and then Louis XIV sought to reduce. For several years there were mere superficial quarrels in which the Jansenists were prominently represented by Arnauld, Barcos, and the Oratorian P. Desmares, and the anti-Jansenists by Habert and the Jesuits Deschamps and Pinthereau. The latter managed to procure some of the papers confiscated in Saint-Cyran's apartments and from 1646 to 1655 he published skillfully chosen excerpts from them, supplemented by an exceedingly dishonest commentary. In this manner he provided posterity with a wealth of valuable documents. By 1649 the stage was set for a massive attack on [19] The report written by Bourgeois was published in 1695 through the efforts of Quesnel, see A. Arnauld, Œuvres 18, 665–734.

---

[20] Text of the decree: Recueil historique des bulles, 59–63.

Jansen. At a meeting of the Sorbonne on 1 July 1649 the syndic Nicolas Cornet, without reference to a particular work, submitted the following seven propositions to be examined:

1. Some of God's commandments cannot be followed by the righteous with the help of those powers available to them in the present state even if they want to follow them. Neither do they have the grace which would make it possible for them to be followed.
2. In the state of fallen nature inner grace never meets resistance.
3. In the state of fallen nature merit or demerit does not require man's freedom from inner compulsion; freedom from outer constraint is sufficient.
4. The Semi-Pelagians admitted the necessity of antecedent inner grace for the individual acts, also for the beginning of faith. Their error was to maintain that human will could resist or obey this grace.
5. It is Semi-Pelagian to assert that Christ has died or shed his blood for all men.
6. The acts of disbelievers are sins.
7. The Church earlier believed that the Sacrament of Penance was not sufficient for secret sins.

Immediately a stormy and chaotic discussion ensued, in the course of which several professors asserted that the present intention was to condemn the teachings of Augustine under the name of Jansen. In spite of the opposition of seventy of the participants a commission was charged with the examination requested by Cornet. A short time later Arnauld made public his Considérations sur l'enterprise faite par Maître Nicolas Cornet, in which he declared the formulation of the propositions to be deliberately ambiguous. In as much as a superficial reading could make them appear to have a heretical meaning, they could—from the Augustinian viewpoint—be taken in a completely orthodox sense. In the end, an appeal based on misuse of authority filed by sixty-one professors gave President Molé an opportunity to impose on both parties a four-month armistice which was honored only in the breach. The situation at the Sorbonne was further complicated by the fact that professors belonging to a religious order were each given a vote, whereas the old rules limited this right to only two representatives of each order so that block voting in accordance with instructions by the order could be avoided. Under these conditions it was impossible to compose and publish a censure of the propositions. Recourse to the Holy See, suggested earlier by the Roman Jesuits, now appeared unavoidable. This coincided with Rome's desire not to have such an important issue left up to the Sorbonne.

Towards the end of 1650, Isaac Habert, by now bishop of Vabres, wrote to Innocent X, submitting to him the first five propositions and vaguely ascribing them to Jansen.[21] For this letter the anti-Jansenists collected the signatures of bishops and when it was sent to Rome early in 1651 there were seventy-eight, another fifteen signatures were added later. At that time the French episcopate totaled about one hundred and thirty bishops. Arnauld countered the letter by arguments similar to those used in his reply to Nicolas Cornet. The episcopate also had supporters of Jansen, among them Henri Arnauld, bishop of Angers and brother of the Great Arnauld. At the meeting of clergy from February to March 1651 several bishops protested to the nuncio against Habert's action. A little later eleven participants wrote a letter to Innocent X, an action which later gained the support of two more bishops. Saint-Amour, a professor at the Sorbonne who happened to be in Rome, was willing to represent their cause and presented the letter on 10 July 1651. In the following months other Jansenist delegates came to Rome. The anti-Jansenists, too, initially represented there by the Franciscan Mulard, sent three more emissaries in April 1652. All signs pointed to a long wait for a decision. Meanwhile the conflict again turned to less important matters. One of them involved the appearance of a Catéchisme de la grâce by the Jansenist Feydear; another was provoked by the teachings of Alphonse Le Moyne, an anti-Jansenist professor at the Sorbonne whom Arnauld opposed by his Apologie pour les saints Pères, one of his best works. Other incidents concerned the convent of Port-Royal, whose father confessor, Antoine Singlin, was prohibited from preaching in 1649. In a pamphlet by the Jesuit Brisacier, Le jansénisme confondu (1651) the convent also was accused of surreptitious Calvinism.

From the start, the Jansenist delegation in Rome made the mistake of demanding convocations with public discussions similar to the congregations De Auxiliis, while Innocent X wanted to be the sole judge in this issue. The precise details of these tiresome negotiations can be perused in Saint-Amour's Journal.[22] In April 1651 a commission of cardinals was formed; in September 1652 another commission, consisting of theologians, dealt with the matter. There was only one Jesuit member and it was distinguished by the remarkable manner in which the Franciscan Luke Wadding[23] defended Jansen. The two delegations were empowered to send briefs to the commission, but were not allowed official meetings with each other. They were received in audience very rarely and even then only separately. Several extremely interesting polemical writings originated at that time, especially the Écrit à trois colonnes[24] which was handed to the commission by Jansen's supporters on the occasion of their last audience on 19 May 1653. It is extremely significant if one is to understand Jansenist thought. For each of the five propositions it distinguishes between orthodox and heretical meaning and also lists the opposing Molinist position. In reality political factors had a decisive part in the negotiations. On the one hand, Rome did not want to change its mind and retract the bull In eminenti. On the other hand, the Holy See—very sensitive on the issue of Gallicanism—had been well disposed to the appeal by the anti-Jansenist bishops and was prepared to allow them to emerge victorious especially since they represented a large majority of the episcopate. After all, Mazarin, with whom good contacts were desired, had come out openly against Jansenism and in 1651 had even sent to Rome a letter signed by the young King Louis XIV. Given these conditions, another condemnation of Jansen was unavoidable and indeed it seems as though the responsible circles in Rome never thought of an alternative. Here and there certain representatives wanted orthodox Augustinianism to be excepted explicitly from the condemnation, but this was not done. The bull Cum occasione, dated 31 May 1653 and published on 3 June, condemned without reservations the five propositions which it ascribed to Jansen, the first four as heretical, the fifth one as erroneous.[25] This bull was a complete victory for the anti-Jansenists. In Flanders it was accepted without difficulties. The Jansenists, hit hard by the recent censures of the archbishop of Mechelen and the bishop of Ghent and much weakened by the deaths in quick succession of Calenus and Froidmont (February, October 1653, respectively), resisted but feebly. Indeed Louvain was no longer the home of the Jansenist party: it was now Paris.[26]

---

[21] Habert's letter can be found in Recueil historique, 74–77.

[22] Saint-Amour kept a diary of his negotiations; it was edited by Arnauld and published in 1662.

[23] See L. Ceyssens, "Florence Conry," cf n. 2.

---

[24] The "Écrit à trois colonnes" is in the appendix of the Journal de M. de Saint-Amour (n. p. 1662).

[25] Text: BullRom 15, 720: Text and French trans.: Recueil historique des bulles, 79–86; see D 2001–07.

[26] L. Ceyssens, "La publication aux Pays-Bas de la seconde bulle contre Jansénius," Augustiniana 7 (1957), 196–240, 389–426, 576–93.

CHAPTER 3

The Jansenist Conflict to 1713

The quaestio juris and the quaestio facti
The Provinciales

The bull Cum occasione no doubt represented a victory for the anti-Jansenists, since Mazarin exerted his own efforts at having the bull accepted throughout France. An order to this effect was addressed to parliament and the clergy by means of a royal declaration dated 4 July 1653. Mazarin had the bull acknowledged in the name of the whole clergy by the twenty-eight bishops present in Paris at that time and shortly thereafter the Sorbonne was also forced to accept it. But a few bishops published it with certain reservations by means of which they sought to save orthodox Augustinianism. Port-Royal found itself in an especially difficult situation. The Fronde had become weaker and weaker. In the most recent disturbances the people of Port-Royal, while proving their absolute loyalty to the crown, had clearly shown their antipathy towards Mazarin, the real victor. In addition, there is no doubt that several pamphlets by the coadjutor of Paris, the future Cardinal Retz, had been edited by the men of Port-Royal. It is therefore understandable that the Jansenists at first took refuge in silence. But the clumsy triumph of their adversaries enabled them to come out into the open again. First they responded to a tasteless cartoon in an almanac which appeared in 1654. In it Jansen and his pupils are depicted throwing themselves into the arms of Calvin. Sacy replied to it with a long satirical poem Enluminures du fameux almanach des jésuites. In February 1654 the Jesuit Father François Annat, the King's father confessor, published a polemic with the title Chicanes des Jansénistes asserting that the Pope in his last bull had intended not even to spare the teachings of Saint Augustine. He also maintained that the five propositions had been taken literally from the Augustinus. In March Arnauld responded with three essays which represented a manifesto of the new Jansenist point of view. First he cleared up the question of the so-called quaestio facti; he proved that only the first proposition is contained in the Augustinus but in a context proving it to be orthodox. He goes on to prove that the rest of the propositions might have summarized other passages of the work, but that these, too, are de facto orthodox and reflect only Augustinian thinking. Finally, he cites propositions from the Augustinus which pronounce the opposite of those that were condemned. Arnauld concludes that while the propositions with a heretical meaning were justifiably condemned by Innocent X, they were in their heterodox meaning not ascribable to Jansen.

But Arnauld could not actually reach public opinion. In a conference of thirty-eight bishops of 9 March 1654, Mazarin prevailed with a text which acknowledged the condemnation of the propositions as reflecting Jansen's ideas. In a rejoinder of 29 September Innocent X issued a brief with the same objective.[1] On 15 January 1655 Mazarin forced a conference of 15 bishops to have all the clergy and female branches of orders sign a formulary condemning Jansen. But in order not to aggravate the situation, this measure was not immediately implemented. Once again the actual doctrinal issue was not resolved. The Jesuit Étienne Deschamps revived it in his voluminous treatise De l'hérésie jansénienne (1654). By means of a formulary, later taken up by Bossuet, he tried to prove that the five propositions were the core of Augustinus, but he had absolutely no success. The pamphlets then turned to the realm of politics. In his Relation juridique (1654) the publicist Filleau de la Chaise spread the falsehood that a meeting had taken place in 1620 at the Carthusian monastery of Bourgfontaine in the course of which Jansen, Saint-Cyran, and others had articulated a plan to introduce deism and to destroy belief in the Eucharist. At the same time the royal almoner Marandé made an effort in his Inconvénients d'état to represent the Jansenists as dangerous opponents of the authority of the state.

Another incident soon heated up the conflict again. On 1 February 1655 the vicar of Saint-Sulpice, Picoté, refused absolution to the duke of Liancourt because of the duke's well-known relations with Port-Royal.[2] Picoté was supported in his stand by the famous Jean-Jacques Olier, pastor of Saint-Sulpice, who was extremely hostile towards Jansenism. This incident attracted much attention and even the intercession by Vincent de Paul came to nought. Three weeks later Arnauld made the issue public through his Lettre à une personne de condition, which his adversaries countered with about ten pamphlets. It took Arnauld four months, until 10 July 1655, to reply to them in his Seconde lettre à un duc et pair, which is actually an extensive work summarizing the position of French Jansenism with a remarkable degree of clarity. He accepts without reservation the condemnation of the heresy contained in the five propositions, but he considers it preferable not to comment as to whether or not they should be attributed to Jansen. He adds that he had not discovered them in a close reading of Augustinus. Then he vigorously attacks the Molinist concept of gratia sufficiens citing Peter and his denial of the Lord as an example of a righteous person who sinned because he was lacking in grace. Arnauld's opponents immediately sought to have him condemned because of the last two propositions concerning the Augustinus and Peter. Arnauld wanted to anticipate them by bringing the issue before the Holy See by a letter of 27 August. Nonetheless it was placed on the agenda of a meeting of the Sorbonne on 4 November. It took place in spite of protests by Arnauld, who asked in vain for a hearing and just as unsuccessfully multiplied his written justifications to the assembly. An initial censure was pronounced on 14 January 1655 under circumstances so contrary to the rules that sixty professors withdrew from the Sorbonne. Nevertheless Arnauld was expelled from the Sorbonne on 15 February. In his defense he was supported by a young theologian from Chartres, Pierre Nicole (1625–95), who from then on played a significant role in the quarrel over Jansenism. Unfortunately Arnauld and Nicole only spoke the language of theologians. Whereas their extraordinary level of erudition in this field assured them of a hearing among their kind, their works hardly met with a response from the general public. At this time, however, as Mazarin's position was gradually weakening, the actual problem was on the level of public opinion. Then, even before the final condemnation of Arnauld, Port-Royal found a man who was uniquely suited to help them out: Blaise Pascal (1623–62).

---

[1] Letter and brief: Recueil historique des bulles, 120–131.

[2] See the duke's authentic report: "Une relation authentique du duc de Liancourt," Documents d'Histoire 3 (March 1912), 90–96.

Up to this time the recluses of Port-Royal[3] had considered Blaise Pascal (Chap. 6) a young man of the world, occupied with the sciences, a recent convert who was friendly towards the convent in which his younger sister Jacqueline had lived as a nun since January 1652. When Arnauld, Nicole, and he were in Port-Royal des Champs in January 1656, a casual invitation by Arnauld prompted him to lend his literary ability to a polemic which was intended for society at large and not for specialists. On 23 January 1656 the Provinciales came into being. This first letter to a friend in the country was an enormous success and initiated a new episode in the conflict. The collaborators quickly found that they were on the right path and so another seventeen Provinciales were issued in the course of a little more than a year, the last one dated 24 March 1657. This campaign, being rather dangerous, forced Arnauld, Nicole, and Pascal to go into hiding in order to evade a lettre de cachet which would have sent them to the Bastille. The printing, too, was done in hiding and successfully evaded every police investigation. In spite of the dangerous conditions the Provinciales, starting with the fifth letter, were printed in 6,000 copies, at that time an unusually large circulation.[4] Attesting to the lasting nature of their success is the fact that three editions in one volume appeared between 1657 and 1659. For a long time the public was left to guess about the author; not until 1659 did the fact of Pascal's authorship gradually become known.

---

[3] See L. Cognet, "Le jugement de Port-Royal sur Pascal," Blaise Pascal, l'homme et l'œuvre (Paris 1956), 11–30.

[4] See L. Parcé, "La réimpression des premieres Provinciales," Pascal, textes du tricentenaire (Paris 1963), 142–59.

Pascal collaborated closely with Arnauld and Nicole; he lent the magic of his incomparable style to the documentation and arguments of the two specialists. He also made use of numerous polemic writings which had appeared earlier and whose contents were now made known to the broad public. Yet he did not meet with complete agreement at Port-Royal; Mother Angélique and Singlin considered this campaign to be irreconcilable with Christian love. With the fifth Provinciale—after Arnauld was defeated at the Sorbonne—Pascal counterattacked. Taking up an old polemic, he assailed the laxist morality of the Jesuit casuists. With this topic he found himself on favorable terrain. Rigorism in morality was indeed not only inherited by Port-Royal, but widespread as well among the best representatives of the clergy and among the faithful. By identifying the Jesuits with laxism, Pascal discredited the Society of Jesus to such an extent that they could never quite overcome it. The conflict thus introduced was to continue far beyond the Provinciales. The secular clergy took up the fight again by means of the Écrits des Curés de Paris, in which Pascal also collaborated. This led to a number of decrees by the Holy Office under Alexander VII (1665, 1666) and Innocent XI (1679),[5] which condemned 110 laxist propositions; 50 of them were indirectly from the Provinciales. Unfortunately Pascal had no congenial adversary in the opposite camp. Aside from several replies by individual anti-Jansenists, the Jesuits after the sixth letter published collaborative retorts whose main authors were probably Fathers Annat and Nouet, the latter an excellent writer in the field of spirituality, but merely an average polemicist. These retorts, discussing a boundless wealth of details from the casuist texts quoted by Pascal, were indeed mediocre. But they benefitted Pascal since they gave the impression to the public that the Jesuits were actually identifying themselves with these controversial casuistic positions. The tone of the Provinciales became increasingly sharper and more vehement; the last two addressed directly to Father Annat are especially caustic. But this did not prevent a Parisian Jesuit, Georges Pirot, from publishing a clumsy Apologie des casuistes in December 1657, which by provoking spirited disapproval further weakened the Jesuit position.

The Provinciales indeed had great influence on the public; this is reflected in the letters of Mme de Sévigné and the physician Guy Patin. Public opinion was also agitated by the famous miracle of the holy thorn which occurred on 24 March at Port-Royal, where Pascal's niece, Marguerite Périer, was healed from a lachrymal fistula by means of a thorn from the Holy Crown. In spite of objections by the Jesuits this was generally seen as a sign in favor of Port-Royal. But none of this changed the attitude of the prominent circles. Mazarin, as well as Chancellor Séguier, irritated more than ever by the Provinciales, made increasing attempts to eliminate Jansenism. Innocent X, of a rather more indifferent nature, never wanted to get seriously involved in this fight. When he died on 7 January 1655 he was succeeded by the former nuncio of Cologne, Fabio Chigi, a decided anti-Jansenist who acceeded to the papal throne as Alexander VII. As of the end of 1655, a new bull concerning Jansen was being prepared, but initially kept secret in order to be issued at some advantageous point in time. In the summer of 1654 the French assembly of the clergy pressured by Mazarin again ordered signing of the formulary against Jansen and by an official letter to Alexander VII, dated 2 September, requested a definitive decision in the quaestio facti.[6] The Holy See considered this a favorable moment: on 16 October 1656 the bull Ad sacram[7] was officially signed. A nuncio extraordinary, Piccolomini, took it to Paris the following January, but various negotiations delayed its official delivery to the King until 2 March 1657. Mazarin, on 17 March, forced the Assembly of the Clergy to accept. Parliament put off its acceptance for a while longer and it took a formal court day on 29 November to break its resistance (Chap. 7).

---

[5] Text of Alexander VII's decrees: BullRom 17, 387–389, 427–428; D 2021–65; Innocent XI's BullRom 19, 145–149, D 2101–67.

The Formulary

The bull Ad sacram caused a violent outbreak of emotion in France. For the Jansenists it represented another defeat and forced them into formulating a new position. Arnauld and Nicole dealt with this problem in various writings published between April and August 1657. In the quaestio juris, that is concerning the heresy contained in the five propositions, Arnauld came out in full agreement with the papal condemnation. But in the quaestio facti, that is concerning the actual presence of the five propositions in the Augustinus, he presented the view that the Pope was simply in error. He maintained that this was entirely possible since the Church was not infallible in nonrevealed facts. On this point he thus refused his inner concurrence and obliged himself to a mere "reverential silence." But this attitude on the part of Arnauld and Nicole did not meet with complete agreement by Port-Royal. Several thought that in the last analysis the condemnation of the five propositions redounded upon Augustinianism as such and that it should therefore be opposed without reservation, even at the price of a schism. The major proponents of this extremist group were the bishop of Alet, Nicolas Pavillon, who was widely revered because of the holiness of his life, and the abbot of Haute-Fontaine, Guillaume Le Roy. Yet others held Arnauld's tactical comments to be absurd. Proceeding from the concept of an unalterably evil world in which it is impossible to defend the truth, they thought it better to submit to the papal condemnations and to leave to God's care the victory of His cause. Barcos, the nephew of Saint-Cyran, was a central figure of this group. But by virtue of his theological authority, Arnauld's ideas were clearly given preeminence.

---

[6] Letter: Recueil historique des bulles, 136–43.

[7] Text of the bull: BullRom 16, 247, see D 2010–12; text and French trans.: Recueil historique des bulles, 144–149.

For Mazarin, anti-Jansenism had actually been above all an argument intended to secure papal neutrality in the conflict with Spain. Having reached this goal he was no longer intent upon a crisis. But after his death (9 March 1661) Louis XIV personally took charge of the battle. Pursued by the specter of the Fronde he was determined to do away with all the sources of opposition which endangered national unity. His determination had a bearing upon both Jansenism and Protestantism. Yet on this point the King, who was not very intelligent and indeed very ignorant in religious matters, was totally in the hands of his Jesuit confessors. On 20 February 1661 the bishops of the Assembly of the Clergy had again taken up the issue of the formulary and had asked Alexander VII for his approbation.[8] On 23 April a decree by the Council of State relentlessly demanded the signing of the formulary and in doing so forced the Jansenists to take a stand. Arnauld declared himself ready to sign the formulary, but only if his distinction between the quaestio juris and the quaestio facti were appended to it. The two vicars general who were administering the Paris diocese in the absence of their archbishop, the famous Cardinal Retz, who had fled, accepted Arnauld's condition. On 8 June 1661 a pastoral letter probably edited by Pascal himself prescribed the signing with the added distinction, which satisfied the group around Arnauld. But faced with opposition by official circles they had to retract the pastoral letter on 31 October and instead to demand the signing without any reservation. Thus Port-Royal was driven to refusal.

At this point the convent and its friends had already suffered severe agitation against them. By 23 April the postulants and pupils had been removed. The spiritual leaders and confessors as well as the most prominent recluses were to be exiled by lettres de cachet or imprisoned, but they managed to flee, pursued by the authorities. Later, in May [8] Text: ibid, 151–65.

---

1666, the police with the aid of an informant succeeded in arresting the nephew of Mother Angélique, Isaac Lemaistre de Sacy, who was subsequently jailed in the Bastille till October 1668. The nuns were prohibited from flight by their monastic confinement and were therefore in the midst of the situation. Naturally none of them had ever read the Augustinus and only three or four of them, such as Angélique de Saint-Jean Arnauld d'Andilly, the niece of Mother Angélique, had even had any theological education. But their reverence for Saint-Cyran absolutely convinced them of Jansen's orthodoxy. So a majority of them rejected any signing of the formulary, even a conditional one, and on this point stood in opposition to Arnauld. Mother Angélique died in August 1661; in the course of the summer passionate internal disagreements erupted at Port-Royal. The resistance was led by Angélique de Saint-Jean and Jacqueline Pascal. But when the pastoral letter by the vicars general was retracted Arnauld and the nuns again agreed in their unqualified refusal to sign. A short time later the archbishop of Paris, Retz, resigned; his successor, Pierre de Marca, died four months later without having occupied the bishopric. Thereupon Louis XIV appointed his former teacher Hardouin de Péréfixe. But in July 1662 some difficulties arose between France and the Holy See. As a result Péréfixe had to wait one and a half years for his bull of investiture and the events centered upon Port-Royal were left in abeyance. There were some who understood that compromise was preferable to the continued conflict. Among them was the bishop of Comminges, Gilbert de Choiseul, who attempted to reconcile the parties in 1663, but the respective views concerning the quaestio facti proved irreconcilable.

In April 1664 Péréfixe finally became archbishop of Paris. At once irascible and good natured, an average theologian, he was convinced that he could easily overcome the Jansenist resistance. On 8 June 1664 he issued a pastoral letter which acknowledged the distinction between de jure and de facto by demanding the divine faith for the quaestio juris and a simple "human faith" for the quaestio facti. But this could only half satisfy the theologians of Port-Royal, who were unwilling to go beyond the "reverential silence" in the quaestio facti. Nicole was entrusted with the reply and in his Lettres sur l'hérésie imaginaire and other pamphlets he sharply rejected the archbishop's view. Péréfixe, beside himself, took his revenge on the nuns. On 21 and 26 August, after two dramatic visits at the convent of Paris, he had twelve of them deported to other convents. Among them were Angélique de Saint-Jean and the aged Mother Agnès. In Paris and at the convent of des Champs the nuns were refused the sacraments and were placed under police supervision. The incredible moral torture brought about by such coercion on the part of the archbishop and his people finally made twelve of the nuns sign the formulary, but some of them renounced it later. Reports about these events written by the nuns immediately afterwards and smuggled outside were published. They created a great stir, for the archbishop had frequently been compromised by his intemperate disposition. Furthermore the Apologie pour les religieuses de Port-Royal, composed at the beginning of 1665 by Arnauld and Nicole, brought all the events before the public. Through one of the nuns who had signed, the "traitoress" Flavie Passart, Péréfixe had found out about the internal tensions at Port-Royal and wanted to make use of them with the help of the publicist Desmaret de Saint-Sorlin. But Nicole succeeded in neutralizing the latter by ridiculing his exaggerated mysticism in the Visionnaires. The small number of signatures he had gotten from the nuns was a serious defeat for the archbishop. In an attempt to stabilize the situation, those nuns who refused to sign were gathered at Port-Royal des Champs and guarded by a police unit, while those who had signed stayed in Paris with a special abbess, Dorothée Perdreau. But neither of these measures solved the problem.

In the meantime Alexander VII had responded to the wishes of the French clergy by issuing in February 1665 the bull Regiminis apostolici, which also ordered the signing of a formulary.[9] But the bull only made matters worse because four bishops published it together with a clear distinction between the quaestio juris and the quaestio facti and in doing so openly took the side of Port-Royal. Among them were Henri Arnauld and Nicolas Pavillon. The Courts of France and Rome were equally annoyed. Father Annat considered the possibility of asking the Pope to remove the four bishops, but this idea had to be given up in order not to provoke the opposition of the entire episcopate, who would not have tolerated such a measure. In January 1667 the Holy See appointed a commission to initiate a trial against the dissidents. This prompted an immediate declaration of solidarity by nineteen bishops; twenty more entered a protest against the papal action. But Clement IX, a peaceful man, who had succeeded Alexander VII as Pope, desired reconciliation (see Chap. 7). Louis XIV, having also recognized that war with Holland was unavoidable, wanted to settle the religious quarrels and reunite the kingdom. In 1668 Nuncio Bargellini was charged with the task of seeking ways to reach an agreement. The Jesuits were excluded from the negotiations in which Gondrin, archbishop of Sens, Ligny, bishop of Meaux, and Vialart, bishop of Châlons, played a decisive role. In the summer of 1668 there was reason for hope. It was agreed that the four bishops in question were to write to the Pope pledging to publish the bull Regiminis apostolici again and to have it signed in their dioceses. The Pope on his part was to tolerate tacitly that the signing would be performed through protocols which—theoretically secret, but in reality generally known—would make the distinction between de facto and de jure. The group of people around Arnauld and Nicole who tended more towards the status of a moderate third party was completely satisfied with this agreement, but not so the extremists of the two opposing parties. A council decree of 23 October 1668 and a brief by Clement IX of 14 January 1669 gave the Clementine Peace official sanction. But the nuns of Port-Royal, still tortured by the same doubts as before, could not decide in favor. Urged by Sacy, they finally signed on 15 February 1669 and were ceremoniously admitted to receive the sacraments.

---

[9] Text of the bull: BullRom 17, 336, see D 2020; text and French trans.: Recueil historique des bulles, 223–30.

The Clementine Peace

For almost thirty years the Clementine Peace, imperfect though it was, brought to an end the doctrinal controversies and accorded Port-Royal its last quiet decade. During this period the old convent had loyal and highly placed friends; it was cared for and protected by the former heroine of the Fronde, the duchess de Longueville, cousin to the King. But all this could not but displease Louis XIV, who continued to see in this circle a source of opposition against his absolutism. Yet he was intent on letting nothing happen that could reignite the conflicts.

The people of Port-Royal were now in a position to turn their intellectual endeavors to peaceful areas, in which they had excelled earlier, among them the subject of spirituality. A decision was made to research the documents left by the great deceased, to emend them and make them available to the public. At the beginning of 1670, Pascal's Pensées appeared, followed in 1671 by two volumes of the Considérations sur les dimanches et les fêtes, excerpts from the notes of Saint-Cyran, whose Lettres chrétiennes et spirituelles was reissued in Louvain in 1679. Also published were original works such as the Traités de Piété by the physician of Port-Royal, M. Hamon (1617) and the Essais de Morale by Nicole (1671). Translations were also published, among them Teresa of Ávila (1670), John of Ávila (1673) and many others. Port-Royal strove to make biblical texts accessible to the faithful. During the last crisis in 1667 the group had published a translation from the Greek of the New Testament. Called the Nouveau Testament de Mons[10] after its place of origin, it owes its existence primarily to Arnauld, Nicole and Sacy.

---

[10] See E. Hublard, Le Nouveau Testament de Mons, histoire d'un livre (Mons 1914); E. Jacques, "Les sympathies jansénistes à Mons à la fin du XVII^{e} siècle, Annales du Cercle archéologique de Mons 66 (1965–67) 249–309.

Although it was a precise and elegant translation, it provoked a violent polemic and was put on the Index in 1668. Sacy—while jailed at the Bastille—had started work on a translation of the Vulgate which he began publishing together with commentaries from the church Fathers. After his death in 1684 his pupils concluded the work. The liturgical translations of Port-Royal—Heures de Port-Royal and Office de Saint-Sacrement (1659) had several revised reprints. Finally the group also turned to polemicizing against the Calvinists, Arnauld and Nicole collaborating with Bossuet. It is possible that Arnauld even had a significant hand in the Expositions de la doctrine de l'Église catholique published by Bossuet in 1671. Nicole—although collaborating with Arnauld—was the main author of Perpétuité de la foi de l'Église catholique touchant l'Eucharistie, an imposing work whose first volume appeared in 1669.

In reality both sides knew that the peace thus maintained was very fragile and several incidents clearly demonstrated the true sentiments of the court. In 1675 Henri Arnauld was accused of not permitting the unqualified signing of the formulary in his diocese of Angers. For this Louis XIV reprimanded him through the Edict of Camp de Ninove (30 May 1676). The King was very annoyed in the beginning of 1677 when a memorandum authored by Nicole and signed by two bishops submitted several laxist propositions to the new Pope Innocent XI. But most of all it was the unpleasant regalia quarrel between Louis XIV and the Holy See going on since 1675, in which Arnauld unequivocally sided with the Holy See against the King.[11] When the Treaty of Nijmegen had ended the war and the duchess of Longueville died on 15 April 1679 Louis XIV decided to liquidate Port-Royal without, however, causing the doctrinal quarrels to be rekindled. On 16 May the confessors, pupils, and novices were removed from the convent, an action which condemned it to die out. Arnauld, fearing for his freedom, left the country in June 1679. Although Innocent XI had a retirement home and probably also a cardinalate offered to him, he rejected this solution because it would make it impossible for him to return to France. After a long period of indecision he took up residence in Brussels, where he died on 8 August 1694, having continued polemics against the Jesuits and later on against Malebranche and his ideas of grace. Nicole, who had gone into exile with Arnauld, received the support of the new archbishop of Paris, Harlay de Champvallon, which enabled him to return to France in 1683. But he no longer participated in the conflicts with the Jesuits and because of this the party looked upon him to some extent as a turncoat.

---

[11] See A. Latreille, "Innocent XI pape janséniste, directeur de conscience de Louis XIV," Cahiers d'histoire [publications of the universities of Grenoble, Lyon, and Clermont-Ferrand], 1 (1956), 9–39.

In 1685 Arnauld received two Oratorians in Brussels who had been forced to leave France because of their Augustinian convictions. The younger of the two, Jacques-Joseph Du Guet (1649–1733), was soon forced by ill health to return home, where he began a career as a religious writer. The other, Pasquier Quesnel (1634–1719) (See Chap. 5), remained till the end a loyal companion to Arnauld. Before his arrival, Quesnel had distinguished himself by scholarly works, among them an excellent edition of the writings of Leo the Great. His personal views were determined by an Augustinianism strongly influenced by Bérulle. He was also strongly affected by the thoughts of Saint Thomas Aquinas, whose work he knew extremely well. Given these conditions, the rigid, archaizing Augustinianism of Jansen did not appeal very much to him and so it was understandable that he had earlier signed the formulary four times. Quesnel, moreover, tended towards Gallicanism and was influenced by ideas advocated by Edmond Richer at the beginning of the seventeenth century. He shared Richer's belief that within the Church the blessing of truth is not entrusted to the Pope and the bishops alone, but to the totality of the faithful who share the responsibility for it and therefore have the same right as the hierarchy to judge the doctrine. A dogmatic truth then could only become binding if the host of the faithful accepted it. Intellectually Quesnel clearly influenced Arnauld in a Thomist direction. This is apparent most of all in the last great works of the aged theologian. Quesnel was also much more the politician than Arnauld. A determined opponent of Jesuits and Molinists, he perceived that the presence of Jansenism among the leading ranks of those advocating parliamentarianism, which was traditionally opposed to royal absolutism, created a set of favorable circumstances to be used to good advantage. For this purpose Jansenism had to be changed into a firmly structured party and this was Quesnel's achievement. Clear-sighted and persistent, endowed with leadership qualities, he soon established an expansive network of Jansenist agencies all across Europe and so perfected the work started by some of his predecessors, mainly by Du Vaucel and Pontchâteau.[12] But even though Quesnel wanted the Augustinian party to be victorious, he was not willing to side with Jansenism, which he did not esteem very highly. Through his Tradition de l'Église romaine sur la prédestination des saints et sur la grâce efficace, which connected incarnation and grace completely from the perspective of Bérulle and thereby at great remove from Jansen, he tried to remain aloof from the latter (1687–90).

---

[12] See B. Neveu, "Un janséniste à Rome: les deux missions de M. de Pontchâteau (1677–1680)," Annuaire de la section des Sciences religieuses de l'École pratique des Hautes-Études 74 (1966–67), 197–202.

But there still were supporters of Jansen who considered him the authentic interpreter of Saint Augustine. This view was shared by Barcos (whose manuscripts Quesnel at one time even ordered destroyed), by a significant group of theologians in Louvain who put up a desperate fight, and by a French Benedictine, Dom Gabriel Gerberon (1628–1711), whose intransigent Jansenism forced him into Dutch exile. From there he liberally criticized Arnauld and Quesnel, who on their part held him to be a dangerous muddlehead. To counter Quesnel's ideas, Gerberon had an earlier essay by Barcos, in which the latter had advocated an aggressive but awkward Augustinianism, Exposition de la foi catholique touchant la grâce et la prédestination, published in 1690. This untimely publication led to excited protests in Paris even by moderate Jansenists. But at the same time it offered the intransigents a point of reference. The new archbishop of Paris, Noailles, outwardly manifested Augustinianism. He felt obliged to condemn the Exposition, and did so in an order of 20 August 1696, whose doctrinal part, composed by Bossuet, emphatically laid a foundation for Augustinianism. Of course he distrusted everyone. Quesnel thereupon advised silence, but Gerberon and the intransigents in Paris circulated several pamphlets against the archbishop, among them the especially malicious Histoire abrégée du jansénisme (1697).

In 1695 when he was still bishop of Châlons, Noailles had given his approbation to Quesnel's Le Nouveau Testament en français avec des réflexions morales sur chaque verset, a revised edition of a much shorter work of the year 1671. On the spiritual level much of the commentary was excellent, but Quesnel's Augustinianism was often expressed in very categorical formulas and his sympathies for Richer's system were clearly discernible. Noailles was quite dismayed when a brochure entitled Problème ecclésiastique appeared towards the end of 1698 which posed the question of whether the Noailles who had approbated Quesnel or the Noailles who had condemned Barcos was to be believed. He found himself in a position of having contradicted himself. For a long time this piece was attributed to the Jesuits; the real author was not identified until modern times: he was Dom Hilarion Monnier, a Benedictine from Saint-Vanne who was an extreme Jansenist, but had had nothing to do with its publication.[13] The pamphlet was condemned by parliament on 10 January 1699—a reply was imperative. Noailles turned to Bossuet, who composed an Avertissement to appear at the beginning of a new, revised edition of the Réflexions morales. But meanwhile the prelates got into a squabble over the issue of quietism. Bossuet's text was not published until 1710, but Noailles made use of it in the four Lettres d'un théologien (1700). Although he was not immediately involved in this matter, Quesnel again played the part of a mediator. At this point the whole affair came to a halt and no one could foresee that it was destined to become the starting point for eighteenth-century Jansenism.

---

[13] See A. Vacant, "Renseignements inédits sur l'auteur du Problème ecclésiastique, "Revue des sciences ecclésiastiques 61 (1890), 411–25; 62 (1891), 34–50, 131–50.

The Way to the Bull Unigenitus

Another incident soon renewed the conflict. At the beginning of 1701 the priest of Notre-Dame du Port at Clermont, Fréhel, submitted to the Sorbonne a question of conscience. It was soon common knowledge that it concerned Pascal's nephew, Louis Périer. The question: can a penitent be granted absolution when he asserts that he cannot go beyond the reverential silence in the quaestio facti? A well-known Jansenist, Nicolas Petitpied, drafted a positive answer which—after various negotiations—was approved by forty professors on 20 July 1701, but rejected by Bossuet. It was not published right away and indeed it should never have been published. But in July 1702 the Cas de Conscience and the answer were printed and promptly generated a flood of pamphlets. The Holy Office condemned the Cas on 12 February 1703. Noailles, who had initially been on the positive side, joined in the condemnation on 22 February. But this did not end the polemic, for not until 4 September 1704 did the Sorbonne issue the condemnation. Petitpied refused to recant and withdrew to Holland.

By that time Fénelon (see Chap. 5) had decided to enter the fray. Sympathetic to the Jesuits, who for the most part had defended him loyally on the issue of L'Explication des Maximes des Saints sur la vie intérieure, he had opposed Jansenism for the past ten years.[14] So when Gerberon offered to defend his ideas concerning Pure Love, he did not have to change his convictions at all.[15] On 15 February 1704 he made public a pastoral instruction[16] in which he developed ideas which placed him in the center of the conflict without being able to satisfy anybody at all. As he saw it, the condemnation of Jansen could have a bearing only on the sensus obvius of his book, but not on the personal intentions of its author. But concerning this sensus obvius, the Church could make a decision and indeed an infallible one. In fact he asserted that the Church could be infallible in such dogmatic facts as were not revealed; that included Jansen's quaestio facti as well. This theory encountered opposition by almost all the specialists in France and by many theologians in Rome. But Fénelon defended and further defined his ideas in three more pastoral instructions in March and April 1705. At the same time he made use of his good relations with Pope Clement XI in order to achieve an unequivocal opinion from the Holy See in favor of his thesis of infallibility in nonrevealed facts. But the Holy See was not so inclined and would have preferred for Fénelon to support the thesis of the personal infallibility of the Pope defended by a majority of the Roman theologians. This led to a misunderstanding and cooled the relations between the prelate and Rome,[17] whereupon Fénelon—sorely disappointed—no longer demanded the formulary to be signed in his diocese.

---

[14] See H. Hillenaar, Fénelon et les jésuites (The Hague 1967).

[15] See J. Orcibal, "La spiritualité de Dom Gabriel Gerberon, champion de Jansénius et de Fénelon," RHEF 43 (1957), 151–222.

[16] Fenelon, Œuvres 3, 573–636.

In the meantime the pamphleteering of Quesnel and Gerberon had made the authorities of the Netherlands uneasy. On 30 May 1703 the two were arrested in Brussels and incarcerated at the jail of the court at Mechelin. Gerberon was extradited to the French police and never regained his freedom, but Quesnel managed to flee in a most unusual manner on 13 September. He took up residence in Amsterdam and resumed his activities. But the documents confiscated in his apartment demonstrated the power and efficacy of the Jansenist network spread over all of Europe. They led directly to the arrest of a number of party agents, among others Quesnel's correspondent in Paris, Germain Vuillarts.[18] The documents also showed the strange way in which the Jansenists adhered to the respectful silence; it did not keep them from publishing innumerable works. Louis XIV—badly informed until that time—had thought Jansenism almost extinguished; Quesnel's documents made him comprehend how much alive and how dangerous it was and also that his efforts had failed. Mme de Maintenon, who gave herself the appearance of being extremely orthodox so that the issue of quietism would be forgotten, urged him to request another bull from Rome condemning the respectful silence. But Clement XI, who understood that this measure would not be any more efficacious than the past ones, was not very enthusiastic and delayed his decision. Only when the French court kept urging him, did he issue the bull Vineam Domini Sabaoth.[19] While it condemned the respectful silence, it did so in such terms as to imply that the silence concerned the quaestio juris, but not the quaestio facti. Fénelon was disappointed that it did not contain a statement about infallibility regarding the facts. In some points, moreover, the documents contradicted Gallican principles; as a result, parliament—to Rome's chagrin—only accepted it with serious reservations. Of the numerous polemics inspired by the bull, the Denuntiatio Bullae Clementinae by a theologian from Louvain, De Witte, is especially important. It contained an appeal to the general council, an idea which would show an effect in the future.

---

[17] See J. Orcibal, "Fénelon et la Cour romaine," Mélanges d'archéologie et d'histoire de l'École française de Rome 57 (1940), 235–348.

[18] See L. Ceyssens, "Les papiers de Quesnel saisis à Bruxelles et transportés à Paris en 1703 et 1704," RHE 44 (1949), 508–51; ibid., "Suites romaines de la confiscation des papiers de Quesnel," Bulletin de l'Institut historique belge de Rome 29 (1955), 5–27.

[19] Text of the bull: BullRom 21, 235, see D 2390.

Aside from this revival of the conflict the bull Vineam Domini had few actual results if one excepts the last nuns of Port-Royal. Death had gradually decimated their ranks and only about twenty aged nuns occupied the imposing building of Port-Royal des Champs. They were forced to sign the bull, but they added a reservation saying that they were not willing to deviate from the arrangement made for them in the Clementine Peace. Not even threats could make them submit. Finally, at the urging of Mme de Maintenon, Louis XIV in October 1709 had their community dispersed and the nuns deported by the police to several different convents. This act of force was roundly condemned by public opinion, even by people who did not consider themselves Jansenists. To prevent the deserted convent from becoming a place of pilgrimage, Louis XIV had it demolished in 1711 and had the remains of the graves thrown into a mass grave in the cemetery of Saint-Lambert. In spite of this, there were pilgrimages and the stones of the ruins became relics. The abbot Le Sesne d'Etemare and the Jansenists published the Gémissements sur la destruction de Port-Royal, which was well received.

The bull Vineam Domini was indeed a disappointment for Louis XIV. The difficulties regarding its acceptance by parliament and also by the Assembly of the Clergy showed him that Jansenism could count on substantial support, even extending into the episcopate, for whom the King had always selected candidates who were above the slightest suspicion. Among these friends of Jansenism, Noailles, who owed his see in Paris to Mme de Maintenon's favor, soon played a prominent role. Quesnel from his shelter in Amsterdam quickly reorganized his network. His arrest had made him the undisputed leader of the party, especially since the disappearance of Gerberon had destroyed integral Jansenism once and for all. Quesnel used his voluminous correspondence to extend his influence far afield. But he was ominously destined to draw future attacks by the anti-Jansenists. After some cooling, Fénelon had reestablished his close relations with Rome. He immediately resumed his polemics against Jansenism. Deviating not a whit from any of his ideas, he warned the Holy See untiringly of the seriousness of the situation. Future events proved him correct. In 1710 he attacked Quesnel. The latter, no mean polemicist himself, vigorously rejected the prelate's ideas in some blunt pamphlets. One of Quesnel's advocates turned out to be Noailles, whom Fénelon resented ever since he had opposed him on the issue of quietism. So Fénelon decided to direct his attack to Quesnel's Réflexions morales. This work had already been denounced in Rome by the Capuchin Timothée de la Fleche in 1703 and condemned on 13 July 1708 by the brief Universi Dominici gregis. But the brief contained clauses contradictory to Gallican principles and had not been accepted in France. Fénelon, unwilling to be personally involved, used two of his friends, the bishops of Luçon and La Rochelle, as straw men. Those two issued a pastoral letter whose details were furnished by Fénelon. In it they condemned the Réflexions morales, accusing them of reiterating the errors of Baius and Jansen. Noailles, having approved the work, thus considered himself indirectly addressed and correctly so. Both bishops had nephews at the seminary of Saint-Sulpice, the diocesan seminary of Paris. Noailles promptly dismissed them without giving a reason. On 28 April 1711 he replied to his adversaries in a sharply worded pastoral instruction. The King thereupon reprimanded Noailles and through Mme de Maintenon demanded that he retract his approbation of Quesnel's book. Noailles of course refused to do so.

Noailles's refusal resulted in a complicated web of intrigue. Gradually Mme de Maintenon turned against the former protégé. At the very least she wanted to scare him into acquiescence. She apparently succeeded in making the new confessor to the King, the Jesuit Le Tellier, go along with her, whereas his predecessor, La Chaize, had consistently thwarted her plans. With her approval, Tellier collected a file of letters by bishops demanding the condemnation of the Réflexions morales and then sent a sample letter ultimately intended for the King to several different dioceses. But a letter by Abbot Bochart de Saron to his uncle, the bishop of Clermont, uncovering the scheme was intercepted in the mail and made public by the Jansenists. Noailles was extremely angry and hardened his position. When the King pressed him again to disassociate himself from Quesnel he refused and it became more and more obvious that part of the episcopate was supporting him. Louis XIV, grasping that he was threatened by a schism in the hierarchy, found himself in a quandary. The only way out seemed to be to involve Rome. So on 16 November 1711 he requested a papal bull against Quesnel, assuring the Holy Office that he would be able to force it upon the episcopate and parliament if he were made privy to its contents beforehand. At this point Noailles declared himself willing to submit to the Pope's decision. But when the King's request was transmitted by the French ambassador it encountered less enthusiasm than had been assumed. The Pope was extremely well informed and—unlike the King—had few illusions about the effect such a measure would have in France. He was also anxious to avoid the appearance of following orders by Louis XIV. The commissioners charged with examining the problem quickly recognized moreover that the subtle, unctuous text of the Réflexions morales offered less of a basis for attack then the Augustinus. But after long hesitation Clement XI gave in: on 8 September 1713, he signed the bull Unigenitus Dei Filius condemning 101 propositions from the Réflexions morales (see Chap. 9).

CHAPTER 4

Gallicanism and Protestantism

Gallicanism at the Beginning of the Seventeenth Century

In the beginning of the seventeenth century the theses offered by the majority of French theologians and canonists concerning the function and power of the Pope were clearly aimed at decreasing his importance. These "Maxims of the Parisian School," supported by the writings of such medieval luminaries as Jean Gerson, Pierre d'Ailly, Jacques Almain, and John Mair, endorsed the relatively independent authority of the bishops in their respective dioceses, but they refused to consider the Pope a universal bishop. They demanded superiority of the general council over the Pope and maintained that the council could convene even without the Pope. They concluded that the Pope was in no way omnipotent and that natural law, canon law, and even the civil law of Christian nations placed limits upon his authority. Yet the French theologians unanimously acknowledged the true primacy of the Pope, his universal authority, and his position as the center of the unity of Christians.

Of course, none of these ideas was intended to sacrifice a single one of the privileges traditionally called "Liberties of the Gallican Church." On this point their views were clearly political and identical with that of Parliament which saw itself as official guardian of these liberties, which had been codified in 1594 by Pierre Pithou, a lawyer of parliament. While this codification remained authoritative for the whole ancien régime, four more treatises on this topic by parliamentary jurists had appeared between 1594 and 1604, with more to come. These works clearly demonstrate to what extent French parliamentary jurists viewed themselves as heirs to the great medieval jurists whose traditions they were continuing. The eighty-three liberties listed by Pithou were unequivocally aimed at restricting the authority of the Holy See in France, limiting its interference to a minimum and at the same time expanding the King's powers relative to religious matters. Although he had no spiritual authority, the King was responsible for the well-being of the French Church, possessing the requisite authority by virtue of divine right. Yet the crown was free of any and all vassalage or state of dependence vis-à-vis the Pope. Parliamentary jurists and theologians alike appeared sensitive to a high degree on all issues concerning the person of the King, who was regarded as sacrosanct. The theological faculties repeatedly censured writings which sought to justify not only the Pope's authority to depose a ruler guilty of heresy but even theories advocating tyrannicide. This latter issue was especially sensitive because the assassinations by Jacques Clément, Jean Chatel, and Ravaillac were not yet forgotten. So it was not surprising that essays by the Jesuits Mariana (1611) and Santarelli (1625), one an apologia for regicide, the other a demand for papal authority to depose kings, provoked great excitement and censure. All of this contributed towards maintaining a state of latent tension which was skillfully manipulated until the time of the Revolution by kings and ministers intent on expanding the power of the monarchy.

The manifestations of Gallicanism, however, continued to be relatively moderate; its advocates kept a low profile by avoiding extremism. This was shown in the events surrounding the writings of Edmond Richer (1560–1631).[1] Richer, a priest from Langres who was a creative personality with an excellent education, became syndic of the theological faculty of Paris in 1608. In 1606 he had published the writings of Gerson with additional annotations and treatises designed to emphasize the latter's Gallican tendencies. In 1610 Bellarmine published his Tractatus de potestate Summi Pontificis in rebus temporalibus adversus Gulielmum Barclaeum, which emphatically reclaimed the rights of the Holy See. Richer replied in 1611 with a small brochure of only thirty pages, De ecclesiastica et civili potestate libellus, which summarized in the name of the tradition of the Parisian School his own very extreme ideas. According to him temporal and spiritual authority—each in its respective realm—are sovereign and independent. But he goes beyond that in asserting that the Church possesses spiritual authority only and must be subordinate to the King in all temporal matters and requirements. He agrees with Gerson that the Pope is merely the prime minister of the Church, whereas the Church's head is Jesus Christ. But while Gerson meant to say that the Pope is Christ's deputy receiving from him the authority for the commonweal of the Church, Richer interpreted this concept in a way that conceded nothing more than an executive authority to the Pope. The actual legislative authority, the leadership, is constituted in the general council, which alone is infallible because infallibility is a property only of the whole Church, whose representatives comprise the general council. The Pope is responsible only for the status, that is for the implementation of the canons issued by the council, but he can not impose anything binding upon the Church without its consent. Richer, however, avoided the multitudinism advocated by Marco-Antonio de Dominis, the apostate archbishop of Spalato, who defected to the English schism. In Richer's view Christ has entrusted jurisdiction of the Church to the totality of the priestly order within which the bishops represent the Apostles and the pastors the seventy-two disciples. The Church, then, is led by an aristocracy, the bishops, who by divine right are above the priests and whose authority is binding even on the Pope. The episcopate does not constitute an order of its own since the body of the priesthood is already realized in the priests; instead it constitutes simply an office which, derived from divine right, gives them an immediate jurisdiction independent of the Holy See. In its roots Richer's theory is thus a form of episcopalism which strongly projects the rights of the clergy and the faithful even if they are subordinate to those of the bishops. By stressing the fact that the Depositum fidei is indivisibly entrusted to the complete Church, Richer concludes that a dogmatic statement can become obligatory only if agreed to by the total Church and that neither the Pope nor the bishops can force the acceptance of such a statement upon the Church without its agreement. To all practical extent, this makes the faithful into judges of the dogma. One of his pupils, Simon Vigor (1556–1624), a member of the grand council, paralleled Richer in several of his works, which extended the Gallicanism of his teacher to an extreme point: he denied the Pope any and all primacy and declared invalid all definitions and institutions issued or established after the fifth century.

---

[1] See E. Puyol, Edmond Richer, étude historique et critique sur la renovation du gallicanisme au commencement du XVII^{e} siècle, 2 vols. (Paris 1876).

The publication of Richer's Libellus created considerable excitement at the universities and in political circles. Rome immediately pronounced condemnations, but they were neither unexpected nor did they have any practical significance, because one of the infamous Gallican Liberties stipulated that the decrees of the Holy Office would not be accepted in France. But the condemnation of the work by a provincial council (March 1612) chaired by the famous Cardinal du Perron in the archbishopric of Sens, to which Paris was subordinated at that time, was quite serious. The theological faculty joined in the condemnation and—for the first time since its existence—dismissed its syndic. Richer took a stand and emphatically defended his ideas in several publications, in turn provoking numerous replies, before he finally admitted defeat. On 30 July 1622 he was prudent enough to sign a declaration submitting to the Holy See and maintaining that it had been his intention merely to "summarize the old teachings of the Parisian School." In actuality he persisted in his viewpoints; even another recantation forced on him by Richelieu on 7 December 1629 did not change that. Richer continued to attract followers. While, in 1630, France was not yet ready for his ideas, these were to reemerge in the Jansenism of the eighteenth century and take on great significance.

Richer's most determined opponent in this fight was another professor at the Sorbonne, André Duval (1564–1638).[2] His views demonstrate clearly how far those Frenchmen who—in relative terms—were most dedicated to the idea of ultramontanism were willing to go. Duval, a professor at the Sorbonne since 1597, had opposed Richer ever since the latter had published Gerson's works in 1606. A friend of the Jesuits and of Nuncio Barberini, later Pope Urban VIII, Duval in effect defended views which openly favored the rights of the Holy See, but he avoided any one-sidedness. In 1612 he replied to Richer in an elenchus sharply rejecting his adversary's Libellus. In addition to several other pamphlets he wrote two rather more significant works relating to this quarrel: De suprema romani pontificis in Ecclesiam potestate (1614) and Tractatus de summi pontificis auctoritate (1622), the latter opposing Simon Vigor. The ideas developed in these works are remarkably balanced, moderate and conciliatory. He determines very precisely those points actually stipulated by Christian faith and respects freedom of opinion vis-à-vis others. Regarding the superiority of the general council over the authority of the Pope he remarks that the theological faculty of Paris alone supports this view, but he presents these opposing views objectively and refrains from rendering a qualifying judgment on either position. He openly defends the personal infallibility of the Pope without, however, raising the accusation of heresy against those who deny it. With this presupposition he advocates the view that a doctrinal decision by the Pope can actually be binding on the faithful only after the universal Church has accepted it at least tacitly. This does not go as far as the theories of Bellarmine, from whom Duval candidly disassociates himself. While obliging the ruler to respect those privileges which are the Pope's, he upholds the King's independence in the temporal and political realm; Duval later concurred in the condemnation of Santarelli's book. It is obvious, then, how moderate Duval's so-called ultramontanism was in comparison to Rome's demands.

---

[2] See A. Dodin, "Duval," DSAM 3 (1957) 1857–62; L. Cognet, "Duval," DHGE 14 (1960), 1213–16.

Richelieu and the Holy See

In 1612 Duval said of Richer and his views that the hot-tempered syndic unwittingly paved the way for the schism. As a matter of fact, from this point on some French Catholics considered a more or less total divorce from the Holy See. In the Estates General of 1614 the Third Estate proposed a basic law which was to stipulate France as being immediately dependent only on God, but du Perron wisely thwarted this undertaking. The attitude of numerous clerics during Marie de Médicis' regency provided Rome with a feeling of relief. After the Regent transferred the conduct of foreign affairs to Richelieu in 1617, the latter began concealing his true sentiments, allowing the nuncio to think that he was squarely on the side of the Holy See and Spain. Not until 1621 when he urged the King to resist Spain did he give even a hint of his true position. Spain, as a great Catholic nation, traditionally could count on the support of the Holy See. In his conflict with Spain, which even within France was opposed by the parti dévot, Richelieu thus had to ensure himself of Rome's neutrality by any available means. Blackmailing Rome with the issue of Gallicanism was the most effective method towards achieving this aim and the cardinal-minister made use of it unscrupulously. In the messages of gratitude written after his elevation to the cardinalate (September 1622) he praised the kindness of the King, but never once mentioned the Pope. At that time Richer's ideas found a responsive chord at the Sorbonne and Richelieu had defended the theological faculty against the ultramontanist tendencies of Cardinal de La Rochefoucauld. At the same time he engaged in several demonstrative diplomatic and military initiatives which could not but have disquieted the Holy See: an alliance with the Protestant united provinces, negotiations with the German Protestants, attacks on the papal fortifications in the Veltlin and ratification of a treaty very favorable to the Huguenots (5 February 1626). This makes it clear why he did not intervene in 1625 and 1626 when the Assembly of the Clergy, the Sorbonne, and Parliament, on the issue of Santarelli's book, sharply condemned ultramontanism. He managed to make a decided enemy of Urban VIII and turned the sentiments of the French parti dévot against himself. After June 1626, when he needed the Pope's support in the Mantua problem, he tried to reverse his policies. He kept the Sorbonne from publishing its censure of Santarelli and increased his political concessions. In France he resumed the fight against the members of the Reformed Churches.

But this was a mere episode, and Urban VIII saw through it although he, too, made a conciliatory move. At the end of 1628 Richelieu entered the war against Austria and again signed treaties with the Protestants of Germany and England. The Pope now stiffened his attitude against the minister by systematically denying him all favors he requested. In spite of Richelieu's urging he refused to elevate Father Joseph to the cardinalate (1632) and made Mazarin wait for it a long time (1641). In 1634 he prevented Richelieu's having himself named bishop of Speyer, which would have given the cardinal access to the German College of Electors. He also refused him several briefs in matters of the episcopate and the religious orders, and, most importantly, he never agreed to nullify the marriage of Gaston d'Orléans, which was essential to Richelieu's politics. After the latter declared war on Spain (26 May 1635) the situation was further aggravated. In order to defy Urban VIII, Richelieu appointed Marshal d'Estrées, who was known for his temper and crudity, ambassador to Rome. The marshal occasioned so many incidents that in 1639 his equerry, Rouvray, was murdered. Almost simultaneously the Pope, in a countermove, appointed Scotti, hardly an ideal choice, as the new nuncio to Paris. It is accurate to say that the Pope at this particular time enjoyed considerable sympathy among the French episcopate, which was up in arms about the heavy taxation imposed on the Church's possessions by Richelieu. Public opinion for the better part did not approve of this opposition to the Holy See.

This tense situation explains why Urban VIII used all means to prevent Richelieu from assuming any sort of legal or canonical authority over the Church of France. The minister, eager in every way to consolidate his power, had long wanted such authority. In 1627, during a short span in which his relations with Rome were somewhat less aggravated, he let it be known discreetly that he would be glad to accept the title of permanent papal legate to France; ultimately he unequivocably demanded the title. Although Richelieu argued the precedent of Cardinal d'Amboise, Urban VIII, convinced of the cardinal's schismatic intentions, did not relent. It was only with great reluctance that he offered him the title for the limited period of a few months after the birth of the Dauphin, but Richelieu declined.

In 1635 Richelieu began to develop a new plan. The obligation on the part of the French clergy to obtain bulls for the canonical investiture of various church benefices from the Holy See, sanctioned in the Concordat of 1516, was obviously very unpopular and led to a number of protests. What Richelieu had in mind was branding the Concordat as illegal and contradictory to the old church discipline, and returning the privilege of electing bishops to the chapters. Subsequently he planned to call a national council into session where the King was to forego his regalia, which was very oppressive to the dioceses. In return he was to be given the right to hand out benefices directly and without participation by the Holy See. The final stage provided for Richelieu to be appointed patriarch of Gallia or of the Occident, with privileges similar to those of an Eastern patriarch. This would make the French Church almost independent of Rome in all but matters of faith, and the Pope would actually retain no more than an honorary primacy. Richelieu appears to have soon made a few politicians he trusted privy to his plan. Among them Chancellor Séguier, who suggested the royal councilor Pierre de Marca, in his role as a jurist, and several newspaper writers capable of propagating the idea among the public. Richelieu was well aware of the great difficulties he faced in trying to realize his plan. He also knew how difficult it would be to win the French public over to his scheme. He hoped to win public opinion over to his side by personally initiating a mass conversion of Protestants, who would look favorably upon such an undertaking by a French patriarch. This explains his mild treatment of the defeated Calvinists whom he allowed the free exercise of their cult. Polemicists in the minister's pay were ordered to extend concessions to members of the Reformed Churches as far as possible. As a result several pastors were won over. Richelieu even thought of calling a spectacular conference of Protestants with him as their protagonist.

In order to create a basis for his plan, Richelieu again facilitated publications with Gallican tendencies. This was the case with an anonymous pamphlet, Le Nonce du Pape français (1637), probably written by one of the cardinal's confidants, which asked the King to end the oppression of France by papal power and to create instead an ecclesiastic authority independent of the Holy See. Public reaction was more negative than positive. Two years later, in 1639, the brothers Dupuy, two well-known scholars, published two works by order of the minister: the Traité des droits et libertés de l'Église gallicane, a voluminous folio, followed by Preuves des libertés de l'Église gallicane.[3] These works, based on ample documentation, virtually did away with everything, including the special privileges of the Pope and immunity of the clergy. The public was greatly perturbed. On the initiative of Cardinal La Rochefoucauld, who defended Rome, and Nuncio Bolognetti, eighteen bishops present in Paris severely censured the work. The cardinal-minister permitted the censure, but did not in any way suppress the books of the brothers Dupuy.

---

[3] See P. Demante, "Histoire de la publication des livres de P. Du Puy sur les libertés de l'Église gallicane," BÉCh, ser. 1, 5 (Paris 1843).

At that point the project of the Gallican patriarchate was beginning to be talked about, although in cryptic fashion. By January 1646 the public had become so sensitized to the subject that the tiny pamphlet Optatus gallus de cavendo schismate, announcing the impending schism, created an enormous emotional response. The author, whom Richelieu could not identify, was Charles Hersent, a former Oratorian. Initially the minister was very annoyed with the pamphlet. But then it probably occurred to him that the Optatus gallus incident, given the proper exaggerative embellishment, would alarm Rome sufficiently to form the basis for extensive extortion. So he ordered several of his favorites to reply to the Optatus gallus. One of the replies, whose author, the Jesuit Rabardeau, made it appear to be coming officially from Richelieu himself, represented the establishment of the patriarchate as being totally legitimate and in no way schismatic. In fact, several Jesuits openly supported Richelieu's plan. The most significant of the replies was one by Marcas, De concordia sacerdotii et imperii (1641), who sought to prove that the Gallican Liberties did not run counter to the rights of the Holy See.[4] Rome appeared to take the apparent schismatic intentions of Richelieu very seriously, especially when he confirmed them by various measures designed to prevent all contact between the nuncio and the episcopate. But Urban VIII was clever enough to exercise extreme restraint. In time Richelieu had to admit to himself that his plan of a patriarchate was not meeting with a favorable response from the public, especially when the war against Spain as well as his domestic policies were becoming more and more unpopular. When Richelieu died on 4 December 1642 the issue was unresolved. Urban VIII manifested his sentiments for the dead prelate by forbidding the solemn mass for the dead, customarily celebrated in Rome at the death of a cardinal.

Mazarin, although a cardinal, was hardly an ecclesiastic personality in the customary sense; he was unable to continue Richelieu's undertakings. And yet he inherited his policies, especially in regard to Spain, and thereby incurred Rome's enmity. Innocent X scorned Mazarin as much as his predecessor Urban VIII had hated Richelieu. But now the Jansenist conflict began to interfere with Gallicanism and to slightly modify the respective positions.[5] The attitude of the French government became unequivocally anti-Jansenist, a position it would maintain for some time to come. It was its anti-Jansenism that forced the French court constantly to appeal to the dogmatic authority of the Holy See. This met with some benevolence on the part of the papal court. Originally Rome had been favorably disposed towards the French milieu dévot, the traditional defender of papal rights, and had emphasized this attitude by refusing to condemn Arnauld's Fréquente Communion as requested by Mazarin. But when the milieu dévot turned into the Jansenist party, Rome was forced to intercede against it. While this created an area of rapprochement with the French court, Rome's reticence nonetheless remained obvious. Mazarin experienced this in the upheavals during the Fronde when he found himself in opposition to the famous Cardinal Retz, coadjutor of Paris, who had automatically succeeded his uncle François Gondi as archbishop after the latter's death on 3 March 1654. Upon his flight Retz sought refuge in Rome in September 1654. Innocent X welcomed him benignly; he treated him according to his station as archbishop and cardinal and denied Mazarin the right to appoint a commission of bishops for the purpose of initiating a trial against Retz. Mazarin was forced to dispatch Lionne as ambassador to Rome to negotiate this matter. After the death of Innocent X, Lionne could not prevent the election of Fabio Chigi, the former nuncio of Paris, who was not well disposed towards France. Lionne thus encountered great difficulty when he worked out an agreement regarding the temporary administration of the Parisian diocese. This dilemma was not resolved until the dismissal of Cardinal Retz in 1661. The Holy See also stubbornly refused Mazarin and young Louis XIV the extension of the Concordat of 1516 to the newly conquered areas, especially the diocese of Arras.

---

[4] F. Gaquère, P. de Marca (1594–1662). Sa vie, ses œuvres, son gallicanisme (Paris 1932).

[5] See L. Cognet, "Le jansénisme drame gallican," L'Année canonique 10 (1965), 75–83.

The Gallicanism of Louis XIV

During the last years of his life Mazarin had been determined to maintain the status quo. But under young Louis XIV this position underwent a fundamental change. Imbued with absolutist ideas, the King strove for religious as well as political unity in his realm. Moreover, he was surrounded by advisers with decidedly Gallican tendencies, among them his confessors Father Annat and Father de la Chaize,[6] who—although they were Jesuits—were shaped by the Gallican tradition. A revival of Gallican ideas can be perceived from the very beginning of the grand monarch's absolute rule. On 12 December 1661 the Flemish Jesuit Coret presented theses at Clermont College in which he defended the infallibility of the Pope in the quaestio juris as well as in the quaestio facti. In so doing he provoked a lively controversy. Louis XIV rebuked Coret and ordered him to be silent because he did not want to provide the Jansenists with additional arguments by a discussion on the Pope's infallibility. The violent confrontation between the Corsican guards and the French soldiers which took place on 20 August 1662, not far from the Palazzo Farnese, seat of the French ambassador, apparently had no doctrinal significance, but Louis XIV used the occasion to threaten an invasion of the Papal States and to humiliate the Pope, who was ultimately forced to capitulate at the Peace of Pisa (12 February 1664). In January 1663 Gabriel Drouet de Villeneuve had meanwhile presented some theses to the Sorbonne which openly advocated papal authority, calling the Gallican Liberties simple privileges granted by the Holy See. A parliamentary decree censured three of these theses on 22 January. The Sorbonne was very indignant over this incursion into its decision-making area. Bossuet, at that time just embarking on his Parisian career, endangered his advancement by joining the opponents. On 1 March the Sorbonne capitulated. But a month later, on 4 April, another incident occurred regarding the theses of Laurent Desplantes, a Cistercian monk, who granted to the Pope total jurisdictional authority in the entire Church in foro externo as well as in foro interno. The court and parliament vehemently demonstrated their opposition and took repressive steps. On 11 May, upon the intervention of the King's minister Michel Tellier,[7] the Sorbonne signed six clauses in favor of the independence of the King and of the Gallican Liberties, rejecting both the Pope's superiority over the council and his infallibility. A year later, in April 1664, the faculty censured a work by the Carmelite friar Bonaventura Hérédie,[8] published under the pseudonym Vernant, which defended extreme Montanist theses. In February 1665 a work published under the name of Guimenius was censured as well. Authored by the Jesuit Mateo Moya, it defended the casuists and acknowledged papal infallibility.[9] This time Rome reacted: the bull Cum ad aures by Alexander VII (25 June 1665)[10] condemned and annulled the faculty's censure. On 29 July Attorney General Talon delivered a vehement indictment of the document in parliament, but in the end the matter was permitted to rest: on the eve of the war with England, Louis XIV did not want the additional burden of clashing with the Holy See. At the same time the Jansenist conflict reached a critical juncture and the French court had to call for the assistance of the authority of Rome several times. This explains the relative quiet lasting until the Clementine Peace (1668) and beyond.

---

[6] See G. Guitton, Le P. de la Chaize confesseur de Louis XIV, 2 vols. (Paris 1959).

---

[7] See L. André, Michel Le Tellier et Louvois (Paris 1942), 448; J. Sahuc, Un ami de Port-Royal, messire Pierre Jean François de Percin de Montgaillard (Paris 1909), 37–43.

[8] La défense de l'autorité de Notre Saint Père le Pape et de Messeigneurs les cardinaux, les archevêques et évêques et de l'emploi des religieux mendicants contre less erreurs de ce temps (Metz 1658).

[9] Amadaei Guimenii Lomarensis opusculum singularia universae fere theologiae moralis complectens (Lyon 1664).

[10] Text of the bull: J. Boileau, Recueil, 92–96.

Yet Louis XIV continued his efforts towards religious unity in his realm and to insist upon extending the Concordat of 1516 to all the areas subject to him, to bishoprics as well as abbeys. This presupposed a broadening of the right of regalia, the spiritual regalia which enabled the King to fill the benefices of a bishop while the bishopric was vacant, and the secular regalia enabling the King to gain possession of the income of vacant bishoprics. An edict of 10 February 1673 made this extension official and a declaration of 2 April 1675 recognized the measure. It applied to approximately sixty dioceses, for the most part in the southern provinces, which had been exempt from the regalia. Almost all bishops submitted, although in some cases with covert resistance. Only two resisted openly: Nicolas Pavillon, bishop of Alet, and François Étienne Caulet, bishop of Pamiers. Both of them had already demonstrated their independence on the issue of the formulary. Thus Jansenism unequivocally manifested its opposition to Gallicanism. In their instructions Pavillon and Caulet expressly rejected the sovereign rights and submitted the matter to the Assembly of the Clergy of 1675. They simultaneously excommunicated the prebendaries named on the title of the regalia.[11] To be sure, Pavillon and Caulet presided over tiny, out-of-the way dioceses, but were venerated as examples of the episcopate because of their virtue. Louis XIV hesitated to engage in open conflict with them because he knew that part of the public would not concur in it. Not until the middle of 1677 did he decide to intervene by having the council of state annul the instructions of the two rebellious bishops, who promptly turned to the Holy See for support. Innocent XI, elected in 1676, had immediately proved his zeal for ecclesiastic reform by abolishing nepotism and by defending his rights against the princes. It could be assumed that he favored the opponents of the regalia, but he had not as yet spoken out on this point. On 30 July 1677 Pavillon sent a letter to Innocent XI by way of one of the recluses of Port-Royal, Pontchâteau.[12] The latter was supported by the Roman Jansenists and could easily have convinced the Pope to side with the anti-regalists.[13] Unfortunately Pavillon died shortly thereafter (18 December 1677) and the regalia were immediately extended to his diocese. The burden of the fight was now on Caulet, who had been condemned by his metropolitan, the archbishop of Toulouse, and had turned to the Pope on 26 October 1677. In a highly laudatory brief of 2 March 1678, Innocent XI sided with the prelate against the King. Certain of Rome's support, Caulet now opposed the King in ever more vehement fashion. In 1679 this resulted in the confiscation of his benefices. There followed two additional briefs, of 20 December 1679 and 17 July 1680, which praised the bishop even more than the first one had. But Caulet died on 7 August 1680 without having received the last brief. Meanwhile the foreign minister, Arnauld de Pomponne, a nephew of the Great Arnauld, who had exercised a moderating influence on the King, had fallen out of favor[14] and the King stiffened his attitude. But several incidents in connection with church appointments in which Innocent XI annulled decisions of Louis XIV made it clear that the Pope, too, was not willing to give in (see Chap. 8).

---

[11] L. Bertrand, Bibliothèque sulpicienne ou histoire littéraire de la Compagnie de Saint-Sulpice, 3 vols. (Paris 1900), III, 42–57.

[12] See B. Neveu, Sébastien Joseph du Cambout de Pontchâteau (1634–1690) et ses missions à Rome (Paris 1969).

[13] See A. Latreille, "Innocent XI, pape janséniste, directeur de conscience de Louis XIV," Cahiers d'Histoire publiés par les universités de Grenoble, Lyon et Clermont-Ferrand 1 (1956), 9–39.

But the matter of Pamiers was by no means ended by Caulet's death: the chapter elected a new chapter vicar who continued the resistance and was supported in it by Rome. Next, Louis XIV tried to intimidate Innocent XI by furnishing proof that he had public opinion and the clergy well in hand. He ordered publication of the treatise De l'autorité légitime des rois en matière de régale (1682) by the reporter on petitions in the council of state, Le Vayer de Boutigny, who vigorously defended the regalia. At the same time the plenary Assembly of the Clergy of 1680 and another assembly at the beginning of 1681 assured the King of their loyalty. But Louis XIV was resolved to escalate his intimidation. On 31 October 1681 he convoked a special plenary assembly, attempting to lend to it the significance of a genuine national council. The deputies were carefully selected and demonstrated total deference to the royal power. Bossuet played a significant part in this assembly, but in reality he was a mere instrument in the hands of the archbishop of Paris, François Harlay de Champvallon, a figure of dubious morality who nonetheless had the King's ear. On 3 February 1682 the assembly officially accepted the extension of the right of regalia; on 19 March it published the four articles of the famous Declaration of the French Clergy (Declaratio cleri gallicani). This document asserted the independence of civil authority in secular matters and the council's superiority over the Pope. His authority was thereby limited to the Church canons; his decisions, even in matters of faith, were to be subject to concurrence by the total Church. On 23 March a royal decree ordered the Declaratio to be included in the curriculum of all universities and seminaries. But this incurred strong opposition from the clergy and the public. Innocent [14] C. Gérin, "La disgrâce de M. de Pomponne," RQH 23 (1878), 170.

---

XI openly showed his bitterness, but the Roman commission charged with examining the four articles could not agree upon the qualification to be imposed upon it. Innocent XI therefore chose not to take any official measures. He merely refused to issue the bulls for canonical investiture to those new bishops who had participated in the assembly of 1682. As a consequence France had thirty-five vacant bishoprics in January 1688.

Around this time the conflict between France and Rome reached another climax. To restore orderly conditions to the city of Rome, Innocent XI had revoked the quartering privileges of houses located in close proximity to the embassies in 1677 (see Chap. 8). But Louis XIV had refused to yield to this measure. So the bull Cum alias of 12 May 1687 excommunicated those who acted contrary to the decree. On 16 November 1687 the new French ambassador, Marquis de Lavardin, entered Rome at the head of 100 armed men. In spite of having been excommunicated, he had the sacraments administered to himself in full view of the public at the church of San Luigi dei Francesi. As a result the church was interdicted. At the beginning of January 1688 Innocent XI secretly informed Louis XIV that he and his ministers had been excommunicated.[15] The King immediately took several countermeasures. On 22 February 1688 General Harlay, speaking before parliament, appealed the decision to a general council; the following day the Solicitor General Talon delivered a violent indictment against Innocent XI in which he renewed the prior appeal and stated that the newly appointed bishops would simply forego the papal bulls of investiture. A decree to this effect was approved by parliament and posted in Rome on 8 February by Lavardin. At the same time Louis XIV openly prepared the occupation of the papal possessions of Avignon and Comtat-Venaissin. Innocent XI expressed his indignation, but did not pronounce an official condemnation of the action because he felt that even in Rome a number of cardinals would not support his unyielding stance. Next, Louis XIV, wanting to bring about the election of an elector-bishop in Cologne who was well inclined towards France, attempted to establish improved rapport with the Holy See by using the services of a secret agent. But Innocent XI rejected these overtures. On 16 September Louis XIV occupied Avignon and Comtat-Venaissin. On 27 September he formally renewed his appeal to the general council and had it recognized by several clerical bodies, among them the various theological faculties. Finally, he not only had the papal nuncio, Ranuzzi, unlawfully jailed, but he also forbade the bishops and Jesuits any and all correspondence with Rome. The actions of Louis XIV against Rome were actually supported by many Jesuits, among them Father de la Chaize, the King's confessor. Since 1675 the Conseil de conscience which had to decide religious matters had consisted merely of La Chaize and Harlay who, by the way, were agreed in only one thing, namely to calm down the King regarding his differences of opinion with the Holy See. The general public liked Innocent XI and was not well inclined towards the King's intransigent position, but through forged documents, skillfully propagated by the King's minister, Colbert de Croissy, in the summer of 1688, public opinion was modified somewhat on this point. But the majority of the Jansenist party remained loyal to the Pope. This in turn gave the necessary argument to La Chaize that prompted him to accuse Innocent XI himself of Jansenism.[16] The situation was now in danger of entering a period of stagnation, when suddenly it was fundamentally altered by an unforeseen event: the conquest of England in November–December 1688 by William of Orange. Faced with this new danger, Louis XIV attempted rapprochement with Rome and recalled Lavardin. But Innocent XI, without even referring to his previous statements, remained silent, made no official decisions, and continued to keep the King's excommunication secret. The Pope died on 12 August 1689 without having issued a single act against the regalia, against the Declaration of the French Clergy 1682 or the appeal to the general council of 1688, and, lastly, without having had an idea that his patience had paved the way for Jansenism in the eighteenth century.

---

[15] See M. Dubruel, "L'excommunication de Louis XIV," Études 137 (1913), 608–35.

During the pontificate of the very conciliatory Innocent XII (1692) the aim was mutual pacification. An agreement was achieved in September 1693. The conflict regarding the regalia, which was destined never to be resolved, was simply ignored. A letter from Louis XIV to the Pope said that all possible steps had been taken to prevent the execution of the edict of 1682 concerning the Four Articles. In the future, relations between Rome and France achieved a relatively peaceful "modus vivendi" lasting for the remainder of the ancien régime. Yet the ideas involved in the dispute went their own way (on the subject of the State Church see Chaps. 17 and 23).

Protestantism in Seventeenth-Century France

After the death of Henry IV, Catholics as well as Protestants considered the regime established by the Edict of Nantes a mere armistice in a continuing state of opposition. Hardly anyone perceived in it the basis for mutual toleration. At this time the Huguenot party knew themselves to be a minority, but they did not give up. The regency of Marie de Médicis was not well disposed towards them, indeed it brought men of the Catholic Counter Reformation to power. The renewal of Catholic spirituality deprived the Huguenots of the esteem they enjoyed because of the deep personal piety of many of them. From this point on, conversions from Protestantism to Catholicism increased while those in the other direction decreased. The Huguenots were therefore firmly resolved to make full use of the guaranties given them by the Edict of Nantes and indeed even to broaden them. Accordingly the assembly of La Rochelle in May 1621 established a military structure for the whole of France in which the country was divided into eight districts. While the plan did not come to full fruition, it nonetheless formed the basis for the Protestant rebellions of 1622 and 1626. But the Huguenots encountered resistance on the part of Richelieu, who had his own ideas in this matter. He was not about to tolerate the creation of a state within the state by the Reformed religion nor that it maintain connections with foreign powers. So he decided to subjugate La Rochelle, the bastion of the Calvinists, which was considered to be impervious to attack. The city surrendered after a terrible siege of eleven months. Although Bérulle and the parti dévot tried to talk Richelieu into exterminating all vestiges of heresy, the cardinal refused to follow up his victory. The Peace of Alais (28 June 1629) granted to the Calvinists the free exercise of their religion and equality in the service of the King, but it deprived them of their military guarantees. In this way Richelieu was not only hoping to keep his connections with Germany's Protestants intact, but perhaps—as has been mentioned—even to become the promoter of a general return to the faith by the Protestants. This would have put him in a very strong position with the Holy See. Mazarin, on the other hand, preferred to let the matter rest, especially since the Protestants had been clever enough to render proof of their very deep loyalty during the upheavals of the Fronde.

---

[16] See J. Bruckner, "Le P. de la Chaize dans les conflits de Louis XIV avec Innocent XI," Études 160 (1919), 304–23.

Intolerance was the rule on both sides. There was not a single Assembly of the Clergy that did not remind the King to work towards the destruction of heresy; in every one of these assemblies complaints were voiced about the "unholy freedom of conscience" granted to the Reformed Church. The Protestant congregations, numerically inferior in most areas, had to suffer manifold insults from the Catholics almost everywhere, but wherever they themselves were in the majority they in turn harassed the minority loyal to Rome. Protestants and Catholics lived in a sort of mutual fear of each other which frequently led to indelible hatred. It was only within the educated and moneyed classes that friendly relationships could at times exist.

The beginning of the absolute reign of Louis XIV brought about certain changes. In the very limited intellectual horizon of the King, whose ignorance in religious matters was well known at court, the political unity of the kingdom had to be followed by religious unity as well. The cohesion and power of the Protestant community appeared dangerous to him, especially since this active, diligent, and enterprising minority[17] possessed a significant part of the national wealth. He therefore more or less confessed to a desire to weaken it if not to disband it altogether. Initially he thought that he would reach his goals by means of an intellectual controversy and by withdrawing royal favor from them. After 1660 the learned disputes on Christian dogma gained added intensity. Bossuet stood out through his keen perspicacity and his irenic spirit. It was probably in collaboration with Arnauld that he created a masterful work, Exposition de la foi catholique (1671), in which Roman dogma was rid of its incidental elements and the difficult issues were presented with remarkable skill. As mentioned above, the people of Port-Royal played a significant role; the very aspect of their inward Christianity, oriented along biblical and liturgical lines, brought them closer to the Protestants. These disputes also led to positive results, the most manifest being the public abjuration by Turenne (23 October 1668), which was the culmination of a long intellectual development. There was in fact no dearth of Reformed who desired reunification and a return to the oneness of the Church. And so there were several common attempts along those lines. From 1660 to 1662 Marshall Fabert negotiated with the pastor of Sedan, Le Blanc de Beaulieu. Around 1665 Bossuet received instructions from a kind of semiofficial conference formed around the royal minister Le Tellier and the royal confessor Father Annat, with the participation of Turenne, to negotiate with the well-known Pastor Ferry. After the Peace of Aachen (2 May 1668) Turenne, who by now had converted, conceived a comprehensive plan which envisioned winning over at least fifty absolutely reliable pastors and convening a conference with them. The positive outcome of such a conference could not but have an impact on the very spirit of the Reformed. He also planned the revocation of the Edict of Nantes for some point in the future when the conversion of the majority of Protestants would have made the edict academic. Nuncio Bargellini was toying with similar ideas. Turenne appears actually to have been successful with some of the pastors, but he encountered the firm resistance of the intransigent faction of Calvinists who did their utmost to nip the plan in the bud. The war against [17] About the relationship between Protestantism and the development of modern economy cf. the classic analysis by Max Weber, "Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus," Archiv für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialethik 20/21 (1904–05).

---

Holland and the death of Turenne put a final stop to it. So the "cabal of the mediators between the religions"—as it was called then—proved unavailing.

There were moral and religious, but also material and financial reasons for that failure. Indeed it took money to aid the newly converted and especially the pastors, who were frequently abandoned to misery by their return to the Roman Church. Earlier, the only money available had been in the form of private donations, above all from the famous Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement, known to be extremely hostile to the Calvinists. Aside from these, very limited contributions had been solicited from the Assemblies of the Clergy. Turenne had finally managed to interest Louis XIV in this problem. At this point the former first secretary of Superintendent Fouquet, Paul Pellison-Fontanier, set to work. He succeeded in persuading the King to create a cash fund, soon known as the "conversion fund" (November 1677), to which was allotted a part of the income from regalia benefices. Famous Protestants such as Jurieu, Bayle and Spanheim raised accusations of corruption, but Innocent XI, Bossuet, Fénelon, Arnauld, and Bourdaloue approved of Pellison's methods. The view prevailed, at any rate, that the application of money could make the use of force unnecessary and that at least the children of converts would become good Catholics. Pellison was also interested in the distribution of Bibles and liturgical texts to the newly converted. His achievements were significant, but more so among the common folk than among the wealthy families.

Meanwhile the Catholic public in France was strongly affected by events in England and the resumption of the persecutions of "Papists." The execution of five Jesuits in London on 30 June 1679 triggered violent emotions, and now the attitude began to prevail that the civil authorities in France were much too tolerant of the heretics. It appeared to Louis XIV that the occasion was ripe for violent measures. Actually such measures had been used since the beginning of his reign: while the Peace of Saint-Germain had been favorable to the Reformed, a new declaration of 1669 applied a much more restrictive and oppressive interpretation to the Edict of Nantes. From 1660 to 1679 there were a mere twelve official acts against the Huguenots; in the six years from 1679 to 1685 there were eighty-five. Not only were all churches, opened after 1598, destroyed, but also those which were in any way found to be in violation of existing laws. In addition, harsh restrictions were imposed on the ministry of pastors. Gradually the Protestants were excluded from the majority of public offices and a large number of professions. But the most effective method was one conceived by the provincial governor of Montauban, Foucault: soldiers were forcibly quartered with the Reformed; their actions were equivalent to those in occupied territories. This was the origin of the infamous dragonnades which aroused indignation throughout Europe. Actual responsibility for them must be borne by Minister Louvois and the provincial governor of the Poitou, Marillac. Of course this method effected many conversions and even now some families started emigrating abroad. In 1683 riots took place in Vivarais and in the Dauphiné, but they were bloodily put down.

Neither Father de la Chaize, the King's confessor, nor Mme de Maintenon, however, appear to bear the responsibility—generally ascribed to them—for the way these methods developed.[18] It is certain that the King's motives were religious in only a few of the cases; for the most part they were political in nature. The events in Holland caused him to impute republican sympathies to the Reformed. He was also convinced that his fame would rest on the completion of the work he had initiated: the restoration of the religious unity of the kingdom. Lastly, he hoped that this would make him appear to be the great defender of Catholicism in the eyes of Innocent XI and thus put the latter in a difficult situation regarding Gallicanism. These motives led him to use violent measures which actually did not correspond to his character. When it was noticed in the summer of 1685 that the number of new converts, having reached several hundred thousand, represented a financial problem because they enjoyed freedom from taxation, Louis XIV thought the time had come for a final decision. On 14 October, against the advice of some of those around him, he published the Edict of Fontainebleu. It revoked the Edict of Nantes and prohibited the public exercise of the Reformed religion. With few exceptions, the most famous being that of Vauban, French and even foreign public opinion accepted this act enthusiastically. Innocent XI, who gauged the motives of Louis XIV correctly, was among the most reticent. He waited for a full year before he had a Te Deum celebrated in gratitude. But the revocation also had more serious consequences, both religious and political. The ensuing emigration by the Protestants unbalanced the economy of the realm. The abominable persecution following on the heels of the revocation is a blemish on French Catholicism. The forced conversions prepared the soil for the spread of religious relativism and indifferentism in the eighteenth century (Chap. 18).

The King, moreover, was forced to acknowledge that the revocation was for the most part a failure, for in spite of everything a strong Protestant resistance was kept alive, especially in areas with a traditionally Calvinist majority. Bloody proof of this was furnished by the Camisard rebellion of 1702 in the Cévennes. Painful and dangerous, the condition of the Protestants remained a constant source of unrest for the remainder of the ancien régime. It was beyond doubt one of the causes of the Revolution.

---

[18] See C. Pascal, La révocation de l'Édit de Nantes et Mme de Maintenon (Paris 1885).

CHAPTER 5

Spirituality in Seventeenth-Century France

Major Trends in Seventeenth-Century Spirituality

The French milieu dévot, which made its appearance after the religious wars and brought about a true renewal of Catholicism, exhibited very clear directions within its spirituality.[1] Despite the chaotic conditions, French spiritual literature was abundant during the whole of the sixteenth and the first third of the seventeenth century, but it consisted almost totally of translations.[2] The foremost were the great authors of Rhenish-Flemish mysticism, Tauler, Suso, Harphius, Ruysbroeck, Louis de Blois and the Perle Evangélique; Spaniards such as Louis of Granada and above all John of Ávila; later on Saint Teresa[3] and John of the Cross also played a significant role; the Italians are represented by the Combat spirituel of Saint Catherine of Genoa. These mystics, who combined Platonic theories with the mysticism of Nordic spirituality, were strongly influenced by the writings of Pseudo-Dionysius, excellently translated by the Feuillant friar Dom Goulu into French. The foundations were laid for a spiritual forum characterized by a mysticism whose ultimate fulfillment of the inner life was an immediate union with the divine essence, surpassing all created means and even the humanity of Christ. The growing influence of this "abstract school" was favored by the impassioned predilection of this period for mysticism. The period is rich with mystics who enjoyed great esteem. While some of them, such as Mme Acarie[4] and later the blessed Carmelite Marie de l'Incarnation (1566–1618) belonged to the noblest Parisian society, there were others like Marie Teysonnier (Marie de Valence) (1570–1648) and Marie des Vallées (1590–1656), the Saint of Coutances, who came from the poorer classes.[5] Their mystical experiences were interpreted by those around them in a very abstract sense.

---

[1] See Louis Cognet, Les origines de la spiritualité française aux XVII^e siècle (Paris 1949).

[2] Bibliographical selection: J. Dagens, Bibliographie chronologique de la littérature de piété et de ses sources, 1501–1610 (Paris 1952).

[3] See P. Sérouet, De la vie dévote à la vie mystique (Paris 1958); A. Vermeylen, Sainte Thérèse en France au XVII^e siècle (Louvain 1958).

[4] See Bruno de Jésus-Marie, La Belle Acarie (Paris 1942).

To complete the picture, it should be mentioned that parallel to the mystical trend there was also a propensity for the diabolic. It originated in the Middle Ages and persisted throughout the seventeenth century, at times leading to tragic incidents.[6] The cases of demoniacal possession produced lively curiosity; immense numbers of people hurried to witness these events. In most cases the person accused of being possessed ended up at the stake after a questionable trial. Incidents of this kind can be found throughout the century. Among the best-known cases we might mention those of Elizabeth of Ranfaing at Nancy[7] and of the Ursuline nuns of Loudun (1632–40), whose principals were Prioress Jeanne des Anges and the Jesuit Jean-Joseph Surin (1600–1665), an admirable spiritual author, who had, however, been mentally ill for many years.[8] Public exorcisms degenerated into horrific mass hysteria. But Richelieu, who was personally interested, encouraged them because he hoped they would provide him with decisive arguments against the Protestants. Only towards the end of the century did persecutions of witches and devil trials abate.

The themes of the abstract school were summarized in the work of a Capuchin friar of English origin, Benedict of Canfield (1562–1610). In 1609, almost at the end of his long career as master of novices and guardian, Canfield published his Règle de perfection. But the first version was so abstract and contained so many Platonic audacities that his superiors forced him to publish an amended edition in 1610.[9] Of merely mediocre stylistic quality, the work nevertheless went through twenty-five printings in the seventeenth century and had a profound influence. Under the guidance of Dom Beaucousin, prior of the Paris Carthusians, young Bérulle composed a Bref discours de l'abnégation intérieure (1597) which was actually no more than a very abstract adaptation of a small Italian work, but it enjoyed lasting success. On the other hand, the monumental Palais d'amour divin (1602) by the Capuchin friar Laurent de Paris (1563–1631)[10] as well as the Sentiers de l'amour divin (1623) by yet another Capuchin, Constantin de Barbanson (1582–1631),[11] manifesting similar tendencies, were soon forgotten. Although Platonic mysticism slowly became unfashionable after 1630, it did have advocates even into the time of Fénelon. Between the years 1654 and 1659 the work of a blind Carmelite, John of Saint-Samson (1571–1636), a great mystic, appeared posthumously. His writings took up the most extreme themes of Ruysbroeck and Henry of Herp. Also inspired by this kind of mysticism, although on a lesser plane, were François Malaval of Marseilles (1627–1719),[12] also blind, in his Pratique facile pour élever l'âme à la contemplation (1664), and the Premonstratensian Epiphanius Louys, abbot of Étival (d. 1682), in his Conférences mystiques (1676).

---

[5] See E. Dermenghem, La vie admirable et les révélations de Marie des Vallées (Paris 1926).

[6] Valuable bibliographical data in the special issue of Études carmélitaines, "Satan" (Paris 1948).

[7] See E. Delcambre and J. Lhermitte, Un cas énigmatique de possession en Lorraine au XVII^e siècle: Elisabeth de Ranfaing (Nancy 1956).

[8] Notable edition of letters: J. J. Surin, Correspondance, ed. by M. de Certeau (Paris 1966); cf. L. Cognet, "A propos des lettres du P. Surin," RSR 56, 2 (1968), 269–82.

[9] See J. Orcibal, "La 'Règle de Perfection' de Benoît de Canfield a-t-elle été interpolée?" Divinitas 11 (1967), 845–74.

[10] See C. Dubois-Quinard, Laurent de Paris, une doctrine du pur amour en France au début du XVII^e siècle (Rome 1959).

In the reign of Henry IV other spiritual tendencies began to appear which were no less fruitful. In his Introduction à la vie dévote (1609) Francis de Sales strove to make Christian perfection attainable for simple Christians all over the world. To this end his Traité de l'amour de Dieu (1616) develops an extraordinarily well-balanced concept of Christian mysticism centered around charitable love and a very optimistic view of the possibilities of man, a concept placing him in close proximity to humanism. By leading the soul to a devotion to God in "holy indifference" he points the way for most of the representatives of the classical period of spirituality to follow, each in his own way. Numerous printings of his Introduction—almost one a year in the course of the century—were spreading the Salesian view of piety. But although the influence of Francis de Sales was almost worldwide, he yet had no actual disciple or successor, since this designation could not be granted unequivocally even to his friend, the very prolific Jean-Pierre Camus (1584–1652), who authored more than two hundred works and became the founder of the religious novel.[13]

The founder of a true school of spirituality is encountered in the person of Pierre de Bérulle (1575–1629), appointed cardinal in 1627, whose political activities we have already discussed (Chap. 1). Proceeding from the abstract school he brought about a truly Copernican change in the field of spirituality by recognizing the preeminent significance for the inner life of the secret of Jesus' incarnation and by subsequently concentrating his piety on the person of the Incarnate Word. His ideas were first put down in a number of small devotionals which remained unpublished for a long time. It was only when forced to defend his position that he gave definitive shape to his ideas in the twelve volumes of Discours de l'état et des grandeurs de Jésus (1623),[14] which he composed with the help of his friend Saint-Cyran. His influence was maintained through the Oratory and the Carmelites and even though—as we shall demonstrate later—his was not the only impulse for the Christological piety of the seventeenth century, it has remained the most significant one. Some of Bérulle's pupils remained loyal to their master's ideas, such as Saint-Cyran and above all the Oratorian François Bourgoing (1585–1662).[15] The many reprints of the latter's Vérités et excellences de Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ (1636) made Bérulle's system accessible to a wide public in the form of devotionals. Guilleaume Gibieuf (1580–1650)[16] who had published Bérulle's collected works in 1644 was the first to come out with a treatise of Platonic orientation, De libertate Dei et creaturae. But in his La vie et grandeurs de la très sainte Vierge Marie (1637) he initiated the Mariological orientation of Bérullism. Other successors gave their own imprint to Bérulle's ideas. Foremost among those was Charles de Condren (1588–1641), Bérulle's successor in the Oratory, an intellectually curious spirit, but hostile to the written word, whose influence was felt above all by way of the spoken word. In Condren's ideas the themes of vanity of the human creature and of sacrifice through destruction gain extraordinary significance and lend strangely pessimistic and negating characteristics to him.[17] Similar perspectives formulated with rare literary talent determine the work of one of Condren's pupils, Jean-Jacques Olier (1608–57), founder of Saint-Sulpice, whose Journée chrétienne (1657) enjoyed rare success. Saint John Eudes (1601–80), also an Oratorian until he founded his own Congrégation de Jésus et Marie (1643), was at first under the profound influence of Bérulle and later under the more mystically oriented influence of Marie des Vallées. In its simplicity, his first great work, La Vie et la royaume de Jésus dans les âmes chrétiennes (1637), is essentially obligated to Bérulle. He was among the initiators of the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Mary and the Sacred Heart of Jesus, which he later developed in a Christocentric atmosphere.[18] Thus, among the authors of the classical period, the efforts of Bérulle's successors gradually led to a theological wealth of piety under the imprint of the devotion to Christ, a piety resting soundly on biblical and patristic foundations.

---

[11] See Théotime de Bois-le-Duc, "Le P. Constantin de Barbanson et le préquiétisme," CollFr 10 (1940), 338–82.

[12] See. J. Bremond, "Le quiétisme de Malaval," RAM 31 (1955), 399–418.

[13] See L. Lafuma, Les histoires dévotes de Jean-Pierre Camus (Paris 1940); J. Dagens, "Camus, écrivain dévot," Studi francesi (1958).

---

[14] See L. Cognet, "Bérulle et la théologie de l'Incarnation," XVII^e siècle 29 (1955), 330–52.

[15] See M. Leherpeur, "Le P. François Bourgoing," L'Oratoire de France 28 (1937), 286–99; 31 (1938), 241–56; 34 (1939), 125–38.

[16] See R. Notonier, "Le P. Guillaume Gibieuf," Oratoriana (1960–61); L. Cognet, "Gibieuf," DSAM 6 (1965), 356–63.

[17] See B. Kiesler, Die Struktur des Theozentrismus bei Pierre de Bérulle und Charles de Condren (Berlin 1934).

[18] See L. Cognet, "Le Cœur de Jésus et la Trinité d'après saint Jean Eudes," Le Cœur du Seigneur (Paris 1955), 180–91.

A special position in this development is occupied by the French Jesuits. But their spirituality was in no way uniform. Especially at the beginning of the century, many of their members arrived at the humanisme dévot through their predilection for aesthetic literature. They weakened, at times to a dangerous extent, the traditional demands of Christianity. This holds true for Louis Richeome (1544–1625) as well as Étienne Binet (1569–1639), who otherwise manifested some very beautiful, profoundly religious perceptions. But in Pierre Coton (1564–1626), the compliant confessor of Henry IV, we encounter a rival of Francis de Sales. His Intérieure occupation d'une âme dévote (1608) also attempts to make piety accessible to the members of the court, but with less psychological penetration. In the person of Louis Lallemant (1588–1635) we meet a true mystic who in his capacity as instructor of the tertiaries put his stamp on a whole generation of Jesuits.[19] He wrote nothing himself, but with the help of lecture notes from his pupils, Father Champion later compiled a Doctrine spirituelle (1694) which appears to reflect his teachings faithfully. Lallemant skillfully combined the most essential themes of Ignatian mysticism with those stemming from Rhenish-Flemish mysticism. The significance he gives to the unity of man with Christ puts him close to Bérulle, whom he admired without, however, being influenced by him. The same Christocentrism is found in one of Lallemant's contemporaries, who, in contrast to the latter, was an extremely prolific author: Jean-Baptiste de Saint-Jure (1588–1657). It is apparent primarily in his first work, which is also his best, De la connaissance et de l'amour du fils de Dieu Notre-Seigneur Jésus-Christ (1634), in which he demonstrates his profound knowledge of the literature of mysticism. Lallemant, too, had numerous successors who were true to his inspiration. Among them are Surin, in his unsettled way, and the very sympathetic group of Breton Jesuits consisting of Jean Rigoleuc (1595–1638), Vincent Huby (1608–93), and Julien Maunoir (1606–83), who excelled in the area of popular missions. The work of François Guilloré (1615–84), especially his interesting Secrets de la vie spirituelle qui en découvrent les illusions (1673), accentuates the mystical aspect. Unfortunately, its value is impaired by its ponderous style.[20]

---

[19] See J. Jiménex, "Précisions biographiques sur le P. L. Lallemant," AHSI 33 (1964), 269–331; idem, "En torno a la formación de la Doctrine spirituelle del P. Lallemant," AHSI 32 (1963), 225–92.

[20] See A. Klaas, "La doctrine spirituelle du P. François Guilloré," RAM 24 (1948), 143–55 (Source for numerous other articles).

The Great Christian Works

Although the French milieu catholique was characterized by a spirituality rooted in mysticism, it nonetheless grew into a center of practical activities and efficacious undertakings. We have already mentioned its popular mission work and the reform of the secular clergy and that of the religious orders, but it also initiated numerous other works. Vincent de Paul (see Chap. 1) became a symbol of Christian charity. There was hardly a single sort of distress that escaped his attention. Starting in 1618, he turned his attention to the miserable condition of the galley slaves, touching the imagination of the people to such an extent that legend had him take the place of a manacled galley slave. As we know, abject poverty and begging were two of the great festering sores of the seventeenth century and Vincent de Paul quickly became involved in these problems. In 1624 he found a helper of extraordinary ability in the person of Louise de Marillac (1591–1660). Born out of wedlock to Louis de Marillac, she married Antoine le Gras in 1613 and was widowed in 1625. In September 1621 Vincent de Paul had established a Confrérie de la Charité in Mâcon to help the poor. With the participation of the aristocracy, similar institutions were founded in other towns. But it was difficult to create close ties between the individual fraternities. In 1628 this task was entrusted to Louise de Marillac. A year later she was asked to organize the charitable fraternities in Paris and in 1634 she was given the very important charge of helping the sick of the Hôtel-Dieu. The most noble ladies of Paris participated in this work, especially the duchess of Aiguillon, a niece of Richelieu. But of equal importance was the formation of a group of helpers of the poor for such tasks as were closed to the ladies of the aristocracy by the conventions of the times. This came about, to a very modest extent, as early as 1630, but did not take on final form until the courageous Louise de Marillac became its focal point in November 1633. This was the beginning of the Filles de la Charité, whose formation was promoted vigorously by Vincent de Paul. Soon after, they were practicing the apostolate of charitable love.

In the wake of Vincent de Paul's foundings, other similar ones occurred which were, however, of lesser and generally mere local significance.[21] In 1638 through the Dames de Charité Vincent de Paul was able—initially on a very modest basis—to establish a charity for foundlings. Although it continued to grow, it never reached the level required to solve this painful problem; in the seventeenth century there were three to four hundred foundlings in and around Paris every year who were sold at eight sols to one livre pièce to beggars and carnival people.

---

[21] See M. d'Escola, Misère et charité au Grand Siècle (Paris 1942).

Yet another broad field of endeavor for Vincent de Paul's charitable love was to ameliorate the sufferings of war. In the almost total absence of logistics for supplying the troops, they existed at the expense of the populace. In the process, the mercenaries committed wholesale murder, arson, pillage, and plunder, and left in their wake fields which were devastated for a long time to come. In 1639 Vincent de Paul became involved in the sad fate of Lorraine, the Picardie, and the Champagne, which were destroyed by the Thirty Years' War. Even though he had gone over to the anti-Jansenist side—albeit more from opportunism than conviction—he yet dared turn to Charles Maignart de Bernières (1616–62), a friend of Port-Royal.[22] In order to arouse the public to this problem, twenty-nine Relations were distributed from 1650 to 1655 describing the plight of the respective provinces. In this way, abundant alms were collected and distributed on the spot to refugees.

In all his charitable works Vincent de Paul frequently received support from a secret association of piety and brotherly love, the Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement. It had been founded in 1630 by Henry de Lévis, Duke of Ventadour, with the concurrence of Louis XIV, but without official approbation.[23] It developed very rapidly and soon counted some of the most illustrious names of France among its members. Among those who were especially active in its overall administration were Gaston de Renty and above all Jean de Bernières-Louvigny (1602–59). The latter was an interesting personality, a mystic and author of religious texts, of which Le Chrétien intérieur (1660/77) enjoyed great success.[24] Beyond that, Bernières founded a house for spiritual exercises, called Hermitage, which radiated its effect through all of Normandy. We should also mention René Le Voyer d'Argenson, a productive religious author,[25] and the Marquis de Salignac, an uncle of Fénelon. The Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement placed a high value upon maintaining its lay character and its independence; it accepted no members of religious orders and very few priests, one of whom was Bossuet. Spread across France and having at its disposal a far-flung network of connections by virtue of the high social standing of its members, it played an important role on the religious as well as the political level. The Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement frequently had large financial resources; it was in a position to support numerous charitable works and often put funds at Vincent de Paul's disposal. The national and foreign missions, especially those of Canada, owe much to the Compagnie. A number of its members made great sacrifices for the poor, the sick, the prisoners, and the galley slaves without regard for their own well-being. At times the activities of the Compagnie were viewed with some reticence if not hostility. Its fight against the practice of dueling—although supported in governmental circles—met with vehement criticism from among the aristocracy. Mazarin disliked the Compagnie's political perspectives, which were exclusively Catholic-oriented; some of its members, moreover, had repeatedly demanded his dismissal from the Queen. Its virtually omnipresent system of police surveillance, used to prevent the laws of the Church from being violated, was ill-received, as was its intercession to have the most important posts filled with good Christians and to exclude men who were suspected of free thought. And finally the Compagnie showed itself to be utterly merciless in the fight against the Protestants. It did not hesitate to use any means at its disposal to close the churches and schools of the Reformed faith. It even went so far as to have Calvinist tradesmen barred from working. But more than anything else it attacked the Jansenists, who in turn swore bitter revenge. In 1660 a well-known Jansenist, Charles du Four, abbot of Annay, published two pamphlets about the Hermitage of Caen, which was known to be an affiliate of the Compagnie, and mentioned the latter by name. When Mazarin made skillful use of the situation, the Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement understood the implications: in the summer of 1660 it announced its disbandment and destroyed the larger part of its archives. On 13 December a decree prohibited all associations which had not been authorized by royal letters patent. Only a few groups in the provinces continued their activities until 1664, but more or less secretly. As late as 1664, Molière attacked the Compagnie in his Tartuffe.[26] Other secret associations were formed later which appear basically to have been a continuation of the Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement.

---

[22] See A. Féron, La vie et les œuvres de C. Maignart de Bernières, 1616–1662 (Rouen 1930).

[23] See A. Rébelliau, "Un épisode de l'histoire religieuse au XVII^e siècle, la Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement," Revue de Deux-mondes 16 (1903), 49–82; F. Bégouen, Une société secrète émule de la Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement, l'Aa de Toulouse aux XVII^e et XVIII^e siècles (Paris 1913).

[24] See M. Souriau, Deux mystiques normands, G. de Renty et J. de Bernières (Paris 1913); R. Heurtevent, L'œuvre spirituelle de Jean de Bernières (Paris 1938).

[25] See M. de Certeau, "Politique et mystique, René d'Argenson, 1596–1651," RAM 153 (1963), 1–37.

Among the apostles who were supported by the Compagnie was the venerable nun Marie of the Incarnation (1599–1672)—not to be mistaken for the Carmelite by the same name. Born Marie Guyard, she married Claude Martin in 1617 and was widowed two years later. Leading an intensely mystical life, she joined the Ursulines in 1630, became a friend and confidante of Bernières and in 1639 went to Canada, where she completely immersed herself in her apostolic work.

---

[26] See M. Émard, Tartuffe, sa vie, son milieu et la comédie de Molière (Paris 1932).

In this period she arrived at the most exalted stages of mystical union. Her spiritual experiences are preserved in two admirable autobiographical reports. Her voluminous correspondence with numerous people in France is an extraordinarily rich source and a valuable contribution to the history of Canada. Bossuet considered Marie of the Incarnation the "Teresa of France"; in her capacity as a religious writer she is without a doubt comparable to the great Carmelite. Moreover she bears witness to the rich development of French mysticism in the middle of the seventeenth century.

The milieu catholique, being dedicated above all to the task of education, continued the initiatives of the early sixteenth century. The Society of Jesus, with its long tradition in this form of the apostolate, remained the leader in this field. Their colleges enjoyed continued esteem; they were frequented by the aristocracy and granted royal favor. Mazarin had his nephew educated the Clermont College, which assumed the name Louis le Grand in 1682 when it had an enrollment of two thousand pupils, four hundred of them in residence.[27] The college Henry IV in La Flèche and that at Rennes were even more prominent.[28] Since the society concentrated heavily on the teaching of Latin literature, it trained many excellent humanists[29] and some eminent specialists, the most famous being Dominique Bouhours (1628–1702). But then the Jesuits encountered serious competition in the form of the Oratory.[30] Initially Bérulle had not intended the establishment of a college, but in 1616 he changed his mind and founded one in Dieppe, which was soon followed by others. The Académie royale, founded in 1639 in Juilly, was among the most famous of them.[31] The Oratorian colleges usually had fewer students than the Jesuit ones, although in 1642 Dieppe reached an enrollment of twelve hundred. But an experiment in a dual emphasis on Greek and Latin was not entirely successful. Mathematics and physics, on the other hand, were given a prominent position in the curriculum. On the whole the pedagogical methods of the Oratorians were both more liberal and more modern. Their colleges, too, were well attended by the most prominent society. In the framework of education we should also mention the "schools" of Port-Royal, not for the size of their enrollment but for their historical significance. In the brief span of their existence from 1646 to 1660 they only educated one hundred pupils,[32] the most famous of whom was Racine.[33] Of all the Port-Royal "recluses" it was Claude Lancelot[34] who was most consistently involved with them. He created a number of "methods" for these schools, among them the famous Jardins des Racines grecqes (1657), which advanced the state of pedagogy considerably. We have already mentioned the activities of the Ursulines and the Sisters of the Visitation in the field of girls' education. Their education never received the same high level of attention as that of boys. Even the intellectual level of the flexible and admittedly intelligent program designed by Fénelon in his famous Traité de l'éducation des filles (1687) remained quite modest. Thus the school for girls from needy aristocratic families founded by Mme de Maintenon in the former abbey of Saint-Cyr in 1686,[35] to which she devoted constant personal care, was far from turning out learned women. In spite of these lacunae, the education of the higher classes had reached an excellent level by the end of the seventeenth century.

---

[27] See G. Dupont-Ferrier, Du Collège de Clermont à Louis-le-Grand, 3 vols. (Paris 1921).

[28] See G. de La Rochemonteix, Le Collège Henri IV de La Flèche, 4 vols. (Le Mans 1889).

[29] See F. de Dainville, Naissance de l'humanisme moderne (Paris 1940).

[30] See P. Lallemand, Essai sur l'histoire de l'éducation dans l'ancien Oratoire de France (Paris 1887).

[31] See C. Hamel, Histoire de l'abbaye et du collège de Juilly (Paris 1868).

This did not hold true for the lower classes. To be sure, parish schools and charitable schools had been established almost everywhere, but these had encountered great difficulties both in general and in the training of teachers; for these reasons their achievements were not more than mediocre. This explains the fundamental importance of a small number of teachers sponsored in 1684 by the former prebendary of Reims, John Baptist de la Salle (1651–1719), who were given a definitive organization in Vaugirard (1694): the Brothers of the Christian Schools (Frères des Écoles chrétiennes). This new foundation initially encountered great difficulties but finally blossomed until it corresponded perfectly to its task of providing an elementary education in its various forms. In the course of the seventeenth century it led to similar efficacious, albeit more limited experiments of this sort. But in the countryside the problem stayed largely unsolved, as demonstrated by the continuing high number of illiterates.

Christian Life

The efforts by involved Catholics showed rapid achievements in the realm of religious practices, piety, and Christian life. Along with the increasing renewal of the clergy the parishes were once again turning into genuinely spiritual places. Sermons were given regularly; the clergy had recourse to solid materials in sermon books readily at their disposal. Sermons by such famous practitioners as the Oratorian Le Jeune, Sénault, and later Bossuet, Bourdaloue, Massilon, Mascaron, Fléchier, and many others were not only published as religious reading, but were to serve as examples to the clergy and to inspire them. The great number of such works appearing throughout the century cannot even be estimated.[36] Catechism classes were revived; many dioceses published catechisms, some of which enjoyed great success,[37] as for instance the Catéchisme des trois Henris (entitled after the first names of the editing bishops) used in the dioceses of Angers, Luçon and La Rochelle. This revival made possible a steady increase in devotional literature. As a matter of fact, the production in this area is overwhelming; it includes works designed for a relatively well-educated audience as well as for the more simple readers. Jesuits, the Oratory, and Port-Royal were competing to outdo each other in productivity; to the present day it has not been possible to compile an exhaustive bibliography. In the process there came about a variety of literary genres, of which three were favored: works of meditation, moral treatises concerning the duties of daily life, and the hagiographies. While the saints occupied the first place among the latter, they satisfied a mere part of the demand. The seventeenth century loved religious biographies, and whenever a personality revered in some fashion died, a historian surfaced, so that there was never a dearth of such books.

---

[32] See L. Cognet, "Les Petites-Écoles de Port-Royal," Cahiers de l'Association internationale des études françaises 3–5 (1953), 20–29.

[33] See J. Orcibal, "L'enfance de Racine," Revue d'Histoire littéraire de la France 51 (1951), 2–16.

[34] See L. Cognet, Claude Lancelot Solitaire de Port-Royal (Paris 1950).

[35] See T. Lavallée, Mme de Maintenon et al Maison royale de Saint-Cyr (Paris 1862).

The seventeenth century was above all a privileged period for devotions. While they were not any more popular than in the Middle Ages, they now found followers among the educated and were propagated by the great representatives of spirituality and by famous theologians. In first place was the worship of Mary, a symbol of which may have been the gesture by Louis XIII on 15 August 1638 to dedicate his kingdom to the Most Blessed Virgin, an act that horrified the Protestant ambassadors.[38] Although thologians repeatedly protested abuses in the worship of Mary, especially towards the end of the century,[39] they received no support among the general populace. We have already mentioned the devout worship of the Sacrament of the Altar, with its intention of expiating the insults by the Calvinists. The group around Bérulle now developed a loving worship of Jesus' infancy. This was inspired primarily by a young Carmelite from Beaune, Marguerite Parigot, whose convent name was Marguerite of the Blessed Sacrament (1619–48). In 1636 she founded a devout association called the Famille du saint Enfant-Jésus.[40] The Oratory and the Carmelites took over the propagation of the worship of the Infancy of Jesus, aided energetically by Mme Guyon later on.[41] While devotion to the Sacred Heart has earlier origins, it nonetheless created special forms of expression in the seventeenth century. They were initiated by Saint John Eudes, who was the first to establish that liturgical cult around 1670. But the decisive role in this was played by a member of the Sisters of the Visitation, Saint Margaret Mary Alacoque (1647–90).[42] Completely self-taught and of modest education, she was but a mediocre author whose writings moreover were destroyed upon her death by her mother superior. Yet she conveyed very touching private revelations which were in part made known to the public before her death by the Retraite spirituelle (1684), the posthumous work of her spiritual guide, the Jesuit Claude de la Colombière (1641–82). But this new type of piety encountered strong resistance and did not spread until the following century.

---

[36] See E. Griselle, Bourdaloue, Histoire critique de sa prédication (Lille 1901); J. Lebarq, Histoire critique de la prédication de Bossuet (Paris 1888).

[37] See J. C. Dhôtel, Les origines du catéchisme modern d'aprés les premiers manuels imprimés en France (Paris 1967).

[38] See C. Flachaire, La dévotion à la Vierge dans la littérature catholique au commencement du XVII^e siècle (Paris 1957).

[39] See P. Hoffer, La dévotion à Marie au déclin du XVII^e siècle (Paris 1938).

The liturgical efforts of the seventeenth century must be viewed from a threefold perspective. First, new liturgical texts were created. At this time the bishops had extensive authority in this matter. To be sure, a detailed history in this regard has not yet been written, but it is certain that numerous dioceses had their own breviaries or missals. In 1680 Harlay de Champvallon had texts stricken from the Parisian breviary concerning episodes of legendary origin; also an attempt was made to reintroduce a uniform character to the divine service. This effort was made in many other dioceses as well. There was also an attempt to provide the liturgical books with thorough and accurate theological commentaries, modeled after the famous Instructions du Rituel d'Alet (1667), requested by Pavillon from the group of Port-Royal and edited by Barcos, the nephew of Saint-Cyran. In spite of their Jansenist origin they were approved by thirty bishops; although they did provoke a polemic they were even adopted by dioceses which were headed by anti-Jansenist prelates. Finally, a third problem had to be solved: the liturgical text had to be made accessible to those of the faithful who did not understand Latin. This presented an obstacle of a very special kind.

---

[40] See E. Deberre, Histoire de la vénérable Marguerite du Saint-Sacrement (Paris 1907).

[41] See I. Noye, "Enfance de Jésus," DSAM 4 (1959), 652–82.

[42] See A. Hamon, Histoire de la dévotion au Sacré-Cœur, 5 vols. (Paris 1923–40); P. Blanchard, Sainte Marguerite-Marie, expérience et doctrine (Paris 1961).

Many Catholics feared that the translation of liturgical texts into French might favor the Calvinist spirit, since this was precisely one of the main demands of the Reformed Church. On the other hand, there was also the convinction that the use of Latin provided a necessary element of mystery to the ceremonies which would be lost by translating, especially the Canon of the Mass. Yet in the period 1587 to 1660 at least five separate translations of the Ordinary were printed. Port-Royal had played a significant role in these efforts with its Office de l'Église et de la Vierge en latin et en français (1650), generally referred to as Heures de Port-Royal, which enjoyed great success with its many printings. It was followed by the Office du Saint-Sacrement (1659) and the Piété des chrétiens envers les morts (1665). But a violent controversy was triggered by the translation of the complete missal in 1660 by Jacques de Voisin (d. 1685), an erudite and by no means Jansenist theologian who was victimized in part by political considerations. Voisin's work was censured immediately after it appeared by the Assembly of the Clergy and by the Sorbonne. It was also condemned in a brief by Alexander VII dated 12 January 1661. But this brief, which never came up for passage in parliament, had limited success, since it did not keep Voisin from publishing in 1662 a translation of the Office of Holy Week. Among the defenders of Voisin was Arnauld. But the most important work of this kind was that of one of the confessors at Port-Royal, Nicolas Le Tourneux (1640–86). At his death he left behind a manuscript in the process of being published, Année chrétienne. Completed by his friend Ernest Ruth d'Ans,[43] it constitutes a remarkable spiritual explication of the liturgical texts. In addition he wrote a translation of the Roman breviary, also published after his death. The Jansenist origin of these works led to several incidents and in 1695 Année chrétienne was placed on the Index. But Le Tourneux's work was taken up again in the eighteenth century and led to a renewal of liturgical devotion in France.

Translation of the books of the Bible posed similar problems. Reading the Holy Scriptures in French was one of the chief demands of the Reformed Church and this created among the Catholics a certain emotional prejudice towards any such translations. Consequently the number of French translations available to the Catholics for most of the seventeenth century was very small.[44] Foremost among them were those by Deville (1613), Frizon (1621), Pierre de Besse (1631), and Corbin (1643), all of which followed the old Louvain translation very closely. But they were hardly known to the public.

---

[43] See X. Janne d'Othée, Ernest Ruth d'Ans, secrétaire du grand Arnauld (Verviers 1949).

[44] See D. Lortsch, Histoire de la bible en France (Paris 1910); J. Baroni, La Contre-Réforme devant la bible (Lausanne 1943).

Only the New Testament which appeared frequently in separate printings, improved through a few supplementary translations, achieved a broader distribution. The situation changed somewhat after 1660 when several translations such as the New Testament by the Oratorian Amelote (1667) and of the Bible by Desmarets de Saint-Sorlin (1669) reached the general public. The Jansenists played a significant role in this field of endeavor with the so-called Mons New Testament (1667) and, above all, with the Bible annotated by Sacy whose thirty-two volumes appeared from 1672 to 1696. Predictably, the translations of Port-Royal caused several polemics in which Arnauld took an effective part. But these attacks did not make them any less appreciated. Moreover, as mentioned earlier, translations of the Bible and liturgy were frequently needed for use by new converts from Protestantism.

A significant part of Christian life was the development of religious art. Characterized by a profound inwardness in the very sobriety of its form it slipped into a decorative phase after 1668.[45] This development is especially noticeable in religious painting where the initial tendency is incorporated: in the work of Simon Vouet (1590–1649), Georges de la Tour (1593–1657), Eustache Le Sueur (1617–55), and Philippe de Champaigne (1602–74). The later phase is represented by Pierre Mignard (1610–95) and Charles Le Brun (1619–90). In the field of architecture the difference in inspiration is to a certain extent obscured by the continuity in planning. At first a strong Roman influence can be perceived: even Bernini was asked for designs. A great religious zeal produced a boom that resulted in more than thirty churches being built in the first half of the century. Several among them excel by virtue of their truly authentic religious character, such as Port-Royal of Paris, Val-de-Grâce, and the chapel of the Sorbonne. After 1660 church architecture became an instrument to the glory of the King, as represented by the Hôtel des Invalides and also by the chapel of Versailles, both of which attest in their own way to the change in the artistic climate.

From Cartesianism to Quietism

The far-reaching religious transformation in France after 1660 came from a profound change of mentality in which Cartesian rationalism was able to gain ground. There was a simultaneous development towards psychological and moral analysis and introspection. The tendency in regard to the inner life was towards seeking one's own identity within a clear consciousness, within clearly formulated thoughts; all obscure elements and those that could not be articulated were viewed with distrust. Mystical experience gradually disappeared from the perspective of consciousness; its dynamic and fundamental role in Christian life was being forgotten. In its place a spiritual psychologism and moralism were introduced into devotional literature. Yet this current did produce some valuable works which were based on a dogmatic fundament indebted to Bérulle's Christocentricity.

---

[45] See C. Mauricheau-Beaupré, L'art au XVII^e^ siècle, 2 vols. (Paris 1947).

One of the most prominent representatives of this movement was the Jansenist Pierre Nicole (1625–95), the longtime collaborator of Arnauld. In 1672 he began publishing his famous Essais de morale, a sequence of small treatises and commentaries on the Bible which enjoyed great popularity until the Revolution. Two other Jansenists were competing with him. One was the Oratorian Pasquier Quesnel (1624–1719), whose religious and political role has already been discussed. He was also a remarkable religious author. It should be remembered that his Réflexions morales (1693), long before they became the immediate cause of the bull Unigenitus, served as the basis for meditation to many of the faithful, even among non-Jansenists. His many other devotional writings, especially his frequently reprinted Prières chrétiennes (1687), demonstrate a remarkable talent for dealing exhaustively with topics of Bérulle's theology. Quesnel's literary abilities almost equaled those of Jacques-Joseph Du Guet (1649–1733), a former Oratorian as well, who was deeply engaged in the disputes over Jansenism.[46] Du Guet was an admirable author who deserves to be counted among the greatest. Unfortunately the very enormity of the body of his works, which exceeds one hundred printed volumes, as well as the all too undifferentiated uniformity of his very perfection detract from his work. But it should yet be possible to reawaken an interest in some of his most successful works, such as the Traité de la prière publique and the ten volumes of his Lettres de morale et de piété (1707–53). He advanced the art of psychological analysis farther than did Quesnel and showed rare powers of differentiation. Quesnel and Du Guet followed in Nicole's footsteps and ensured the continuity into the eighteenth century. But they should not obscure the other authors of like tendencies. A special place is occupied by the doctor of Port-Royal, Jean Hamon (1618–87), who left behind a voluminous body of writings, part of which was not published until much later.[47] His poetic and colorful style, above all in his Lettres et opuscules (1734) and his treatise De la solitude (1734), distinguish them from the somewhat drab language of the rest of the works from Port-Royal. Finally, we should call attention to the third superior general of Saint-Sulpice, Louis Tronson (1622–1700), whose famous Examens particuliers (1690) made an imprint on the development of conscience and on introspection for innumerable generations of priests. They have been read in most of the religious orders up until our day.

---

[46] P. Chételat, Étude sur Du Guet (Paris 1877).

[47] See L. Cognet, "Hamon," DSAM 7 (1968), 64–71.

The development of psychologism in spirituality gradually led to a distrust of mysticism and created a climate favorable to the outbreak of a crisis. This process crystallized around a woman, Jeanne-Marie Bouvier de la Motte (1648–1717), married to Jacques Guyon du Chesnoy[48] and widowed since 1676. She was a devout person given to a somewhat exaggerated mysticism who used her considerable fortune and the freedom of her widowed state in order to dedicate herself to a spiritual apostolate which led her, together with her spiritual guide, the Barnabite François La Combe (1643–1715), to Savoy, Turin, and Grenoble.[49] Having returned to Paris in 1686, she was embroiled in a financial controversy in 1688 caused by the greed of Harlay de Champvallon and leading to the incarceration of Father La Combe. Mme Guyon was released upon the intervention of Mme de Maintenon. The latter introduced her into the royal residence of Saint-Cyr, where in October 1688 she met Fénelon. After a little hesitation he recognized her spiritual gifts and entered into a close relationship with her. By this time Mme Guyon had already written a lot, but published very little. Only her Moyen court et très facile pour l'oraison (1685) had been fairly successful. The rest of her writings were published very much later, between 1712 and 1720, by the pietistic pastor Pierre Poiret, one of her ardent admirers. Not very original, but also not without talent and skill, Mme Guyon's writings present the classical teachings of the great tradition of Christian mysticism. But at times her expression lacks precision, which explains why her books occasionally caused some disquiet.[50]

Fénelon, too, had been introduced at Saint-Cyr by Mme de Maintenon. Under his and Mme Guyon's leadership the spirituality there was influenced in a clearly mystical direction. But the trial in Rome against Molinos (1687; Chap. 8) had aroused public opinion even in France and resulted in an attitude hostile to mysticism. Given the maliciousness of the court, where Mme de Maintenon was hated, this was enough to accuse her of spreading quietism at Saint-Cyr. Mme de Maintenon tried to counteract the accusation by removing Fénelon and Mme Guyon from Saint-Cyr in the spring of 1693. She also prevailed in having Mme Guyon's writings examined by Bossuet, who was by no means a specialist in matters of mysticism. In fact these were almost totally foreign to him. This did not prevent him from rendering an unequivocally negative judgment in March 1694. Above all he reproached Mme Guyon for her views on the passive state, which in his opinion was incompatible both with the practice of the prayer of supplication and the exercise of Christian virtues. Thereupon Mme Guyon demanded a more precise examination. This led to the discussions of Issy from July 1694 to 10 March 1695 in which Bossuet, Noailles, and Tronson conferred, with none of them actually being competent in this matter. Fénelon, having been appointed archbishop of Cambrai in February 1695, succeeded in having a protocol composed which contained thirty-four paragraphs relating to the inner life. This brought the conferences to a hardly satisfactory conclusion.

---

[48] See ibid., "Guyon," DSAM 6 (1967), 1306–38.

[49] See G. Boffito, Scrittori Barnabiti II (Florence 1933–34), 305–11.

[50] See L. Cognet, "La spiritualité de Mme Guyon," XVII^{e} siècle 12–14 (1952), 269–75.

Next Bossuet wrote a long pastoral instruction on this topic largely designed to prove Mme Guyon wrong for which he hoped to obtain Fénelon's concurrence and, with it, the latter's disassociation from Mme Guyon. But Fénelon rejected any sort of condemnation of her. He had received significant ideas from her and maintained an unswerving devotion towards her, proof of an admirable degree of loyalty. In July 1696 Fénelon received Bossuet's manuscript and returned it to him with a categorical rejection. Yet he perceived that the time had come for him to clarify his own position. In the summer of 1696 he used a stay in Cambrai to compose his Explication des Maximes des Saints sur la vie intérieure, a compact systematization of his mystical spirituality centered around his ideas of pure love and completely unselfish Christian charity. Bossuet, having been appraised of the existence of the work, tried to prevent its publication. But Fénelon's friends thereupon hurried the printing along so that the Maximes were published at the beginning of February 1697, more than a month before Bossuet's Instruction sur les états d'oraison, a work very much lacking in matters of spirituality which nonetheless attacked Mme Guyon violently. Next, Bossuet started agitating public opinion and prejudicing the King against Fénelon, whom he openly accused of quietism. But Fénelon succeeded in securing the King's permission to put the matter before the Holy See.

In France, Fénelon and Bossuet exchanged numerous polemics and the conflict was joined by many other experts. On 15 September 1697 Fénelon defined his ideas extremely well in a remarkable pastoral instruction which received the support of numerous theologians. By April 1698 Bossuet realized that he would not win this fight on the level of doctrine. Urged on by part of those around him and blinded by vengefulness, he then engaged in a contemptible campaign of defamation. In June 1698 he published his Relation sur le quiétisme which completely avoided the basic problems and was nothing but a long persiflage. Moreover, he included many slanderous innuendos regarding the relationship between Fénelon and Mme Guyon, making use, with incredible indiscretion, of even the most confidential communications. This tactic turned out to be very effective and Fénelon's beautiful Réponse à la relation (August 1698) was unable to save the situation.

Innocent XII, who scorned Bossuet because of the latter's Gallicanism, did not conceal his sympathy for Fénelon because of the latter's recognition of papal prerogatives. Convinced of the archbishop's profound orthodoxy and of his loyalty to the authentic mystical tradition, he tried his best, including the use of procrastination, to avoid having to condemn Fénelon.[51] But Bossuet's propagation in Rome of the Relation sur le quiétisme was most injurious to Fénelon's reputation. Yet Innocent XII would probably not have given in had it not been for the personal persistent interference on the part of Louis XIV, who was completely on the side of Bossuet. The disfavor aimed at Fénelon, his family, and friends clearly showed the King's attitude; barely disguised threats reached all the way to the Vatican. It was well known that, given the Pope's advanced age, a conclave was not far off and that the cardinals feared a negative attitude on the part of France. So they pressured Innocent XII in order to obtain a condemnation in principle and the Pope regretfully gave in. But Cardinal Albano, secretary of briefs and the future Clement XI, succeeded in defying Bossuet even by means of this condemnation. The brief Cum alias,[52] dated 12 March 1699, was simply a brief, whereas Bossuet had expected a formal bull. Furthermore, it contained the proviso "motu proprio," which usually caused the French parliament to reject it. Twenty-three sentences from the Maximes were condemned as a whole, but without any individual qualifications. The term "heretical" did not occur in the brief. Fénelon accepted the condemnation without reservation in a pastoral letter of 9 April, and on this occasion Innocent XII sent him a letter of unusual praise. A little later, in October, in order to demonstrate his sympathy he announced his intention to elevate Fénelon to a cardinalship, an honor which he persistently refused Bossuet. But Fénelon's friends kept him from it because they feared the wrath of Louis XIV. For the rest of his life Fénelon was banished from the court to his diocese of Cambrai; yet he continued to maintain his deep affection for Mme Guyon, who had been incarcerated in December 1695 under most obscure circumstances. It was only in March 1703 that she was freed and exiled to [51] See J. Orcibal, Le procès des Maximes des Saints devant le Saint-Office (Rome 1968).

---

[52] Text: BullRom 20, 870b.

Blois. From here she was able secretly to correspond with Fénelon, who in turn sent his nephews and selected pupils to her. Mme Guyon subsequently had a strong influence on the milieu of Protestant Pietism, especially in England.[53] But the foresight of Innocent XII was proved correct: the condemnation of Fénelon damaged Christian mysticism on the whole and caused it to enter a period of regression for more than a century.

---

[53] A. de la Gorce, "Mme Guyon à Blois," Études 310 (1961), 182–96.

CHAPTER 6

Christian Thought in Seventeenth-Century France

Systematic and Scholastic Theology

Catholic renewal, initiated at the beginning of the seventeenth century, was manifested less in the realm of thought than in the area of Christian life and spirituality. The men of the Counter Reformation did not occupy themselves with a renewal of theological methods. Patristics and history became objects of detailed studies only inasmuch as they were forced upon them by the exigency of polemics with the Reformed Churches. But it was not their intention to continue the efforts of the great Christian humanists of the Renaissance in these areas. The famous theological faculties and above all the Sorbonne remained bastions of traditional speculative theology. Here the situation of the prominent Parisian professors was characteristic. Their teachings were almost exclusively Thomistic, their lectures nothing but commentaries on the Summa theologica. This does not mean, however, that they were actually based upon a genuine Thomism. Rather they were frequently influenced by the deteriorating Scholasticism of the waning Middle Ages.

We see this reflected in the case of the well-known Philippe de Gamaches (1568–1625), professor at the Sorbonne, whose honor it was to count Bérulle and Condren among his pupils and who doubtlessly strongly influenced Bérulle. Although he, together with Duval, was among the first to occupy one of the chairs for positive theology established by Henry IV in 1598, his method remained absolutely Scholastic. His numerous quotes from the Fathers were intended as proof or illustration, but not as a return to the thought of Christian antiquity. Vestiges of nominalism as well as a strong Augustinian influence are occasionally discernible in his work. His competitor Nicolas Isambert (1565–1642), who published a voluminous commentary on the Summa in 1639, represented a much more consistent Thomism, although he did not universally accept the concept of absolute predestination independent of previous merit. Aside from the Sorbonne professors many Jesuits could be mentioned who under the cover of Saint Thomas Aquinas introduced ideas of the new theology of Molina and Lessius.

Within the same framework were others representing even more independent thoughts. This holds true for André Duval, whose role in the Gallican conflict we have mentioned before. His commentary on the prima pars of the Summa is still unpublished in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris; that on the secunda pars was published by him in 1636. Duval, a follower of the abstract school, approved of Canfield's theses. He had read Ruysbroeck and Henry of Herp and was preoccupied with Platonic ideas. All these influences are reflected in his commentary on Saint Thomas Aquinas as well. He is therefore an informative witness for the Platonic tendencies in spirituality and theology especially up to 1630; its presence up to Bérulle has already been mentioned. It was in the latter's circle that a strange theological study appeared which did not claim the auspices of Saint Thomas Aquinas and furthermore made no bones about its Platonic origin: De libertate Dei et creaturae by the Oratorian Guilleaume Gibieuf, whose Marian spirituality has been mentioned earlier.[1] Gibieuf's complex system posits the highest idea of freedom in God and its perfect realization in Jesus Christ, the God-Man. Therefore, man's freedom increases the more it approximates that of Christ and becomes incapable of sin. Gibieuf rejects both the Thomist idea of praedeterminatio physica as well as the Molinist idea of the scientia media. His thoughts are clearly inspired by Ruysbroeck and Henry of Herp. This work provoked a violent controversy in which the Jesuit Theophile Raynaud pointed out the Rhenish-Flemish origins of his opponent. Gibieuf's presentation breaks with Scholastic tradition by virtue of its continuous structure, but his primarily deductive method is absolutely ahistoric. His work was unique in its way, since Platonism in theology as well as in spirituality was retreating after 1630. The only treatise which could be connected with Gibieuf's work is De Sancto Sacerdotio (1631) by the Oratorian Paul Métézeau (1583–1632), who develops a hierarchic, Platonic, and dionysian theology of the priesthood.[2]

After this period the teaching at the theological faculties more and more lost contact with reality, towards an abstract speculation out of step with the spiritual tendencies of the time. The rejection of Cartesianism by official circles—a topic to be dealt with later—may serve as an example. A characteristic work in this regard is the Opera theologica of Martin Grandin (1604–91), who was famous for his piety and erudition. Published posthumously in 1710 by his former pupil and compilator Charles du Plessis d'Argentré, it is a more or less mediocre commentary on a few articles of the Summa, devoid of any originality. Henceforth the teaching duties at the Sorbonne, instead of being a source of true intellectual education, appeared to even the best of minds as no more than a condition for achieving university degrees. It is a significant fact that even Bossuet did not keep his notes of the lectures he attended at the Collège de Navarre. Some minds were aware of this stagnation and, in an attempt to renew the theology from within, strove for a synthesis with spirituality, yet still by traditional methods. One of them was Louis Bail (1610–69), who wanted to create a comprehensive work on spiritual theology on a Scholastic basis, his Théologie affective ou saint Thomas en méditations, which appeared in four parts from 1638 to 1650. This work is not without merit, but has a certain ponderousness about it. Besides, it is not entirely free of commonplaces. In this field Bail is far behind the Dominican Guillaume de Contenson (1641–74), the author of the Theologia mentis et cordis (1668–87). Left incomplete, it was concluded by his fellow Dominican Massoulié. The speculationes, a presentation of the dogma with a heavy Scholastic imprint, are followed by the reflexiones, subtly differentiated spiritual discussions which—while at times going rather far afield—do contain some very beautiful pages. Unfortunately these spiritual reflections are not always connected in a natural fashion with the theological part. Consequently the work does not show the necessary unity; its speculative tendency is weakened by its methodology.[3]

---

[1] See G. Marafini, Agli albori del Giansenismo, Guglielmo Gibieuf e il suo pensiero intorno alla libertà (Rome 1947); J. Orcibal, "Néoplatonisme et jansénisme, du De libertate du P. Gibieuf à l'Augustinus: 'Nuove ricerche storiche sul giansenismo,'" AnGr 71 (Rome 1954), 33–57.

[2] I. Noye, Sacerdoce et sainteté d'après le P. Métézeau: La Tradition sacerdotale (Le Puy 1962), 169–89.

Moral theology was no doubt in a more critical situation. Theologians frequently developed problems of moral theology following the respective quaestiones of Saint Thomas's Summa, but in a purely speculative and theoretical fashion. No one intended to create the basis for an individual theological moral philosophy. At the same time an ever more distinct predilection for casuistry was developing. To a certain extent this development was even demanded by the need to reform the clergy as well as by the necessity to educate sufficiently well-instructed confessors. Instruction in the casus conscientiae was included in all the curricula of clerical education. In this area the Jesuits, the great guides of souls, are undeniable masters. Yet the Society of Jesus scarcely produced any famous casuists in France; the most prominent authors in this field were foreigners. In passing, one could mention Étienne Bauny (1564–1649) who taught at Clermont College from 1618 to 1625. He is primarily known as the author of a French handbook for priests who could not read Latin sufficiently well, the Somme des péchés qui se commettent en tous états (Paris 1634). This casuistry is nothing more than a collection of guidelines for the treatment of specific cases, but the fundamental problems of morality are not at all mentioned. Probabilism, without any theoretical justification, is applied as the basic principle. The method of casuistry soon crossed over into the field of controversialism and in so doing became one of the most controversial topics of seventeenth-century religious thought, mainly for political reasons. The major cause lay in the old enmity between the university and the Jesuits. A regulation, issued in 1618 and jealously upheld, obliged the candidates for a baccalaureate degree to study for three years with the professors of the theological faculty and not to have any other teachers of theology. This excluded the Jesuit pupils from the baccalaureate. The Jesuits were most reluctant to submit to this humiliating regulation; towards the end of 1642 they attacked it, causing another round of polemics. In order to discredit the Jesuits, partisans of the university published a pamphlet in August 1643 entitled Théologie morale des jésuites extraite fidèlement de leurs livres, a collection of clearly laxist solutions from the pens of Jesuit casuists. This pamphlet was written by Doctor François Hallier and the young Antoine Arnauld, who was then at the beginning of his career. Although the controversy was belayed quickly, the public remained sensitive to this issue. Thus the ground remained fertile for the great talent of Pascal, who resumed the battle in 1656 with his fifth Provinciale. At this point the issue of laxist casuistry interfered with the Jansenist conflict and furnished a veritable arsenal of arguments against the Jesuits which were used again and again. But it should be noted that no one actually unfolded the problem by starting with its root causes. Neither Pascal nor Nicole in his annotations, added to his Latin translation of the Provinciales (1658), nor the Jesuit Georges Pirot (1599–1669) in his Apologie pour les casuistes (1657) posed the question of the actual value of probabilism in its fundamental principles. Henceforth Jesuits and laxism, and Jansenism and rigorism were firmly identified with each other in the eyes of the general public. Not even the example of a rigorist Jesuit such as Bordaloue could change that. The moralism of the spiritual authors of the waning seventeenth century is of a purely psychological and empirical nature. Not until the Traité de morale (1683) of Malebranche do we encounter an essay on Christian moral philosophy, but it was conceived in an atmosphere dominated entirely by Descartes.

---

[3] See A. Bozaudun, Une gloire dominicaine, histoire du T.R.P. de Contenson (Montauban 1863).

The Development of Historical Theology

Various causes contributed to the fact that Scholasticism gradually became archaic and unfashionable. The anti-Protestant controversies played a significant role in this development. We should recall that the Reformed, especially the Calvinists, refused to recognize medieval theology, viewing it as the application of totally heathen logic to the realities of the revelation. So their own weapons had to be used against them: the Scriptures and the Fathers. From 1575 on, the Bibliotheca patrum of Marguerin de la Bigne (1546–90) offered a valuable source to the controversialists. In 1644 it was reprinted in seventeen folios. After 1600, scientific editions of authors from Christian antiquity multiplied, and numerous formerly unpublished works were made accessible. Work in this field encompassed the entire century and reached a high level of scientific precision, especially in the great editions of the Benedictines of Saint-Maur. Initially this abundant material was used primarily for polemics; the Discours de controverse by Bérulle (1609) is a good example of that sort of use. But soon the scientific investigation of that period became an independent science, disregarding polemical prejudice and seeking fulfillment in the interest in Christian antiquity, an interest which spread from the Italian Counter Reformation to the French milieu dévot.

Some famous specialists excelled in this field, the Jesuit Jacques Sirmond (1559–1651) for instance, who during his long life was able to engage in extensive editorial activities, above all the Concilia antiqua Galliae (1629). There was also his fellow Jesuit Théophile Raynaud (1582–1663), whose polemics against Gibieuf have already been mentioned. He gave us an excellent edition of Anselm of Canterbury (1630). Among the Dominicans we should mention François Combéfis (1605–79), a specialist in Greek patristics who published a remarkable edition of the writings of Maximus Confessor (1675). It was also his somewhat dangerous merit to prove that the acts of the Sixth Ecumenical Council concerning the condemnation of Pope Honorius were in no way a falsification. The Oratorians made their contribution in the person of Jean Morin (1591–1659), whom we shall meet again in his capacity as exegete, but who was also an admirable expert in oriental liturgical texts. The two volumes of Supplementum operum sancti Augustini (1654), edited by his fellow Oratorian Jérôme Vignier (1606–61), also known as an exegete, are unfortunately full of errors into which he was led by his anti-Jansenist zeal.[4]

Among the French scholarly groups the reformed Benedictines of Saint-Maur (Maurists) whose center was the Benedictine abbey of Saint-Germain-des-Prés occupied a special place. The initial impulse came from their first superior, Dom Grégoire Tarrisse,[5] but the actual organizer of their scholarly work was Dom Luc d'Achéry (1609–85), the founder of the marvelous library of Saint-Germain who placed at the disposal of his fellow monks tools which were unique at that time.[6] His work was continued by the famous Dom Jean Mabillon (1632–1707) a milestone of whose prodigious production was his edition of the writings of Bernard of Clairvaux (1667).[7] Aside from him there were others, no less famous, such as Dom Bernard de Montfaucon (1655–1742), Dom Thomas Blampin (1640–1710), who directed the edition of the works of Saint Augustine, and many more. The work of the Maurists continued until the Revolution and comprised the majority of the patristic literature. Even today their folios represent a prime example of scholarship. Their untiring efforts extended into all other areas of the holy sciences. Yet prior to them, other learned circles had exercised a similar influence, such as the one formed around the brothers Dupuy, where Bossuet developed his critical thinking and scholarship.[8] The role of this circle in the issue of Gallicanism has already been mentioned.

Another product of these editorial activities were the comprehensive syntheses of patristic theology. Several names already mentioned in connection with their editorial work excelled in this field as well. These endeavors were dominated, however, by the mighty figure of the Jesuit Denis Petau (1583–1652), whose Dogmata theologica (1644–50) represented a theretofore unsurpassed monument of patristic work of extraordinary informational and analytical exactness.[9] In the person of Louis Thomassin (1619–95) he had a competitor from the ranks of the Oratorians, but Thomassin's comprehensive Dogmata theologica (1680–84), written in a more personal vein, was inferior to Petau's in its lack of objectivity. He also authored a number of historical and dogmatic treatises in French.[10] Petau's work quite unintentionally sealed the disrepute into which Scholasticism had fallen even before the century had reached its midpoint. Jansen had already criticized its methods in his Augustinus and Saint-Cyran faulted Saint Thomas for having lived in a century in which philosophy and human judgment were overvalued.

---

[4] See E. Havet, "Les decouvertes de Jérôme Vignier," BÉCh 46 (Paris 1885); L. Saltet, "Un mystificateur janséniste," BLE 43 (1942), 75 ff.

[5] See F. Rousseau, Dom Grégoire Tarrisse, premier supérieur général de la Congrégation de Saint-Maur (Paris 1924).

[6] See M. Laurain, "Les travaux d'érudition des Mauristes, origine et évolution," RHEF 43 (1957), 231–72.

[7] See H. Leclercq, Mabillon, 2 vols. (Paris 1953–57).

[8] See I. Uri, Un cercle savant au XVII^e^ siècle (Paris 1886).

[9] See J. C. Vital-Chatellain, Le P. Denis Petau d'Orléans, jésuite, sa vie et ses œuvres (Paris 1884).

An analogous development can be traced in the field of exegesis. The tradition of spiritual, moral, and even allegorical exegesis no doubt continued to be widespread. They were used primarily by the people of Port-Royal, and especially in Sacy's Bible and in the Explications sur le Nouveau Testament (1683) by his secretary Nicolas Fontaine (1625–1709); both of them joined the patristic tradition and particularly that of Augustine. Bossuet too can be added on the basis of his Apocalypse avec une explication (1689). A parallel, albeit less significant tradition, was that of scientific exegesis. It originated in the humanistic endeavors of the Renaissance and was represented by the Jesuit Johannes Maldonatus in Paris. In 1645 this form of exegesis had led to the publication of the beautiful polyglot Bible by the lawyer Guillaume Le Jay. Also in this line was the work of the Oratorian Jean Morin, a convert to Judaism and a great scholar of rabbinical literature who demonstrated its importance for the interpretation of Holy Scripture. But he also expressed the daring idea that the Masoretic interpreters had falsified the Hebrew text. He offered this theory in his Exercitationes ecclesiasticae (1631) about the Samaritan Pentateuch and in his Exercitationes biblicae (1633), which provoked spirited polemics. But the actual founder of biblical criticism was another Oratorian, Richard Simon (1638–1712), an unsavory character but intellectually a genius of comprehensive education. Initially he tried to achieve a clear and satisfactory definition of the infallibility of the Bible and thus to demonstrate that the normal methods of historical criticism could be applied to the Holy Scriptures.[11] In 1678 he attempted to present his ideas in his Histoire critique du Vieux Testament. But Bossuet, warned through an indiscretion, managed to get a table of contents of the book and promptly intervened. He had the work confiscated and all copies destroyed. The Oratorians thought their congregation endangered by Simon and expelled him on 21 May 1678. He then became parish priest at Bolleville in the diocese of Rouen. His ideas were indeed too far ahead of his time, and all the world opposed him; Bossuet, the Great Arnauld, and Protestants such as Vossius and [10] See P. Clair, Louis Thomassin, étude biographique et bibliographique (Paris 1964).

---

[11] See J. Steinmann, Richard Simon et les origines de l'exégèse biblique (Paris 1960); P. Auvray, "Richard Simon d'après des documents inédits," Oratoriana 1 (1960), 46–68; idem, "Richard Simon après 1678," 6 (1962), 55–69; idem, "Richard Simon, Bossuet et l'abbé Bibnon," 14 (1968), 89–103; idem, "Richard Simon et Jean Leclercq," 15 (1969), 26–42.

Jurieu. Yet he persisted in his views. The Histoire critique du texte du Vieux Testament was reprinted in Holland in 1680 and 1685. In 1689 Simon published a Histoire critique du texte du Nouveau Testament, followed by several similar works and finally by a translation of the New Testament in 1702 which led to another incident with Bossuet. The latter continued the fight, but died without having completed his Défense de la tradition des Saints Pères, in which he wanted to refute the exegetical methods of Richard Simon and to justify the traditional principles. Simon was in fact not emulated because his ideas were considered too daring in those days. A contemporary of that pioneer of genius was another Oratorian, Bernard Lamy (1640–1715), a well-educated and skilled exegete and friend of Malebranche.[12]

The development of scholarship was attended by that of historiography, which now ceased being a literary composition in favor of becoming a genuine science. This movement had already been indicated since the beginning of the century by the historian Eudes de Mézeray, brother of Saint John Eudes, but its actual development did not start until 1630. In the field of church history Baronius had some competitors in France since all the great specialists in historical theology were interested in it as well. Jean Morin, Petau, and Thomassin created significant works in this field, but the true French Baronius was an Oratorian, Charles Lecointe (1611–81), whose Annales ecclesiastici Francorum appeared in eight folios from 1665 to 83. Lecointe wisely avoided including the first two centuries so he would not have to dispute the legends which traced back the origins of many French dioceses to the apostles. But in this connection the Bollandists served as an example in France inasmuch as numerous specialists now tried to examine the historical truth of the lives of local saints. In this regard a professor of the Sorbonne, Jean de Launoy (1603–78), developed a deterrent reputation which gained him the sobriquet "Nest robber of the Saints." He had the courage to attack the legends of Provence about Saint Lazarus and Saint Magdalen (1641), those of the city of Paris concerning Saint Dionysius (1641) and the ones of the Carmelites about Simon Stock and the scapular. As a consequence he found himself exposed to intense polemics. Others nonetheless followed in his footsteps, mainly the Benedictines of Saint-Maur, who excelled in this sort of research, contributing an extraordinary number of works. By virtue of the quality as well as quantity of his work Mabillon occupied the most prominent position among them. He authored the Acta sanctorum ordinis sancti Benedicti (1668–1701; in collaboration with Dom Thierry Ruinart) and the Annales ordinis sancti Benedicti (1703–13). In his famous work De re diplomatica (1681) he determined the basic rules applying to works in the field of historiography. Many of the successors and pupils of Mabillon gained prominence in the difficult area of local and regional history. Later on, Dom Denys de Sainte-Marthe (1650–1725) took over the task of reediting and completing the Gallia christiana. These works gained a considerable reputation throughout Europe for their comprehensiveness and quality. Louis XIV expressly requested to have Mabillon introduced to him. Port-Royal, too, contributed one of its finest representatives in this field in the person of one of its last pupils, Sébastien Le Nain de Tillemont (1637–98).[13] While he was not blessed with a long career, his enormous energy enabled him to complete a monumental number of works. In addition to the six volumes of the Histoire des empereurs (1690–1738), there are the sixteen volumes of his Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles (1693–1712). All of his work is characterized by a profound scholarship and an unusual scientific rigor. In addition, Tillemont, whose kindness was inexhaustible, furnished the documentation for numerous other works. Sacy, who had agreed before his death to write a history of Saint Louis for the Dauphin (the son of Louis XIV), had received some admirable treatises from Tillemont which manifest an unusually profound knowledge of the Middle Ages. These manuscripts remained unpublished until the nineteenth century.[14] Tillemont, who was very sympathetic to the Maurists, left to them his complete documentation on Augustine, from which the Benedictines compiled a history of the life of Saint Augustine and added it to volume twelve of his works (1700). Additionally, he collaborated on the patristic biographies of the Jansenist Godefroy Hermant (1617–90), who wrote the lives of Saints Athanasius (1671), Basilius, Gregory of Nazianzus (1674), and Ambrose (1678). Lastly, a valuable work by another Oratorian, Jacques Lelong (1665–1721), should be mentioned: the Bibliothèque historique de la France (1719), which represents an indispensable source even today.

---

[12] F. Girbal, Bernard Lamy, étude biographique et bibliographique (Paris 1964); B. Lamy, Entretiens sur les Sciences, ed. by F. Girbal and P. Clair (Paris 1966).

Cartesianism and Religious Thought

One of the main reasons for the decline of Scholasticism in the seventeenth century was the success of Cartesian philosophy. In order to comprehend its full significance, the presence of a latitudinarian, skeptical, and even at times atheistic current in France has to be taken into consideration. Its origins go back to the sixteenth century and possibly even farther;[15] it invokes Jean Bodin,[16] Montaigne,[17] and Pierre Charron.[18] For the first thirty years of the seventeenth century this intellectual current attracted a large part of high society. The circle of Gaston d'Orléans and of the famous lady of the demimonde, Ninon de Lenclos,[19] was characterized by latitudinarianism. In these circles were poets such as Théophile de Viau,[20] Saint-Amant, Tristan, and even Cyrano de Bergerac. They were joined by philosophers as well, one of them being François de la Mothe le Vayer (1588–1672), the teacher of Monsieur, brother of Louis XIV. In his treatise De la vertu des païens (1640), de la Mothe le Vayer represents the view that Christianity is superfluous if not pernicious, since pagans can possess the same virtues as Christians. Another prominent member of this group is Pierre Gassendi (1592–1655), canon of Digne and professor of mathematics at the Royal Bourbon College, a splendid scholar who advocated Epicureanism.[21] Around them gathered the libertins érudits, the learned latitudinarians who were also encountered in scholarly circles and even in the famous cabinet of the brothers Dupuy. Latitudinarianism persisted throughout the century. Temporarily forced into retreat and anonymity when Louis XIV was under the influence of Mme de Maintenon, it made itself felt more strongly than ever after 1717.

---

[13] See B. Neveu, Un historien à l'école de Port-Royal, Sébastien Le Nain de Tillemont (The Hague 1966).

[14] Vie de saint Louis roi de France, par Lenain de Tillemont, ed. by J. de Gaulle, 6 vols. (Paris 1847–51).

René Descartes (see Chap. 18) was himself in no way a latitudinarian. His Christian education was profound, his faith serious, and his astonishing ties with Thomism are of greater significance for deciphering his personal thought than generally assumed.[22] It is understandable that he was encouraged by Bérulle at the beginning of his career. When he structured his essay on the rational mastery of all reality by following a method of systematic doubt, Descartes had no anti-Christian intentions. He limited himself to pursuing the old dream of a comprehensive explanation of material as well as intellectual reality by means of a single principle. But the Discours de la Méthode (1637) represents in every respect a turning point in Western thought. His search for evidence, aimed for by the application of sharp and clear logic, created a new way of thinking. This gradually crossed over into the religious realm and left behind the cumbersome synthetic dialectics of Scholasticism, but by its systematic application of doubt it also furnished arguments for the skepticism of the latitudinarians. The success of Cartesianism was extraordinary. To be sure, its success was most prevalent in the social salons, but even the best of minds were affected by it. It is very interesting to see for instance how widespread Cartesianism was even in Port-Royal circles.[23] Arnauld and Nicole adhered to it without, however, renouncing Augustinianism and Thomism. In dealing with this problem they made an extremely valuable contribution with their famous Logique de Port-Royal (1662), which probably owed a great deal to Pascal.[24] In Port-Royal as well as in secular circles Cartesianism was of great interest for the sciences, especially mathematics and physics. This interest spread to the intellectuals among the clergy. It is very illuminating that a pious and modest confessor of Port-Royal such as Antoine de Rebours from Auvergne (1595–1661) had in his library a unique collection of scientific works.[25] Philosophic-scientific circles were formed in Paris. One of the most famous was the one around Marin Mersenne (1588–1648), the founder of a successful academy frequented by some of the greatest scholars of their time, among them Roberval. One of its first members was the father of Pascal, Étienne Pascal.[26]

---

[15] See F. Lachèvre, Le libertinage au XVII^e siècle (Paris 1920).

[16] See R. Chauviré, J. Bodin auteur de la République (Paris 1928).

[17] See P. Villey, Montaigne et la postérité (Paris 1925).

[18] See J. Sabrié, De l'humanisme au rationalisme, Pierre Charron (Paris 1913).

[19] See E. Magne, Ninon de Lenclos (Paris 1925).

[20] See A. Adam, Théophile de Viau et la libre-pensée française en 1620 (Paris 1935).

[21] See B. Rochot, Les travaux de Gassendi sur Epicure et l'atomisme, 1619–1658 (Paris 1944); R. Pintard, La Mothe le Vayer, Gassendi, Guy Patin, études de bibliographie et de critique (Paris 1943).

[22] See H. Gouhier, Les premières pensées de Descartes, contribution à l'histoire de l'anti-Renaissance (Paris 1958); C. Serrurier, Descartes, l'homme et le penseur (Paris and Amsterdam 1951).

Pascal (Chap. 3) also owed much to Cartesianism, although he turned against it after his conversion. Pascal's is an interesting case inasmuch as he is at the origin of a new Christian philosophy. But we should not forget that he did not at all aspire to be a philosopher and that his interests were not in this area. He wanted to be an apologist and defend the Christian religion against the latitudinarians, whom he had gotten to know better than anybody else during his secular period.[27] In this regard he joined a long tradition,[28] as had the Jesuit François Garasse[29] and the Capuchin Yves de Paris.[30] But these pre-Pascal polemics missed their target because they were too ponderous and inept. On the day after the miracle of the Holy Thorn (24 March 1656) Pascal had jotted down some notes concerning the value of miracles. But not until 1657 did he resolve to oppose the latitudinarians and to collect notes with a view towards an apologia. His project had caused some disquiet at Port-Royal since he was considered a mere amateur in the field of theology. Moreover, Port-Royal, while skilled in controversies with the Protestants, had no experience in polemics against the latitudinarians. So Pascal was asked to give a lecture which was to detail his plan. For this conference Pascal took an initial inventory of his notes. Fortunately this compilation is preserved and provides insight into Pascal's way of thinking at the time of this presentation, probably around June 1658. Pascal's sickness and subsequent early death kept him from completing his work, which, by the way, was not given very great importance by Port-Royal. In honor of his memory, Pascal's sister Gilberte and his friend, the duke of Roannez, insisted on compiling the Pensées from the surviving papers. These appeared in 1670, but only in a partial edition whose text was much changed. Not until 1844 was the precise and complete wording of Pascal's manuscripts made accessible to the readers. But the edition of Port-Royal had sufficed to call the public's attention to Pascal's method, his rich view of man and the world, and the profundity of his analysis of the conditio humana and christiana. But it was merely a limited success: in his manner of humiliating man's intellect vis-à-vis a God unfathomable to the intellect but able to be experienced by the heart, Pascal opposed the rationalism of Descartes, which nonetheless won out. Few people in the eighteenth century understood the Pensées. We know that Voltaire used them as the butt of his ridicule.

---

[23] See G. Lewis, Augustinisme et cartésianisme à Port-Royal: Descartes et le cartésianisme hollandais (Paris and Amsterdam 1950), 131–82.

[24] See P. Clair and F. Girbal, eds., La logique ou l'art de penser (Paris 1965).

[25] See L. Cognet, Antoine de Rebours, confesseur de Port-Royal, ami de la famille Pascal: Clermont, ville de Pascal (Clermont 1962), 219–29.

[26] See R. Lenoble, Mersenne ou la naissance du mécanisme (Paris 1943).

[27] See J. Mesnard, "Introduction à l'étude de Pascal mondain," Annales Universitatis Saraviensis 3 (1954), 76–94.

[28] See Julien-Eymard d'Angers, Pascal et ses précurseurs (Paris 1954).

[29] See J. Lecler, "Un adversaire des libertins au début de XVII^{e} siècle, le P. Garasse," Études 209 (1931), 570–72.

Only those who attempted a synthesis between Cartesianism and Christianity managed to reach public opinion. They deserve praise because this undertaking was not without danger. In fact the official circles soon initiated a reaction against the further spread of Descartes's ideas. This resulted in a fight replete with complex and unpleasant episodes, reaching a climax on 1 September 1671 when, after the Mass of the Holy Ghost, the resolutions against Descartes's philosophy were read at the Sorbonne. The dean, Morel, explained that this condemnation concerned especially those who denied the materia prima and the formae substantiales. The public derided the Sorbonne's insistence upon this sort of archaic Scholasticism and Boileau mocked it in his Arrêt burlesque. But the majority of the congregations thought it wiser to prohibit any and all teaching smacking of Cartesianism in their schools. This prohibition was enforced even with measures insulting to some professors. Lamy, whose exegeses have been mentioned before, was summoned to the philosophical faculty of Angers in 1673 and charged with teaching the traditional philosophy of Aristotle and Saint Thomas Aquinas. In his lectures he expressed some clearly pro-Cartesian theses and was promptly exiled to Grenoble on the heels of some dubious incident. Yet he held on to his Cartesian views.

---

[30] See Julien-Eymard d'Angers (C. Chesneau), Le P. Yves de Paris et son temps, 1590–1670, 2 vols. (Paris 1946).

Understanding these conditions makes it easier to appreciate what the courage of Nicolas Malebranche (1638–1715), also an Oratorian, meant in such an atmosphere. To fully comprehend him we need an appreciation of what he really was: an admirable religious author who expressed himself through his metaphysics.[31] He was also an apologist, but one who proceeded from his heart, who wanted to lend to religion a metaphysical and logical coherence able to convince both the intellect and the heart in this century of Enlightenment. His daring identification of ratio with the word of God combined Descartes's method with the original Augustinian principles, and that is the meaning of the synthesis for which he strove. A Cartesian by deep conviction, he proceeded to contemplate the religious universe of Augustinianism. In his Recherche de la vérité (1674) Malebranche presented his basic ideas precisely at the time of the incidents at Angers. His opponents immediately gave voice. From this point on, the mild-mannered and peaceable Malebranche showed himself to be the kind of powerful polemicist he was to remain till the end of his life. In subsequent editions of his work he countered every attack. His other works raised the expression of his thought to ever higher levels, probably reaching a climax in the Méditations chrétiennes et métaphysiques (1683). In contrast to the apologias of Pascal, those of Malebranche merged beautifully with the spirit of the century. This accounts for their great success, as demonstrated by the many reprints of his works. But his apologias also embroiled him in lively polemics with the representatives of the old school. Furthermore, his Traité de la nature et de la grâce (1680) involved him in a lengthy controversy with the Great Arnauld in which both gave as well as they took. The system by means of which Malebranche wanted to synthesize the mechanism of Descartes with the Augustinian concepts of the praedestinatio and the gratia efficax was daring and new. But it did contain numerous weak points, which was why Malebranche encountered such a dangerous adversary in the person of the Great Arnauld and why this dispute ended in a draw. Malebranche was quite conscious of that. Long after Arnauld's death in 1712 he was still planning a summary of all his responses to Arnauld. Bossuet was quite hostile to Malebranche's views. In 1684 he charged the young Fénelon, with whom he was on friendly terms at the time, to compose a Réfutation du système du P. Malebranche. Fénelon obeyed, but in reading the manuscript Bossuet recognized that these all too youthful comments merely scratched the surface of a difficult problem. Fénelon's work was not published. In spite of the resistance from various parties, the reputation of Malebranche grew more and more. In all of Europe those who knew the problems involved—foremost among them Leibniz—considered it an honor to have maintained connections with Malebranche[32] (see Chap. 18).

---

[31] See A. Robinet, Système et existence dans l'œuvre de Malebranche (Paris 1965).

For posterity the fame of Malebranche has overshadowed less prominent Cartesians who were making similar efforts at that time. Yet several of them are of interest even today. We have already named Lamy, but we should also mention the Oratorian Nicolas Poisson (1637–1710), the author of the rare book Commentaires ou remarques sur la méthode de M. Descartes (Vendôme 1671), which played an important role in the history of Cartesianism. Clerselier suggested that he also write a biography of the great philosopher. We should not forget the very interesting Géraud de Cordemoy (1626–84),[33] who enjoyed the esteem of both Malebranche and Leibniz. But these are only the privileged representatives of a movement the detailed history of which has not yet been written. It was a movement which—no doubt unintentionally—paved the way for the rationalism of the eighteenth century.

---

[32] See A. Robinet, Malebranche et Leibniz, relations personnelles (Paris 1955).

[33] See G. de Cordemoy, Œuvres philosophiques, avec une étude bio-bibliographique, ed. by P. Clair and F. Girbal (Paris 1968).

SECTION TWO

The Papacy in the Period of French Hegemony

Introduction

The Peace of Westphalia, which ended the Wars of Religion in Europe (with the exception of England) and determined the configuration of the confessional map of Europe up to the first half of the present century, also meant a turning point in the position of the papacy. It had to resign itself to the factual situation. The protest of Innocent X charging the accords with contravening or injuring the rights of the Church have frequently encumbered the Church by the implication that the Pope, by his protest, wanted to undermine the making of peace in favor of continuing the war. Yet it amounted to nothing more than a formal legal reservation which, furthermore, was published with considerable delay in the brief Zelus Domus Dei, antedated by almost two years, so that the protest really had no practical effect.

The outcome of the Thirty Years' War meant a strengthening of the power of the state in ecclesiastical matters as well and led to the gradually expanding principle of the established Church, which, although developing differently in the various countries, had in common the diminution of the influence of Rome. In the following period the papacy increasingly lost esteem and the power to influence events. This can be demonstrated by the diminishing participation of the Holy See in the peace negotiations of the time. Whereas it took an active part in the Peace Conference of Münster in the person of its legate Chigi, the representative of the Pope was seldom listened to by the end of the century. In the eighteenth century decisions between the powers were generally made without the Pope and at times even against him.

As far as the Catholic powers were concerned, the papacy became in this period an object of their politics rather than those politics being determined to any degree by the Pope. In any given case he was caught within the existing and continuing field of tension based upon the constant opposition between France and the Habsburgs on the one hand, and between France and England on the other. The only area in which the Pope retained a certain initiative of his own was leadership in repelling the continuing Turkish threat.

For the most part the papal elections turned into political power plays between groups of cardinals in sympathy either with France or the Emperor. It was only in rare cases that the "Third Party" of independents—after the conclave of 1655 they were called the squadrone volante because of their political neutrality and their mobility resulting from it—could make a decision. As the result of political pressure on the papal elections it was not altogether rare that a compromise had to be sought and that sometimes there were elections which would have been unthinkable without the massive intervention of the various powers. In general it held true that no candidate could be elected against the express will of the French King. Yet this did not always mean invoking the ius exclusival, since the two-thirds' majority required by the rules of papal elections did create the possibility of a blocking minority. The fact that papal elections of this period generally took a very long time was due—aside from the slowness of communication and the difficulties encountered in traveling—precisely to those political interventions.

The appointments of cardinals as well were jealously watched by the various governments so that none of the individual powers would in any way be favored. There still remained the unwritten "right" of Catholic sovereigns to suggest to the Pope a number of candidates for the cardinalate in order to have, by virtue of these "Cardinals of the Crown," a special representation of their own interests within the College of Cardinals primarily for the event of a papal election. The nepotism of the previous period was not entirely overcome, even if some Popes kept themselves either partially or totally aloof from this traditional form of governing and family welfare.

The position of the papacy in the field of dogma and church discipline was aggravated and even endangered by tensions that appeared at mid-century which, spreading rapidly, were destined to lead to internal divisions. The ideas of Gallicanism and the Jansenist movement continued to be in opposition to each other into the next century. Thus it could happen that a comment by the Holy See against one was almost interpreted as partisanship in favor of the other party. No doubt the Church lost a good deal of initiative and strength by these continuing dogmatic disputes which no longer were of concern merely to theological experts, but encroached on the life of the Church itself (Chaps. 2–4).

The intellectual movement known as the Enlightenment also had its beginnings around this time. Rome was late in recognizing its importance and even then underestimated it because the Holy See's attention was riveted too much upon the negative effects and especially upon the attack on the belief in revealed religion. This necessarily widened the gulf between the leadership of the Church, arrested in traditional ways of thinking, and the new intellectual current emanating from England and France and influencing the whole Western world, a movement that soon went beyond the narrow circle of scholars to lead to a generally accepted new attitude towards life and the intellect even within the bourgeoisie. Its basic concerns, such as the demand for critical examination instead of a mere faith in authority, or its idea of tolerance and a practical humanity were viewed with distrust and rejection even when they were pronounced with the best of intentions by the foremost moderate representatives of the Enlightenment, such as Leibniz. The fact that the Church offered nothing but a rigid rejection of this challenge directed energetically against the traditional forms of church life contributed to both Church and papacy being viewed more and more as outmoded. More so than in other countries, where certain concerns of the new intellectual current were gradually accepted by ecclesiastical circles, resulting in something like a Catholic Enlightenment being formed, the above reaction could not but have its effect in Italy and primarily in the Papal States. It was here that the influence of Rome was most immediate and developments which were possible elsewhere could only take place with great difficulty or not at all (Chap. 18).

The simple faithful remained relatively untouched by the Enlightenment; they preserved their faith. A clear indicator of this was the noticeably high participation of the faithful in the popular missions which experienced a new flowering in this period especially in Italy. Above all it was the two Segneri, Paolo (1624–94) and his nephew Paolo the Younger (1673–1713), who developed their own exemplary missionary style with impressive elements of a baroque, sometimes perhaps exaggerated piety (with penitential processions, public flagellation, and dramatic religious plays). Aside from the religious benefits of this novel pastoral method, contemporaries especially recognized its social success, consisting of settling family and blood feuds as well as economic injustices. Of similar importance was the Capuchin Francesco Maria Casini (1648–1719), who preached at the papal court for fourteen years. In his sermons before the Pope he criticized the failings of the clergy and the administration of the Papal States with surprising frankness.

CHAPTER 7

The Popes from Alexander VII to Clement X

Alexander VII (1655–67)

After the death of Innocent X, Cardinal Mazarin, who conducted French policies, wanted to push through the election of Giulio Sacchetti. The latter had been considered as far back as 1644 but had been excluded by Spain and since then been called Cardinal Trentatre because of the insufficient thirty-three votes he consistently received over a period of time. But Sacchetti personally intervened with Mazarin in favor of the candidacy of Fabio Chigi, which he had earlier opposed. Because of his actions at the Peace Conference of Münster (Westphalia) he was initially not agreeable to France.[1] But with Mazarin's concurrence Chigi was elected on 7 April 1655 after a conclave of eighty days. He chose his name in memory of his countryman Alexander III.

The newly elected Pope was born into a Siena family who had been generous patrons of the arts two generations earlier in Rome (Farnesina, chapels in Santa Maria della Pace and Santa Maria del Popolo). After twelve years as nuncio on the Rhine his predecessor appointed him Secretary of State in 1651 and cardinal in the following year. But towards the end of the pontificate of Innocent X he lost influence because of Olympia Maidalchini's intrigues against him. Alexander VII, impressed by his personal experience of the extant abuses, was initially resolved to end the practice of nepotism completely. But later on he gave in to the entreaties of diplomats and even some well-known cardinals who urged him to call his relatives to the papal court and entrust them with governmental positions. The safeguards designed to prevent abuses subsequently proved insufficient.

From the very beginning of Alexander's pontificate, his relationship with France, the supreme Catholic power, was tense. Added to the fact that Chigi was not Mazarin's actual choice, his papal government was also encumbered by problems he inherited from his predecessor. Among them was that of Cardinal de Retz (Jean-François Paul de Gondi), who had been arrested in France as an enemy of Mazarin. In August 1654 he was able to escape and make his way to Rome via Spain by the end of the year. In spite of all the efforts by the Pope to arrive at a satisfactory solution of this case, the presence of de Retz in Rome could not fail to have a deleterious effect on the relationship with France. In addition, the negotiations concerning the appointments of bishops in the newly acquired areas of France, which were not covered by the Concordat of 1516, had stagnated under Innocent X. Lastly, Mazarin did not like the Pope's efforts to promote peace between France and Spain.

---

[1] P. Richard's criticism is very sharp and probably not without exaggeration: "Il est indéniable que Chigi a travaillé au congrès contre la France, et mis tout en œuvre pour faire échouer ses vues et ses prétentions. C'était peu répondre à un programme de médiation, et justifier par avance l'animosité dont le poursuivirent plus tard les hommes d'État français, Mazarin en tête. . . ." But even he admits: "Ce qui justifie l'attitude du nonce médiateur, c'est que les Français abandonnaient l'Église pour les protestants, ce que lui, agent de la papauté, ne pouvait, ne devait pas admettre." (DHGE 2, 235 f.).

Therefore Rome was excluded as the site of a peace conference. In March 1656 the French ambassador at the Holy See was recalled. The negotiations, which resulted in the Treaty of the Pyrenees (1659) and the uniting of the dynasties of France and Spain through the marriage of Louis XIV to the infanta Maria Teresa, the daughter of King Philip IV, took place to the deliberate exclusion of the Pope. In the peace treaty the two powers even obliged themselves to support the claims of the Este family to the coastal town of Comacchio and those of the Farnese family to Castro which ran counter to the interests of the Holy See.

After the death of Mazarin (9 March 1661), tension between France and Rome increased. The twenty-two-year-old Louis XIV, convinced of his dignity and power and raised in the spirit of Gallican ideas, sought to prevail in his ecclesiastic policies. Sending the duke of Créqui as ambassador to Rome in June 1662, although welcomed by Alexander VII as a sign of support of the papal defensive policy against the Turks (see below), was designed at the same time to demonstrate the hegemony of France. Then problems of ceremony led to displeasure. The new ambassador, moreover, claimed immunity for the buildings bordering on the Palazzo Farnese. The demand of this extended "quartering privilege" was initially rejected. After several fights between the ambassador's retinue and the papal soldiers from Corsica billeted near the Ponte Sisto, the Corsicans got carried away and fired upon the Farnese Palace on 20 August 1662, putting Créqui himself in danger of his life, and then molested the duchess and her companions, who were returning to the palace just then. In spite of immediate measures by the papal administration and an offer by the Pope to make amends, Créqui retired to Florence. The incident offered to French policy makers a good opportunity to exact some special concessions in matters of ecclesiastical policy and so they escalated their demands. Avignon was occupied and military actions against the Papal States were prepared. It was under this kind of pressure that the Treaty of Pisa was concluded on 12 February 1664. Alexander VII was compelled to accept the humiliating conditions which included, among others, the erection of a memorial pyramid bearing a confession of guilt which was not removed until more than four years later (31 May 1668). On the issue of bishops' appointments the Pope had to comply fully with the wishes of the French King. Only then did Louis XIV return Avignon (May 1665); in order to give another signal for the decrease of tension he recalled the duke of Créqui in May 1665 and put in his place the duke de Chaulnes.

The Pope's attitude towards France was also conditioned by the Turkish threat. The island of Crete, belonging to Venice, was especially vulnerable. A diversionary attack against the Dardanelles in June 1657, conducted with papal support, failed and resulted in the loss of several islands in the Ionian Sea. In 1660 after the Battle of Clausenburg the Turks conquered Grosswardein. When Emperor Leopold I appealed to him for aid, the Pope attempted to establish a defensive league. But the success of his efforts depended entirely on France. The negotiations conducted by the duke de Créqui were interrupted by the incident involving the Corsican soldiers. It was feared that the Turks would attack Vienna as early as 1664. Surprisingly, Louis XIV sent a contingent of seven thousand men in the summer of 1664 with whose help the Turks were decisively defeated near the Cistercian convent of Sankt Gotthard on the Gyor River (1 August 1664). Yet the victory was not exploited. The Emperor was eager to conclude the Peace of Eisenburg because he could neither be sure of continued aid from the Empire nor of support from France. The next military objective of the Turks was again Candia. In the last months of his life Alexander VII again sent an urgent appeal to Louis XIV and the other Catholic princes asking for military aid for the Signoria of Venice. The Pope on his own part authorized a great sum of financial aid and had the papal galleys prepared. The total expenditures in connection with the papal fleet in defense against the Turks during the pontificate of Alexander VII are estimated at more than one and a half million scudi.

In his appointments to cardinalates, Alexander VII kept to the traditional practice of giving primary consideration to Italians. Out of a total of thirty-eight appointments with six promotions, foreigners were appointed only twice—two Spaniards and Germans each and one Frenchman. The conspicuous favoring of Sienese was taken note of even then; the great number of reservations in petto, a total of seventeen, is surprising. The reason for that was the lack of adequate remuneration for the appointees. But the appointments were nonetheless pronounced in order to complete the traditional membership of seventy in the College of Cardinals and thereby to forestall the demands by Catholic powers for crown cardinals. The most prominent among the appointees were the Jesuit Pallavicino, a friend of the Pope's and well known through his history of the Council of Trent; the bishop of Regensburg, Franz Wilhelm zu Wartenberg, who had worked with Chigi at the Peace Conference of Münster; and Gregorio Barbarigo, bishop of Bergamo and later of Padua, who came close to being elected Pope in subsequent conclaves.

The condemnation of laxist propositions by the Holy Office in 1665 and 1666 (D 2021–65) are thematically related to the continuing Jansenist disputes. The decrees were triggered by censures on the part of the universities of Louvain and Paris, some of whose wording was included verbatim in the Roman condemnations. Even though probabilism was not rejected as a system, this first detailed condemnation of "laxist" propositions represented a considerable success for the opponents of the Jesuit order, which was accused of lax morality.

A great stir was caused when Queen Christina of Sweden, daughter and successor of Gustavus Adolphus, renounced her throne and converted to Catholicism. The assertion that her conversion was without actual religious conviction and merely an escape from her dynastic responsibility is undoubtedly without fact. We need not dwell on the questions whether or to what extent her decisive motives were a compelling insight in matters of faith, or a certain aversion for the rigidity of the kind of orthodox Protestantism in Scandinavia at that time and the desire for greater intellectual freedom.[2] After renouncing the throne on 6 June 1654, Christina secretly pronounced the Catholic confession of faith on Christmas Day that year in Brussels. On 2 November 1655 she reiterated it publicly in Innsbruck. Shortly before Christmas she entered Rome with great ceremony. It was characteristic of the situation that the Pope exhorted the cardinals to make sure that the royal convert could not take offense at their behavior. He told them how his own work in Germany had taught him how scrupulously the northerners watched the Romans. Impulsive spending, political gaffes—especially her attempts to attain the crown of Naples—lack of sensitivity, and her scornful criticism of the customs of Roman piety led to friction. Yet Alexander VII was never lacking in benevolence and helpfulness towards the former queen. The tension decreased after Cardinal Azzolini gained influence about 1660 and managed to eliminate the undependable elements from Christina's retinue. Aside from two stays in France and two trips to Sweden in connection with her appanage, the former queen remained in Rome. Her apartments—initially in Mazarin's palace on the Quirinal and later in the Palazzo Riario on the right bank of the Tiber—became a center of the cultural life of Rome.

Rome's culture was considerably enhanced by the extension of the University of Rome. New chairs were established, among them that of church history, together with an appropriate library called the Biblioteca Alessandrina after its founder. But most prominent were the construction projects in the Vatican initiated by the Pope and executed by Bernini. The Cathedra Petri,[3] a simple oaken armchair decorated with small antique tablets of ivory and used in the Middle Ages in the liturgy on Saint Peter's Day (22 February) was to be the focal point in the apse of Saint Peter's, which was empty at that time. Bernini's design of four bronze statues of the great church Fathers carrying the Cathedra enclosed in bronze was approved by the Pope, who personally supervised all the work. Construction of Saint Peter's Square was started at the same time, again planned and executed by Bernini. According to the original design as shown on a medallion coined on 28 August 1657 on the occasion of the laying of the cornerstone, the space between the two half-arches of the colonnades was to be closed by a continuation separated only by two relatively narrow entrances. By the end of Alexander VII's pontificate only part of the construction work was finished. The Pope also had Bernini build new stairs to the Scala Regia and to the Sistine Chapel; this Scala Regia was finished in 1666. Four years later the equestrian statue of Constantine the Great, created by Bernini and completed during Alexander's VII lifetime, was placed in the vestibule.

---

[2] See S. Stolpe, Königin Christine von Schweden (Frankfurt 1962); Queen Christina of Sweden: Documents and Studies, ed. by M. von Platen (Stockholm 1966); C. Weibull, Christina of Sweden (Göteborg 1966); G. Masson, Queen Christina (London 1968).

[3] See D. Balboni, La Cattedra di San Pietro (Vatican City 1967); for an initial tentative report of the results of the examination which was made by a commission appointed by Paul VI in 1968/69, see L'Osservatore Romano no. 275 of 28 November 1968, p. 3.

Clement IX (1667–69)

On 20 June 1667 Cardinal Giulio Rospigliosi was elected Pope after a remarkably brief conclave of only eighteen days. As nuncio at Madrid he had obtained Spain's goodwill, but—unknown to Spain—he was also in the favor of Louis XIV. Also active in his behalf were the cardinals of the squadrone volante, who were primarily credited with the outcome of the election. The new Pope had been secretary of state under his predecessor and was famous for his humanistic education and poetic talent. A number of his dramas, based in part on Spanish models, were successfully performed at the time. His choice of the name Clement was prompted by the meaning of the word rather than its connection with an earlier bearer of the name, as was often the case. One of the few medallions of his brief pontificate is inscribed "Aliis non sibi clemens." A short pontificate was expected from the start because of his frail health.

The pontificate of Clement IX was troubled by two major problem areas. One was the continuing tensions in France caused by the Jansenist movement and the Pope's efforts to allay them. This was to be achieved by the so-called Clementine Peace (Chap. 3), but in the last analysis the Pope's efforts remained unsuccessful. The other was the danger posed by the Turks. The island of Crete was again their prime objective. They had already conquered the larger part of the island and were preparing to attack the capital of Candia (Megalo Castro), still in the hands of the Venetians. Just like his predecessor, Clement IX attempted to bring about joint aid by the Western powers. He tried to bring an end to the war between Louis XIV and Spain (War of Devolution) which broke out in May 1667 when France invaded the Spanish Netherlands. But the Pope's suggestions and the entreaties of various nuncios extraordinary sent to all the capitals were hardly successful. But the political constellation resulting from the alliance between Holland, England, and Sweden made the French King condescend to a negotiated peace. He kept his conquests in the Netherlands, but had to return the occupied Franche-Comté. The fact of the papal mediation was emphasized in the peace treaty of Aachen (2 May 1668). Finally, the removal of the humiliating pyramid erected in Rome in 1664 was intended to seal the reconciliation between France and the Holy See. The peace treaty also increased hopes of joint aid for the island of Crete. But the assurances given by the Western powers were only partly kept and were insufficient to boot. Even the French expeditionary corps, numerically small in the summer of 1668 but significantly increased the following year, was unable to change the outcome. Naval superiority was not exploited and so the fortress of Candia was forced to surrender on 6 September 1669.

Clement X (1670–76)

A few days before he died on 9 December 1669, Clement IX had appointed seven cardinals, bringing the complement of the college back up to the traditional seventy. The subsequent conclave, lasting more than four months, proved difficult. Among the sources informing us in detail of the events and negotiations, the voluminous correspondence between Queen Christina and Cardinal Azzolini is especially interesting. The French rejected two possible candidates (D'Elce and Odescalchi), while the Spanish opposed two others (Vidoni and Brancaccio), virtually eliminating any chance of those four being elected. Vidoni was the candidate promoted by Queen Christina and Azzoli. The long duration of the conclave provoked great displeasure and gave rise to many satires. The representatives of the Catholic powers probably exerted greater influence on this papal election than on any previous one. Upon mediation by Venice, Spain and France finally agreed that one of the cardinals appointed by Pope Clement IX before his death should be elected. The choice was the oldest of that group, the eighty-year-old Cardinal Altieri. The election took place on 29 April 1670. Resisting for some time, Altieri finally gave in to the urgings of the cardinals and accepted the election as Pope Clement X. The advanced age of the newly elected Pope resulted in the cardinal-nephew Paluzzi-Altieri gaining in importance while the secretary of state lost influence. While Clement X personally urged thriftiness, he could not prevent his nephew from enriching himself by means of his position.

The pontificate of Clement X was largely determined by the increasing danger posed by Turkey. In 1672 the objective was Poland, which was weakened by internal disorder. The Pope sought to have the Emperor and the Catholic princes of Germany coalesce into a defensive alliance and even appealed—probably following a suggestion by Queen Christina—to the King of Sweden, Charles IX, who refused, however, to enter into any direct negotiations with the Pope. Conversely, Russia now sought Western support against the Turks and after thirteen years of war concluded an alliance with Poland. With financial support from the Pope and a personal contribution from Cardinal Odescalchi, John Sobieski had formed his own army in 1673. He advanced against the Turks and defeated them decisively at the Dniester (11 November). On the eve of the battle the Polish King, Michael Wiśniowiecki, had succumbed to an illness. In lengthy negotiations concerning the succession to the throne, the Pope and his nuncio, Buonvisi, insisted on a Catholic candidate. But the candidacy of the papal nephew, Gaspare Altieri, suggested by Rome in the course of the negotiations, was rejected as totally impossible by the nuncio. But more dangerous by far were the applicants from the house of Brandenburg. Finally, on 20 May 1674, John Sobieski was elected king. The following summer he again succeeded against the Turks in the defense of the city of Lemberg.

While the Pope made every effort to form a defensive alliance against the Turks, Louis XIV prepared for a war of conquest against Holland, which had permitted itself to become politically isolated. This war was propagated by France as a holy war for the restoration of the Catholic religion. Initially the Pope in fact believed this professed goal. Briefs of praise and Te Deums in Rome upon the victories of the French army demonstrate how effective that propaganda was. The military aid given to the Dutch by Emperor Leopold I was disapproved of as a weakening of the unified front against the Turks. The intervention of Spain was also condemned by the Pope. After about the summer of 1674 Clement X perceived that he had been deceived regarding the actual aims of the war against Holland. In addition, Louis XIV tried to frustrate the Pope's peace negotiations at every turn. Nevertheless three nuncios extraordinary were sent to the western capitals of Paris, Vienna, and Madrid in October 1675 in order to prepare for peace negotiations. At the same time a papal representative was designated for the actual peace conference, although no place or time had been considered yet. The instruction composed for this purpose is important since it clarifies the developments since the time of the Peace of Westphalia.[4] At that time Chigi had strictly to hew to the traditional rule of dealing only with the Catholic powers and not having anything to do with the apostates. But now the papal representative was permitted to establish communication with the Protestants as well. He was instructed not to offend them by pedantic considerations and to make concessions for the sake of peace in Europe. Yet for the time being these preparations did not lead to anything.

More than his predecessors the aged Pope was hard pressed by the Catholic powers to accede to appointments to the cardinalate. In addition to fifteen Italians, Clement X appointed a mere five cardinals of other nationalities: two French, one German, Spanish, and English. France especially exerted constant pressure. Louis XIV above all wanted to have the bishop of Laon, César D'Estrées, promoted to cardinal. So the King sent him to Rome as an ambassador extraordinary to enable him personally to pursue his appointment. D'Estrées was indeed appointed in petto on 24 August 1671, but he was not satisfied with that. Even before the appointment was published the brother of the new cardinal arrived in Rome as the new ambassador of France. By order of Louis XIV, César also remained at the Curia. Now both brothers pursued the appointment of additional favorites of the French King to cardinalates. On 21 May 1675 their strenuous efforts led to a serious incident. In a papal audience the duke D'Estrées addressed himself to the subject of appointments still outstanding. In the process he vehemently reproached Cardinal Altieri, the papal nepotist. When the Pope wanted to signal the end of the audience by means of his bell, the ambassador obstructed him by grabbing his hand. When Clement X made another attempt to end the audience, D'Estrées would not leave. After a third signal of the bell the Pope tried to get up and was pushed back into his chair by D'Estrées. A few days later the Pope appointed six new cardinals, his last ones, among whom there was not a single Frenchman.

---

[4] The most important part of the instruction in QFIAB 15 (1913), 366 f., n. 3.

CHAPTER 8

Innocent XI

After having met with the determined resistance of France at the previous conclave, Cardinal Odescalchi's election came as a complete surprise. At the beginning of the present conclave his candidacy had been openly promoted by the nephew of the late pope, Cardinal Altieri, with whom Louis XIV and his ambassador to Rome were totally at variance. Furthermore, Altieri acted in concert with the Spanish cardinals, also opponents of France. When D'Estrées threatened to invoke the ius exclusivae if the election were to take place before the arrival of the French cardinals, the number of votes for Odescalchi decreased markedly. But in the meantime the French ambassador had asked Louis XIV to approve the election of the candidate originally rejected by him. Cardinals Chigi and Rospigliosi, both in the King's favor, supported this action by emphatically recommending Odescalchi to Louis XIV. The King concurred and he was elected unanimously on 21 September 1676, after having received a mere eight votes on the previous day.

The new Pope chose his name in memory of the one who had appointed him cardinal in 1645 when he was a mere thirty-four years of age. He came from a wealthy mercantile family in Como and made a name for himself in the administration of the Papal States under Urban VIII and Innocent X. His charity, extreme conscientiousness, and austere piety were widely acknowledged. Before he accepted the election he insisted that all cardinals sign the fourteen articles of reform suggested by him during the conclave.[1] Always intent upon safeguarding and defending the rights of the Church, he was not very open to the advice of others and at times persisted all too rigidly in his own views. Moreover, he had never spent any time abroad, so that his knowledge of the political situation was insufficient. While he was an excellent administrator with a special skill in financial matters, he was lacking in knowledge of human nature and even in theological education.

Innocent XI refrained from any kind of nepotism. Frugal by nature, he put the financial affairs of the Papal States in order. But in his strict, sometimes overly pedantic instructions concerning any sort of luxury and the reform of public order he several times went so far as to prohibit all carnivals, consequently becoming the butt of ridicule by the Romans.

The pontificate of Innocent XI bears the stamp of two problem areas.

---

[1] The text of the articles of reform is published in Bojani I, 31–37.

In addition to his efforts in the defense against the Turks (see below), the tense relationship between the Holy See and France was a major problem. It emanated from the unrestricted right of regalia claimed by the French King. Ever since the Middle Ages the King had had the right to make appointments to ecclesiastical livings in certain vacant dioceses (spiritual regalia) and to receive the revenues of bishoprics (temporal regalia). Since Louis XIII, care had been taken not to use these revenues for improper purposes. The second council of Louvain (1274) had forbidden further extension of this right. In so doing it appeared to recognize implicitly or at least to condone it. After several earlier attempts to extend the right of regalia to other dioceses, Louis XIV—considering it a true right of the crown—decreed in 1673 and 1675 that it was to apply to all areas subject to the French crown. Clement X, informed of the decree by his nuncio, did not make any response. Almost all the French bishops, in part influenced by the papal silence which could be construed as acquiescence, submitted to the royal decree. Only Bishop Pavillon of Alet and Bishop Caulet of Pamiers resisted. Not getting any support from their metropolitan, they appealed to the Pope. The fact that Innocent XI accepted the bishops' appeal was in accord with his conviction not to permit any encroachment upon the rights of the Church. But under the circumstances it was a somewhat dangerous assertion of principle in a matter of secondary importance. As a consequence the Pope was viewed as a friend of the Jansenist party. This was incorrect yet understandable in view of the personality of the two appellants, who were well known from the Jansenist conflict. The situation vis-à-vis France, already tense, was unnecessarily aggravated by this incident. In two briefs of March 1678 and January 1679 the Pope admonished the King not to follow the bad advice which was misleading him into an extension of the right of regalia and with it into a violation of the rights of the Church, but instead to keep in mind the salvation of his soul. A third brief, sent in March 1680, was more to the point. It warned the King of the wrath of Heaven which could manifest itself in making him die without a successor. But Louis XIV, having been struck by the idea of a national council, decided upon a noncommittal answer. At the Curia, the King's confessor, de la Chaize, and his fellow Jesuit Maimbourg were wrongly given the major portion of the blame for the King's inflexibility. In the meantime, the French Assembly of the Clergy of 1680 had taken the King's part. Louis XIV, wanting to gain time, suggested negotiations. After a lengthy delay, Cardinal d'Estrées, who was to conduct them, arrived in Rome in the spring of 1681. But Innocent XI had already given a sharp allocution against France in a consistory on 13 January 1681. At that time the so-called "Small Assembly" of the French clergy under the direction of the archbishop of Paris, Harlay, and the archbishop of Reims, Le Tellier, supported the King's position concerning the right of regalia and suggested convening a national council or an extraordinary Assembly of the Clergy. Aside from their original function as a "tax parliament" which decided the contributions of the French Church to the King (don gratuit), these periodic assemblies since their inception had also dealt with other ecclesiastical matters.[2] In general they involved efforts genuinely serving the reform and the promotion of church life even though the self-consciousness of the Gallican Church appears always to have been involved, intent on safeguarding its special privileges and position. Depending on the importance of these assemblies, the King and his government increasingly tried to influence their composition, either by means of recommendations or by exerting pressure upon the elective body of the individual church provinces. Such measures were also employed in the preparation of the assembly of October 1681. Again under the direction of Harlay and Le Tellier, it turned into an obedient tool of the government. The assembly agreed with the King that regalia was an exclusive right of the crown. In a general way the assembly noted that the ruler was independent of the authority of the Church in all purely temporal matters. The codification of additional articles designated as "Gallican Liberties" required lengthy discussion. In the end they were formulated by Bossuet, who was trying to avoid a more radical version. The King then decreed that they be included as binding doctrine.

The news of the assembly's conclusions arrived in Rome during the negotiations between the Pope and Cardinal d'Estrées, which were immediately interrupted. In his brief of 11 April 1682, Innocent XI sharply rebuked the assembly while sparing the King as much as possible. The Pope's chagrin was primarily directed at de la Chaize, the King's confessor, but the latter's influence was overestimated and his personal attitude misunderstood.[3] Indeed, Louis XIV suspended the assembly on 9 May and dismissed it at the end of June in order to bring about a resumption of the interrupted negotiations in Rome. Since the threat of Turkey had become more and more acute, Innocent XI was prepared for a moratorium. As an outward sign of détente he was to send a nuncio extraordinary to France upon the birth of the first son of the Dauphin. Although it was not the birth of a crown prince, the nuncio was to present the diapers blessed by the Pope as a special sign of goodwill.

---

[2] See P. Blet, Le Clergé de France et la Monarchie: Étude sur les Assemblées Générales du Clergé de 1615 à 1666 (Rome 1959).

[3] See G. Guitton, Le Père de la Chaize, Confesseur de Louis XIV (Paris 1959); P. Blet, "Jésuites Gallicans au XVII^{e} siècle," AHSI 29 (1960), 55–84.

But the most important reason for the nuncio's mission was to get the support of Louis XIV for the war against the Turks and to pave the way for a reconciliation between France and the Emperor. The gravest impediment was the issue of the vacant sees. Innocent XI steadfastly refused to confer canonical investiture upon the new bishops nominated by the King if they had participated in the Assembly of the Clergy of 1681/82 and had not disavowed the four Gallican articles.

Louis XIV was convinced that his measures against the Huguenots, resulting in the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, would meet with the Pope's approval and he therefore expected Rome's cooperation on the issue of the regalia. But Innocent XI maintained his reserve for two reasons: the actions against the Huguenots were prompted by Gallicanism, and the Pope expressly disapproved of the violent methods applied against them.

During this conflict between the Pope and France another one arose in Rome. It had to do with the quartering privilege claimed by the ambassadors to the Holy See. Their demands for concomitant immunity from police supervision and for extensive freedom from customs duty, which led to trade and business transactions on a large scale, stretched the quartering franchise to troublesome proportions. From the very beginning of his pontificate Innocent XI was determined to put an end to those abuses. Spain declared its willingness to forego the quartering privilege if the other powers would follow suit. But no agreement could be reached. So the Pope let it be known that he would receive no new ambassador unless he would surrender the franchise in advance. Venice was first to give in. After a lengthy period of resistance Spain followed suit in 1682. After the death of the French ambassador d'Estrées (30 January 1687), the Pope informed France that the new ambassador would only be received if he acceded to the conditions laid down by him. Subsequent proposals for settling the issue were rejected by Innocent XI. In November the new ambassador de Lavardin entered Rome at the head of a large retinue. Since he was considered subject to the sanctions of the bull In Coena Domini, he was not granted the papal audience he had requested. At the same time the French King was informed by the nuncio that the censure of the bull applied to him as well. The conflict broke into the open on 24 December 1687 when de Lavardin attended midnight Mass at the French national church of San Luigi dei Francesi. He was ushered to the seat of honor according to his rank of ambassador and given the sacraments. The Pope thereupon put the church under the interdict.

The tension was increased by the issue of the appointment of a coadjutor of Cologne. After the sudden death of the elector of Cologne, Maximilian von Wittelsbach, the election of a successor had to be endorsed. Both candidates, Cardinal Wilhelm von Fürstenberg, Bishop of Strasbourg, nominee of Louis XIV, and the seventeen-year-old Clement of Bavaria, the Emperor's nominee, needed the Pope's dispensation. The election was inconclusive. In spite of threats from Louis XIV, the Pope appointed the Bavarian. This led to the outbreak of the war between France and the Emperor in September 1688. Attempts at mediation on the part of James II of England failed. In April 1689 de Lavardin was recalled from Rome without having been received in audience by the Pope. The following May Nuncio Ranuzzi left Paris, having been under police supervision since October 1688.

The conflict with France had a bearing on simultaneous efforts by the Pope to establish a defense against the Turks. These constitute the foremost achievements of his pontificate, as is rightfully pointed out on his tomb in Saint Peter's.

At about the beginning of Innocent XI's pontificate, Kara Mustafa had become grand vizier and had taken over the direction of the Turkish government. This increased the danger of a renewed offensive. In order to counter this danger and to make sure of an effective defense the Pope engaged in mediation to end the war between France and the Emperor. For this purpose he sent a legate to the peace negotiations at Protestant Nijmegen. This was the first time since the schism that a papal representative set foot on Dutch soil. But his authority displeased France since it was the custom that only the Emperor was mentioned by name while the other rulers were mentioned collectively. Because of these problems of protocol the legate, Bevilacqua, could not sign the peace treaties and the papal mediation was not mentioned at all. The peace terms were especially unfavorable for Catholics living in Protestant areas. By doing nothing to advance the cause of the Catholic religion Louis XIV disappointed the Pope's expectations.

The advent of peace did not further the Pope's main goal of bringing about a defensive and offensive alliance against the Turks. In the east his efforts were thwarted by the distrust prevailing between Russia and Poland. This was aggravated by the initial Francophile policy of King Sobieski, who—disregarding the Pope's admonitions—supported the Hungarians revolting against Emperor Leopold I by letting them recruit troops in Poland. In return Louis XIV stated his readiness to try to have his ambassador in Constantinople ensure that Poland would not be attacked by Turkey. If such an attack were to take place, he promised to come to Poland's aid. At the Imperial Diet of 1680 renewed attempts to form a league with the Emperor failed; in the following year the French influence once again managed to prevent a resolution by the Polish Diet in favor of an alliance against the Turks. Yet Innocent XI did not tire in pursuing his plans of a great offensive. He envisioned French naval operations in support of a land-based attack by the Emperor and Poland. This was basically the same plan suggested fifteen years before to Louis XIV by the young Leibniz.[4] Actually Louis XIV informed the Holy See that he would help Poland and Venice if they were attacked, but that the Emperor would not be able to count on his aid. This assurance of benevolent neutrality in the eventuality of an attack upon the Emperor coupled with Thököly's revolt in Hungary confirmed Kara Mustafa in his intentions against Austria. But now this direct threat had the effect of reversing Polish policy, leading to a defensive alliance with the Emperor (April 1683). The Pope expended approximately one and a half million guilders in subsidies, about two-thirds of which went to the Emperor. By 14 July Vienna, defended by Rüdiger von Starhemberg, was completely surrounded. The Emperor and his court had shortly before fled to the west. The siege was prolonged by the unswerving courage of the numerically weak garrison of Vienna and by tactical mistakes on the part of the Turks. At the very last moment a relief force consisting of Austrian, Polish, and Bavarian troops under the nominal command of Sobieski approached and on 12 September 1683 forced the Turks to retreat. Vienna owed its liberation above all to the efforts of Innocent XI.

In spite of the allied victories at Ofen and the conquest of Gran in October of the same year, the alliance was endangered by a renewed rapprochement between Sobieski and the Hungarian rebels and by Louis XIV's attempts at joining Poland to France in a closer relationship. But the Pope managed to maintain the alliance. In 1684 it was joined by Venice after diplomatic relations, terminated five years prior because of the quartering franchise, were reestablished between the Serenissima and the Holy See. The powers of the "Holy League" pledged to use their troops only against the Turks, to update war plans annually, and not to negotiate without the agreement of the other allies. Again the expansionist policies of France impaired the effectiveness of the league. In May 1684 Genoa, refusing to bow to the wishes of France, was destroyed by a French fleet and Luxemburg was conquered by French troops. Therefore the military operations of the league could not begin until late in 1684 and, with the unsuccessful siege of Ofen, showed scant success. Primarily owing to the Pope's urgent appeals, a peace treaty and subsequent alliance against the Turks were concluded between Poland and Russia. The successes of the following years were primarily due to the Austrian and imperial troops, whereas Sobieski was inactive. But the Emperor's offensive against the Turks was stopped in 1688 by the beginning of the third French war of conquest. In addition to the significant financial aid—the Emperor alone had been paid approximately five million guilders by the apostolic treasury—it was the untiring efforts of the Pope which had brought about the alliance against the Turks and at least to some extent had kept it together.

---

[4] A. Foucher de Careil, ed., "Projet d'expédition d'Égypte présenté à Louis XIV," Œuvres de Leibniz V (Paris 1864).

Innocent XI was extremely strict in his direction of the Church. He tried to restore church discipline especially among the clergy and the orders, but in the process he sometimes dissipated his energy in details. His conscientiousness, almost bordering on scrupulousness, was also manifest in the promotion of cardinals. During his pontificate he decided on only two appointments. The first one, numbering sixteen, was comprised of Italians only (1681), which led to a protest by France. The second promotion again consisted of sixteen Italians, but also of an additional eleven foreigners. Among the latter there were four Germans, but among them the bishop of Strasbourg, Egon von Fürstenberg, who was on the side of Louis XIV.

Innocent XI's position within the Church was marked by his firm opposition against any form of Gallicanism. Opponents of Gallicanism met with ready understanding on the part of the Pope and with support that was not always wise from a tactical viewpoint. This explains why many of the Pope's decisions and actions were viewed as partisanship in favor of the Jansenist movement, since it was precisely the Jansenists who took an especially strong stand against the Gallicanism of the King. In addition, the manifest religious severity of Jansenism and its stress on church discipline corresponded with the Pope's personal views. The moral system of probabilism offered by the Jesuits, who were certainly the most confirmed enemies of Jansenism, nonetheless represented a dangerous move towards laxism. Even at the beginning of his pontificate a small group of French bishops, among them Pavillon of Alet, urged the Pope to condemn certain moral propositions. Their agents in Rome, starting with Possion and continuing with the abbot of Pontchâteau and Louis de Vaucel, were able to wield considerable influence. At the same time, the University of Louvain attempted to effect a similar condemnation. This took place in 1679 by means of a decree of the Holy Office (D 2101–67). Within the Jesuit order, Tyrsus González de Santalla tried to push back probabilism; in 1680 he received papal approbation for his system of probabiliorism (D 2176–77). The fact that he was elected general of the order in 1689 was a result of the benevolence of Innocent XI, who clearly let it be known to the General Congregation of the order on the occasion of an audience whom he wished to have at the head of the Society of Jesus.

Ever since the middle of the century a quietistic current had spread primarily in Italy. Beginning with an intensification of the religious life of the individual and stressing the practice of contemplative prayer, the movement led to the sole emphasis on the efficacy of grace to the total exclusion of personal deeds, amounting finally to a complete passivity of the individual. The Spanish priest Miguel Molinos became the focal point of a large circle in Rome where he was joined by important laymen as well as by many clerics, among them Cardinal Odescalchi. More than his book Guía espiritual, which first appeared in Rome in 1675 and could be interpreted in a harmless fashion, it was his guidance of souls through an active correspondence by which he made his influence felt. When the Roman Inquisition dealt with him, it tracked down approximately twelve thousand such letters, from which it compiled the quietistic doctrines. Jesuits were the first to offer reservations against Molinos and his doctrine. In 1680 Paolo Segneri published a treatise concerning contemplative prayer which was forbidden by the Inquisition. In the meantime more reservations against Molinos's doctrine arose. In 1682 the Holy Office had Cardinal Hieronymus Casanate compose an instruction for confessors (D 2181–92) whose actual publication can not be ascertained. In 1685 Molinos was arrested by the Inquisition and his writings were confiscated. Innocent XI had earlier had high esteem for Molinos. As late as 1686 he had elevated Pier Matteo Petrucci, who had held similar views, to the cardinalate. So he waited for some time before granting his permission for a formal trial, which was concluded in 1687. Of an original 263 propositions 68 were condemned (D 2201–68). Thirteen of these were taken from the defense which Molinos submitted to the Inquisition. (D 2241–53). Molinos was condemned to life in prison and died in 1696. After an investigation against Cardinal Petrucci the latter had to recant in front of the Pope. But Innocent XI advocated mild treatment. As a consequence Petrucci retained all his rights as a cardinal and as bishop of Jesi.

When Queen Christina of Sweden died on 19 April 1689, the Pope ordered a formal funeral in Saint Peter's, which was attended by all cardinals. Shortly thereafter his condition deteriorated. For years he had suffered from painful illnesses to which he succumbed in the Quirinal on 12 August.

Soon after his death the Romans began to venerate Innocent XI as a saint, but not until 1956 was he canonized by Pius XII.[5] The procedure, initiated by Clement XI, was delayed primarily by the opposition of the French government, which was apparently unable to forget the Pope's struggle with Louis XIV which had endured through almost his whole pontificate.

---

[5] A balanced overview of the entire pontificate is provided in the address by Pius XII at the beatification (AAS 48 [1950], 762–78), written by Father Robert Leiber, S.J., who also revised the major portion about Innocent XI by Pastor.

CHAPTER 9

The Popes from Alexander VIII to Clement XI

Alexander VIII (1689–91)

The conclave took place during a war which enveloped the larger part of Europe. The Emperor and the King of France were represented by ambassadors extraordinary attempting to exert their influence upon the papal election. But before the monarchs' wishes were made known, the majority of the cardinals had already decided upon Pietro Ottoboni from Venice. France concurred in his candidacy after Ottoboni's nephew had given assurances that canonical investiture would be conferred on the French bishops who had participated in the Assembly of 1681/82 and that Lavardin would be received as ambassador. The new Pope chose his name in memory of Alexander VII, to whom he felt especially obliged. Although he was eighty years of age, he performed his work with unusual energy. His personal life-style was diametrically opposed to that of his predecessor, which ensured him of the immediate goodwill of the Romans. It was disastrous, however, that he permitted the practice of nepotism to be revived. His barely twenty-year-old grandnephew Pietro, in addition to being appointed cardinal and reigning nephew, was invested with large benefices. Other family members as well were beneficiaries of the Pope's largesse, who is credited with the pronouncement: "Let us make haste as much as possible, for the clock has struck the twenty-third hour."

Alexander VIII also differed from his predecessor Innocent XI in his attitude towards the great powers. Relations with the German Empire cooled off noticeably. Financial aid granted Leopold I for the Turkish Wars was decreased considerably, not in the least because Venice, worried about its own interests in the Levant, looked with a jaundiced eye upon Austria's great military successes. On the other hand, the Pope sought improved relations with France, which had a growing number of uninvested bishops. The consistory of February 1690 was designed as a sign of rapprochement. Disregarding serious reasons to the contrary as well as protests by the Emperor, the Pope fulfilled a longstanding wish of Louis XIV by appointing to the cardinalate the bishop of Beauvais, Toussaint de Forbin-Janson, who had participated in the assembly of 1682. When the third consistory of Alexander VIII passed in November 1690 without the Pope appointing any of the Emperor's nominees, Vienna threatened to break off diplomatic relations. The ambassador was indeed recalled, but additional resolves were not translated into action because of the Pope's serious illness.

But attempts by the King of France to represent his war as a war in defense of Catholicism and to have it approved as such by the Pope were unsuccessful. Since Louis XIV, largely under the influence of the newly appointed Cardinal Forbin-Janson, who was leading the negotiations in Rome, proved to be unyielding on the issue of the Gallican articles, Alexander VIII, already on his deathbed, decided to publish the decree prepared under Innocent XI which nullified the four Gallican Liberties. (D 2281–85).

By condemning propositions which manifested a tendency towards laxism, Innocent XI gave support—albeit unintentionally—to the opponents of the Jesuit order and to the friends of the Jansenist party. Under Alexander VIII contrary propositions, excerpted primarily from writings published in Belgium, were condemned. These propositions, originally ninety-six in number, had been submitted to Rome in 1682; the examination was finished in 1686, but no actual decree was issued. In the end, thirty-one propositions were condemned in 1690 (D 2301–32).

Alexander VIII fell ill in January 1691. On 30 January, in the presence of ten cardinals he ordered the publication of the above-mentioned decree against the Gallican articles and dictated a personal letter to Louis XIV. On 1 February he died at the age of eighty-one.

Innocent XII (1691–1700)

The conclave beginning on 12 February 1691 lasted exactly five months. The front-runner was Gregorio Barbarigo. But Vienna considered him too submissive to France because of his connections with Venice. As a consequence the imperial government sought to prevent his election, yet without making use of a formal exclusivae. Since the French group also failed to support Barbarigo's election—which was promoted by the Zelanti, the apolitical party of the College of Cardinals—although Barbarigo was personally agreeable to Louis XIV, his candidacy failed. After many futile attempts at a compromise, agreement finally centered on Antonio Pignatelli, who received the votes of various blocks and finally those of the French as well. The seventy-five-year-old aristocratic cardinal from the south of Italy had been nuncio in Poland and Vienna; he had been raised to the cardinalate rather late, in 1681, by Innocent XI. His choice of name was intended to be an expression of gratitude for his predecessor. In his mode of governing, his care for the poor, and the simplicity of his personal life-style, he indeed resembled Innocent XI. The most important reform document of his papacy was the bull against nepotism (22 June 1692). After some initial resistance by a good many cardinals, this bull, which for all practical purposes put an end to the practice of nepotism in papal history, was signed by all cardinals.[1] Innocent XII also restricted the sale of ecclesiastical offices at the Curia. To make up for the resulting financial loss he applied thrift to the running of the papal court, and, most importantly, he enlarged the harbors of Civitavecchia and Netuno in order to promote trade. Yet many of his reform measures were impeded by his excessive attention to details.

A compromise was reached with Louis XIV after the latter was forced to be more conciliatory by the formation of the Grand Alliance. As an initial step, the new bishops, appointed by the King since 1682, who had not participated in the Assembly of the Clergy of that year, were granted papal approbation. In return, Louis XIV promised to revoke the decree prescribing the four articles of 1682 as doctrine. The participants of the assembly signed a declaration of obedience. Although clad in provisos, it nonetheless amounted to a recognizable repudiation of their original resolutions. In return the King kept his promise and revoked the decree concerning the Declaration of the French Clergy. Thereupon the bishops in question were granted canonical institution. By the end of 1693 the French hierarchy was restored. Yet the King's right of regalia remained intact in spite of the Pope's protestations. But this act of rapprochement between Rome and France was viewed with distrust by the Emperor. Initially the Pope, following Innocent XI's policy in this regard, gave liberal support to the Emperor in the defense against the Turks. But gradually relations between them became more and more strained, due in part to the unwise behavior of the imperial ambassadors in Rome, Liechtenstein and Martinitz. This tension was skillfully exploited by the French ambassador, Cardinal Forbin-Janson.

The death of Sobieski in 1696 reignited the struggle for the Polish succession. Ostensibly maintaining neutrality, the Holy See nonetheless made efforts to have a Catholic King elected. The candidacy of the French Prince Conti, understandably rejected by Austria, Russia, and Prussia, was successfully contested by Friedrich August, elector of Saxony, who had declared his willingness to convert to Catholicism in the event of his election. Innocent XII was initially somewhat reticent about the new Polish King. Only when the latter had consolidated his rule did the Pope have his letter of recognition and congratulation transmitted.

Innocent XII, having increased his efforts since 1696 towards bringing about an end to the European war of Louis XIV against the Grand

---

[1] Text of the bull in BullRom (ed. by Taur.) 20, 441–46.

Coalition, welcomed the Peace of Rijswijk (1697) although the Holy See had not been officially represented at the congress. He especially liked the so-called Rijswijk Clause, a stipulation keeping the Catholic religion intact in all places made subject to Protestant rule by the terms of the peace. Originally suggested by the Count Palatine Johann Wilhelm von Neuburg, the clause was included in the negotiations and put through at the last minute by the representatives of Louis XIV, to whom it had been expressly recommended by the Pope.

At the end of his pontificate the Pope had to deal with the issue of the Spanish succession. The heir designated by the childless Spanish King, Charles II, died suddenly on 6 February 1699. He had been the Bavarian electoral prince Joseph Ferdinand, grandson of Charles II's sister, who was the wife of Emperor Leopold I. The Spanish King wanted a successor from the Austrian dynasty, but the Council of State under the direction of Cardinal Portocarrero preferred the French dynasty. Innocent XII, whose advice the Spanish King had requested, approved the decision of a commission of cardinals in favor of the French solution. The demise of the Pope (27 September 1700) preceded that of Charles II by a mere few weeks.

Clement XI (1700–1721)

The death of Charles II led to protracted political manipulations and finally to the election of Cardinal Gian Francesco Albani, nominated by the Zelanti. Albani accepted the unanimous election only after several days of consideration and after soliciting formal opinions by several theologians. He chose the name Clement XI after the saint of the day (23 November). Appointed by Alexander VIII, he had become probably the most powerful of the cardinals during the pontificates of Alexander and the latter's successor. He had received his ordination late (in September 1700) and was consecrated a week after his election to the papacy. Since he was only fifty-one years old, he could count on a long pontificate.

From the very beginning the new pontificate was affected by the danger of renewed warfare in Europe. While King Philip V of the French dynasty was recognized by most of the European powers and the Pope as well, Leopold I formally protested the testament of Charles II of Spain. By recognizing the royal title, arbitrarily assumed by the elector of Brandenburg, the Emperor was able to ensure himself of Prussia's support. He also obtained the support of the two naval powers England and Holland, who felt themselves endangered by France's expansionist policies. Clement XI was immediately involved in the conflict by his very proximity to the Kingdom of Naples, which he considered a papal lien. His claim was disputed by both the opposing sides. At first he tried to avoid a decision in order to gain time. But the Emperor considered the Pope to be a partisan of France primarily because of his quick recognition of Philip V as King of Spain and because of his protest in April 1701 against the assumption of the royal title by the elector of Brandenburg. The Pope's attempt to keep Italy out of the war and to form a defensive league of the Italian states for the purpose of protecting his own neutrality failed. After Mantua surrendered to the French troops without a battle (5 April 1701), Italy became a theater of war with parts of the Papal States under occupation. At the end of 1701 the Emperor requested free passage to Naples for his troops, which was denied. Both belligerents violated the neutrality of the Papal States in northern Italy. France's skillful propaganda, representing the Emperor's alliance with the Protestant powers as a danger to the Church and to France and simultaneously picturing Spain as the sole protector of Catholicism, achieved some success with the Pope, especially since his efforts to achieve peace were brusquely rejected by the Court of Vienna. When Joseph I succeeded his father Leopold I on 5 May 1705, tensions between the Pope and the Emperor worsened. During the following year the military situation clearly changed in favor of the Emperor. In September, after Prince Eugene's victory at Turin the French troops had to vacate all of northern Italy. In spite of protests by the Pope the imperial army occupied some of the legations. In May 1707 the Pope was forced to grant free passage to Naples for the imperial troops. Within a few weeks almost all of the kingdom was in their hands. Contrary to papal claims, Parma and Piacenza were taxed as imperial liens. A bull of 27 July 1707 pronouncing excommunication against those abuses achieved nothing. Since Clement XI still adhered to Philip V as the rightful King of Spain, the Austrian pretender, Charles III, ordered a freeze on all revenues of the Church in Lombardy and Naples (April 1708), which caused many members of the Curia to lose a considerable part of their income. Next, the imperial troops invaded the Papal States without a declaration of war and occupied the Comacchio, important for its production of salt (situated between Ravenna and Ferrara on the coast). In autumn 1708, hoping for help from Louis XIV, the Pope decided to oppose the Emperor by force of arms. But left to his own devices, Clement XI was unable to stop the attacking imperial army. On 15 January 1709 he had to accept the Emperor's harsh conditions: disarmament of the papal troops, recognition of Charles III as King of Spain, recognition of the Emperor's precedence over the King of France, a peaceful solution of the territorial issues concerning Parma, Piacenza, and Comacchio. In return he received a promise that the prohibition against the transfer of money would be revoked and compensation would be paid for the damages caused by the occupation of the Papal States.

Although Philip V had encroached on church rights several times, the actual break occurred upon papal recognition of his rival Charles. The defeat of Louis XIV at Malplaquet and Spain's breaking off of diplomatic relations with Rome resulted in a definitive recognition of Charles III on 10 October 1709. Clement XI refused canonical investiture to the bishops appointed by Philip V after the latter had closed the nunciature in Madrid. In the end the Pope suggested mediation by Louis XIV. Yet the development towards an established Church in Spain continued. Conversely, Charles III, residing in Barcelona, demanded a nuncio proper, who arrived in 1711. The negotiations concerning the return of Comacchio and the encroachment on church rights in Naples conducted in Rome since 1710 were protracted. They were concluded after a year with an agreement stipulating the return of that coastal town. The unexpected death of the Emperor on 17 April 1711 of smallpox and that of the French Dauphin, who had succumbed to the same disease three days earlier, caused a complete turnabout in the issue of the Spanish succession. The dead Emperor left only daughters, so that his brother Charles was the logical choice to succeed him in Austria. In the face of French machinations, the Pope held fast to Charles's candidacy. But his nephew Albani, whom he dispatched to the imperial election in Frankfurt as his personal envoy, was kept from exerting any and all influence and was treated curtly on every occasion. England was immutably opposed to a union of Spain and the Empire under one monarch: Philip V was to remain King of Spain while Austria was to be compensated by the Spanish possessions in Italy and the Habsburg Netherlands.

At the peace congress starting in Utrecht in January 1712, the papal representative Passionei—since he was devoid of any diplomatic rank he could only act as a common agent of the Pope—had a twofold charge: to prevent the revocation of the Rijswijk Clause and see to it that the feudal rights of the Pope over Parma, Piacenza, and Sicily (the latter was to be given to the duke of Savoy) were upheld. But he could, in fact, achieve very little. The territorial alterations turned out to be damaging to the Church. France recognized the Protestant succession in England and withdrew its support of the pretender James III of the house of Stuart, hitherto staunchly supported by the Pope; Sicily was promised to the duke of Savoy without consultation with the Pope. Personal efforts by the Pope to influence Louis XIV notwithstanding, the Rijswijk Clause—while not formally revoked—was in effect weakened. However, in the parallel peace treaty concluded in Rastatt between the Emperor and the King of France (March 1714) the clause was included. But since the estates of the realm had not participated in the negotiations, a new congress had to be convoked. This took place in Baden, Switzerland, where the Protestant estates again worked towards a revocation of that clause. Passionei, back in his role as papal agent, was again charged with upholding the rights of the Church, with the Rijswijk Clause still being promoted by the Pope. The imperial peace concluded in September 1714 indeed corresponded to that of Rastatt, so that the efforts of the Holy See can be considered partially successful.

Passionei had to protest against those stipulations that were unfavorable to the Catholic Church: the recognition in toto of the Peace of Westphalia, the recognition of the Protestant electoral status of Hanover and of the Prussian royal title, and the ceding of Catholic territories to Protestant princes. In the consistory of 21 January 1715, in which he talked about the three peace treaties, Clement XI had his protest publicly reiterated.

While the Northern War, which lasted beyond the War of the Spanish Succession, did not directly affect the papacy and the Church, the end of the European war renewed the Turkish threat. Initial preparations by the Holy See centered around Venice. Following the example of Pius V, Pope Clement XI tried to bring about a defensive alliance against the Turkish naval threat. Yet the Emperor, distrustful of the French, was unwilling to engage in a military operation on such a large scale. As a consequence the Turkish fleet achieved a series of great successes in the summer of 1715. Venice lost the entire Peloponnesos; an attack upon Italy itself was greatly feared. Urged by the Pope, Philip V of Spain had Clement XI transmit formal guarantees to the Emperor at the end of 1715 that the imperial possessions in Italy would not be endangered for the duration of the Turkish war. This declaration was influenced more than anything by the abbot Giulio Alberoni, a native of Piacenza and envoy of the duke of Parma in Madrid who had promoted the second marriage of Philip V with Elizabeth Farnese. With great financial aid and upon constant urging by the Pope, the Emperor concluded an alliance with Venice in April 1716. The offensive in Hungary was initiated in the summer of that year. The subsequent victory by Prince Eugene at Peterwardein and the successful defense of Corfu against the Turks were a welcome prelude to the operations.

In order to interest Spain in taking an active part in the war against Turkey and on the condition of completely restoring the nunciature in Madrid, the ambitious Alberoni, who had created for himself a superlative position of power, was appointed cardinal.[2] The Spanish fleet, largely equipped by means of financial aid from the Pope, was now expected to intervene in the naval war against the Turks so that the continental military operations of the Emperor, which had led to the conquest of Belgrade in August, could be supported. Instead Spain had conceived a plan to attack the Italian possessions of the Empire in order to establish a secundogeniture. Four days after Alberoni found out about his elevation to the cardinalate the Spanish fleet sailed from its harbor and—in violation of the peace—took Sardinia from the Emperor. The Pope, who had given a moral guarantee for the security of the imperial possessions in Italy was assigned part of the blame for this outrageous betrayal and even accused of complicity in it. When the Pope took certain measures against Spain they were called insufficient by Vienna; the Emperor insisted on a complete break with Spain. The situation was further aggravated by the fact that the nuncio at Madrid, Aldrovandi, obviously permitted himself to be influenced by the Spanish government. By invading papal territories and making unacceptable demands Madrid increased the tensions to the point of a complete break of diplomatic relations with Rome. In 1718, while the Spanish fleet was busy conquering Sicily, the Emperor, France, England, and Holland formed a quadruple alliance for the purpose of reordering Italy. When Spain rejected the suggestions of the alliance, the Spanish fleet was destroyed by the English fleet. Intent on taking care of his own interests, King Philip disavowed Alberoni, blaming him for his own political failures. The Emperor acquired Sicily; Sardinia went to Savoy. Don Carlos, son of Philip V and Elizabeth Farnese, was to assume the succession in Parma and Piacenza. The traditional feudal rights of the Holy See in these territories were disregarded. The trial against Alberoni, initiated by Clement XI and promoted strongly by Philip V for political reasons, was concluded under Clement's successor, Innocent XIII, on the whole in favor of the cardinal, who had even participated in the conclave of 1721. His office and rank were completely restored to him.

---

[2] The more recent research has for the most part exonerated Alberoni; cf. A. Arata, Il processo del card. Alberoni (Piacenza 1923); P. Castagnoli, Il card. G. Alberoni (Piacenza

In addition to the difficulties caused by the wars, the long pontificate of Clement XI was also troubled by a series of natural catastrophes such as floodings of the Tiber river, epidemics, and earthquakes. These and other problems prevented him from taking far-reaching measures. The penal institution for juveniles, San Michele in Rome, established in 1703, was a pioneering effort in the modern penal system.

Clement XI has been criticized for his timid and indecisive character and Rome 1929); R. Quazza, Dizionario Biografico Italiano I, 662–68; G. F. Rossi, La bibliografia Alberoniana di Mons. Antonio Arata (Piacenza 1964).

---

and his inability to lend needed emphasis to important decisions.[3] But the lack of success of his pontificate in the area of politics and the Church was surely caused above all by the unfavorable state of affairs confronting the Pope. He never quite recovered from a serious illness in the beginning of 1710. In the winter of 1720 his health further deteriorated. He personally dictated to his nephew the inscription for the simple grave already prepared for him. During the following months his condition was precarious. He died on 19 March 1721 after a pontificate lasting over twenty years.

---

[3] Pastor XV, 385.

SECTION THREE

The End of the Denominational Era in Europe—Progress and Stagnation of the World Mission

CHAPTER 10

Reconstruction and Constitution of the Church of the Empire

The Peace of Westphalia had ended the Thirty Years' War, but it had not been able to bring peace to the Empire. Throughout a series of wars lasting into the first third of the eighteenth century and barely interrupted by a few years of peace, the ecclesiastical states within the "constituted anarchy" of the Empire were helpless pawns of the great powers. Again and again afflicted by military campaigns and the aftermath of war, repeatedly threatened by secularization and manipulation at European peace conferences, their reconstruction was also seriously impeded by their own constitution as electoral states, by joint dominion with the cathedral chapters, a lack of continuity, and the dual function of ecclesiastical princes.

In the period of 1500 to 1720, the archbishopric of Trier, for example, had to suffer a total of one hundred years of war, pestilence, and occupation.[1] The small bishopric of Worms, almost completely surrounded by the Protestant Palatinate, its cathedral used as a garrison church by the Swedes, is another case in point. Only after the Catholic house of Neuburg succeeded the house of Pfalz-Simmern in the Palatinate could Prince-Bishop Franz Ludwig von Pfalz-Neuburg begin to overcome the terrible destruction of the Orléans War and to restore church life under the protection of the controversial Rijswijk Clause. The Turkish threat,[2] reflected even in motifs and figures of popular piety, was not banished until the Treaty of Passarowitz (1718). Only the peace treaties of Utrecht, Rastatt, Baden (1713/14), and Aachen (1748) were preludes to lengthier periods of peace. Lamentations were heard across the land uniformly decrying, in the typical hyperbole of the baroque, the pervasive wretchedness, the misery of the war in the west, the threat of the Turks in the east, joined by woeful tales of pestilence, famine, and the decay of morals.[3] Even if one were inclined to take the tendentiousness and exaggeration of the contemporary accounts into consideration and not view conditions as being totally hopeless, the political and economic reconstruction, beset by constant reverses, was yet an impressive achievement. The same holds true for the renewal and deepening of religion and church life, which were palpably expressed in the sacred art under the rule of the various dynasties, those of Wittelsbach, Habsburg, Pfalz-Neuburg, and Schönborn.

---

[1] G. Reitz, Die Größe des geistlichen und ritterschaftlichen Grundbesitzes in ehemaligen Kur-Trier (Koblenz 1919), 43.

[2] H. Watzl, ed., Flucht und Zuflucht. Das Tagebuch des Priesters Balthasar Kleinschroth aus dem Türkenjahr 1683 (Graz and Cologne 1956); L. A. Veit and L. Lenhart, Kirche und Volksfrömmigkeit im Zeitalter des Barock (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1956), 64ff.

The ecclesiastical territories of the Empire, militarily and politically impotent and reduced to relying on the law, had been afflicted most grievously during the Thirty Years' War. Hardly a prince-bishop was able to do what the zealous Archbishop Paris Lodron of Salzburg (1619–53) had accomplished: preserved his land from war and its aftermath, founded the university, the Collegium Marianum (1645), the Rupertinum (1653), and finished construction of the cathedral.[4] Neutrality had neither spared the prince-bishopric of Liège under Ferdinand of Bavaria[5] nor the bishopric of Basel, although the migration after the war into more depopulated areas of the Empire,[6] as for instance from Liège to Seligenstadt, might have created the opposite impression. Even in those areas of the Catholic Church of the Empire which had never directly suffered pillage and destruction, the war had increased prewar indebtedness, severed traditional ties, created misery for many refugees, and affected living conditions. By 1659 the bishopric of Brixen was so deeply in debt that the annates and taxes to Tyrol could not be paid and the major portion of its revenues had to be applied to the amortization of interest. A report by Prince-Bishop Karl Emanuel shows that in 1653 economic conditions in the prince-bishopric of Trent were hardly better.[7]

---

[3] Regarding the misery of war from 1703 to 1713 the Luxemburg Carmelite Father Pacificus a Cruce remarks: "Now all is subjected to war and in a bad state; the Netherlands have been further lowered by war; Alsace has become a place of misery; the Rhine a river of pain; Italy is a battleground. . . . War and misery are everywhere! . . ." quoted from E. Donckel, "P. Pacificus a Cruce, Ordinis Fratrum B.M.V. de Monte Carmelo. Sein Leben—Sein Predigtwerk," Festschrift für Alois Thomas (Trier 1967), 106, n. 43.—A little later a contemporary of his complains about the conditions in the bishopric of Speyer: "There was no trace left of the disciplina ecclesiastica, no sinful excess so great that it was not also seen among the clergy. The teachings of Christ have proved to be unknown in many places." Cited from O. B. Roegele, "Damian Hugo von Schönborn und die Anfänge des Bruchsaler Priesterseminars," FreibDiözArch 71 (1951), 10.

[4] F. Martin, Salzburgs Fürsten in der Barockzeit (1557–1812) (Salzburg 1966), 85–105.

[5] P. Harsin, "Les origines diplomatiques de la neutralité liégeoise," Revue belge de philologie et d'histoire 5 (1926), 423–52.

[6] Regarding loss of population and war damages, see G. Franz, Der Dreißigjährige Krieg und das deutsche Volk (Stuttgart 1961); J. Schmidlin, Kirchliche Zustände und Schicksale des deutschen Katholizismus während des Dreißigjährigen Krieges nach den bischöflichen Romberichten (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1940); A. Rothbauer, "Der Dreißigjährige Krieg im Spiegel der ältesten Langenloiser Matrik,Jahrbuch für Landeskunde von Niederösterreich n.s. 35 (1964), 357–63; H. Steinberg, Der Dreißigjährige Krieg und der Kampf um die Vorherrschaft in Europa 1600–60 (Göttingen 1967), is not very convincing in his attempt to correct the "traditional" image of the terrible catastrophe of the Thirty Years' War and to deemphasize its destructive effects on culture and morals.

Compared to the bishoprics on the periphery of the Church of the Empire west and south of the Danube, political, economic, religious, and moral conditions around the middle of the seventeenth century were even worse in the so-called "priests' alley" on the Rhine and Main, as well as in those bishoprics of northern Germany which had remained Catholic. In most of the ecclesiastical territories whole regions had to be almost completely recolonized, numerous deserted villages and decayed towns rebuilt, exorbitant debts repaid, monetary confusion and infringements by secular masters on the assets and prerogatives of churches and clerics had to be checked. "Reports received by us of visitations undertaken at war's end show a disconsolate picture of the destruction of churches, of the inferior condition of the sparse number of clerics, of the dissolution and ruin of all church life, of the moral degeneration and the wild superstition of the populace."[8]

In 1647 upon the accession of Johann Philipp von Schönborn in Mainz, the so-called primary see with its second residence of Aschaffenburg had vacancies in 77 of 105 parishes. The archbishopric on the left bank of the Rhine including Mainz, which was left half-destroyed after the Swedish occupation, remained in French hands until 1650. In the archbishopric of Bamberg "the population was decimated by atrocities, famine, and pestilence. The survivors were quite impoverished as a consequence of repeated tributes."[9] In the prince-bishopric of Münster, religious and moral conditions were more precarious than the economic ones. Church discipline had deteriorated, strange cults had been introduced, and when Bishop Christoph Bernhard von Galen entered office, a large part of the clergy lived in concubinage.[10] The report to Rome by Bishop Johann Franz Vogt von Altensumerau and Praßberg of Constance, the largest diocese of the Catholic Church of the Empire, counted only six hundred occupied parishes among more than a thousand. In 1654 the bishopric of Regensburg had more than three hundred vacant parishes. Conditions were not much better in most of the remaining prince-bishoprics. In addition to the well-known aftermath of the war, the political, economic, and religious reconstruction was often impeded by foreign occupation troops, raids, and considerable reparations.[11]

---

[7] I. P. Dengel, "Berichte von Bischöfen über den Stand ihrer Diözesen (Relationes status ecclesiarum). Als Beitrag zur Kirchengeschichte Österreichs im 16. und 17. Jh.," Forschungen und Mitteilungen zur Geschichte Tyrols und Vorarlbergs 6 (1907), 323–26, 337–40.

[8] F. X. Seppelt, Geschichte des Bistums Breslau (Breslau 1929), 71.

[9] J. Kist, Fürst und Erzbistum Bamberg (Bamberg 1962), 103.

[10] W. Kohl, Christoph Bernhard von Galen: Politische Geschichte des Fürstbistums Münster 1650–78 (Münster 1964), 26–32.

Wherever reliable sources are available, they demonstrate that the indebtedness of many prince-bishoprics dating back to the late Middle Ages could not be reduced substantially even in the most affluent archdioceses. Among the reasons were the financial burdens of war, monetary deterioration, wrong financial policies, excessive expenditures for households, construction projects, and maintaining the relatives of the reigning princes.[12] During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries the following prince-bishoprics were considered either quite poor or highly indebted: Chur, Constance, Regensburg, Paderborn, Hildesheim, in part also Worms, Speyer, Trier, and Freising. The cumulation of bishoprics has to be seen from economic viewpoints as well. Those bishoprics which were economically healthy and therefore relatively rich were desirable political objects for princes and knights of the Empire. In the period mentioned, these included the archbishopric of Mainz with annual revenues of approximately 1.5 to 1.7 million imperial talers (around 1790), the archbishopric of Cologne, the bishoprics of Münster, Strasbourg, Würzburg, Augsburg, and also Bamberg after it was reconstructed by Bishop Philipp Valentin Voit von Rieneck. The revenues of Bishop Wilhelm Egon von Fürstenberg (1740) from the prince-bishopric of Strasbourg, the abbeys of Saint Arnulf in Metz, Saint Michel and other benefices are estimated at 600,000 to 700,000 livres annually, those of Elector-Archbishop Max Franz of Cologne at more than one million imperial talers.

Yet the justifiable criticism of the financial policies[13] of many an ecclesiastical prince should not obscure their merits in the promotion of the arts, especially architecture—as by the Schönborns[14]—painting, the music of the baroque and Rococo, but also of science, and their charitable efforts, all of which can more than hold their own in comparison with the more powerful secular territories. The absence of standing armies, the primary instrument of power in modern absolutist states, and the close connection between the military and the exchequer tended to hold back the ecclesiastical territories in their public organization and as a political factor. At the same time it provided them with the possibility to solve by means of older forms of governing the basic question of the affairs of any state, to bring about in a faster and simpler way and in correspondence with the natural order a relationship between the individual and society, between man and the state, not least under the aspect of future salvation in the hereafter. The lack of political format, destined to become a fateful issue in the areas governed by crosier and miter, could not but provoke criticism on the part of the Enlightenment; yet it was nonetheless a positive force since it promised relatively more freedom and a certain worldly happiness according to the proverb "Under the crosier one can rest assured." On the eve of secularization, Friedrich Carl von Moser wrote: "The often scorned Pfaffengasse [priests' alley] constitutes a Pyrenees of sorts of inestimable value to the German people and worthy of their eternal gratitude. Thanks to it the power of monarchs was prevented from enchaining all and everything, as it did in France and Spain, leaving these Alps intact." He continues by saying that only the ecclesiastical princes "deserve the name of public administrators in the true sense of the word because bad and damaging actions are not let pass, as in the case of secular sovereigns, since the eyes of the chapter are on and around them."[15]

---

[11] The prince-abbeys of Murbach and Luders, for example, had to pay an immense sum in reparations. This had a negative effect until the eighteenth century; A. Gatrio, Die Abtei Murbach im Elsaß II (Strasbourg 1895), 553.

[12] The Mainz elector-archbishop Friedrich Karl von Ostein reported to Maria Theresa on 20 March 1763 that the Seven Years' War had "left behind nothing but beggars. Chapters and convents are totally prostrate regarding their revenues. Indeed, there is no hamlet in my entire archbishopric so small that it does not have debts as much and often manifold as is its worth." According to a calculation by the Mainz electorate of 16 October 1763, losses and damages by the French, imperial, Prussian, and allied troops, including the expenditures for the Mainz contingent of the Imperial Army, amounted to 20, 156, 447 guilders and 21 crowns. (Haus-, Hof- und Staatsarchiv Wien MOG, 25 A, [n.d.], 20).

[13] The policies of expenditures, revenues, and debts of the ecclesiastical princes have not yet been examined closely. Only two pertinent investigations regarding the eighteenth

The ecclesiastical princes could not expect significant help from Rome or from the nunciatures in Cologne, Vienna, and Lucerne for the task of century can be mentioned: H. Maas, Verwaltungs- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte des Bistums Speyer während der Regierung des Fürstbischofs Franz Christoph von Hutten (1743–1770) (diss., Göttingen 1931); O. Schneider, "Die Finanzpolitik des Kurfürsten Clemens Wenzeslaus von Trier," Finanzwissenschaftliche Forschungsarbeiten n.s. 19 (Berlin 1958).

---

[14] M. V. Freeden, Würzburgs Residenz und Fürstenhof zur Schönbornzeit (Würzburg 1949); idem, Kunst und Künstler am Hofe des Kurfürsten Lothar Franz von Schönborn (Würzburg 1949); J. F. Albert, Vom Mäzenatentum der Schönborn (Würzburg 1949); M. Braubach, "Politik und Kultur an den geistlichen Fürstenhöfen Westfalens gegen Ende des alten Reiches," WZ 105 (1955), 65–82; also in: Bonner historische Forschungen 33 (1969), 546–62; "Kurfürst Clemens August, Landesherr und Mäzen des 18. Jahrhunderts," Katalog der Ausstellung in Schloß Augustusburg zu Brühl 1961 (Cologne 1961).

[15] F. C. v. Moser, Über die Regierung der geistlichen Staaten in Deutschland (Frankfurt and Leipzig 1787), 163.

religious reconstruction. There is scant reference to actions by the nunciatures on behalf of reforms, unlike the case in the waning sixteenth century and the first two decades of the seventeenth century.[16] As a matter of fact, some bishops pushed through reforms against the resistance of certain nuncios. In the case of Cologne, hardly more than the central part (the bishoprics of Cologne and Liège) were left of the vast jurisdictional area which the nuncio of Cologne, Sanfelice, casting his eyes towards Metz, Toul, and Verdun, warned against giving up. Even in 1670 the Uditore Fini claimed all of it in his instruction: ". . . si estende questa Nunziatura per tutto quel tratto di paese, che bagna il Rheno, cominciando da Basilea fino alle sue bocche dell'Oceano Britannico."[17] But even in the part that was left, opposition against the jurisdiction and the existence of the nunciature assumed dangerous proportions.[18]

The latent existential crisis or the threatening "total ruin" of some prince-bishoprics could not be averted by either the nunciatures or by the steadily weakening papacy. They could be averted only by the Emperor and the Empire and by the policies of the Wittelsbachs and the Habsburgs, of the Pfalz-Neuburgs, and the great chapter families such as the Eltz and Schönborns, the von der Leyens, Dalbergs, Stadions, Metternichs, Walderdorffs, and their relatives among the knights of the Empire. After a fashion, these efforts were fairly successful in the first century after the Peace of Westphalia, but less so after the middle of the eighteenth century. Much to their credit was the securing of ecclesiastical properties and the re-Catholization in the Upper Palatinate, Silesia, Jülich and Berg, in the diaspora areas of the Catholic Church of the Empire. But the political results of the conversion of princes have usually been overestimated.[19]

---

[16] A. Franzen, "Die Finalrelation des Kölner Nuntius Sanfelice vom Jahre 1659," RQ 50 (1955), 69–88 idem, "Französische Politik und Kurkölns Beziehungen zu Frankreich unter Erzbischof Max Heinrich (1650–1688), RQ 52 (1957), 169–210; H. Raab, "Die Finalrelation des Kölner Nuntius Fabrizio Paolucci," RQ 55 (1960), 129–50; idem, "Die Relation des Kölner Nuntius Gaetano de' Cavalieri von 1732," RQ 58 (1963), 71–88; idem, "Die Instruktion für den Kölner Nuntius Jacopo Oddi," RQ 62 (1967), 36–69; A. Levinson, "Nuntiaturberichte vom Kaiserhofe Leopolds I. (1657–1669)," AÖG 103 (1913), 547–831; R. Scotti, Helvetia sacra. Relatione de Vescovati, Abbatie, et altre dignità subordinate alla Nuntiatura helvetica (Macerata 1642); K. Haid, "Aus der Aktenmappe des Monsignore Francesco Boccapaduglio, Nuntius in der Schweiz," ZSKG 38 (1944), 121–53.

[17] L. Just, "Die Kölner Nuntiatur nach einer Information des Uditore Fini von 1670," AHVNrh 155/56 (1954), 314.

[18] See Chap. 23: "Episcopalism in the Church of the Empire."

[19] Concerning Johann Ludwig von Nassau-Hadamar, who converted to Catholicism in Vienna in 1628 and as a widower and father of a large number of children, some of

The renewal of church life, initiated in force after 1648, received a late start in comparison with the Romance countries. It can only be fully understood if its special constitutional aspects and the difficulties arising from them are taken into account.[20]

According to the constitution of the Empire, the bishops were not only dignitaries of the hierarchy and successors of the apostles, but as holders of ecclesiastical territories granted as fiefs of the Empire they were also pillars of the Empire, full members with a vote in the imperial diet, princes with the sovereignty granted them by the Peace of Westphalia, albeit a sovereignty which few of them were able to claim for lack of concrete power. This duality of ecclesiastical and secular functions of the prince-bishops and prince-abbots had a positive potential for Church reform. But it also represented a temptation which in a courtly world of absolutism frequently surpassed their strength and permitted the worldly prince in them to win out over the bishop. Forgoing the pomp and circumstance, as was often demanded by contemporary critics, or the demand for a more profound scientific education on the part of prince-bishops[21] only scratched the surface of the problem.

A Church of the Empire in the sense of an association comprising all bishoprics under an ecclesiastical head empowered to lead and direct whom were already placed in German chapters, applied in 1650 for the prince-bishopric of Münster, see K. Wolf, "Johann Ludwig, Graf von Nassau-Hadamar," Nassauische Lebensbilder II (Wiesbaden 1943), 109–23; W. Kohl, "Nassauische Absichten auf das Bistum Münster," Westfalen 36 (1958), 92–102; concerning Ernst von Hessen-Rheinfels, who promoted re-Catholicization in St. Goar, Bad Schwalbach, Rotenburg/Fulda, see H. Raab, Landgraf Ernst von Hessen-Rheinfels (1623–93) (St. Goar 1964). The conversion of Duke Alexander Heinrich von Holstein (1649), Duke Friedrich von Hanover (1651), Count Palatine Christian August von Sulzbach, Elector Friedrich August I of Saxony, the dukes of Württemberg, etc. had little or no consequence from the standpoint of denominational politics.

---

[20] It is self-evident that space does not permit us to write the history of the counter-reformational and reformational efforts of the seventeenth and early eighteenth century in the Church of the Empire, although in spite of a number of monographs this field has remained largely unexplored.

[21] In his "Speculum pro Episcopo et simul Principi saeculari" Landgrave Ernst von Hessen-Rheinfels expressed the view that a bishop should be allowed the exercise of ecclesiastical and temporal power only "propter duritiem cordis, that is, according to the present state of the world." No bishop was to be implicated, like Christoph Bernhard von Galen of Münster and the Popes Julius II and Innocent X "in war and matters of war." Thorough knowledge of theology, academic titles, and experience in the ministry should be demanded of every candidate for the office of bishop. Membership in a certain estate should not exclude him from being eligible for election.—According to the prince-abbot Bernhard Frank von Disentis eighty years later, "an uneducated bishop is a speechless herald" (L. Schmid, Bernhard Frank von Frankenberg, Fürstabt von Disentis 1742–63 [Chur 1958], 53.).

never existed. As far as its unity was concerned, the Church of the Empire could not be compared with the Ecclesia Gallicana. But after the canonical and historical foundation of episcopalism, initially in imitation of Gallicanism, had made some progress, it proudly put its own freedoms—Prince-Abbot Martin Gerbert even spoke of a "national freedom of the German Church"—on a higher footing than those of the Gallican Church, which were considered basically to give expression only to the dominance of the King over the Church. In its legal aspects the Church was initially and exclusively based on the Concordat of Vienna (1448),[22] including, most importantly, its stipulations regarding the filling of bishoprics in the Empire, the granting of benefices, and the financial tribute to the Roman Curia. In the late seventeenth century, following the ambiguous Cologne election of 1688 and the efforts of G. W. Leibniz, there was an attempt to revive the Concordat of Worms and to deduce from it the right of the Emperor to decide conflicting elections.[23] The episcopal church law of the Empire stressed the rediscovered Concordata Principum of 1447 and specifically the Mainz Acceptation of 1439 in order to use them in an attempt to modify the Concordat of Vienna.[24] The reform councils of Constance and Basel viewed as foundations of the Church of the Empire the pertinent stipulations of the Peace of Augsburg, the Peace of Westphalia, the Emperor's election capitulation, and the Rijswijk Clause, in addition to the more significant peace treaties of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In neither of these centuries did the Church of the Empire effect a new concordat satisfying the demands of the time.

The church province of Mainz and the idea of a Primas Germaniae was brought up as an age-old unifying tie between the bishoprics of the Empire. When Magdeburg joined the Reformation, the archbishops of Salzburg not only claimed the title of Primas Germaniae, but were able to maintain their claim with the support of the Emperor and even have it recognized by the Imperial Chancellery in 1750. Yet it had never really amounted to more than an honorary title when the elector-archbishops of Mainz raised their claim to it. This held true even though Mainz, with some justification, was considered the Metropolis Germaniae until the fall of the Empire, "increasingly in the sense that involved legal and constitutional aspects of the Empire, decreasingly in the sense of ecclesiastical primacy, and hardly at all in the sense of territorial power."[25]

---

[22] H. Raab, Die Concordata Nationis Germanicae in der kanonistischen Diskussion des 17. bis 19. Jh. Ein Beitrag der episkopalistischen Theorie in Deutschland (Wiesbaden 1956).

[23] P. Kopfermann, Das Wiener Konkordat im deutschen Staatsrecht (Berlin 1908).

[24] See Chap. 23: "Episcopalism in the Church of the Empire from the Middle of the Seventeenth to the End of the Eighteenth Century."

[25] J. Bärmann, Moguntiae Metropolis Germaniae (Mainz 1965), 23.

It was in his capacity as elector-archchancellor of the Empire that the archbishop of Mainz occupied the most respected position among the ecclesiastical princes.[26] The prince-bishops of Eichstätt assumed the title of a Sanctae Moguntinae Sedis Cancellarius whose task it was to watch over the inviolateness of the Empire and the rights of its Catholic Church. But in spite of the occasional use of the title of primate and some attempts to make themselves the spokesmen representing the interests of the Church of the Empire, their ecclesiastical authority was no greater than that of the other three archbishops.

The extent and borders of the Church of the Empire have never been precisely defined; nor do they correspond to Wessenberg's later definition of the "German Church" under a German primate.[27] They are best determined according to the area affected by the Concordat of Vienna (1448) combined with the basic law of the Empire calling for the free election of bishops. Fluidity and obscurity of its borders, overlapping authority, strange legal conditions, as in the case of the prince-abbeys of Sankt Gallen and Murbach-Luders, the Salzburg bishoprics proper, the abbeys nullius dioecesis[28] and the quasi-bishoprics, the alternation of Osnabrück and the denominationally mixed cathedral chapters and benefices all lent a special character to the Church of the Empire and made many a reform difficult. Not counting the elevation of Fulda and Corvey to bishoprics in the second half of the eighteenth century, the number of bishoprics remained constant during the 150 years following the Peace of Westphalia. Neither strength nor will were sufficient to establish Counter Reformation bishoprics, although Joseph II was not the first to perceive the necessity for reordering the organization of the bishoprics, which was almost a thousand years old at that time. Landgrave Ernst von Hessen-Rheinfels (1623–93) demanded that the Empire be restructured into 150 archdioceses and dioceses with each of them having no more than 200 parishes and annual revenues of 4000 talers. Even individual corrections in the administrative structure could not be effected without considerable difficulty. Thus the centuries-old issue between Salzburg and Passau[29] concerning exemption was not decided until 1728, in favor of Passau.

For all practical purposes, the Catholic Church of the Empire ended at the borders of the Emperor's patrimonial dominions, yet it also overlapped the borders of Switzerland and France. In spite of some corresponding details, its situation in the Bavarian sphere of influence cannot simply be compared with that of the Rhenish ecclesiastical electorates. In the Austrian hereditary lands the Church was to a large extent an established Church; despite their extensive property holdings, the bishops were merely members of the provincial diets. With the exception of aristocratic clerics of the Empire who played a significant role in Vienna or Prague (as did the vice-chancellor of the Empire, Walderdorff, and Archbishops Manderscheid and Salm-Salm), and the bishops of Brixen, Trent, Seckau, and Lavant, the clergy of the hereditary lands, unless they simultaneously occupied a seat in the cathedral chapters of Passau, Salzburg, Regensburg or in imperial chapters, simply could not have very strong feelings regarding their ties to the diocesan structure of Germany. Since the turn of the eighteenth century, moreover, the Habsburg emperors started to carve an Austrian monarchy from the Empire and increasingly to consider themselves heads of an established Church.

---

[26] H. Mathy, "Über das Mainzer Erzkanzleramt in der Neuzeit Stand und Aufgaben der Forschung," Geschichtliche Landeskunde II (1965), 109–49.

[27] I. H. von Wessenberg, Betrachtungen über die Verhältnisse der katholischen Kirche im Umfange des deutschen Bundes (1818).

[28] Hofmeister, "Gefreite Abteien und Prälaturen," ZSavRGkan 50 (1964), 176ff.

[29] E. M. Eder, Beiträge zum Passauer Exemtionsstreit, (diss., Vienna 1962).

And yet if one looks for a head of the Church of the Empire, able to exert influence upon it, it would most likely be the Emperor, the Advocatus ecclesiae.[30] The seat of German Kings and Emperors in the choir stall of many a cathedral, to be sure, had become a sort of venerable legacy. The office of an archchancellor of the empress, occupied by the prince-abbot of Fulda, or that of the archmarshall, claimed by the prince-abbot of Kempten was endowed with a very modest influence. But these various offices and the artistic aspects of "Imperial Halls," the historiography and architecture of the Germania sacra demonstrate its "amphibious constitution."[31] In spite of the denominational split, the Empire remained Catholic, albeit semiecclesiastic in its claims and its mission. It was not only political self-preservation that prompted a bond with the Empire, generally stronger than in most of the secular territories. Only within the framework of the Empire were these many Caesaropapal states of varying size able to develop a political and cultural life or eventually realize their lack of political power relative to the rise of the modern absolutist states.[32]

[30] L. Glier, Die Advocatia ecclesiae Romanae imperatoris in der Zeit von 1519 bis 1648 (diss., Erlangen 1897); R. Müller, Die rechtlichen Wandlungen der Advocatia Ecclesiae des römischen Kaisers deutscher Nation (diss., Erlangen 1895).

[31] This apt expression was first found in N. Lieb, "Die Stiftsanlagen des Barocks in Altbayern und Schwaben," SM 29 (1968), 120: "From the standpoint of creativity in architecture, the synthesis of a monastery and an immediate ecclesiastical state can be compared to the combination of bishop's church and royal church in the Gothic cathedral."—G. Iller, Die Malereien des Kaisersaales zu Fulda (1939).

[32] Joseph von Eichendorff, "Über die Folgen der Aufhebung de Landeshoheit der Bischöfe und Klöster in Deutschland," Sämtliche Werke, ed. by W. Kosch and A. Sauer, X

The basic laws of the Empire, especially the stipulations of the Peace of Westphalia and the electoral capitulation obliged the Emperor to secure the status quo of the Church of the Empire,[33] to maintain the Concordata Nationis Germanicae, and to stop the complaints against the Roman Curia.[34] Since the thirteenth century the German Kings and Emperors had exercised the privilege of "First Entreaties" (Jus primariarum precum)[35] even without a papal indulgence and under Joseph I held fast to it in the face of a violent dispute with Rome. They granted so-called panis letters "which ordered a religious chapter or congregation that upheld or was still upholding the custom of a common table to provide for a certain person's livelihood for life either in agricultural products or money."[36]

Although basically respecting the electoral freedom of the cathedral chapters, the Emperor was nonetheless able to influence the filling of bishoprics and through this the policies of ecclesiastical territories by dispatching electoral ambassadors, or by means of recommendations, tokens of favor to Austrian canons or those loyal to the Empire, that is by political and financial means. The presence of imperial election commissioners at the decisive preliminary negotiations, although not at the election itself, was considered legally necessary.[37] But even the right of decision in ambiguous episcopal elections and the ius exclusivae, for whose justification the proponents of an established Church in favor of increased advocacy invoked the Concordat of Worms and imperial cus-

---

(Regensburg 1911), 169: "[The ecclesiastic territories] as the only remains of a monstrous ancient temple maintained, in the midst of the flood of changes, a steadfast, almost mystic connection with and reference to their great past, the memory of which other states could not destroy fast enough."

[33] Ferdinand III, for example, admonished the Swiss Confederation in 1656 to leave the seminary of Sankt Gallen unmolested on the grounds of "the regalia, privileges, and jurisdiction it held in fief from the Holy Roman Empire." Emperor and Empire regarded Sankt Gallen as belonging to the Empire, that is, as not affected by the Peace of Westphalia. This was evident in their conduct during the Toggenburg War.

[34] W. Wagner, Das Staatsrecht des Heiligen Römischen Reiches deutscher Nation. Eine Darstellung der Reichsverfassung gegen Ende des 18. Jh. nach einer Handschrift der Wiener Staatsbibliothek (Karlsruhe 1968), 58–62.

[35] H. E. Feine, "Papst, Erste Bitten und Regierungsantritt des Kaisers seit dem Ausgang des Mittelalters," ZSavRGkan 20 (1931), 1–101; F. J. Heyen, "Die kaiserlichen Ersten Bitten für das Erzbistum Trier von Ferdinand I. bis Franz II. (1531–1792)," Festschrift für Alois Thomas (Trier 1967), 175–88.

[36] W. Wagner, Staatsrecht, 64.

[37] About the claim to send imperial curate delegates to the election of bishops, cf. W. Hermkes, Das Reichsvikariat in Deutschland. Reichsvikare nach dem Tode des Kaisers von der Goldenen Bulle bis zum Ende des Reiches (Karlsruhe 1968), as well as Chap. 24: "The Established Church."

tom, did not prevail against the resistance of the cathedral chapters and the prebendal aristocracy.

In Trent, where the Compacts of 18 September 1363 and the Note of Speyer of 1571 granted extensive concessions to the Habsburgs, and in Brixen, Passau, Eichstätt and Salzburg, whose "Eternal Statute" (1606) prohibited the election of Bavarian princes and Austrian archdukes and practically excluded all but Tyrolians and Lower Austrians, as a rule candidates from Austrian nobility and those in the service of the Emperor ascended to the see. A position unique in the Church of the Empire and indeed within the Church as a whole was occupied by Salzburg. It had the privilege of appointing, confirming, and consecrating the bishops of its own four small bishoprics of Gurk, Seckau, Chiemsee, and Lavant. Only in the case of Gurk had there been an arrangement made between King Ferdinand I and Archbishop Matthäus Lang (25 October 1535) to the effect that of three successive bishops the first two would always be appointed by the ruler.

The ecclesiastical territories on the Main and middle Rhine were for the most part ruled by prince-bishops who were patriotic and loyal to the Emperor. These cathedral chapters of knights of the Empire repeatedly and successfully demonstrated their independence to candidates nominated by the respective rulers. The knights of the Empire prevailed over proof of ancestry and immediate exclusiveness as well as over the great Catholic dynasties such as the Wittelsbachs, Habsburgs, Pfalz-Neuburgs, and Wettins. But they also prevailed over the mediate nobility who dominated the northwest German cathedral chapters but were in a much more difficult situation in trying to ward off the candidates of their princes. Their resistance was aggravated by the system of coadjutorships, which was expanded in the course of the Counter Reformation and dynastic policies to the extent of a "quasi-hereditability" in a number of states. Thus the prince-bishopric of Freising was referred to as "our parish" by the court of Munich. As a consequence of the Wittelsbach coadjutorships only two elections took place in more than two hundred years in the archbishopric of Cologne (1688 and 1763), although the election of coadjutors was never acknowledged as an actual election or postulation by the Curia, at least in theory. Yet in spite of considerable disadvantages, the coadjutorships at least had the advantage of avoiding interregna and provisional governments by cathedral chapters in the case of vacant sees and the attendant negative consequences.

The ecclesiastical territories were electoral states without any continuity in their foreign and domestic policies or in their attempts at clerical reform. To be sure, they were spared disputes and partitions of inheritance, but were not immune to dynastic rivalries, the ambitions of prebendal families, their nepotism and conflicts of interest. Interregnum and provisional governments during vacancies—not unfairly characterized as "cathedral chapter harvest"—were frequently marked by an express animosity towards the person, the family, and government of the deceased prince-bishop, as well as against his advisers, who at times were not spared personal persecution.[38] This, as well as the considerable cost of an episcopal election and the sums to be raised for annates, services, and pallium contributions, made all reforms exceedingly difficult. Many prince-bishops started their reign without financial means and consequently with little authority. In addition they were tied to the electoral capitulations acknowledged by the Peace of Westphalia,[39] which secured for the cathedral chapters joint government in the bishopric and participation in the clerical administration of it, altogether guaranteeing the estates to be constitutionally embodied in the ecclesiastical territories.[40]

Some wishes for church reforms were reflected in the electoral capitulations, among them the demand to forgo accumulations of bishoprics, a stricter observance of the residence obligation, the settlement of clerical jurisdiction, and the care of elderly and indigent clergy. Those elected were frequently obliged not to take on a coadjutor, not to seek a cardinalate or to do so only if the electoral privilege of the cathedral chapter was assured, not to admit religious orders, which could mean a diminution of episcopal jurisdiction, to root out heresy and to promote the Catholic mission. In the prince-bishoprics of Würzburg, Speyer, and Eichstätt, lengthy lawsuits ensued because of the electoral capitulations. In 1690 Prince-Bishop Johann Gottfried II von Guttenberg of Würzburg managed to be absolved from the electoral capitulation by the Pope. The prince-bishops of Eichstätt, Bamberg, and Constance tried to achieve a similar solution. In 1692 a particular congregation examined all the German electoral capitulations.

---

[38] G. Christ, "Der Wiener Hof und die Wahl Conrad Wilhelms v. Werdenau zum Fürstbischof von Würzburg 1683," Würzburger Diözesangeschichts-Bll. 26 (1964), 298.

[39] J. F. Abert, "Die Wahlkapitulationen der Würzburger Fürstbischöfe bis zum Ende des 17. Jh.," Archiv des Hist. Vereins für Unterfranken u. Aschaffenburg 46 (1969), 104ff.; J. Kremer, "Studien zur Gesch. der Trierer Wahlkapitulationen (1286–1786)," Westdt. Zschr. ErgH 16; G. Weigel, Die Wahlkapitulationen der Bamberger Bischöfe 1328–1693 (Bamberg 1909); L. Bruggaier, Die Wahlkapitulationen der Bischöfe und Reichsfürsten von Eichstätt Eine historisch-kanonistische Studie (Freiburg i.Brsg. 1915); N. Fuchs, "Die Wahlkapitulationen der Fürstbischöfe von Regensburg 1437–1801," Verhandlungen des Hist. Vereins für Oberpfalz und Regensburg 101 (1960–61), 5ff.

[40] R. v. Oer, Landständische Verfassungen in den geistlichen Fürstentümern Nordwestdeutschlands: Ständische Vertretungen in Europa in 17. und 18. Jh., ed. by D. Gerhard (Göttingen 1969), 94–119.

Following its suggestions, Innocent XII issued the constitution Ecclesiae catholicae (22 September 1695). By threatening dire penalties, it prohibited any and all agreements prior to the election and made all obligations to be contracted after the election subject to concurrence by the Holy See in order to be valid. Emperor Leopold I expressed similar sentiments concerning the invalidity of the electoral capitulations. This Constitutio Innocentiana was a decisive blow to the electoral capitulations of several archbishoprics, such as Würzburg, Bamberg, Cologne, and Salzburg, but in those chapters which refused to obey the papal bull and the Emperor's resolution it could not abolish them. In those places a tolerable modus vivendi was obtained which was only occasionally disturbed since the capitulars made the bishops keep to their stipulations and forgo recourse to Rome. Moreover, no prince-bishop who had to consider the consequences for his family could afford deliberately to seek a conflict over the electoral capitulation.

Social differences, reduced during the late Middle Ages, again played a more prominent role in the Church of the seventeenth century. In an unprecedented campaign of securing established positions and in the process of Catholic renewal the hierarchy and leadership of the Church of the Empire consisted exclusively of the few Catholic princely families and the prebendal nobility. Until the death of the Archdukes Leopold Wilhelm (1662) and Karl Joseph (1664), and of the Cologne elector Ferdinand (13 September 1650), who had singlehandedly accumulated five archbishoprics, one prince-abbey and one prince-priory, had never been consecrated, and yet had done well in reforms, half of the Church of the Empire seems to have been dominated by the Habsburgs and Wittelsbachs. Finally, when the archdynasty of Austria for lack of male descendants could no longer furnish candidates for the bishoprics,[41] the nobility of the hereditary lands and later on the related houses of Pfalz-Neuburg, Wettin, and Lorraine took their place.

To be sure, accumulations of bishoprics as practiced under Leopold Wilhelm of Austria and Ferdinand of Bavaria were rarely equaled after the middle of the seventeenth century. Yet for another century the northwest German Germania Sacra from Liège to Hildesheim remained almost exclusively an ecclesiastical secundogeniture of the Wittelsbachs until the death of Elector-Archbishop Clemens August of Cologne (1761). The prince-bishoprics of Freising and Regensburg were occupied almost throughout by Wittelsbachs until the passing away of Cardinal Johann Theodor of Bavaria (1763). The Thuns alone furnished four prince-bishops of Passau, the rich archdiocese of Strasbourg was in the hands of the Fürstenbergs from 1663 to 1704; until its decline it was a prebend of the princely family Rohan. The prince-bishopric of Basel came under the rule of a group of "ten families whose seats were on the left and right banks of the Rhine."[42] For three generations the history of the ecclesiastical territories on the Rhine and Main was determined by the rule of the Schönborns and their related families.[43]

---

[41] A. Schulte (Der Adel und die deutsche Kirche im Mittelalter [Stuttgart 1922]) repeatedly pointed out that quite a few noble families jeopardized the continuation of their line when their sons entered the ecclesiastical estate.—H. L. Krick, 212 Stammtafeln adeliger Familien, denen geistliche Würdenträger des Bistums Passau entsprossen sind (Schweiklberg 1924) shows 134 of 212 families as having died out; of these, however, ca. 60 through circumstances other than the entrance of male descendants into the ecclesiastical estate. Beside the Habsburgs, the Wittelsbach, Pfalz-Neuburg, and Slavata families were diminished through ecclesiastical professions.

Dynastic policies within the Church of the Empire undoubtedly contributed to a concentration of power, securing of ecclesiastical properties, and slowing the process of secularization. But as a means of securing a livelihood for younger sons of princes not always suited for the clerical estate they also carried with them grave dangers for the Church. Even taking into account the beneficial influence of the suffragan bishops, the accumulation of bishoprics nonetheless militated against church reform emanating from the hierarchy. Towards the end of the seventeenth century the Church of the Empire had a number of weak and theologically uneducated bishops who were more interested in politics, war, art or entertainment than in their clerical tasks. Yet the number of unconsecrated bishops did decrease. In fact, there were more excellent and truly religious bishops who came close to the ideal than is immediately apparent. Among the exemplary bishops who earned great merit in the implementation of church reforms were the following: Johann Hugo von Orsbeck, archbishop of Trier; Johann Ernst von Thun (1709), archbishop of Salzburg; Sebastian Count von Pöking (1673–88), bishop of Passau; the reformatory Franz Wilhelm von Wartenberg, bishop of Regensburg and Osnabrück (d. 1661), "one of the greatest church politicians of his century";[44] and J. F. Eckher von Kapfing (d. 1724), bishop of Freising, who was "the type of baroque prince of the Church whose intellect and soul were dedicated to the Tridentinum."[45]

---

[42] H. Rössler, Deutscher Adel 1555–1740 (Darmstadt 1965), 196.

[43] Ibid. On p. 194 Rössler quotes from a report by the imperial legate to the Rhenish electoral courts, Trauttmannsdorff, of 1786, according to which the Schönborn and Stadion families were still considered as being in the top group of the nobility of electoral Mainz.

[44] G. Schwaiger, Kardinal Franz Wilhelm von Wartenberg als Bischof von Regensburg (1649–61) (Munich 1954), 302.

[45] B. Hubensteiner, Die geistliche Stadt Welt und Leben des Johann Franz Eckher von Kapfing und Liechteneck, Fürstbischofs von Freising (Munich 1954), 193.

The capitulars looked on themselves as "hereditary lords" of the archbishoprics, as "condomini et conregnantes" or as "patriae et statuum protectores" (from the 1729 electoral capitulation of the electorate of Trier). These "princes of the Papal States" (Sartorius) have often enough been harshly judged. They were taken to task for their inept mediocrity, their lack of zeal and theological education, their chasing after prebends, belligerence, and their chronic gambling and drinking (deplored by the papal nuncios almost in terms of a German national vice). They were blamed for a good part of the abuses in the Church and for the fact that they delayed or hesitated in implementing reform. It is indeed not easy to do them justice, especially if we take into account that while the chapters were similar on the whole they nonetheless differed considerably in detail regarding size, revenues, and structure. The prebendal nobility was rooted deeply in the courtly world of the baroque. There were lethargic, incompetent prebendaries, talented politicians, sophisticated cavaliers in the cathedral and collegiate chapters, but there were also unobtrusive supplicants and humble pious priests. Greed for fame and money were widespread, but so were preparedness for penitence and expiation. The prebendal nobility were not exclusively engaged in taking care of their families. While they were open to criticism concerning the "aristocratic Church of the Empire," their achievements for Church and Empire, for the arts and sciences deserve recognition. The Schönborns and Eltzes, the Stadions and Dalbergs, the von der Leyens, Breidbach-Bürresheims, Walderdorffs, Fürstenbergs, Thuns, and Firmians, to mention a few, have left their mark on inner and outer aspects of the Church. Their clerical and political decisions, their courts and church architecture, their collections and foundations represent prominent high points in the course of German history.

Efforts to strengthen the principle of exclusiveness had to do with the desire for political, economic and religious security. In the course of the seventeenth century the requirements regarding proof of ancestry were generally augmented. In 1606 the cathedral chapter of Bamberg increased its demands to include eight ancestors. The statutes of the cathedral chapter of Mainz dated 19 December 1654 required of prebendal applicants the witness of eight matriculated knights of the Empire to the effect that the former's ancestors corresponded with the traditions of the Mainz Church. Towards the end of the seventeenth century the closely connected chapters of Mainz, Bamberg, and Würzburg demanded proof of sixteen immediate ancestors of the Empire. The cathedral chapters of Eichstätt, Constance, Passau, and Regensburg were satisfied with proof of four ancestors. The farther the chapters were situated to the east and south of the Empire, the less stringent were the requirements and the less frequent the rejection of spurious ancestors. The mediate nobility of these areas did not try to compete in its requirements with those of the knights of the Empire. By increasing their demands regarding proof of ancestry in Bamberg, Würzburg, Mainz, and later on in Trier, Worms, and Speyer, the knights achieved exclusive status for their class and to a large extent also for their territories, unaffected by the resistance of the mediate nobility of the Lower Rhine and Westphalia, who were supported by Prussia and Hanover. The bishops of these dioceses—disregarding the special circumstances in Trier—were almost exclusively from families of knights of the Empire from Franconian, electoral Rhenish, and Swabian areas.

In 1526 the bishopric of Chur had gained territorial exclusiveness by means of the Articles of Ilanz, which, in fact, made the cathedral chapter and the archdiocese into an institution of triple ties. A strong Italian, Tridentine character was preserved in the cathedral chapter of Trent. Eight of twenty-four capitular prebends had been open to the French high aristocracy since 1687; in 1713 the requirements for proof of ancestry were made much less stringent. In the cathedral chapter of Liège the number of prebendal German nobles decreased steadily. In the eighteenth century the cathedral chapters of Paderborn, Hildesheim, and Münster attempted to come to an agreement regarding estates and territories of the Empire. It was their intention to no longer admit either Rhenish, Swabian, or Franconian knights of the Empire—with the exception of the cantons of Hegau, Allgäu and Bodensee—or Bohemians and Moravians. In the cathedral chapter of Cologne, where proof of sixteen ancestors had had to be demonstrated since the end of the fifteenth century, the dominance of the nobility was breached by eight pastoral prebends accessible to members of the bourgeoisie. These prebends required both ordination and the doctorate; the equality of rank between the doctoral degree and noble origin thus continued. In the cathedral chapters of Liège, Brixen, and Chur the bourgeois element was not only represented, but actually gained influence in the course of the eighteenth century. Even if one readily admits to cases of reactions against the candidacy of prebendal nobles or princes of the Empire in Stablo-Malmedy or Liège, reactions based on territorial issues or the question of mediate or immediate imperial status, the assumption of a contrast between an aristocratic Church and a rising bourgeoisie can no longer be taken for granted. This is the conclusion to be drawn if one examines the composition of the upper German chapters, the list of their abbots—with Sankt Gallen a case in point[46]—as well as the origin of the various prelates[47] and the suffragan bishops. Entering a monastery in the period of the baroque was more a matter of "social rise than a policy for securing a livelihood,"[48] for the monasteries of that period made tremendous contributions towards reforms and cultural changes, not least in the area of equalizing the differences between social classes.

The Council of Trent had aimed at strengthening the position of the bishops within the diocese, doing away with the separation of the pontificate and the secular-political office characteristic of the development of the Church of the Empire prior to the Reformation. It had also raised a demand for the abolition of the suffragan bishop, this larva ecclesiae Dei. To be sure, the bishops had increasingly returned to the center of diocesan life, especially since the middle of the seventeenth century, and there was hardly a diocese within the confines of the Church which could not point to at least one and in most cases several exemplary bishops in the period between the Peace of Westphalia and the Catholic Enlightenment. Yet there was no dearth of complaints concerning the position of the suffragan bishops, that German "bizarrerie, que l'Évêque in partibus n'est que pour les fonctions Épiscopales de l'ordre, et qu'il n'a que voir au gouvernement spirituel, celui qui en est chargé n'étant que Prêtre,"[49] more so if conditions in the Church of the Empire were measured against the Tridentine or early Christian ideal. "A bishop can do everything according to his plans," was the complaint of the learned and profoundly religious suffragan bishop Niels Stensen, who withdrew to his jurisdiction of the "Nordic Missions" as a protest against the controversial election of the Cologne elector Max Heinrich to the prince-bishopric of Münster. He continued: "But I am only permitted pontifical acts; therefore all those other functions, such as visitations, synods, schools, and other things necessary to prepare a candidate for ordination, are out of my hands."[50]

---

[46] As early as 1430–36 Sankt Gallen abolished the exclusion of nonnobles. Three of its eight abbots between 1630 and 1803 came from the lowest social stratum (two were sons of poor peasants, one the son of a shoemaker); the majority of the others came from the bourgeoisie. Of more than 350 conventuals between 1648 and 1803 only seven were real nobles. The last noble conventual took his vows in 1723 (cf. J. Salzgeber, Die Klöster Einsiedeln und St. Gallen im Barockzeitalter [Munich 1966]).

[47] E. Krausen, "Die Zusammensetzung bayerischer Prämonstratenserkonvente," HJ 86 (1966), 166ff.; idem, "Die Herkunft der bayerischen Prälaten des 17. und 18. Jh." ZBLG 27 (1964), 259–85.

[48] J. Salzgeber, op. cit., 90.

[49] Antoine Arnauld to Landgrave Ernst von Hessen Rheinfels, 30 September 1683. Lettres de Messire Antoine Arnauld, Docteur de la Maison et Société de Sorbonne II (Paris and Lausanne 1775), 353.

Compared to the aristocratic ecclesiastical princes, not all of whom had been consecrated or were able to fulfill their residence obligation, the suffragan bishops were very much in the background even in the historical representations of the Church, since their work appears to have been limited primarily to pontifical acts and their lives were evidently lacking in prominent events and were too dull and colorless to merit the interest of historians. This one-sided picture of an aristocratic Church of the Empire in modern times must be rectified by an improved assessment of the role and origin of the suffragan bishops. From the Peace of Westphalia to secularization, the Mainz suffragan bishops in partibus Rheni were almost exclusively of bourgeois origin, most of them from rather modest circumstances. From 1600 to 1800 there was not a single aristocrat among the ten suffragans of Speyer; the seven suffragans of Basel during the same period were either bourgeois or patricians. Although the prince-bishops and the cathedral chapter of Strasbourg were exclusively members of the high nobility, the vast majority of the suffragans were from the bourgeoisie. This was also the case in Augsburg during the seventeenth century, while during the eighteenth century it was the knights of the Empire who predominated, so that in the course of two centuries the two were approximately of equal representation. In the same two centuries the tendency in favor of the aristocracy manifest in Augsburg was even more prominent in Constance in the form of a transition from graduated theologians to the barons of the baroque.

The suffragans more or less took care of the ministry in their bishoprics and undertook a great part of the reforms. Their work, insufficiently known even today, characterized an inner aspect of the Church of the Empire, which at times has been seen too much as an "aristocratic Church," as ecclesiastical principalities, as a merger of secular and clerical rule, and as the exclusive domain of Catholic princes and aristocratic families.

In the duchy of Berg and later as suffragans in Mainz and Cologne the brothers Peter and Adrian van Walenbusch dedicated all their energies to church reform and the reunification in the faith. As suffragans of Mainz, their friend, the convert Adolf Gottfried Volusius, as well as Mathias Starck and Christian Nebel continued their efforts towards intensifying the life of the Church. In northern Germany it was the extraordinarily capable Osnabrück suffragan Kaspar Münster (d. 5 February 1654), "filled with a burning zeal for reform,"[51] who worked for the implementation of the Edict of Restitution and the propagation of the faith. The larger part of his inheritance went to the Cologne Archbrothership of the Sufferings of our Lord,[52] that is for the benefit of the ministry to converts. The learned Niels Stensen was hard at work in the prince-bishopric of Münster and in the "Nordic Missions." But the attempt, welcomed by the Jansenist Antoine Arnauld as an "action agréable à Dieu," to attract Stensen as suffragan in the service of the pious Johann Hugo von Orsbeck of Trier came to naught.[53] In the diocese of Regensburg, reforms and the reconstruction of the Church were given strong impulses by Bishop Wartenberg's excellent collaborator, the titular bishop of Almira, Sebastian Denich. During the reign of the Wittelsbach prince-bishops Joseph Clemens, Clemens August, and Johann Theodor, who rarely resided there, these tasks were undertaken by the saintly suffragan bishop Gottfried Johann Freiherr Langwerth von Simmern, a convert and a distant relative of Freiherr vom Stein.[54] During his long tenure, the titular bishop of Edremit, Kaspar Zeiler (1645–81), applied his energy to the restoration of church life in the bishopric of Augsburg. The learned Thomas Henrici, titular bishop of Chrysopolis (1648 to 1660) and public advocate of the reunification of the Churches, worked in the bishopric of Basel. The Suffragan Bishops Peter Verhorst and Matthias von Eyss led the defense against Jansenism in the archdiocese of Trier. Cologne developed an active church life under the Francken-Siersdorf suffragans. Representative of many other suffragans of the seventeenth century for their achievements and reforms were the following: Johannes Brunetti and Elias Daniel von Sommerfeld in Breslau, Paul Aldringen (1592–1644), who came from a poor Luxemburg family and in his role as suffragan under Archduke Leopold Wilhelm was the actual bishop and reformer of the Strasbourg diocese,[55] his successors Gabriel Haug and the Titular Bishop of Adrianople, Johann Peter Quentel (d. 1710), from the well-known Cologne family of printers, who last worked in Münster. Others who deserve mention by virtue of their political or diplomatic missions, or the promotion of science and art during the eighteenth century are the suffragan bishops Nalbach of Trier, Jacquet of Liège, Toussaint Duvernin of Strasbourg,[56] and Ungelter of Augsburg.[57] For personal achievements in the areas of historical research, canon law, reforms of church life, and a Catholic Enlightenment they were surpassed by the great bourgeois suffragans at the end of the eighteenth century, such as Johann Nikolaus von Hontheim from an old patrician family of Trier; the Mainz suffragans Ludwig Philipp Behlen, the son of a simple Eichsfeld family; and Valentin Heimes, who came from a family of vintners in the Rheingau. In company with the Worms suffragan Stephen Alexander Würdtwein, who prepared a tremendous amount of source material for the history of the Church of the Empire; Suffragan Bishop Seelmann in Speyer, his successor; the prominent canonist Philipp Anton Schmidt,[58] brother of the "historiographer of the Germans"; and, lastly, Dalberg's suffragan Kolborn,[59] they left the imprint of their names upon the final attempts at a reform of the Church in an episcopal sense and upon the theological and canonical discussions of the waning eighteenth century. And finally, after similar demands had been raised here and there in the chapters of Germany, Valentin Heimes attempted at the Congress of Ems to limit the privileges of the nobility within the Church of the Empire in favor of improving the quality of the ministry.

---

[50] Quotation from M. Berbaum, Niels Stensen. Von der Anatomie zur Theologie (1638–1688) (Münster, n.d.), 100.

---

[51] G. Denzler, Die Propagandakongregation in Rom und die Kirche in Deutschland im ersten Jahrzehnt nach dem Westfälischen Frieden (Paderborn 1969), 179.

[52] About this archbrotherhood, see L. Just, "Beiträge zur Geschichte der Kölner Nuntiatur," QFIAB 36 (1956), 248–320.

[53] Stensen died 12 May 1686. For almost four months before his death he had waited in vain for a decision from Rome concerning "sia in ordine alla licenza di ritornar in Italia, sia per veder cosa si possa far a Treveri, secondo le instanze dell' Eminentissimo Signor Elettore, sia di veder come posso trattenermi ne' vicariati" (G. Scherz and J. Raeder, eds., Nicolai Stenonis epistolae et epistolae ad eum datae II [Hafniae-Friburgi 1952], 894 f.; H. Raab, "Landgraf Ernst von Hessen-Rheinfels und der Jansenismus," AMrhKG 19 [1967], 48–56).

[54] H. F. Langwerth v. Simmern, Aus Krieg und Frieden. Kulturhistorische Bilder aus einem Familienarchiv (Wiesbaden 1906), 83–254.

The economic condition of the parish clergy and its education immediately after the Thirty Years' War was poor throughout. Even in the following decades, ravaged by war and epidemics, it was rarely better.

---

[55] Aldringen's younger brother Johann Markus became canon in Salzburg and Olmütz and was bishop of Seckau from 1633 to 1664. One should really pay attention in research to "bourgeois" bishops' families. A good example is the family of the innkeeper of "The Lion," Hans Jakob Haus from Stein am Rhein near Säckingen. His two sons, Johann Christoph (1652–1725) and Johann Baptist (1672–1745) became suffragan bishops of Basel, as did their great-nephew Johann Baptist Gobel, who later became constitutional bishop of Paris.

[56] J. Gass, Straßburger Theologen im Aufklärungszeitalter (1766–90) (Strasbourg 1917), 183–85.

[57] F. Zoepfl, "Weihbischof Ungelter und Christoph Schmidt," Christoph Schmid und seine Zeitgenossen, ed. by H. Pörnbacher (Weißenhorn 1968), 43–49.

[58] W. Kratz, "Exjesuiten als Bischöfe 1773–1822," AHSI 6 (1937), 200.

[59] H. Raab, "Aus dem Briefwechsel des Aschaffenburger Weihbischofs J.H.K. v. Kolborn mit dem Generalvikar von Konstanz Ignaz von Wessenberg," Aschaffenburger Jb. 2 (1955), 98–135.

Abject poverty, hunger, and totally inadequate housing were frequent occurrences. The comment by the deacon of Bingen, Dr. Vogt, regarding the conditions at Niederheimbach pertained to the average income of many priests: "The revenues of the parish priest are such that they do not permit a priestly existence unless he were to sustain himself by means of only bread, milk, and smoked meat, without wine except in autumn, when he may drink cider until the wine is finished and sold."[60]

Greed, gambling, drunkenness, and violation of the law of celibacy in many a place were probably consequences of dire distress. The circumstances explain why many a priest assumed the glebe lands for his own use, disregarding encumbrances and the unavoidable consequences. Patronage rights and incorporation on one hand, surplice fees and oblations on the other, but also economic and spiritual anguish, the difficulties in ministering and trying to lead a pious life can no more than imply the problems of the parish clergy in the second half of the seventeenth century and the early eighteenth century until the reform efforts of the Enlightenment and the parish regulation of Joseph II.

The words of Leonhard Mayr, longtime priest of the court church in Neuburg, expressed in one of his last sermons before his death (1665), apply to many other priests of his time: "Since 1617 I have remained with you through all sorts of adversity, untoward conditions, dearth, through hunger and grief, raging pestilence, in danger of life and limb, never have I forsaken you, but have instead persevered. Mementote! Preserve my memory! During that time 2,857 have died; to each of them, except for pestilence, have I given the funeral rites. I have baptized 2,500 children and have had many books put in print."[61]

The parish clergy was often hopelessly overburdened. Given the severe lack of priests during the seventeenth century, the restoration of church life would have been impossible without aid not only by the orders, especially the Capuchins,Carmelites, and the Jesuits, but also by the chapter clergy. The number of monastic parishes in Bavaria and Austria was considerable. The prebendary chapter of Sankt Florian near Linz administered thirty-three parishes; Klosterneuburg near Vienna twenty-three, and in the Cologne deaconry of Zülpich thirty parishes were in the care of religious orders. But these "expositures" led to many an incompatibility for the expositi, their monastic establishments, and the secular clergy. On the whole, the end of the eighteenth century not only saw an increase in the number of priests but also a more profound intellectual and religious life within the clergy.

---

[60] A. L. Veit, Kirchliche Reformbestrebungen im ehemaligen Erzstift Mainz unter Erzbischof Johann Philipp von Schönborn 1647–73 (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1910), 64.

[61] Veit-Lenhart, 217.

In the opinion of contemporary sources of the seventeenth century, seminaries appeared to be the best means to restore and improve church discipline. Given the great need for priests, it was tempting to favor exemplary conduct over theological education, thus enabling a less than ideal alternative to have its effect on the rivalries of the ministering regular clergy. The first seminary in Germany was established in 1564 by Bishop Martin von Schaumburg in Eichstätt over the opposition of his cathedral chapter. But the Swedes destroyed it in 1634 and it could not be reopened until 1710. The seminary of Breslau, founded by the cathedral chapter in 1565 almost against the wishes of its bishop, began to flourish again after the Thirty Years' War under the reign of Archduke Leopold I Wilhelm of Austria (1656–56). The diocese of Ermland had a seminary since 1567; it closed its doors between 1625 and 1637 as a result of the Swedish incursion and was given a new building in 1651. Other seminaries were opened in Würzburg (1570), Salzburg (1577/79), Basel (1606), and Dillingen (1614, for the Augsburg diocese). With the exception of Salzburg these seminaries were unable to develop steadily either because of the vagaries of war or because of financial problems. As was the case in Basel under Prince-Bishop Johann Konrad von Reinach in 1716,[62] they had to be reformed or reestablished in the second half of the seventeenth or during the eighteenth century.

In 1639 the seminary in Münster, established in 1613 and named after Suffragan Bishop Johannes Kridt (d. 9 July 1577), failed. A new seminary was founded in 1776 under Franz von Fürstenberg in the abandoned Benedictine monastery of Überwasser. On 1 December 1615, Archbishop Ferdinand opened a seminary in Cologne with a mere twelve boarding students, but it ceased to exist on 1 May of 1645 as a result of the war. Reopened in 1658/60 with a discouragingly small number of students, it had to be dissolved fifteen years later because of the catastrophic economic condition and the effects of the Dutch War. During its tenure it had produced no more than two novice priests per year.[63] It was not until 1738, after difficult negotiations, that the Seminarium Clementinum was founded. The situation was somewhat better in the archbishopric of Mainz, where Johann Philipp von Schönborn, the "German Solomon," having seen the Institute for a Universal Clergy of Bartholomäus Holzhauser in Gastein, put him in charge of the Mainz seminary in 1660. Holzhauser himself took over the difficult parish of Bingen; for over a century Sankt Emmeran of Mainz, the parishes of Frankfurt, Heppenheim an der Bergstrasse, and Duderstadt were domains of the Bartholomites. Under their guidance the seminary of Würzburg educated 187 seminarians in the years from 1655 to 1679.[64]

---

[62] A letter from the prince-bishop of Basel elucidates the situation: "Il a passé un siècle qu'un de mes prédécesseurs put élever un bâtiment dans ma ville de Porrentrui qui devait servir de Séminaire pour le Clergé de son diocèse, mais côme les guerres ensuites en ont affligé la plus grande partie, ce dessein est demeuré sand exécution. . . . La première raison qui m'y a porté a esté la disposition de l'Église . . . et la seconde estait le déréglement, l'ignorance et le libertinage qui commençoit à se glisser dans mon Clergé, le tout fautte d'occasion à instruire les Ecclésiastiques dans leurs ministères et à donner de vives corrections à ceux qui s'écartaient à leur devoir." (Quotation from A. Schaer, Le clergé paroissial catholique en haute Alsace sous l'Ancien régime 1648–1789 [Paris 1966], 119).

The seminary in Osnabrück, founded by the reform bishop Franz Wilhelm von Wartenberg, closed soon after the latter's death (1 September 1661) during the reign of the Protestant pseudobishop Ernst August. The one in Wartenberg's second diocese of Regensburg which he entrusted to the Bartholomites in 1650 and which was reestablished in 1665 under the direction of the Jesuits, continued in spite of considerable difficulties, but did not begin to flourish until the reign of Prince-Bishop Anton Ignaz von Fugger (1769–87).[65]

The college of clerics at the Porta Beatissimae Virginis Mariae developed into a Seminary for a Universal Clergy for the Prince-Abbey of Sankt Gallen because the college was unable to implement its own theological curriculum (1642) as a result of the war.[66]

After the deluge of the Thirty Years' War and given the total impoverishment of the ecclesiastical territories and their deep indebtedness even from the period before the war—in Constance under Prince-Bishop Jakob Fugger (1604–26) it amounted to 200,000 florins—there could be no thought of establishing new seminaries. It was not "a lack of goodwill on the part of the bishops and not a matter of resistance against the idea of seminaries as such, but primarily the question of finances which created the greatest difficulty."[67]

---

[63] E. Reckers, Gesch. des Kölner Priesterseminars (Cologne 1929), 93.

[64] M. Arneth, Bartholomäus Holzhauser und sein Weltpriesterinstitut (Würzburg 1959); A. Werfer and H. Wildanger, Der ehrwürdige Bartholomäus Holzhauser und sein Weltpriesterinstitut (Munich 1941); K. Böck, "Bartholomäus Holzhauser," Lebensbilder aus dem bayerischen Schwaben 5 (1956), 221–38; K. Braun, Gesch. der Heranbildung des Klerus in der Diözese Würzburg seit ihrer Gründung bis zur Gegenwart, 2 vols. (Mainz 1897); A. P. Brück, "Das Mainzer Priesterseminar der Bartholomisten," AMrhKG. 15 (1963), 33–94.

[65] G. Schwaiger, Kardinal Franz Wilhelm von Wartenberg als Bischof von Regensburg (1649–61) (Munich 1954), 151–71; E. Meißner, Fürstbischof Anton Ignaz Fugger (1711–87) (Tübingen 1969), 243f.

[66] J. Duft, Die Glaubenssorge der Fürstäbte von St. Gallen im 17. und 18. Jh. Ein Beitrag zur Seelsorgsgeschichte der katholischen Restauration als Vorgeschichte des Bistums Sankt Gallen (Lucerne 1944), 103ff.

The papal seminaries in Fulda and Dillingen, to be sure, provided some relief and the relatively well educated monastic clergy successfully took part in the ministry. Yet the fact that many bishops had to have their theologians trained in the orders or in foreign and often backward universities was rather disadvantageous for the Church of the Empire. There was a noticeable discrepancy between the meager and sometimes very poor conditions in the training of priests and the background of monumental architecture in the ecclesiastical states; in the mediate chapters, there was a vivid contrast between many a poor village church and splendid monastic libraries.[68] The difficulties encountered by the large diocese of Chur in the education of its priests are well known. Supported by only a small prince-bishopric and scant revenues, its attempts to obtain a seminary were fruitless throughout the seventeenth century. Until the time of Napoleon it had to depend on the Jesuit college in Feldkirch, which was abolished in 1773, and on vacancies in Rome, Milan, Vienna, and Dillingen. Not until the end of the seventeenth and the first decades of the eighteenth century, when the worst aftermath of the war had been overcome by the Germania Sacra, were existing seminaries restored and new ones opened. This development was accompanied by a new striving for reforms especially during the reign of the Schönborns, to whom four seminaries owed either their existence or their support. Wilhelm Egon von Fürstenberg founded a seminary for the diocese of Strasbourg (1683) which enjoyed an excellent reputation up to the end of the eighteenth century. He also relocated the Catholic university of Molsheim to the episcopal seat. After all its attempts since the Salzburg Synod of 1569 had failed, the bishopric of Freising finally obtained a seminary in 1691, thanks to an unequivocal demand by Pope Innocent XI.[69]

---

[67] E. Reckers, Kölner Priesterseminar, 25.

[68] Some light is shed on the morals of the students of theology, for example at the University of Dillingen. Immediately before Sailer's appointment there prevailed, "especially among the students of theology, the most immoderate drunkenness, even in the dormitory, and the zeal for study had slackened." (Quotation from H. Schiel, Johann Michael Sailer, Leben und Briefe I [Regensburg 1948], 84).—The impressions gathered by the regent of the Würzburg seminary for priests, the future suffragan bishop Fahrmann, on a trip for "seminary, literary, architectural purposes" in 1787 are most informative. The Strasbourg Seminary made the best impression on him: "Discipline here is by far not as strict as in Besançon, yet it works fairly well. The students are cheerful and filled with respect and love toward their superiors." (Quotation from J. Gass, Straßburger Theologen im Aufklärungszeitalter [Strasbourg 1917], 3).

[69] B. Hubensteiner, Die geistliche Stadt Welt und Leben des Johann Franz Eckher von Kapfing und Liechteneck, Fürstbischofs von Freising (Munich 1954), 157.

Seminaries were founded in Königgrätz (1706) and Leitmeritz (1736). But in Speyer and Trier the training of clerics was insufficient until the turn of the eighteenth century. The boarding seminary of the Speyer cathedral chapter had perished in the tumult of the Thirty Years' War. During the warring seventeenth century there had not been enough money, and so it was not until 1723 that Prince-Bishop Damian Hugo von Schönborn was able to establish a pastoral seminary.[70] Trier did indeed have the Bantus Seminary founded in 1586/92 and, after 1667, there was the aristocratic, lavishly endowed Lambertus Seminary established by an endowment of Ferdinand von Buchholtz,[71] but it hardly produced any ministering clergymen. The strange founding of a seminary in Koblenz during the reign of Elector Franz Ludwig von Pfalz-Neuburg, who forwent consecration for dynastic and political reasons, illuminates the difficulty of the conditions at that time. In Koblenz twelve younger but not yet sufficiently educated priests were supposed to live together with eight older ones and thus further their education in theology and canon law.[72] Not until the reign of the last Trier elector-archbishop, Clemens Wenzeslaus von Sachsen, was a satisfactory solution found in the form of the Seminarium Clementinum. Under the influence of reform-Catholic efforts and a moderate administrative enlightenment, a considerable improvement took place in the condition of the ministering clergy. This included the establishment of houses for retired priests and a better education of recruits for the priesthood. The Bamberg seminary was reformed under Prince-Bishop Friedrich Karl von Schönborn (1729–46); his brother Damian Hugo opened the seminary of Constance (1734–35),[73] and the third great Schönborn of that generation, the elector of Trier and prince-provost of Ellwangen Franz Georg, founded the seminary on the Schönenberg. In Paderborn the Harsewinkel Seminarium clericorum came into being in 1776. In the waning years of the prince-bishopric of Chur, where the education of priests was endangered by the abolition of the Society of Jesus and the loss of student vacancies in Rome, Milan, Vienna, and Dillingen, Gottfried Purtscher opened a small seminary in Meran on 9 September 1800, but this was closed again by the provisions of the Peace of Preßburg after the attack on Tirol by Bavaria.

---

[70] O. B. Roegele, "Damian Hugo von Schoenborn und die Anfänge des Bruchsaler Priesterseminars," FreibDiözArch 71 (1951), 5–51.

[71] P. A. Reuß, Gesch. des bischöflichen Priesterseminars zu Trier (Trier 1890).

[72] P. Reitz, "Das zweite Koblenzer Priesterseminar von 1728," Pastor bono 40 (1929), 54–58.

[73] F. Hundsnurscher, Die finanziellen Grundlagen für die Ausbildung des Weltklerus im Fürstbistum Konstanz vom Tridentinischen Konzil bis zur Säkularisation mit einem Ausblick auf die übrigen nachtridentinischen Bistümer Deutschlands, (diss., Freiburg i. Brsg. 1968).

CHAPTER 11

Spain and Portugal to 1815

The General Intellectual Situation

The structure of the Spanish and Portuguese Church from 1650 to 1815 was determined by the rules and mentality of the ancien régime. It was a socially privileged Church with significant agricultural and urban assets, with an unchallenged authority over the faithful. Based on a religious foundation, it also exerted its influence on the bureaucracy of the state. The period falls into two divisions: the century from 1650 to 1750 bears a counterreformational character, while the period from 1750 to 1815 should be considered part of the Enlightenment. However, this concept demands refinement. Was the Spanish Enlightenment Catholic or antireligious? Was it an importation or did it stem from inner dynamics, although characterized by foreign elements? What relationship was there between the Spanish Enlightenment, the Encyclopedists, and the French Revolution? Was it congruent in time with the rest of Europe? These questions contain a number of stimulating problems which cannot be comprehensively or even adequately solved here, but must be mentioned briefly in order to provide a perspective towards a better understanding of this period. The three basic components of the "enlightened Spaniard" as he was represented by a good many clerics of that time were: a Catholic education, European culture and a social and economic reformative zeal.

In its origins, the Spanish Enlightenment was not antireligious. While anticlerics and disbelievers could have joined it, all the typical exponents of the Spanish Enlightenment were Catholic. The clergy especially, being most prominent in the life of the nation, were considered the great representatives of this form of the Enlightenment. The fact that the most pressing problem was socioeconomic reform, with the state as its most important instrument, was not accompanied by scorn for the supernatural order and even less by opposition to it. And if the authority of the state did usurp the rights of the Church in a pernicious and extremely destructive manner, it was an error on the part of the authority and not of the Enlightenment. Similar to the Renaissance, Enlightenment existed only in its various shadings according to the perception of those who adapted to it.

The representatives of the four generations of the Spanish Enlightenment, referred to by Vicens Vives[1] and adopted here according to their respective generations are Feijóo (1676–1764), Flórez (1702–1783), Campomanes (1723–1802), and Jovellanos (1744–1811). The first two were prominent personalities from religious orders. Jovellanos was tonsured and, although not ordained, remained loyal to the principles of his ecclesiastical office. Campomanes, one of the great regalists of his century, was educated by his uncle, the capitular of Oviedo, and by the Dominicans of Santillana; he steadfastly avowed his Catholicism.

---

[1] J. Vincens Vives, Approximación a la Historia de España (Barcelona 1960), 175.

The Geographic, Sociographic, and Economic Situation

At this time Spain had eight Church provinces and 56 bishoprics. Only one change was brought about in the seventeenth century: the loss of the bishopric of Elna when Roussillon became French (1659). Four new dioceses were founded in the eighteenth century: Santander (1754), Tudela (1783), Ibiza, and Minorca (1795), so that the number of bishoprics was 59 by the end of the century.

At the end of the sixteenth century the population of the Iberian Peninsula totaled 9,485,000; of those 1,250,000 were in Portugal. About three-fourths, that is 6,910,000, were in Castile. According to Felipe Ruiz there were 33,087 secular clerics, 26,297 monks, and 20,369 nuns. These amounted to 11.33 per thousand of the population. These figures contradict the exaggeration in that part of the secondary literature where the number of clerics is given at 200,000. By the end of the seventeenth century the total population of Spain decreased considerably due to wars and epidemics, but by 1797 it again increased to a total of 10,541,221. According to Canga Argüelles this figure included 57,488 secular clerics, 49,365 monks, and 24,007 nuns. The number of clerics also contained those who had received minor orders. The 73,372 monks and nuns were distributed among forty-three orders. The male orders owned 2,104 houses and the female orders 976.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century the Spanish Church had 59 bishoprics and, beyond that, 648 dignities, 1,768 prebends, 216 pensions and 200 half-pensions in the cathedrals and collegiate churches. There were 64 collegiate and 16,481 parish churches.[2] The wealth of the Church at that time has been exaggerated just as much as the number of clerics. Yet it must be noted that the economic condition of the Church was good. As in society at large, there existed a significant inequality between the higher and the lower clergy. The most important source of revenue was the diezmo, the tenth part of the agrarian gross income. But it fluctuated according to the harvest. In 1592 the annual income of the Church amounted to 10,400,000 ducats; by 1638 it had decreased to 7,000,000. In addition there were the simple benefices and the religious foundations. But these revenues were decreased by a number of contributions to the state or the Roman or national church administration, such as annates, bishops' subsidies, pensions, welfare funds, monthly assessments, etc. There were also the church seigniories, which were dependent on bishoprics, monasteries, or other church bodies. Most of this economic system disappeared in the nineteenth century, together with the ancien régime.

---

[2] Censo de población de las provincias y partidos de la Corona de Castilla en el siglo XVI (Madrid 1829); J. Nadal, Historia de la población española (siglos XVI a XX) (Barcelona 1966); Felipe Ruiz, "La población española en los tiempos modernos," Cuadernos de Historia. Anexos de la revista Hispania 1 (1967), 189–202; Miguel Artola, La España del Antiguo Régimen (Salamanca 1967); José de Canga Argüelles, Diccionario de Hacienda (Madrid 1833).

Portugal had three church provinces and sixteen dioceses during the eighteenth century.

The Development of Ecclesiastical Institutions

In the present state of research it is not easy to render a complete picture of the hierarchy, but some general characteristics can be pointed out.

In spite of political decadence, church discipline did not deteriorate. The lateral transfer of prelates was more frequent in the earlier years. From the point of view of the pastoral administration it was possible that this practice was commendable. The question then is whether the motive should be sought in rank or remuneration.

Towards the end of the seventeenth century there was an increase in the appointments of bishops from the ranks of religious orders. We do not know the reasons for this phenomenon. Rome did not have full confidence in the Spanish episcopate; several expressions of distrust were voiced regarding its loyalty to the disciplinary norms of the Curia. The episcopate was assumed to be subservient to the court. It was suspected of standing up more for the fulfillment of its own material interests than for the defense of church jurisdiction and the decisions of the Roman Curia. The latter therefore called the attention of the nuncios to this situation and to the existing tension between the lower clergy, organised in a large association called the Congregación del clero de Castilla y de León, and the residing bishops. The nuncios were recommended, whenever justified, to support the demands of the cathedral chapters against the bishops, thereby making them ever more dependent on the will and the protection of the nuncios. Was there a reason for the state secretariat to interpret the situation in this manner? No doubt there was a danger that being dependent on the King for promotion to a better paid or more prestigious position could change into a golden cage. On the other hand, there was criticism in Spain of the Curia and the nepotism of Popes and members of the Curia. The sources do not reveal that the submissiveness of the episcopate to the King or his dynastic concerns was a fundamental disadvantage for the Church. Devotion to the King had its limits; in every case we know of the bishop either accepted the royal decrees in accordance with his conscience or he freely argued his pastoral duties when these did not permit him to obey such decrees. Conversely, opposition of Spanish bishops to the Curia was frequently aimed at the latter's centralism and fiscalism or the anti-Spanish policies of Popes. In the seventeenth century Spain had neither a political and theological episcopacy, as did France, nor did the episcopate form a united front with a more or less uniform mentality for or against Rome or Madrid.[3]

In the middle of the eighteenth century the historian and enlightened reformist Gregorio Mayáns y Siscar (1699–1781) deplored the lack of interest of some bishops in culture and enlightenment and their preoccupation with Scholasticism. Yet the research by J. Sarrailh proves that most of the bishops made great efforts in the area of charity and material improvement within their dioceses. Since they were generally of modest origins, they stayed in contact with their faithful. J. Sarrailh presents a list of such "charitable" bishops whose energy was applied to ameliorating misery and to promoting the well-being of their sees. He also points out the "economically active" bishops who promoted public buildings and established schools and houses for the poor.

Within the episcopate a group of Jansenist bishops[4] attained prominence. Though small, it was extremely active and influential: Asensio Salas and José Climent, both of them bishops of Barcelona, Felipe Bertrán of Salamanca, Antonio Tavira, also of Salamanca and later of Osma, as well as others. As bishop of Salamanca, Tavira—in the company of the bishop and the archdeacon of Cuenca and two capitulars of the chapter of San Isidoro—regularly attended the meetings of the duchess of Montijo, who had translated the Jansenist work Instrucciones cristianas sobre el sacramento del matrimonio, whose foreword was written by Bishop Climent.

At the end of the eighteenth century (19 November 1799) the Austrian ambassador to Madrid, Kageneck, had some disparaging things to say about the bishops of that time. According to him they had no influence on the government, in spite of their wealth, nor did they form a social body within the monarchy. Yet all the while they represented a high level of authority for the pious faithful in the provinces. He continues by saying that it was the custom of the Spanish cabinet of the time not to select highly intelligent people for high offices and none at all who could pose a serious threat to the regime. Kageneck did not reproach the high clergy so much in regard to morality, but referred to the majority of the prelates as insignificant, of low estate, occasionally given to intrigues once they attained positions of leadership, and of being covetous of honor and money. He describes the Spanish episcopate at the end of the ancien régime thusly: "The majority of prelates who play a very small part at the court and rarely appear in the capital are very pious but also very hard-hearted."[5] No doubt this is a generalization and exaggeration; at any rate this judgment can not be applied to the whole century. The fact that the bishops were not as submissive as could be assumed was evidenced on the occasion of the regalia decree of Urquijo (5 September 1799). Of sixty-one bishops only ten agreed to it, among them the leaders of the Jansenists, Antonio Tavira, bishop of Salamanca, and Francisco Mateo Aguiriano, bishop of Calahorra (see below). Regardless of all the weakness of the system, this century had great bishops, such as Belluga, Valero, and Lorenzana.

---

[3] Q. Aldea, Iglesia y Estado en siglo XVII (Comillas [Santander] 1961), 105–08.

[4] A. Mestre, Ilustración y Reforma de la Iglesia (Valencia 1968), 219–29.

As in other countries and times, the lower clergy, too, was deeply in need of reform and adaptation. To be sure, the demands of the Council of Trent for reforms were theoretically still in force. But a broad spectrum of the clergy—with the exception of some select groups—lagged far behind the priestly ideal. Ignorance, stinginess, and a wordly spirit were the deficiencies castigated by Cardinal Belluga, bishop of Cartagena, in his lengthy pastoral letter of 1705. In order to remove these ills, Innocent XIII, with the help of Belluga, issued the bull Apostolici ministerii (13 May 1723) containing twenty-six points for the reform of the clergy. This bull replaced the provincial councils, advocated by the archbishop of Toledo, Francisco Valero, and the national council, demanded by some politicians. From 1650 to 1815, as a consequence, no provincial councils were convened, the only exception being the province of Tarragona, where seventeen meetings were called, the majority of them to deal with economic matters.[6]

Preaching had declined from the classical ideal of the "Golden Era" of Spain, which boasted of so many exemplary teachers. Even Belluga deplored the foolishness of the sermons "full of exquisite voices, exuberant phrases, and hairsplitting concepts." Father Francisco Isla fought against this by means of his burlesque Fray Gerundio de Campazas, in which he ridiculed the severe shortcomings of contemporary sermons.

---

[5] R. Olaechea, Las relaciones hispano-romanas en la segunda mitad del XVIII II (Saragossa 1965), 586.

[6] Rafael Serra Ruiz, El pensamiento social-politico del Cardenal Belluga (Murcia 1963), 242–47.

This in turn brought down upon the Jesuits the wrath of other orders who felt they were the accused. But there was a sizeable school of parish missionaries who regularly traversed the peninsula. Dominicans, Franciscans and Capuchins competed in this apostolic task, but the Jesuits were the leaders. One of the most prominent parish missionaries of this period was Father Jerónimo López (1589–1658), who untiringly wandered through Catalonia, Aragon, Valencia, the Balearic Islands, Navarre, and many villages of the two Castiles. He was the author of the well-known Acto de contrición, a pious book of devotions with which he went through the streets delivering sermons. His pastoral successor was Father Tirso Gonzáles (1624–1705), who later became general of the Society of Jesus. Accompanied by many helpers he made 120 trips in northern Spain alone in a period of four years (1671–75), many of which lasted more than twenty days. Other great parish missionaries were the Jesuit Pedro de Calatayud (1689–1773) and the blessed Diego de Cádiz, a Capuchin. These missions were extremely fruitful; above all they revived the practice of the sacrament among the masses.

A typical form of piety in this period was the Sacred Heart devotion. It was propagated by Fathers Cardaveraz (d. 1720), Bernardo de Hoyos (d. 1735), Juan de Loyola (d. 1762), and Pedro de Calatayud. In his apostolic travels Calatayud founded congregations whose members were pledged to dedicate themselves to the Sacred Heart devotion, to confess monthly, and to receive Communion. Along with the parish missions, though without the fanfare, went retreats which gradually changed the lives of certain groups of priests and laymen.

In Portugal there were two great figures who deserve special mention, Antonio Vieira (1608–97), called "the Portuguese Demosthenes," and Manuel Bernardes, more esteemed as an author than as an orator.

The persecution of the Jesuits started in Portugal, a country most favored by the society. Under the weak King José I, his minister, the Marquis de Pombal, reigned supreme. Pombal ordered the confiscation of all Jesuit property in 1759 and a few months later their expulsion. Seventeen hundred Jesuits (aside from the nine hundred missionaries) were expelled in a most brutal fashion, deported to the Papal States, or incarcerated in dirty jail cells in their own homeland. Some twenty Jesuit schools were taken over by laymen.

The Jesuits in Spain had great influence and practically a monopoly in the educational system, having a total of 130 colleges. This was one of the causes leading to a tragedy in Spain similar to the one in Portugal. Other reasons for the expulsion were: prejudices on the part of those who had earlier felt themselves disadvantaged by the Jesuits, their assumed wealth, the close connection of the Society of Jesus with the Pope, the suspected opposition to the authority of the King (the Jesuits were said to have been responsible for the rebellion of Esquilache), theological differences of opinion, especially on the issue of probabilism, which many orders and bishops, such as Lorenzana and Armañá, condemned as laxism but without actually knowing it. In addition there was their political and social influence, and finally, the example of Portugal and France. The trial did not take place in the Consejo of Castile, as had been the custom, because there the majority favored the Jesuits. For this reason the famous Consejo extraordinario was convened, excluding all having any connection with the Jesuits. During the night of 2 and 3 April 1767, all Spanish Jesuits, approximately twenty-seven hundred, with twice that number overseas, were driven from their homeland without having been given a hearing or having been properly convicted. Fear of repression by the King suppressed all protest. The reasons for this decision remained a secret of Charles III. Through his ambassador in Rome, Moñino, he obtained from Clement XIV the brief Dominus ac Redemptor (21 July, 1773). When in 1769 the King questioned fifty-six bishops, forty-two of them agreed with the measures against the society, six abstained, and eight opposed them.[7]

The decree Pro Seminariis of the Council of Trent, stipulating the establishment of a seminary in every diocese, was at first followed conscientiously. But the difficulties encountered militated against further implementation. Among those were the large number of colleges, which absorbed the elite of the youth, and the high cost of constructing the necessary buildings. But more important than the construction costs were the direction of seminaries, the selection of applicants and the curricula, which were generally antiquated. By the end of the sixteenth century twenty seminaries were founded; in the seventeenth century eight, and in the eighteenth century seventeen, for a total of forty-five by 1816. Of the thirteen seminaries existing in Portugal by that year, five were established in the eighteenth century.

As everywhere in Europe, Scholasticism and above all theological studies at the universities slowly regressed. There was a lack of originality and realism. One was satisfied with composing the no doubt necessary cursus or compendium of theological or philosophical knowledge for the use in schools. But in the background of Scholasticism were the new philosophy, the Enlightenment, and the positive sciences. There were significant personalities nonetheless, such as Cardinal Alvaro Cienfuegos (d. 1737), Pedro Manso (1736), Luis de Losada, Francisco Armañá and others. The moral theologian Miguel de Molinos

---

[7] V. Rodríguez Casado, "Iglesia y Estado en el reinado de Carlos III," Estudios Americanos 1 (1948–49), 5–57; F. Tort, Francisco Armanyá (Villanueva and Geltrú 1967), 113–48.

(1628–96) gave rise to a great controversy when sixty-eight propositions of his Spiritual Guide (Rome 1675) were condemned as quietistic by Innocent XI.

Historical studies flourished considerably through men such as José Sáenz de Aguirre, Enrique Flórez (author of the España sagrada), Andrés Burriel, and Jaime Villanueva. There was a group of literary figures of great quality, such as Benito Feijóo, Francisco Isla, and the group of exiled Italian Jesuits.[8] Among the religious authors who should be mentioned were the venerable Mother Agreda (d. 1665), who was often consulted by Philip IV, and Manuel de Reguera y Álvarez de Paz, and the Portuguese Luis Brandão and Alonso de Andrade.

The authority of the Inquisition decreased considerably, as can be seen by the number of autos-da-fé held at the time: there were 782 under Philip V, 34 under Ferdinand VI and only a dozen under Charles III and Charles IV. The last condemnation by the Inquisition was pronounced in Seville on 7 November 1781.

The royal confessors, who did not limit themselves to the sacraments but freely interfered in the problems of state, enjoyed great esteem. In the council of state they had a voice and a vote just like any other member of the council.

Under the Habsburgs those positions were occupied by the Dominicans. Among the confessors of Philip IV were Antonio de Sotomayor, archbishop of Damascus and inquisitor general, and Juan de Santo Tomás, a famous Portuguese theologian. Under Charles II the position again was entrusted to the Dominicans, but Queen Mariana, following the custom of the imperial court, brought along Father Eberhard Nidhard. The Spanish Bourbons followed French custom: Philip V had as his confessor the Jesuit Daubenton. The last and probably best known of the Jesuit confessors was Francisco de Rávago, professor of theology at the Roman college and provincial of Castile.

In the course of the sixteenth century and at the beginning of the seventeenth century twenty Spanish saints were canonized, whereas the period we are discussing here lists only two: José Oriol (1650–1702) and José Pignatelli (1737–1811).

Church and State

Relations between Spain and the Holy See rested on the principle of the two authorities: the papal and the royal authority, each supreme in its realm. But the person of the Pope had an additional position: not only was he the successor of Saint Peter, but the prince of the Papal States as well. In cases of doubt the Spanish politicians followed the delimitation formulated by Gabriel Pereira: if there is doubt whether a civil law violates the ecclesiastical weal, the decision of the Pope has to be adhered to. Whenever there is doubt whether it violates the political weal, the decision of the civil authorities prevails. These principles were applied in the theory of the indirect authority of the Pope in Spain under the Habsburgs, and the concepts of the great Spanish writers Vitoria, Molina, Suárez and others were followed. Just shortly before the Bourbons took over the reign, Bossuet formulated his views of the divine origin of the monarchs' absolute power on which the Bourbons based their interference in church affairs, especially in the second half of the eighteenth century (see Chaps. 4 and 7).[9] [8] M. Batllori, La cultura hispano-italiana de los jesuitas expulsos (Madrid 1966).

---

The legal claims of royal intervention were based—over and above his general position as a Christian prince—on the obligation to ensure observation of the decrees of the Council of Trent and, above all, on the royal patronage of Spain, from which the missions patronage over the West Indies is derived as well. The institution of the patronage in Spain was traced to the sixth canon of the twelfth Council of Toledo (681) and formulated by Philip II (1565) in the first law, section six of the first volume of the Nueva recopilación as follows: "Legally and on the basis of old custom, just claims as well as apostolic concessions we are patrons of all cathedral churches of these kingdoms and are entitled to appoint the archbishops and bishops, the prelates and abbots of these kingdoms even if they fall vacant in Rome." The following were the decisive steps in the development of the patronage system: The granting of universal and eternal patronage over the Kingdom of Granada, the Canary Islands and Puerto Real (from this was derived in part the royal patronage over the West Indies), which was granted by the bull Orthodoxae Fidei (13 December 1486) by Sixtus IV; the granting of presentation in the cathedrals and consistorial benefices for the rest of Spain by a bull of Hadrian VI (6 September 1523); the granting of the royal universal patronage over the entire national territory by virtue of the concordat of 11 January 1753. Benedict XIV reserved for himself no more than the granting of fifty-two benefices. This constituted the climax of the presentation privilege in Spain.[10]

Since the reign of Philip II, Spain and Portugal had been united under the Spanish crown. In 1640 the Portuguese rose up against Philip IV and crowned Juan IV (1640–70) King. This posed great problems for the Holy See, not just because of the diplomatic recognition of the new King, but also regarding the filling of vacant bishoprics in Portugal, which was the King's prerogative. The conflict lasted until the consolidation of Portuguese independence. In 1670 relations between Portugal and Rome were resumed and the bishoprics filled.

---

[9] Q. Aldea, Iglesia y Estado en el siglo XVII, 57–63.

[10] Ibid., 63–111.

A special role was played by the Gravamina Ecclesiae Hispanae. In 1632 the parliamentary estates of Castile and León submitted to the King a petition listing the encumbrances of the Spanish Church by the Roman Curia and the nunciature in Madrid. The number of complaints, especially against the dataries, increased until the end of the eighteenth century. Several Spanish cardinals, such as Zapata and Gil de Albornoz, criticized the granting of marriage dispensations, the filling and authentication of church benefices, and the distribution of pensions from them. The complicated fees in the case of marriage dispensations, their high rates (two tables from the end of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries have been preserved), and their arbitrary application led to Cardinal Zapata comparing the datary with a house of commerce. Complaints against the Apostolic Chamber in connection with the spolia and the revenues of vacant bishoprics did not cease until the publication of the Concordat of 1753, whose ARTICLE 20 granted these revenues to the church where they originated. The Madrid nunciature was accused of economic and jurisdictional abuses, the latter as well bearing close connection with economic factors. It was accused of charging inordinately high fees, accepting original law suits, making illegal demands for gold and silver money, issuing marriage dispensations contravening the decrees of the Council of Trent and so forth. In 1634 when repeated protests on the part of the ambassadors in Rome, especially by the ambassadors extraordinary Pimentel and Chumacero, were rejected, Madrid used the pretext of the death of Nuncio Campeggi to discontinue the activities of the Madrid nunciature for the period of one year. The so-called agreement of Nuncio Facchinetti of 1640 brought about a new table of rates, but until the Concordat of 1753 and essentially until 26 March 1771, when the Spanish Rota was established according to the model of the Roman Signatura iustitiae, the problem remained unsolved.[11]

"Regalism," that is the abuse of privileges or rights of the King in church matters, is an ambiguous concept. Regarding Spanish regalism one has to differentiate between the reign of the Habsburgs and that of the Bourbons. One must also take into consideration the dialectics of a modern state with its steadily growing administrative autonomy and the intimate ties between Church and state of earlier epochs. The inordinate extent of ecclesiastical immunity of persons as well as properties had created a state within the state and triggered considerable tensions. This explains the origin of recourse to the King, the reticence of papal bulls and the laws of amortization. Yet these events are also a page in the process of secularization of modern society, manifesting itself in the usurpation of spiritual tasks and hostility towards ecclesiastical institutions.[12]

---

[11] Ibid., 115–85.

After 1700, when the first Bourbon, Philip V, had ascended the throne of Spain, monarchical absolutism following the French example was intensified by attempts to limit the independence of the Church. Regalism, more radical than ever before, was turned against the papal reservations which had developed into a sort of "regalism of the pope." One of the bishops fighting against Roman centralism was Francisco de Solis, bishop of Ávila and later of Córdoba, who in 1709 composed the famous Dictamen sobre los abusos de la Corte Romana por lo tocante a las regalías de su M.C. y jurisdicción que reside en los obispos. He went so far as to maintain that: "On the basis of these privileges His Majesty is permitted and even obligated to protect His kingdoms and churches from the slavery of the Roman Curia and to liberate them from it . . ." He was referring to the illegal limitation of the authority of bishops, without however going into the opposite extreme.

Philip V reacted violently against the recognition of Archduke Charles as King of Spain, a step forced upon Clement XI during the War of Sucession (1700 until 1715). He founded the Junta Magna, which on 25 February 1709 ordered the nuncio expelled and the nunciature closed, the spolia and revenues of vacant bishoprics sequestered and all relations of Spanish ecclesiastics with Rome prohibited. These were restored after the Peace of Utrecht (1713) and a provisional concordat concluded in 1717. The concordat was broken a year later when the nuncio was expelled again; only in July 1720 was he permitted to return to Madrid.

When Charles III ascended to the throne (1759) the front of the advocates of regalism hardened. The political and ecclesiastical complications brought about by the letter of exhortation of Parma, the expulsion of the Society of Jesus, the Fourth Mexican Provincial Council (1771) and the State Junta (1784), with its famous Instrucción reservada, were manifestations of an extreme regalism. Charles IV followed along this path until the publication of the decree of 5 September 1799. It provided that the Spanish bishops in case of a sedes vacans of the Holy See "would in accordance with the old church discipline make use of all their faculties for marriage dispensations and other powers," without regard to the papal reservations.[13] This betrayed the extreme philosophy of the royal minister Urquijo, whom a good many people called a schismatic. But actually this event proved the words of the Austrian ambassador Kageneck right, who said that "schisms are not possible in Spain."[14]

---

[12] Alberto de la Hera, El Regalismo Borbónico (Madrid 1963).

After the eradication of the ancien régime by the French Revolution the vestiges of Bourbon regalism gradually died out in Spain. The rebellion of Porto in 1820 signaled the beginning of new ideas in Portugal and the start of an epoch of liberalism in both countries.

---

[13] J. A. Llorente, Coleción Diplomática (Madrid 1809), 65–66. This book contains some of the letters of reply concerning the above-mentioned decree; Luis Sierra, La reacción del episcopado español ante los decretos de matrimonios del ministro Urquijo de 1799 a 1813 (Bilbao 1964).

[14] R. Olaechea, Las relaciones hispano-romanas en la segunda mitad del XVIII II, 585.

CHAPTER 12

The Condition of the Catholics in Great Britain and Ireland in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

The Early Stuarts

The history of English Catholicism in the first half of the seventeenth century has already been treated briefly. What remains to be added is that English Catholicism at this time had already assumed the social structure which it was to retain until the great Irish immigration during the Industrial Revolution. The faith survived in isolated groups on the estates of individual rural aristocrats who supported the clergy and consequently demanded a certain amount of control over them. The same structure also dominated among the few Catholics of the Scottish Lowlands. On the Gaelic islands and in the Scottish Highlands, Catholicism maintained itself in stronger groups. They were efficaciously supported by Franciscan missionaries.[1] In Wales Catholicism was almost completely abolished after 1650 when Puritan preachers introduced the nonconformist tradition.

Ireland, on the other hand, had remained predominantly Catholic. Subject to the English crown but with its own parliament, the island had not developed into a homogeneous nation. At the beginning of the seventeenth century three groups can be clearly distinguished: The old Irish of Gaelic origin; the old English from before the Reformation, and the new English who had come to Ireland since the Reformation. The latter group was Protestant, the former two were Catholic. The Tudors had subordinated their desire for religious conformity to political conquest. The old English, strongly represented in the Tudor parliaments, had seen to it that the penal laws in Ireland were never as strict as in England. In addition, the local administration was in the hands of the old English, so that the laws were not as harshly applied as the government might have wished. After about 1570 the Irish—by nature a conservative people who for religious reasons were little susceptible to Protestantism—had at their disposal a growing number of priests who had been educated on the continent according to Tridentine ideals. A considerable number of Irish seminaries had been established on the continent as early as around 1600. To be sure, the seminary priests did not gain immediate access to the old Irish, but these had suffered so deeply during the Tudor conquest that their Catholic faith had become part of their resistance against the new rulers. The old English, on the other hand, continued to keep their wealth and possessions.[2] [1] C. Giblin, Irish Franciscan Mission to Scotland 1619–1646 (Dublin 1964).

---

In the early seventeenth century the Irish Catholics fought in vain for a political agreement which was to recognize both their loyalty and their Catholicism. Just as in England, James I continued the Elizabethan penal legislation. He also promoted her policies of colonialization. Extensive settlements, especially in Ulster, brought a strong Protestant element into the country for whose economic acumen the conservative Irish Catholics were no match. The King's policies, moreover, excluded the Catholics from public service. The parliament of 1613 clearly manifested that the Catholic influence on legislation had sharply decreased.[3] Political pressure upon them was maintained; around 1640 the old English Catholics had every reason to fear that in the eyes of the administration they were merely "semisubjects"—as James I had called them—who, like the old Irish, were robbed of their political rights because of their religion and whose right of property was being questioned.

Yet in actual practice there was sufficient tolerance at this time to enable the Catholic Church to carry out a comprehensive reorganisation of its mission. From the colleges on the continent Ireland received enough priests who were trained to teach a people whose religious formation had been neglected for a long time. The Catholic episcopate, too, had been renewed. Even during the reign of Elizabeth nominations to the Irish bishoprics had not ceased, although there had at times been lengthy vacancies. From the ranks of the first generation of seminary priests emerged a superior group of bishops who had been appointed around 1620. They were confronted by serious problems, especially on the part of the monastic clergy, who continued to claim the right of extensive missionary authority as it had been granted to them by the Holy See at the time of Elizabeth. But in collaboration with the newly founded Roman Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith the bishops succeeded in establishing a parish system. The monastic clergy calmed down since it now became possible for them to found their own houses. By 1636 the situation had been stabilized by a series of decrees for the Irish mission issued by the Propaganda.[4]

---

[2] A. Clarke, The Old English in Ireland 1625–42 (London 1966); P. J. Corish, The Origins of Catholic Nationalism (Dublin 1968).

[3] T. W. Moody, "The Irish Parliaments under Elizabeth and James I," Proceedings of the Royal Irish Academy 45 (1938–40), 42–81.

In 1641 the old Irish took up arms in order to reconquer their rights and property. After brief hesitation the old English joined them. United in the Confederation of Kilkenny, they undertook anew an effort to regain their position as "the King's Catholic subjects." Their negotiations with the King were difficult and were further aggravated by the arrival of the papal nuncio, Rinuccini, in 1645, who demanded the restoration of Catholicism on the basis of strict counterreformational principles which did not take into account the complexity of the Irish situation. Several attempts to prevail with his views, even in the face of ecclesiastical censure, finally split the confederation and forced him to leave the country.[5] Thus weakened and divided, Ireland easily fell prey to Oliver Cromwell.

Commonwealth and Restoration

Under Cromwell's rule the two islands had a single administration in the years around 1650. This meant that the more repressive English laws were automatically extended to Ireland as well. Cromwell's concept of "freedom of conscience" condemned the Anglicanism of the High Church of Charles I and Catholicism in like measure. Paradoxically, this meant that the English Catholics were not subject to the bloody persecutions which they had feared because their sympathy had been with the royalists during the civil war. They escaped persecution because they constituted a minority and also because for a time they could successfully claim the principle of freedom of conscience.

The Irish Catholics, on the other hand, suffered a bitter fate. In addition to their being Catholics they were viewed as inferior and uneducated, criminal and politically dangerous. Cromwell had conquered the country in a brutal war of extermination. As a general rule, clergymen captured in the war were executed without a trial. Then followed a large-scale process of confiscation. The propertied Catholics were banished to the province of Connaught. A sharp distinction must be made between the continuity of Catholicism in Ireland and England.

---

[4] See B. Jennings, ed., "Acta Sacrae Congregationis de Propaganda Fide 1622–1650," Archivum Hibernicum 22 (1959), 28–139.

[5] Rinuccini followed a much stricter direction in Ireland than the papal ambassador Fabio Chigi (the future Pope Alexander VII) took at the peace conference in Münster.

When the war was over, a priest—according to an Elizabethan decree of 1585—was guilty of treason by his mere presence in Ireland. As a result many clergymen voluntarily went into exile. Those who stayed were persecuted relentlessly, but after 1654 the government preferred to jail the prisoners or to banish instead of executing them. Only a relatively small number of priests were able to follow their vocation—receiving help in numerous ways and assuming various disguises. Mass was usually celebrated in the open, on the "Mass rock." No doubt this was the most severe test ever faced by the Irish Catholics. Fortunately, it lasted but a short time.

The reorganization of the previous generation had been totally destroyed. Again priests exercised their office by virtue of missionary authority if indeed they had such authority at all. But around 1657 the Propaganda in Rome set up new plans for the Irish mission. By the end of 1659, two bishops had returned to Ireland. On 29 May 1660, Charles II reoccupied the throne of his father.

Following the Restoration, England, Scotland, and Ireland again had separate parliaments, which were now much more powerful than under the early Stuarts. The King, striving to safeguard his personal authority, endeavored to secure the support of his royal cousin, Louis XIV of France. The struggle between King and parliament in England was aggravated by distrust on the part of parliament of the King's benevolence towards the Catholics (Charles himself converted to Catholicism on his deathbed and his brother James, duke of York, the heir apparent, converted shortly after 1668).

In 1670 Charles signed the treaty of Dover with Louis XIV, which parliament countered a year later with an act banishing the Catholic clergy. Charles in turn issued the Declaration of Indulgence in 1672, which extended toleration to the dissenters, including Catholics. But parliament proved to be the stronger. The Test Acts of 1673 and 1678 affirmed the exclusion of Catholics from public life. Although the balance of power between King and parliament was sufficient to guarantee the Catholics enough toleration, some of the Catholic gentry and consequently their tenants and vassals left the faith. Church authority was maintained in a much reduced fashion by a canon chapter established in 1623 by Apostolic Vicar William Bishop. It represented a conservative body with Gallican tendencies in which vacancies were filled by election.

In Ireland, Charles had to accept the fact that power was held by those who had profited by the great land confiscations and now increasingly looked on themselves as the "Protestant Interest." In trying to prove their loyalty, Catholic laymen gave considerable support to a movement known as the "Remonstrance," which wanted to obtain from the Irish Church a declaration of Gallican principles. The resistance of the clergy against this demand, which to some extent can be seen as a justification of Rinuccini's ultramontanistic attitude of twenty years before, came to a head in 1666 during a synod in Dublin. But at this point it had become clear that a large majority of the dispossessed Catholics would not get their property back.

Again the Church had to rebuild its ministry. There were only two bishops remaining in the country and those who lived in exile were politically compromised by the events of the religious conflicts so that they were not permitted to return. There was indeed a real shortage of priests. For almost a decade no new bishops were appointed, but priests were ordained in considerable numbers—often with insufficient or no preparation for their vocation. Both decisions appear to have been made by Rome; no doubt they were the wrong ones.[6]

It was not until 1669 that the first bishops were appointed; by 1671 most of the sees were again occupied. The new bishops were worthy men, some of them even superior. Helped by a greater degree of toleration in the years around 1670, they started the restoration of the parish system by a series of synods and visitations. But toleration was merely relative; congregations continued to be reduced to making use of the "mass rock," although there were some modest chapels or "mass houses" the Catholics were able to establish. But in 1673 a royal proclamation ordered all members of religious orders and clerics with jurisdictional authority to be banished. While this proclamation was not implemented strictly, it did affect an episcopate already in distress. Some of the clerics, ordained in the last decade, now proved themselves unequal to their task. The reconstruction of the parish system led to renewed divergence between the secular and monastic clergy, aggravated by the fact that all the clergy were dependent on gifts by the people, since the Catholic laymen as well as the clergy had lost all their wealth and property.

The Catholics of both islands were exposed to bloody persecutions when Titus Oates instigated a conspiracy in 1678 in order to exclude the duke of York from the royal succession.[7] Oates was an unprincipled adventurer and totally untrustworthy, but because of the political hysteria of the time he was able to have an impact. On 11 October 1678 the archbishop of Dublin was arrested; he died in jail in November 1680. The trials in England began on 15 November 1678. More than twenty-five Catholics were executed and the number of those who were jailed ran into the hundreds. The last and best-known victim was the blessed Oliver Plunkett, archbishop of Armagh, who was executed at Tyburn on 1 July 1681. He was the last victim of the conspiracy as well as the last priest to be executed under the penal laws applying at that time.

---

[6] B. Millett, Survival and Reorganization 1650–1695 (Dublin 1968), 12–22.

The hysteria collapsed as quickly as it had arisen. In February 1685 James II followed his brother to the throne. He was an incompetent politican and ignored the fact that at most 10 percent of his English subjects were ready to accept a Catholic monarchy. The birth of a Catholic heir cost him the throne, which went to his Protestant daughter Mary and her husband William of Orange. James fled to France and later returned to Ireland to lead the resistance there.

The great Catholic majority in Ireland had enough freedom to exercise their religion. The bishops received a maintenance from the government and the congregations were established publicly. When James arrived in Ireland, he convened a parliament which promised freedom of religion and the return of confiscated property to the Catholics. But the further course of events was determined by William's victory over the Irish-Jacobite forces, which enabled the "Protestant Interest" to regain its political power.[8]

The Penal Code of the Eighteenth Century

After William's victory the laws excluding Catholics from public life in England were again noticeably tightened up. On the other hand, several laws concerning property proved to be ineffective and the Catholic landed gentry continued to be accepted on the social level. Yet in the following century there were more and more cases of apostasy among them. During the reign of James II there had been about 300,000 professed Catholics, by 1780 this figure had decreased to 70,000.

An act of parliament of 1700 replaced the death penalty decreed in 1585 with life imprisonment. William tended toward a concept of limited toleration practiced in Holland. Although the English Protestants could not quite accept this, there was, in practice, an increasing extent of toleration; only a few priests were actually jailed. Those who were under the protection of the Catholic gentry were almost completely safe, although the price of this safety may at times have been a humiliating state of dependence. Other clerics, especially in London, had to execute their office in greater secrecy. Bishop Giffard, the vicar apostolic of the London district, was jailed several times.

---

[7] See mainly J. Lane, Titus Oates (London 1949).

[8] J. G. Simms, Jacobite Ireland 1685–91 (London 1969).

The jurisdiction of the bishops had been reestablished in England during the reign of James II. In 1685 John Leyburn was appointed vicar apostolic and in 1688 the country was divided into four districts, each headed by a vicar apostolic. All four vicars were jailed during the revolution, but released afterwards. Their authority over the clergy had to be exercised very carefully, especially over those who were chaplains with the gentry and even more so with the monastic clergy who were against the restoration of the bishops' authority. In 1753 Benedict XIV made a final decision in favor of the bishops.

The only truly predominant figure among the English bishops of the eighteenth century was Richard Challoner (1691–1781), who was head of the London district for more than forty years. Reticent, strict, and very English, he had a great formative influence on Catholicism not only in England but to some extent also in Ireland. He made his influence felt through numerous written works which he composed over and above a life filled with the work of ministry. His Garden of the Soul (1740) Think well on't (1728), and Meditations (1753) became almost synonymous for his kind of spirituality. Challoner was also influential through his translation of the Imitatio Christi, the Confessiones of Augustine and the Introduction à la vie dévote of Francis de Sales. His revision of the bible translation of Douai-Reims continued to be the Holy Scripture most used in England until recently.

The Scottish Catholics were subjected to penal legislation very similar to that of England,[9] but for them it was frequently even more oppressive, since Jacobite sympathies were more widespread in Scotland. In 1653 a priest had been installed for the purpose of directing the Scottish mission and in 1694 Bishop Thomas Nicholson was appointed vicar apostolic. In 1731 two more vicariates were established, one for the Highlands and one for the Lowlands. From the remote hamlet where each bishop had his residence he directed the education of candidates for the priesthood in order to do his part for the next generation which emerged from the Scottish colleges on the continent. The Catholics of the Highlands suffered profoundly under the repression after 1745, which led to a lasting wave of emigration, particularly to the country which was given the name "New Scotland" (Nova Scotia).

---

[9] The Act of Union (1707) united England and Scotland into the Kingdom of Great Britain with a single parliament in London.

The minority in Ireland, constituting the "Protestant Interest," was faced by some very complex problems. Theoretically it was obliged to work towards the extermination of Catholicism. But for all practical purposes a mass conversion was unthinkable, since this would have meant an immediate threat to the property which the "Protestant Interest" had gained by confiscation. The religious articles of the Treaty of Limerick (1691) had promised the Catholics even better conditions than had prevailed under Charles II. William wanted to respect these agreements, but after the Treaty of Rijswijk (1697) he was more inclined to give in to the Protestant parliament in Dublin.

An act of 1697 ordered all members of religious orders and clerics with jurisdictional authority banished. Those who returned were put under sentence of death. About five hundred monastic clerics were deported and only three bishops managed to stay. The secular clergy had always enjoyed a certain immunity, an outcome of the resistance on the part of the old English in the Elizabethan parliaments. The aim was to put the clergy under surveillance by means of the Registration Act of 1703 and if possible to oppress them. The act provided for the official registration of one priest for each parish; he had to perform his duties under strict control. There were no provisions at all to fill vacancies. In 1704 a total of 1089 priests registered in accordance with the Registration Act, they included three bishops and a number of priests who can be identified as monastic clerics.

The system of controls and possible extermination collapsed with the Act of Renunciation of 1709, which demanded of each priest an oath renouncing the cause of the Stuarts. Only thirty priests swore the oath. Although new laws were passed for another generation, the government had finally given up its goal of religious conformity and instead pledged itself to a policy of social and political humiliation. The Acts of Banishment and Registration were not consistently implemented. No more priests were condemned to death. To be sure, parliament passed laws, but their implementation was in the hands of an executive answerable directly to the crown. The administrative apparatus was weak, especially in remote areas, and even in Dublin it had to proceed with caution to keep the Catholic masses from rioting.

In spite of the Act of Banishment new bishops were appointed in 1707 and almost all the sees were occupied by 1720. Priests were ordained, some on the continent, others within the country, but the latter all too often were given insufficient preparation. The monastic clergy had a large number of recruits and after 1720 were able to resume a certain measure of communal life. But many of its representatives were not personally engaged and were often in unpleasant competition with the parish priests for the alms of the faithful. In spite of great difficulties the bishops wanted to reinstall a parish clergy. But because their mere presence was legally prohibited, they had to act with caution, especially in times of political tension, as for instance in 1715 or 1745. Poverty was a constant problem and sometimes it was very difficult for them to live in their dioceses for any length of time.

By 1730 a more stable parish system emerged. The conflicts between the secular and monastic clergy were lessened by a number of decisions from Rome, which were reaffirmed by Benedict XIV in 1751.[10] They placed limitations upon the monastic clergy which transcended even the rules prescribed by general canon law. On the other hand, they also limited, perhaps too rigorously, the number of priests to be ordained by any one bishop. Yet the papal decisions were motivated by well-founded grievances, based above all on numerous cases of premature ordination. Within a short time there were complaints concerning the shortage of priests to minister to the growing populace, but this situation was never very serious. The continental colleges took care of the recruits needed for the priesthood until they were closed by the French Revolution and Maynooth assumed their role in 1795.

By the middle of the century the "mass rock" was replaced everywhere by the "mass house." Only in Ulster did this process take longer, because the large-scale settlements at the beginning of the seventeenth century had created a Protestant majority there. For the most part, the parish priests had their own houses and the monastic clergy, too, were able to maintain a communal life. Each of the two groups developed its own missionary field. The offerings of the faithful guaranteed both of them a suitable subsistence. In the eighteenth century Ireland finally found peace and gradual economic improvement. Problems reemerged when England—unlike Ireland—was industrialized. Most of the Catholics remained impoverished. This was the case in all the social classes, even though a small number of the gentry had at least kept some of their estates and a middle class was able to establish a certain affluence from skills and commerce. But it required the first Relief Act of 1782 for new churches to be built. In 1800 a report of the bishops to the government made note that the average annual income of a bishop amounted to 300 pounds sterling and that of a priest to 65 pounds sterling. This constituted a modest but sufficient subsistence.

The long fight for the Mass had inculcated the latter firmly into the center of religious life in Ireland. Veneration of the Most Blessed Virgin and above all the Rosary had also become deeply rooted. Catholic teachers, although outlawed, continued to teach religious instruction in cooperation with the clergy. By the late seventeenth century religious tracts in English were widely distributed; during the eighteenth century a sizeable system of publication and distribution was developed. The inventories of book dealers in the second half of the century show that the works of Richard Challoner were the most popular. Almost nothing was printed in the Irish language, but a good many devotionals were distributed by means of copies, a procedure based on a long tradition. These writings, too, were for the most part translations, occasionally from English, but most of them were translations of European works of counterreformational spirituality.

---

[10] See H. Fenning, "John Kent's Report on the Irish Mission 1742," Archivum Hibernicum 28 (1966), 59–102.

The traditional devotions also survived. The great pilgrimages expecially were kept alive, although the bishops frequently forbade them because of the danger of superstition connected with them. The government also prohibited them because it feared all gatherings of Catholic groups. Modern Irish-Catholic spirituality as it crystallized in the eighteenth century was a mixture of old and new characterized—at least in the English-speaking middle class—by a strict and fearful ethos. This is customarily ascribed to the Jansenist influence, but historically this connection cannot be demonstrated[11] and many other causes can be assumed for it. One of the predominant traits of Irish Catholicism is its traditional severity; even today the popular pilgrimage to Lough Derg is considered a genuine penance. To some extent this attitude is derived from the strict attitude of Challoner, but perhaps more so from the experience of persecution which has been deeply imprinted on Irish Catholic consciousness.

Catholic Emancipation

The Relief Acts canceling the penal laws were prompted primarily by the situation in Ireland, where the consequences of the acts were extremely important. Under the reign of George II (1727–60) suggestions were submitted on numerous occasions which aimed at the approval of a "suitable number" of priests and even some bishops, provided that they would accept a certain measure of government supervision. But these suggestions were unacceptable to parliament. The succession to the throne by George III (1760), the death of the eldest son of James II (1766), and the American Declaration of Rights (1774) created a changed political climate which made it possible to alleviate the condition of the Catholics.

---

[11] See R. Clark, Strangers and Sojourners at Port Royal (Cambridge 1932), 210ff.; C. Giblin, "Catalogue of Material of Irish Interest in the collection Nunziatura di Fiandra (Vatican Archives)," Collectanea Hibernica 5 (1962), 73ff.

Derived from English tradition, the Declaration of Rights had been partisan to the politically oppressed. A more urgent problem was England's need to increase its army; to this end the Catholics of Ireland and the Scottish Highlands constituted a promising pool of recruits. To call them to arms without granting them a certain measure of political recognition was impossible. So in 1774 an oath of allegiance, couched primarily in political terms, was accepted by parliament and—after some initial hesitation—by the Catholics as well. In 1782 some concrete concessions were made. These were easier to put through in England, but an attempt to expand them to Scotland had to be given up in the face of the Protestant rebellion.

In 1782 the Gallican laity of England founded the Cisalpine Club, which suggested an oath of allegiance for England very similar to the one decreed by James I in 1607. This oath rejected papal power of removal as being "heretical" and in so doing resurrected an issue which had been largely laid to rest. More importantly, the oath withdrew from the Pope all spiritual authority which was not in accordance with the laws and constitutions of the Kingdom. The vicars apostolic resisted, whereupon parliament decided to replace that suggestion with the Irish oath of 1774.

By 1791 full religious emancipation had been achieved in England; in 1793 it was extended to Scotland. The Irish Catholics, too, obtained similar relief, wrested in a long fight from a resisting parliament by a middle class which was developing the beginnings of a Catholic democracy.

Many political deficiencies continued to exist. Their elimination was difficult as long as Ireland, with its sizeable Catholic majority, retained its own parliament. William Pitt, the English prime minister, therefore suggested a common parliament for the two islands with some governmental control of appointments in the Catholic hierarchy. After the sudden loss of all their continental seminaries the Irish bishops had accepted a subsidy from the government when Maynooth was founded in 1795; four years later, in 1799, they accepted in principle a government veto power over appointments of bishops.

The union of the parliaments took place in 1801, but George III refused to support Catholic emancipation, and for a number of years the issue of the veto dominated public and parliamentary discussion. In 1805 the Holy See approved a limited veto privilege and thereby created acceptable conditions for the leaders of the Catholic laity in England. But in Ireland the budding Catholic democracy rejected this concession; in February 1809 the Irish bishops declared the veto to be unacceptable. An opinion from Rome of 1813 and another from Pope Pius VII two years later favored the veto, yet neither of the two opinions appeared to be acceptable to Ireland. In 1813 the Irish Catholic democracy had found a talented leader in Daniel O'Connell. Political emancipation was finally granted in 1829 without creating any obligations for the Church vis-à-vis the government. In consideration of the annual subsidy the curators of Maynooth were the only ones answerable to parliament until the Irish Church Act of 1869.

CHAPTER 13

The Russian Orthodox Church

The rise of the duchy, or rather grand duchy, of Moscow to the tsardom and the close connection of the Orthodox Church of Russia with the rulers in Moscow led to the relocation of the metropolitan see of Kiev and all of Russia to the north. The dependence of the Russian branch Church upon the patriarchate of Constantinople was weakening as was attested to in a letter dated 1393 from Patriarch Antonios to Grand Duke Vasili I (1389–1425). As a result of the election at the Moscow synod (1448) of Bishop Ioanna of Riazan as metropolitan (1448–61), desired by Grand Duke Vasili II (1425–62) and certified in the synod of 1459, the Church for all practical purposes obtained its ecclesiastical independence, even though it was not released from the jurisdictional ties with Constantinople until its elevation to a patriarchate.

Moscow the Third Rome[1]

After the fall of the imperial city on the Bosporus in 1453, the metropolitans, in concert with the rulers of Moscow, expanded their independence and gradually took over the central position, which had been occupied by Byzantium, the New, the Second Rome, for almost a millennium. The formulation of a "Third Rome" represented an easily remembered symbol for the symbiosis between the Moscow tsars and the metropolitans. In 1472 Ivan III (1462–1505) married as his second wife Sophia (Zoë), niece of the last of the Palaeologoi emperors, Constantinos XI (1448–53). He included the Byzantine double eagle in his coat of arms,[2] assumed the Greek imperial title of autocrat and the Byzantine court ceremonial. In 1492 Metropolitan Zosima (1490–95) designated: "Ivan Vasilevich, chosen by God, loyal to faith, as tsar and autocrat of all of Russia, a new Emperor Constantine for the new Constantinople-Moscow."[3] The writings of Filofei of the monastery of Saint Eleazar near Pskov at the beginning of the sixteenth century reveal the essential ideas of the Third Rome. His letter to Grand Duke Vasili III (1505–33)[4] reads: "For the Church of the Old Rome has fallen by the unbelief of Appollinarian heresy. The doors of the Second Rome, Constantine's city, were shattered by the axes of Hagar's offspring. This is now the Church of the Third, the New Rome, of your sublime realm the Holy Catholic (sobornyi) Apostolic Church, which at the ends of the earth shines brighter than the sun in the Orthodox Christian faith on all the earth. Know, Your Majesty, pious tsar, that all the realms of the Orthodox Christian faith together have been transferred into your singular realm. You alone are on all the earth tsar of the Christians."[5]

---

[1] V. Malinin, Starec Eleazarova monastyrja Filofej i ego poslanija (Kiev 1901). N. F. Kapterev, Charakter otnošenij Rossii k pravoslavnomu vostoky v XVI i XVII stoletijach (Sergiev Posad 1914 = The Hague and Paris 1968), 26–102; N. Zernov, Moscow the Third Rome (London 1937); H. Rahner, Vom ersten bis zum dritten Rom (Innsbruck 1950); I. Smolitsch, Mönchtum, 129–34; H. Schaeder, Moskau das Dritte Rom (Darmstadt 1957); W. Lettenbauer, Moskau das dritte Rom (Munich 1961); H.-D. Döpmann, Der Einflußder Kirche auf die moskowitische Staatsidee (Berlin 1967), 152–60; K. Onasch, op. cit., 30–34; M. Hellmann, "Moskau und Byzanz," JGO n.s. 17 (1969), 338–44. H. v. Rimscha, Geschichte Rußlands (Darmstadt 1970), 152–59.

These utterances should not be overestimated, especially since the panegyrics on the Third Rome were accompanied by admonitions to the orthodox tsar to protect Russia's orthodoxy and the continuance of the Church. But they should not be underestimated either, as though only refugees from Serbia and Byzantium in the Russian grand duchy, the only country not ruled by the infidel, viewed it as "the refuge of orthodoxy, the hope for the liberation of the homeland."[6] Intellectual-historical, political and religious motives, ideas of Rome, New Rome, and Jerusalem, Byzantine heritage, a messianic sense of mission and eschatology mingled with each other and formed a concept which was to prove historically powerful. The theory of Moscow as the Third Rome lent to the Orthodox faithful and to the tsar a strong sense of mission, which continued its effect in the Russian ideology of state and empire and was evidenced even in the first decades of the twentieth century in the newly established Moscow patriarchate.[7]

---

[2] M. Hellmann disagrees, op. cit., 330–38.

[3] A. M. Ammann, op. cit., 164.

[4] V. Malinin, op. cit., appendix, 49–66a; H. Schaeder, op. cit., 206–9. Also cf. N. Andrejev, "Filofey and his epistle to Ivan Vasilyevich," SEER 38 (1959), 1–31.

[5] H. Schaeder, op. cit., 206–7.—A letter to Michail G. Misjur' Munechin, an official of the grand duke (cf. V. Malinin, op. cit., appendix, 37–47), states, following a similar praise of the tsar: "All Christian realms have vanished and together have merged into the One Realm of our sovereign, according to the prophetic books: That is the Russian Empire. . . . For two Romes have fallen, but the third lives, and there will not be a fourth (H. Schaeder, op. cit., 204).

[6] M. Hellmann, op. cit., 342.

The First Moscow Patriarchate

The ecclesiastical independence existing since the middle of the fifteenth century was under the direction of the metropolitans of Moscow, who—given the symbiosis of Church and state in the grand duchy of Moscow and the growing power of the Moscow tsardom—grew ever more dependent on the state. A new ritual was published by Metropolitan Makari (1542–63) and Tsar Ivan IV (1533–84). The Synod of the Hundred Chapters (1551)[8] solved the conflict between the "Altruistic" and the "Propertied" by compromise. The former were composed of followers of starets Nil Sorski (d. 1508), who advocated a complete separation of Church and state. The latter, called "Josephites" after their founder Iosif of Volokalamsk (d. 1515), were in favor of close collaboration of Church and state and wanted to put at the state's disposal an elite troop to permeate society in the form of a tightly organized monasticism. The rule of terror by Ivan IV (starting in 1560) which gave him the sobriquet "the Terrible," rigorously interfered in the affairs of the Church. Makari's successors tried in vain to put a stop to his ruthless frenzy. Metropolitan Afanasi (1564–66) resigned; Metropolitan German (1566) was driven out; Metropolitan Philip (1566–68) was banished to a monastery and strangled in 1569.[9] Their successors Cyril III (1570–77), Antoni (1577–80), and Dionisi (1581–86) were helpless in the face of Ivan's fury; he traced his autocracy back to God and used church property for purposes of the state. The Church's dependence on the state persisted under Ivan's mentally retarded son Fedor I (1584–98) and the latter's brother-in-law, Boris Godunov, who reigned in his place and followed him as tsar (1598–1605). When Metropolitan Dionisi attempted to limit Godunov's influence, he was removed from office and replaced by Archbishop Job of Rostov (metropolitan: 1586–89, patriarch: 1589–1605). The "dismissals and appointments of hierarchs by the ruler" can be called with some justification "Russian

---

[7] Cf. H. Rahner, op. cit., 18; H. Koch, Schriften (incl. biblio.), 195–225.

[8] A. Herman, op. cit., 51–64.

[9] The martyr Metropolitan Filipp was canonized in 1636 as fighter for the truth; in 1652 his remains were brought to Moscow.

Gallicanism."[10] These actions did not prevent the patriarchs of the East who suffered under the supreme rule of the sultan to request and receive gifts from the Moscow tsar. Negotiations and visits made the tsar's authority within the total Orthodoxy grow. In 1585, for instance, Silvester, patriarch of Alexandria, communicated to the tsar "not to let the Holy Places be lacking in his protection."[11] At the same time he prophesied for him the inheritance of Emperor Constantine. These and other utterances prompted the government to aspire to have the autocephalic Russian Church elevated to a patriarchate in order to strengthen its position in the sense of the Orthodox symphony of state and Church. When Patriarch Joachim V of Antioch visited Moscow as a petitioner in 1586, he received—along with generous gifts of money for the other patriarchs as well—the charge to enlist their sympathies for a Moscow patriarchate. When the Serbs had obtained the restoration of their patriarchate of Peć at the insistence of Grand Vizir Mohammed Sokolović, the ecumenically minded patriarch was faced by the decision to recognize yet another autonomous patriarchate.

When Patriarch Jeremias II of Constantinople arrived in Moscow in 1588, he was forced to agree to the establishment of an independent patriarchate of Moscow and of the entire Russian tsardom (patriarchestvo moskovskoe i vsego rossiiskago czarstviia). The synod meeting in January 1589[12] nominated three candidates for the new office, of whom the tsar selected Metropolitan Job of Moscow, who was anointed and enthroned by Jeremias II on 26 January 1589 as the first Russian patriarch. At another synod the eparchies of Novgorod, Kazan, Sarai (Kruticy), and Rostov were elevated to metropolitanates. The ecclesiastical arrangement also included six archbishoprics and eight bishoprics whose borders were determined.

Tsar Fedor I and Boris Godunov forced Jeremias II to recognize the patriarchate by a synodal resolution of the other patriarchs. The synod in May 1590 in Constantinople[13]—in the absence of the patriarch of Alexandria, Silvester, who had died and whose successor had not yet been elected—approved the actions of Jeremias II and assigned to the Moscow patriarchate the fifth place in the ranks of the patriarchates (Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, Moscow). The tsar was not satisfied with this order; he claimed the third place. He further insisted that Meletios Pigas, the new patriarch of Alexandria, who had not entered his office until June 1590 and had protested the resolution, agree to this. Fedor I sent messengers to the four patriarchs with letters and gifts of money to persuade them to agree. In 1593 a synod in Constantinople finally announced the approval of all the patriarchs,[14] without, however, changing the ranking.

---

[10] K. Onasch, op. cit., 57; K. Onasch, op. cit., 29: Note 11 refers to the parallel he drew to Gallicanism as "Russian Gallicanism within Byzantine Orthodoxy." His examples represent a fertile hypothesis.

[11] A. I. Muravev, Snošenija Rossiis Vostokom do dělam cerkovynym I (St. Petersburg 1858), 151.

[12] A. Herman, op. cit., 57–58.

[13] W. Regel, op. cit., 85–91.

The establishment of the Moscow patriarchate in 1589 and its recognition by the whole of Orthodoxy did away with the special position usurped by the Russian Church since the middle of the fifteenth century and concluded its Slavonicization. The diarchy of ecclesiastical and secular rule, considered agreeable, was now represented by a tsar and patriarch who were dependent upon each other. According to the theory of the Third Rome, they stood side by side to act in concert for the salvation of the faithful entrusted to them. In point of fact, the patriarchs remained just as dependent on the tsars as had been the case with the Russian grand dukes and the Moscow metropolitans. Only under special circumstances did some of the eleven patriarchs (1589–1700) succeed in asserting themselves in the face of the tsarist autocracy and to strengthen the authority of the Church by dint of their powerful personalities.

Patriarch Job (1589–1605) was completely overshadowed by Fedor I and Boris Godunov. Following the extinction of the Riurik dynasty, there occurred the "Time of Troubles," during which the false Dmitri pretended to be a son of Ivan IV. With Polish help he conquered Moscow in 1605, deposed Job and elected Ignati, until then archbishop of Riazan, in his stead. (1605/06). After the assassination of Dmitri under the rule of Tsar Vasili IV Shuski (1606–10), Ignati had to make way for the metropolitan of Kazan, Germogen, who became patriarch from 1606 to 1612. When the Poles again advanced to Moscow in 1610, they threw Germogen into jail and reinstated Ignati as patriarch. Germogen on his part stirred up nationwide resistance against the Poles until the exterior threats and upheavals of Russia could be overcome by the election of Tsar Michail Romanov (1613–45).

The tsar's father, Fedor Romanov, who had assumed the name Filaret after he entered the monastery and who, as metropolitan of Rostov had been imprisoned by the Poles until 1618, had been designated for the office of patriarch. When he regained his freedom, he took over the highest church office in Russia (1619–33) whose affairs had been conducted by an administrator for seven years (1612–19). Until his death a constellation unique in Russian church history prevailed: father and son—both had the title of "Sublime Ruler" (velikii gosudar)—reigned together as patriarch and tsar. The Orthodox symphony of spiritual and secular power became a reality in this rule of two tsars (dvoeczarstvie) in which the two forces strengthened each other and gave a strange imprint to the idea of the Third Rome. The Moscow patriarchate was stabilized by the establishment of the archbishopric of Tobolsk in Siberia (1620), the reordering of the patriarchal administration within the structure of the state (1625), and the rejection of all Western infiltrations by the Roman Catholic Church, the Uniates, and the Protestants.

---

[14] A. Herman, op. cit., 40–41.

The next patriarchs Ioasaf (1634–40) and Iosif (1642–52) benefited from the heritage of their predecessor Filaret, even though the reign of Tsar Alexei (1645–76), who codified extant law in 1649, brought about a noticeable tendency towards subordination of the Church under the authority of the state. The establishment of a central government office for church affairs and the prohibition of acquisition of property by the Church initiated the deterioration of church privileges. Patriarch Nikon (1652–66)[15] attempted once again to achieve a status of priority of the Church over the state. In an appendix to the Epanagoge, a Byzantine book of laws written between 879 and 886 in which Patriarch Photios opposed the hegemony of the Emperor in the Eastern Church, Nikon developed an ideal of church autonomy: "To the tsar are entrusted the affairs of the body, to the clergy those of the souls . . . therefore the priesthood is far higher than the tsardom."[16] His recourse to Greek models is demonstrated as well by his re-edition of the collection of canon law of the Nomokanon (kormčaia kniga)[17] and in the improvement of liturgical texts in adherence to the Greek originals by correcting the deviations which had become custom in Russia. With this work he continued the views of Grecophile Russian hierarchs who expected to raise the cultural level of the clergy and ministry by contacts with the Eastern patriarchs. Nikon, who had met the patriarch of Jerusalem, Paisios, in Moscow received texts, among others "a ritual for the execution of the liturgy in the East by a bishop."[18] They were transmitted to him by the former ecumenical patriarch Athanasios III Patellaros, who had been in Moscow in 1653–54. In 1653 the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople, Paisios I, sent him a large volume containing the precise rules of the Greek Orthodox liturgy and descriptions of the holy implements and vestments.

---

[15] N. F. Kapterev, Patriarch Nikon i caŕ Michajlovič, 2 vols. (Sergiev Posad 1909–12); M. V. Zyzykin, Patriarch Nikon, 3 vols. (Warsaw 1931–38).

[16] A. V. Karešev, Očerki poistorii russkoj cerkvi II (Paris 1959), 195.

[17] A. Herman, op. cit., 23–33; H. Neubauer, op. cit., 134–35.

[18] I. Smolitsch, Mönchtum, 366.

With the help of these and other documents Nikon initiated his reforms. In an admonition to the Moscow clergy in 1653 he ordered the seventeen genuflections at certain prayers reduced to four and decreed the use of three instead of two fingers for making the sign of the cross.[19] Even these first few reforms on the Greek model created confusion in Moscow. The Moscow protopopes Avvakum (1621–82)[20] and Ivan Neronov protested against the innovations and appealed to the tsar as the protector of Orthodoxy. At the Moscow synod of 1653 Nikon had Neronov condemned, demoted, and banished to a remote monastery; Avvakum was sent to Siberia. At the Moscow synods of 1654, 1655, and 1656[21] the patriarch pushed through the adaptation of the liturgy to the Byzantine liturgy. He was supported by Serbian Patriarch Gabriel, Patriarch Makarios of Antioch and the representative of the ecumenical patriarch, Paisios I. Tsar Alexei acknowledged the reform resolutions, made them law, and recognized the penalties against protesting clerics, simultaneously trying to have them ameliorated. The close ties between the Moscow and Constantinople patriarchs opened political perspectives. Because the Treaty of Pereiaslaw of 1654 united the larger part of the Ukraine with Russia—since then Nikon had called himself patriarch of Greater Russia, Russia Proper, and Byelorussia—the avenue to Constantinople appeared open. At the occasion of his stay in Moscow the former ecumenical patriarch, Athanasios III Patellaros, had implied that the orthodox subjects of the sultan could place themselves under the protection of the tsar and encouraged him to "conquer Constantinople and to install his patriarch there as ecumenical patriarch."[22] There were distinct possibilities of the Third Rome uniting with the Second.

Nikon, allowed since 1654 to bear the title of velikii gosudar, like his predecessor Filaret, was administrator of the realm during the Russo-Polish War of 1654/55. His exaggerated self-assurance, the overemphasis of his position, above all the growing movement of the Old Believers, who considered the reforms[23] as interference with the blessed

---

[19] J. Chrysostomus, Die "Pomorskie Otvety" als Denkmal der Anschauungen der russischen Altgläubigen gegen Ende des l. Viertels des XVIII. Jh. (Rome 1957), 174–92; H. Koch, Schriften, 94–103.

[20] P. Pascal, Avvakum et les débuts du Raskol (Paris 1963), incl. biblio.

[21] A. Herman, op. cit., 60–61.

[22] A. M. Ammann, op. cit., 270.

[23] P. Hauptmann, Altrussischer Glaube. Der Kampf des Protopopen Avvakum gegen die Kirchenreform des 17. Jh. (Göttingen 1963).—Ibid., 86: Enumeration of the main components of Nikon's cultural reform: Text revision of agenda, the cross made with three fingers instead of two, three instead of two hallelujahs, orthography and pronunciation of Jesus ("Jisus" instead of "Isus"), reduction of liturgical bows to the ground, changes in the creed of Nicaea-Constantinople, five prosphorae instead of seven, reversal of direction of procession.

Russian tradition and consequently took up a fight against the state and the Church causing a schism (raskol)[24] within the Russian Orthodox Church unsolved to the present day, all these contributed to a break between him and the tsar in 1658. Nikon threatened his resignation, whereupon Alexei took away his title of velikii gosudar and convoked a bishops' synod in 1660 which was to issue a declaration that the patriarch had resigned his office voluntarily. When this attempt failed, Greek theologians were called in and expert opinions were requested from the four former patriarchs. At the great Moscow synod of 1666/67,[25] in which the patriarchs Paisios of Alexandria and Makarios of Antioch as well as numerous monks and Greek princes of the Church participated, Nikon was dismissed for refusing the opinion of the united Orthodox patriarchs, for restructuring valid canon law, and resigning unjustifiably. He had to retreat to a monastery as a simple monk and spend the last fifteen years of his life there (d. 1682). Nikon's attempt to upgrade the office of the patriarch had failed; the tsar had had his way. At the end of January 1667 the synod submitted a list of three possible candidates for a successor, of whom Alexei chose Ioasaf, the aged abbot of the Monastery of the Trinity near Moscow, to be the next patriarch. The fall of Nikon affirmed the priority of the secular ruler in church matters.

The last four patriarchs who were more or less appointed directly by the government could not stop this development. Ioasaf II (1667–72) followed the tsar's wishes in every way. To be sure, at the end of the great synod he advocated the rights of the Church and obtained an amelioration of the limitations put upon the ecclesiastical court jurisdiction in 1649, but had to recognize that the reform of the liturgy implemented by Nikon had actually been advised by the tsar. According to the records of Paisios Ligarides, a member of the Jerusalem patriarchate,[26] the position of the tsar within the Church was solved by a compromise according to which "neither of the two powers were to interfere in the affairs of the other. In secular matters the tsar was to prevail, the patriarch was to have priority in spiritual ones."[27] The resolutions of the synod honored the tsar as a new Constantine, Zealot of the faith, Defender of the true faith, Judge and Avenger for the Old

---

[24] V. V. Andreev, Raskol i ego značenie v narodnoj russkoj istorii (St. Petersburg 1870=Osnabrück 1965); J. Chrysostomus, op. cit., 1–34; V. Pleyer, Das russische Altgläubigentum (Munich 1960); P. Hauptmann, op. cit.

[25] A. Herman, op. cit., 63–64; cf. H. Neubauer, op. cit., 142–98, about the deposition of Nikon and its consequences.

[26] N. F. Kapterev, Patriarch Nikon II, 227–50.

[27] H. Neubauer, op. cit., 176.

Believers and the disobedient.[28] The Old Believers rejected their being condemned as a partisan and uncanonical act. The brotherhood of the Solovecki monastery on the Caspian Sea reasoned for their views in several petitions: it was convinced that the end of the world was immediately impending, since tsar and hierarchs had fallen from the old faith and had betrayed the charge of the Third Rome, while the members of the synod had interpreted the idea of the Third Rome according to their own opinions. The brotherhood did not accept the Archimandrite Iosif appointed by Patriarch Ioasaf II and elected its own superiors. The monks defended themselves passionately and resisted the troops called out against them from 1670 to 1676, when their monastery was finally stormed.[29]

After only seven months in office Patriarch Pitirim (1672–73) was followed by Ioakim (1674–90). Next to promoting strict monastic and Church discipline and rejecting all Western influences, he considered the implementation of the decisions of the 1666/67 synod one of his main tasks. This was shown at the bishops synod of 1675[30] and even more so at the synod of 1682,[31] which continued the development of liturgical reform and declared anew that the punishment of the Old Believers was a duty of the state. One of the first victims was the Protopope Avvakum, who ended at the stake in 1682. A religious conference at the beginning of the reign of Tsarina Sophia (1682–89), who took over the regency for her minor brothers Ivan V and Peter I after the death of Tsar Fedor II (1676–82), ended with draconic measures and the execution of the main speakers for the Old Believers. A ukase of 7 April 1685 ordered their prosecution and conviction as rebels and enemies of the state. In the following years thousands of them were executed; many evaded their persecutors by self-immolation. They rejected the actions of the state and the Church as being dictated by the Anti-Christ, idealized the past of the Russian Church, and as itinerant priests proselytized for their views. Two groups were now formed, those with priests (popovcy) and those without (bezpopovcy). The suppression of the raskol had serious consequences for Russian monkdom. Many monasteries which had hitherto been centers of religious life and literary production, now ceased to fulfill that function. Most of the monks, because they had joined the Old Believers and rejected the reforms decreed by the patriarchal Church and later on also by the government, were suspected to be enemies of the state.

---

[28] Ibid., 177–78.

[29] I. Smolitsch, Mönchtum, 374–81.

[30] A. Herman, op. cit., 64.

[31] Ibid., 64–65.

The synod of 1682 was also occupied with the moral and educational reform of the secular and monastic clergy. New bishoprics were established and the organization of the metropolitanates was tightened. In 1685 the metropolitanate of Kiev was incorporated in the patriarchate; in 1686 Patriarch Dionysios of Constantinople released it from his jurisdiction. This incorporation aggravated the tensions within the Russian Church because the academy founded by the Ukrainian metropolitan Peter Mogila (1633–47) in Kiev was prepared to engage in a discourse with Catholicism and the Counter Reformation. It also required a knowledge of Latin in addition to Greek and gained influence beyond its borders of the Ukraine in the second half of the seventeenth century. One of its pupils, Simeon of Polock (1629–80), who had been tutor of the princes in Moscow and had opened a Latin school, and his friend, the monastic priest Silvester Medvedev, spread the many-faceted intellectualism cultivated in Kiev to Moscow.[32] The fight between the conservative forces and those of the "Latinists" who were supported by the government came to a head during negotiations concerning the establishment of a university in Moscow.[33] Although a Slavic-Greek-Latin academy was founded in Moscow in 1687, Patriarch Ioakim prevailed at the Moscow Synod of 1689/90: the followers of the Ukrainian movement were demoted; Medvedev was convicted, laicized, and executed.[34]

The relative uniformity of Russian church life at the beginning of the patriarchate gave way to noticeable differentiations at the end of the seventeenth century.[35] Although publications on canon law, liturgy, and hagiography predominated, the revision of the liturgical books represented a new scientific contribution. The interior disputes with Ukrainian and Greek theologians led to a loosening of traditional ties. Baroque culture flowing from the Ukraine to Russia enriched church literature, architecture, painting, and music. The icon painter Simeon Ushakov (1626–86) made use of typically baroque emblematics, the icons show traces of individual portraiture. In architecture the traditional elements combined with Greek ideas and influences of the baroque. Polyphony was added to the customary homophonous singing. The Russian Church, then, received many impulses during the time of the first patriarchate, but these were rejected by the influential conservative circles that determined matters.

One of them was Patriarch Adrian (1690–1700). He tried once again to protect the privileges of the Church, but did not have the strength to prevail against Tsar Peter I,[36] who, together with his debilitated half-brother Ivan V (1689–96) and after the latter's death, ruled and restructured the realm as autocrat (1696–1725). Just as his predecessor Ioakim, Adrian was so steeped in tradition that the tsar's predilection for foreigners and his European trip (1697–98) were totally inconceivable to him. When Peter I returned from abroad in 1698 and ruthlessly proceeded against the revolt of the Streltsi, Adrian, paralyzed since 1696, asked him in vain to apply mercy; henceforth tsar and patriarch communicated only in writing. The patriarchal Church and the Old Believers were united in rejecting the new customs introduced by the tsar, as for instance the wearing of European clothes and shaving of beards. Peter I did not refrain from parodying and scorning church ceremonies. His church policies[37] were an integrated part of his desire, shaped by rationalism and the philosophy of early Enlightenment, to reform the realm. His reforms were aimed at the commonweal (vsenarodnaia polza)—albeit interpreted by him in an arbitrary fashion—and for this he made use of the Church as well. While he took into account the ties of his people with the Orthodox faith, he nonetheless considered the Church no more than an institution for moral education, which he wanted to implement by legal norms instead of religious commandments. During his travels through Catholic and Protestant countries he had become familiar with the dependence of the Churches upon secular authority. He was determined to subordinate the Church to the state in Russia as well.

---

[32] A. M. Ammann, op. cit., 346–55.

[33] H. Neubauer, op. cit., 204–21.

[34] A. Herman, op. cit., 65.

[35] Jugie I, 558–78; K. Onasch, op. cit., 77–87.

The Dissolution of the Patriarchate and the Establishment of the Holy Synod

The death of Patriarch Adrian on 16 October 1700 meant the end of the autonomous patriarchal administration. Peter I arbitrarily interfered in church affairs. He did not allow the election of a new patriarch. Two months later he simply appointed Stefan Javorski (1658–1722),[38] metropolitan of Riazan, to the position of administrator and regent of the patriarchate. He was given the supervision of ecclesiastical matters, the right of nomination to fill vacant bishoprics—they amounted to a total of twenty-three—and the surveillance of opponents of the Church, especially the Old Believers, whereas the overseeing of church properties was handed to the Office of Monasteries (1701–20); church judicature was considerably curtailed. The tsar thought that Stefan Javorski, a former professor of the Kiev academy who had occupied himself with polemical theology and had lectured at the Moscow Academy in 1697/98, would be open to his plans.

---

[36] R. Wittram, Peter I. Czar und Kaiser. Zur Gesch. Peters des Großen in seiner Zeit, 2 vols. (Göttingen, 1964).

[37] H. Koch, Die russische Orthodoxie im Petrinischen Zeitalter (Breslau 1929); R. Stupperich, Staatsgedanke und Religionspolitik Peters des Großen (Königsberg/Pr.-Berlin 1936); R. Wittram, "Peters des Großen Verhältnis zur Religion und den Kirchen," HZ 173 (1952), 261–96; I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 57–75.

[38] J. Šerech, "Stefan Yavorsky and the Conflict of Ideologies in the Age of Peter the Great," SEER 30 (1951–52), 40–62.

Initially they collaborated in the mission to the pagans and Mohammedans[39] and in the struggle against the Old Believers. In 1703 Stefan Javorski had dealt with them in an essay, "The Signs of the Appearance of the Antichrist and the End of the World."[40] But he was soon chagrined by several significant measures of the tsar's. The latter confiscated monastic revenues to finance his army; he practiced tolerance towards the Protestants, granting them freedom of conscience and autonomous rights when he annexed the Baltic provinces; he appointed Pastor Barthold Vagetius superintendent of the Lutheran congregations in Russia, and, finally, he subordinated the Office of Monasteries to the "Reigning Senate" created in 1711, which became the supreme supervisory office, usurping all administrative and judicial functions. In 1712 Javorski used a sermon to take a stand against the church policies of Peter I and his marriage to Katharina (Catherine) Skravronka, later Tsarina Catherine I: "You stormy sea of man's transgressions of the law, why do you break and devastate the shores? The shores are God's law; since its creation it has consisted in not coveting the wife of one's neighbor and in not leaving one's own . . ."[41] In 1689 the tsar had separated from Evdoxia Lopuxina, mother of Tsarevich Alexei, and decreed that she enter a convent. In the same sermon, Stefan Javorski also expressed his sympathies for the heir to the throne who did not agree with his father's methods of governing. As a consequence Javorski was prohibited from giving sermons for the period of three years. His polemics against the Protestant circles of Moscow and the army surgeon Dimitri Tverentinov, who represented Calvinistic views, led to a summons before the Senate. When the physician Foma Ivanov, a follower of the surgeon, hacked apart some icons, the patriarchal regent had a bishops' synod in 1714 sentence him to death at the stake. The tsar, outraged by this action, forced Stefan Javorski into humiliating apologies. Henceforth the latter did not dare express his opinions freely. But he put them down in his "Rock of Faith, Dedicated to the [39] J. Glazik, Die russisch-orthodoxe Heidenmission seit Peter dem Großen (Münster 1954); idem, Die Islammission der russisch-orthodoxen Kirche (Münster 1959).

---

[40] I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 80.

[41] Ibid., 87.

Sons of the Holy Orthodox-Catholic Eastern Church for their Strengthening and Spiritual Edification, but as Support and Betterment for Those who Perceive it as a Stumbling Block."[42] In this manuscript dedicated to Tsarevich Alexei he maintained that the Church was superposed over the state: "Tsars are the guardians of the laws of God and of the Church, but they are not legislators; it is not theirs to determine what should be part of the faith."[43]

When the conflict between the tsar and his son caused a trial in 1718 against Alexei and his followers, the investigation extended to ecclesiastic dignitaries, who were made answerable for the widespread opposition and an alleged conspiracy. Stefan Javorski advocated a pardon, but was unable to avert the death penalty. The opposition between the patriarchal regent and Peter I, whose founding of Saint Petersburg (1703) had created a symbol for the Russia changed by him, had become unbridgeable. Church life was paralyzed more and more each year by the incursions of the autocrat. In 1714 he prohibited the building of new churches for ten years in favor of the construction of Saint Petersburg, elevated in 1712 to be the capital. In 1716 the Senate ordered the bishops to bind themselves by oath to deal mildly with the opponents of the Church, to employ clerics and sacristans only when needed, and not to interfere in secular affairs. In 1717 the tsar demanded of all confessors that they tell him personally all news of attempts directed against the state. In 1718 he ordered Feofan Prokopovich (1681–1736)[44] to draft a "Description and Evaluation of an Ecclesiastical College," intending to direct the central authority of the Church according to his ideas and to incorporate it in the total administration of the state.

Feofan Prokopovich was one of the most important Russian theologians of the first half of the eighteenth century. Although he referred to certain basic ideas of Protestantism and tenets of the Enlightenment, he tried to combine the Byzantine heritage and Moscow tradition with the demands of his time. After his studies at the Kiev Academy he had temporarily become a Basilian monk and successfully passed a course in Catholic Scholastic philosophy at the Greek College of Saint Athanasius (1698–1701). On his way back through Switzerland and Germany he had met Calvinist and Lutheran theologians. In 1704 he became an Orthodox monastic priest and soon rose to the position of professor

---

[42] K. Onasch, op. cit., 100.

[43] R. Stupperich, Staatsgedanke, 51–52.

[44] R. Stupperich, "Feofan Prokopovič in der neueren Lit." Festschrift für Margarete Woltner zum 70. Geburtstag, P. Brang et al., eds. (Heidelberg 1967), 284–93; H.-J. Härtel, Byzantinisches Erbe und Orthodoxie bei Feofan Prokopovič (Würzburg 1970, incl. biblio.).

(1706) and then rector (1711) in the academy. In 1716 the tsar, who had known him personally since 1706, called him to Saint Petersburg as his adviser and in spite of reservations on the part of the patriarchal regent succeeded in having him appointed bishop of Pskov in 1718.

After his sermon concerning the power and honor of the tsar on 6 April 1718, the basic ideas of which he deepened in 1722 in his essay "The Right of the Monarchic Will," the collaboration between him and the tsar became closer. Its product was the Spiritual Regulations (duxovnyi reglament), which made the Russian Church a part of the order of the state and placed at its head the Holy Synod as a state institution.[45] The text drafted by Feofan Prokopovich in 1720 was corrected by Peter I and submitted to the Senate for its information and for all bishops to sign. It regulated church supervision, church education, the order of Mass, appointment to church offices, the ecclesiastical court and the administration of church property. The tsar's manifesto of 25 January 1721[46] made the council form of government of the Church stipulated in the regulations its basic law and decreed that the Ecclesiastical College could not do anything without his approval. In the first meeting of 14 February 1721 Feofan Prokopovich gave the opening speech based on John 15:16, stressing the decisive role of the monarchic will. At this meeting the designation "Ecclesiastical College" was changed into "Most Holy Governing Synod." It was composed of eleven members who received princely salaries. Saint Petersburg was designated as the seat of this office. Peter I appointed Archbishop Stefan Javorski first president and Bishop Feofan Prokopovich second president. When Javorski, who could not stop this development and whose protests were disregarded, died in 1722, the tsar did not appoint another president but transferred the authority to Prokopovich as vice-president. In April 1722 the Holy Synod issued supplements to the regulations concerning the monastic system. Men could not be vested as monks anymore until the age of thirty; women were prohibited from being vested until the age of fifty to sixty.

On 11 May 1722, Peter I—to whom the Senate had given the title of Emperor (imperator) and the sobriquet "the Great" (Velikii) in 1721—installed within the Holy Synod the office of a chief procurator corresponding to the procurator general in the Senate. Subordinate to the will of the tsar, who simultaneously made him head of the chancery of the synod, he was to have full supervision of the synod "as Our eyes and administrator of the business of the state."[47] J. V. Boltin, colonel of the dragoons, was the first chief procurator (1722–25). His successors were elevated to the rank of ministers in the nineteenth century and became key figures of the Russian established Church. Under the direction of its vice-president, the Holy Synod attempted to return the Old Believers to the Church by means of words of exhortation; it took steps to reform the monastic system and to make it useful to the state, to improve the education of the people, and to raise the level of knowledge of the clergy. Feofan Prokopovich composed a "First Instruction for Boys,"[48] a catechism for children which had to be read to all the congregations four times a year. He also expanded the Alexander Nevski Monastery in Saint Petersburg into a model seminary.

---

[45] I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 99–132.

[46] Mansi XXXVII, 1–99; A. Herman, op. cit., 80–83; I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 103–05.

[47] R. Stupperich, Staatsgedanke, 86.

It was not easy for the members of the Holy Synod to explain to the Orthodox clergy within and without Russia its role as a bishops' synod, able to invoke Orthodox traditions, and its functions as an organ of the state. The Holy Synod had the legislative, executive, and judicial power within the church government which had earlier rested with the Moscow patriarchate. It tried to calm the bishops with the following message: "The synod has the honor, authority, and power of the patriarchs, if not more so, because it is a council (sobor)."[49] The petitions of the liturgy henceforth mentioned the Holy Synod instead of the patriarchs. The commemoration of the other patriarchs was to cease, lest it create the impression that the Holy Synod was below them. When Stefan Javorski raised an objection, he was outvoted. The tsar took it upon himself to inform Patriarch Jeremias III of Constantinople of the new church order in Russia and asked him in turn to communicate it to the other three patriarchs of the East. But in his devoutly phrased letter of 30 September 1721 he did not mention the content of the regulations, which he designated merely as "Instruction." He also kept silent concerning the incorporation of the Holy Synod into the collegiate system of state administration and the subordination of the Church to the supervision of the state. Furthermore, he changed the text of the manifesto of 25 January 1721 in several places.[50] In 1723 the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch recognized the "Most Holy Governing Synod" as "Holy Brother in Christ,"[51] only Patriarch Chrysanthos Notara of Jerusalem refused his approval. Aside from the one-sided information they had received, the decisive factor in obtaining their recognition was the patriarchs' dependence on Russian subsidies because they were under Turkish domination.

---

[48] Ibid., 92–93. Cf. the list of works by Feofan Prokopovič, H. J. Härtel, loc. cit., 13–14.

[49] I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 124.

[50] Ibid., 107–8; R. Wittram, Peter I. Czar und Kaiser II, 192–93.

[51] Kartašev II, 363–67.

The uncanonical installment of the Holy Synod meant the complete dissolution of the Moscow patriarchate. The Russian Orthodox Church became the Orthodox Church in Russia. To be sure, it continued to be connected with the other Eastern Churches in its teachings, the celebration of its liturgy and sacraments, but received a new structure in its relation between Church and state by virtue of the abolition of the earlier dual rule of tsar and patriarch and its subordination to the state. The decrees of the Holy Synod were published in the name of the tsar, by order of His Imperial Majesty. The harmonious collaboration between state and Church aligned for centuries according to the symphonious Byzantine model was part of history. Dostoevski's acerbic judgment that "the Church has been in a state of paralysis since Peter the Great,"[52] is exaggerated. But in the history of the Russian Church the establishment of the Holy Synod meant the beginning of the dictatorship of the established Church (gosudarstvennaia czerkovnost).

The Russian Established Church under the Holy Synod

The Holy Synod was the instrument by which the state subjugated the Church in the eighteenth century. Its members, reduced to four in 1730 and fluctuating between three and eight in the following decades, possessed the legislative, administrative and judicial power. The administrative offices of the Holy Synod prepared all decisions for the conferences usually taking place twice a year. The directives of the ruler were decisive in everything; the chief procurators appointed by them merely received orders.

Under Catherine I (1725–27) the Holy Synod was placed under the "Supreme Secret Council" established in 1726. Archbishop Feodosi Janovski of Novgorod, having shortly before criticized the tsarina's church policies, was demoted and banished to a monastery on the Caspian Sea as an ordinary monk. Feofan Prokopovich, promoted to archbishop of Novgorod in 1725, had to fight for his leadership position in the Holy Synod during the reign of Peter II (1727–30), the son of Tsarevitch Alexei, because the great families protecting the young tsar again declared Moscow the capital of Russia and permitted discussion of a possible restoration of the patriarchate stimulated by some princes of the Church. In 1728 Archbishop Lopatinski of Tver published the "Rock of Faith" written by Stefan Javorski, in which the basic attitude of Feofan

---

[52] F. M. Dostojevskij, Dnevnik pisatelja. Sobranie sočinenij V (St. Petersburg 1885), 356.

Prokopovich was suspected as Lutheranism. The first edition was quickly out of print; the second was sent to all bishops and abbots in 1729.

After the death of Peter II, under the reign of Anna Ivanovna (1730–40), a niece of Peter the Great, Archbishop Prokopovich again obtained dictatorial powers. He removed from the Holy Synod three members who had been supporters of the nun Evdoxia Lopuxina, the first wife of Peter I, for the succession to the throne. He also proceeded against all people who had favored the dissemination of the "Rock of Faith." The Metropolitans Georgi Dashkov and Ignati Smola were stripped of their ecclesiastical office and dispatched to separate monasteries as ordinary monks; Archbishop Lopatinski was divested of his bishopric after a three-year pretrial arrest (1738) and taken to the fortress of Vyborg. Feofan Prokopovich cast suspicion on his adversaries as enemies of the state; he packed the Holy Synod, by now subordinated to the cabinet of ministers, with men whom he trusted and intensified the dependence of the Church upon the state. He punished bishops and abbots if they resisted government regulations, such as total obedience to monastic legislation. When he died in 1736, the arbitrary rule of the tsarina and her favorite, Duke Ernst Johann von Biron, interfered even more in church matters. In 1737 all church officers between the ages of fifteen and forty with the exception of priests and deacons were drafted into the army. Conscription even reached into the monasteries. These and other measures, making it problematical to enter a monastery, reduced the number of monks and nuns from approximately twenty-five thousand to hardly fourteen thousand.[53] In 1738 the Holy Synod had to hand the College of Economics over to the jurisdiction of the Senate, with the result that all church property revenues flowed into the state exchequer. The tsarina ostensibly represented herself as a benefactress of the total Orthodox Church. In 1732 she established a budget for gifts of charity, granting the patriarch of Constantinople an annual 1000 and the other patriarchs 100 rubles each. Other beneficiaries were the Balkan Slavs, the Athos Monasteries, and the Georgians.

After the short interregnum of the minor Prince Ivan VI and the regent Anna Leopoldovna (1740–41) the oppressed situation of the Church improved temporarily at the beginning of the reign of Tsarina Elizabeth (1741–61), a daughter of Peter the Great. She granted freedom to several bishops and returned the administration of the properties of the Church and monasteries to the Holy Synod. Basically she continued the church policies of her father. The chief procurator, Prince Shakovskoi (1742–53), and his successors made sure that the interests of the state were safeguarded; they prepared for the secularization of all church property. The mission among the Mohammedans of the Volga region, suppressed under Anna Ivanovna, was now promoted by the state. For the period 1743 to 1747 the "Office for the Newly Baptized" registered 217,258 baptisms, from 1748 to 1760 another 192,606,[54] which could only be brought about by forcible measures. Thus mosques in places cohabited by Christians and Mohammedans were destroyed. In the province of Kazan 418 of 536 Islamic places of worship were leveled, in the province of Tobolsk 98 of 133, in Astrakhan 29 of 40.[55] In Siberia conversion to Christianity was promoted with the promise of economic favors. The increase in the number of souls by almost a half million may have strengthened the self-assurance of some bishops, to be sure, but the necessary expansion of the church organization—in 1753 there were thirty bishoprics with about 18,000 parishes—was limited to mere outward appearances. The edition of the Holy Scripture, a revision of the 1581 edition in Church Slavonic of the Ostrog Bible after the Greek original text, which was published by the Holy Synod in 1751, and the exhortations of some princes of the Church against the incursions of ideas of the Enlightenment were unable to stop the process of the Church being pushed more and more from public life. Moscow University and its branches, founded in 1755 (see Chap. 18), did not include a theological faculty.

---

[53] I. Smolitsch, Mönchtum, 389: there were 7,829 monks and 6,543 nuns around 1740.—The number of monastics receded even more in the second half of the eighteenth century; cf. I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 713: in 1764 to 7,659 monks and 4,733 nuns, in 1796 to 4,160 monks and 1,671 nuns.

Over the following decades the Church lost the last vestiges of its autonomy. The infantile Peter III and his ambitious wife Catherine II (née princess of Anhalt-Zerbst), who pushed him aside and usurped the throne, continued the subjugation of the Church under the yoke of the state. Peter III, the son of Tsarina Anna and Duke Karl-Friedrich of Holstein-Gottorp, reigned for only half a year (1761–62). He did not have the slighest understanding of the special character of the Orthodox Church. The president of the Holy Synod, Archbishop Dimitri Seshchenov of Novgorod, was expected to remove all icons except those of the Redeemer and the Blessed Virgin, to abolish the monasteries, and make the clergy adopt the dress of Protestant ministers. Complete control by the state over all church property was introduced by the reinstatement of the governmental College of Economics and the inventorying of all monastic estates.

---

[54] J. Glazik, Heidenmission, 79.

[55] J. Glazik, Islammission, 87.

To be sure, Catherine II (1762–96) designated herself "Orthodox Empress," but was guided mainly by the spirit of the French Encyclopedists, with whom she corresponded. She deliberately and stubbornly completed the church policies of Peter I.[56] Even prior to her coming to power she had jotted down the following maxim: "Respecter la religion, mais ne la faire entrer pour rien dans les affaires d'État."[57] Once empress she called herself "chef de l'église grecque" or "chef de son église."[58] At times she referred to the bishops as "people being part of the administration of the state, subject to the will of the monarch as well as to the Gospel."[59] Chief procurators, such as J. J. Melessino (1763–68), who suggested the abolition of fasting, abbreviation of the Mass, and facilitation of divorces, and P. P. Shehebyshchev (1768–74), an avowed atheist, gradually made the Holy Synod comply with the wishes and demands of the tsarina.

At the very beginning of her reign Catherine II appointed a commission to deliberate the problem of the Church properties. The result was the secularization law of 26 February 1764, which ordered all properties to be transferred to the Office of Economics. Four hundred eighteen monasteries were dissolved; the budget for all bishoprics, churches, and monasteries, whose number was further decreased in the following years, provided for three different income scales. At first the process of secularization included only the monastic institutions of Greater Russia; after the special status of the Ukraine was phased out in 1786 and 1788, it was extended to the southwestern territories as well. Aside from a very few other clerics only one prince of the Church, Metropolitan Arseni Masejevich of Rostov (1742–63), who had earlier proved his courage by a paper opposing the wrongs done to Stefan Javorski, dared protest publicly against the nationalization of church property. When he prophesied the destruction of Church and piety in two petitions to the Holy Synod, whose members he characterized as "mute dogs" who "look on without barking,"[60] he was tried by a synodal court in 1763, stripped of his consecration as bishop and priest, and banished to a remote monastery. Shortly thereafter he also lost his monastic status and was condemned to life in prison at the fortress of Reval, where he died in 1772.

The established Orthodox Church bowed to the will of the Tsarina in all matters. This was manifest in the preparation of a new legal code and the expansion of the system of higher education. The religious academy in Moscow, being refused any connection with the university, and the seminaries were so meagerly supported that the Church was reduced more and more to the liturgical realm. All the while Catherine II represented herself as guardian of the Orthodox faith. In the peace treaty with Turkey in 1774 she obtained protectionary rights over the Orthodox faithful in the principalities of Moldavia and Walachia. The "Greek Project,"[61] a plan to restore the Byzantine Empire under a Russian secundogeniture, pursued visions of even greater scope, which could not, however, be realized.

---

[56] I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 247–72, 346–56.

[57] Ibid., 251.

[58] Ibid., 252.

[59] A. M. Ammann, op. cit., 405.

[60] I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 264.

In the second half of the eighteenth century the Church—in a condition of total dependence on the state since Peter I—was endangered from within by the advances of rationalism, the Enlightenment and Freemasonry. Some princes of the Church sought to avert the infiltration by means of compromise, such as the Moscow metropolitan Platon Levshin (1773–1812). He went back to the works of Feofan Prokopovich, whose views were prevailing at the Moscow Academy, and himself published sermons and catechetical works. The number of bishops and monks who deliberately concentrated on the religious core of their tasks was small. One of them was Bishop Tixon of Voronezh (1763–67), who withdrew to the monastery of Zadonsk and, as a hermit and religious writer, radiated great influence.[62] Another was Metropolitan Gavril Petrov of Saint Petersburg (1770–1801), who oversaw the printing of the Church Slavonic translation of the Philokalia (dobrotoliubie). The translator Paisi Velichkovski (1722–94)[63] renewed the "altruistic" current of monasticism, represented by Nil Sorski around 1500, and revived the institution of monastic elders (staretsy), which led the Russian monasteries out of the crisis of the closing eighteenth century. Such personalities of high profile were exceptions in the Orthodox Church of Russia at the time of Catherine II. The condition of the Church was characterized by the process of secularization, through which it had lost the major part of its self-support for its charitable and social tasks. The schism of the Old Believers continued. The government tried to move those who followed official church dogma to recognize the established Church and was prepared to tolerate separate customs for its concession. But it also took harsh measures when it deported twenty thousand Old Believers who had settled on the Dnepr island of Vjatka to Siberia. The "priestless" Old Believers split up in numerous groups. New sects were formed, such as the Chilysty, Skoptsy, Milk-Drinkers (molokany) and Dukobors, who separated from the established Church and—although they were small in numbers—were troublesome to the Holy Synod.

---

[61] E. Hösch, "Das sogenannte 'griechische Projekt' Katharinas II.," JGO n.s. 12 (1964), 168–206.

[62] I. Kologriwow, Das andere Rußland (Munich 1958), 288–326.

[63] Ibid., 326–39.

Paul I (1796–1801) considered the Church an ally in his fight against the consequences of the French Revolution. He called the welfare of its servants "one of the main duties of the imperial rule"[64] and made the expansion of church schools possible so that four Church academies and forty-six seminaries were in existence at the end of the eighteenth century, but he considered the clerics civil servants, as had his mother Catherine II. He was the first to award medals to the bishops, thereby tying the already pliant ecclesiastic princes even more firmly to the state. Even as heir apparent he had a religiously embellished concept of an autocrat feared and honored by his subjects "because he is the image of the Most High."[65] In the law of succession drafted in 1797 he had himself designated "Head of the Church."[66] He chaired the Holy Synod and claimed supreme supervision of the established Church; he appointed and transfered bishops according to whim. The designation of the tsar as "Head of the Church" was the culmination of the development of centuries and sealed the state's domination of the Orthodox Church of Russia.

Protestants and Catholics in Russia

The population of Russia at the time of Peter the Great is estimated at approximately 14 million,[67] most of whom were of the Orthodox faith. The attitude of the patriarchal Church towards the Lutheran congregations which had formed in the course of the seventeenth century was negative. When the number of Protestant immigrants grew considerably at the beginning of the eighteenth century, especially after the Edict of Solicitation and Toleration by Peter I (16 April 1702) and the annexation of the Baltic provinces, the state issued special regulations for them.[68] In 1721 the Holy Synod was given control over all congregations. In addition to ministering to the Orthodox it became responsible for the administrative and judicial problems of the Lutherans, Calvinists, Catholics, and Jews as well. The individual Protestant congregations were dependent upon themselves and had no higher administrative office. Only the church organizations in Livonia, Estonia, and Finland had their own central administration which represented their interests to the state. The congregations had to announce the election of their clergy and the prepositors to the Holy Synod for confirmation. The prepositors had to affirm their loyalty to the tsar by oath. In turn they took the oath from all pastors and submitted pertinent documentation with their signatures. The Holy Synod had to give its approval for the opening of new churches and the establishment of church schools. The College of the Judiciary, founded in 1718, and its department for Livonian and Estonian affairs extended its authority to include supervisory power over the Protestant Church. In spite of ostensible recognition the Protestants had to obey the repeated prohibition against proselytizing (1702, 1723, and 1735).[69] Special advantages were promised to those who converted to the Orthodox faith. In her manifesto of 22 July 1763, Catherine II solicited new settlers from Germany and western Europe for the Volga regions. She promised them free exercise of their religion, but prohibited clerics of non-Orthodox Christian faiths from attempting to convert Russian subjects to their faith.

---

[64] I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 274.

[65] Ibid., 142.

[66] Ibid., 142–44.

[67] Ibid., 9. By 1762 the population increased to 19 million and reached ca. 41 million in 1812.

[68] J. C. Grot, op. cit. I–III; R. Stupperich, ed., Kirchenordnungen der evangelisch-lutherischen Kirche in Rußland (Ulm 1959); G. Langer, "Zuständigkeitsabgrenzungen für die christlichen Kirchen Rußlands in der Gesetzgebung des 17. bis zum Anfang des 19. Jh." ZSavRGkan 46 (1960), 452–470; E. Amburger, Geschichte des Protestantismus in Rußland (Stuttgart 1961, incl. biblio.); I. Smolitsch, Geschichte, 129–32.

While the Protestants in Russia—in spite of subordination to the Holy Synod and subsequent limitations—were tolerated by the government and in part furthered, the situation of the Catholics of the Latin and Uniate Rite was oppressive.[70] Following the split between the Western and Eastern half of Christianity in the Middle Ages, an anti-Catholic prejudice had developed in Russia; it became even more pronounced after the Unions of Florence and Brest, which rejected the papacy and condemned Roman efforts at union as interference in the rights of the Orthodox Church. The repeated conquests of Moscow at the beginning of the seventeenth century were connected with the Catholic Counter Reformation and strengthened the distrust of everything Catholic. The Jesuits who had come to Moscow in the retinue of foreign legations in 1684 were expelled in 1689.[71] Although they returned after a few years as legation priests of Emperor Leopold I, their ministry was severely limited to Catholic immigrants; they were again expelled in 1719.[72] Their place was taken by Capuchins and Reformists, who were given scant possibilities to function and were, moreover, suspected of espionage.

---

[69] G. Langer, op. cit., 460, 462, 466.

[70] J. C. Grot I–II; A. Theiner, Die Neuesten Zustände der Katholischen Kirche beider Ritus in Polen und Rußland seit Katharina II. bis auf unsere Tage (Augsburg 1841); D. Tolstoy, Le catholicisme romain en Russie, 2 vols. (Paris 1863–64); R. Ryšavy, "Die Reformatenmission in Rußland," AFrH 27 (1934), 179–224; A. V. Florovský, Čeští Jesuité na Rusi (Prague 1941); A. M. Ammann, op. cit., 373–75, 409–10, 441–47, 457–63; J. Reinhold, Die St. Petersburger Missionspräfektur der Reformaten im 18. Jh. (Florence 1963); B. Stasiewski, "Die kirchliche Organisation der deutschen katholischen Siedler in Rußland," Festschr. für Margarete Woltner zum 70. Geburtstag (Heidelberg 1967), 270–83.

Peter I, who—after his visit to the Sorbonne in 1717—had ordered an opinion from Feofan Prokopovich and Stefan Javorski regarding prospects of a union between the Russian and Catholic Churches, kept up a good personal relationship with several Catholics in his service, among them Vice-Admiral Matvei Zmaevich and the architect Carlo Bartolomeo Rastelli. But he showed a clear dislike for the Uniate Catholics whom he encountered during his campaigns in White Russia and Lithuania. He was angered by the fact that of the four Orthodox bishops in the southeast of Poland-Lithuania three (of Przemyśl, Lemberg, and Tuck) had joined the Union of Brest (1691 and 1702). In 1706 he had the Uniate, formerly Orthodox Bishop Dionysius Zabrokricki of Łuck forcibly taken to Russia, where he died in jail in 1715. Shortly before this incident, in 1705, there had been a verbal dispute between Peter I and some Basilian monks which ended with five monks being beaten to death.

When the Catholics, along with all other non-Orthodox Christians, were placed under the authority of the Holy Synod in 1721, there were mainly German, French, Italian, and Polish immigrants involved. The suppression of the Orthodox in Poland-Lithuania in the first half of the eighteenth century increased anti-Catholic sentiment in Russia. In 1746 and 1760 Tsarina Elizabeth allowed the Austrian auxiliary troops freedom of their religion only because she had to. In 1747 the Capuchins on mission work in Astrakhan were expelled. As a result of the settlement manifesto of 1763 about six thousand German Catholics came to the Volga region of Saratov. They were permitted to build churches, but monasteries and conversion among members of other Christian faiths were forbidden to them.[73] Disputes among Catholics in Saint Petersburg who were of different nationalities and subsequent appeals to the government led to the establishment of the Livonian department of the College of the Judiciary as their office of appeal. It drafted a set of regulations for the Catholic congregations which was published in 1769. It put the Catholics under state supervision and granted the laity a decisive influence in the election of the clerics.

---

[71] A. V. Florovský, op. cit., 149–67.

[72] Ibid., 320–27.

[73] R. Ryšavy, op. cit., 185.

After the Counter Reformation had prevailed in Poland-Lithuania and Catholicism as the national religion had relegated the other Christian faiths to a minor role,[74] Catherine II contrived to have her favorite, August Poniatowski, placed on the Polish throne (1764–95). Through her ambassador Nikolai Vasilevich Count Repnin she repeatedly interfered in the ecclesiastic affairs of her neighbor to prevent reforms initiated by prominent clerics. In 1767 she had the Bishops Kajetan Sołtyk of Crakow and Józef Andrzej Załuski of Kiev arrested and deported to Russia because they resisted her demands. The Polish partitions (1772, 1793, and 1795) caused large segments of the Catholic population to come under Russian rule. The tsarina found a willing helper in the person of the former Calvinist Stanisław Siestrencewicz-Bohusz (1731–1826),[75] who through her protection rose from suffragan bishop in Vilna to metropolitan of Mogilev, an archbishopric created by her. The new archbishopric to which all Catholic parishes were attached had to follow the Regulations of 1769. Only the Jesuits were able to preserve a certain amount of independence after their order was officially dissolved by Clement XIV (1773), because they willingly placed themselves at the disposal of the new rule in the capacity of teachers. The protest by Nuncios Giovanni Andrea Archetti and Lorenzo Litta notwithstanding, all Catholic church property in the areas occupied by Russia were secularized.

Catherine II proceeded ruthlessly against the Uniate Catholics.[76] With the exception of the archbishopric of Polock all Uniate bishoprics were dissolved. Moral force and police measures recombined the Uniates with the Orthodox. Those who dared protest were convicted as rebels. When the Uniate metropolitan of Kiev, Feodosi Rostovski, traveled to Saint Petersburg in order to protest, he was not allowed to return. The bishops of Chelm and Vladimir and the coadjutor of Łuck tried in vain to obtain help from the Curia. The Basilian order was secularized, its monasteries and property confiscated. The church policies of Catherine II cost the Uniate Church 8 million faithful, 9,316 parishes, and 145 Basilian monasteries from 1773 to 1796. In the region of Polock, too, government pressure became unmistakable. In a pastoral letter of 3 November 1795, Archbishop Heraklius Lisowsky had to announce that no one was allowed to put obstacles in the path of those who wished to convert to the Orthodox faith.

---

[74] B. Stasiewski, Reformation und Gegenreformation in Polen (North Rhine-Westphalia 1960); idem, "Tausend Jahre polnischer Kirchengeschichte," Kirche im Osten 10 (1967), 48–67, especially 55.

[75] A. A. Brumanis, Aux origines de la hiérarchie latine en Russie Mgr Stanislas Siestrzencewicz-Bohusz (Louvain 1968).

[76] J. Madey, Kirche zwischen Ost und West (Munich 1969), 100–10.

Under Paul I there was at first some amelioration. The former Warsaw nuncio, Lorenzo Litta, participating as papal legate in the crowning of the tsar in 1797, submitted a memorandum concerning the desperate situation of the Uniate Catholics and the wishes of the Pope for improving the relationship between the two rites in Russia. The tsar did not accede to any negotiations, but he did revoke the dependence of the Catholics on the Department of Livonian and Estonian Affairs, decreed at the beginning of his reign, and instead subordinated them to a special department of the College of the Judiciary. Of his own accord he ordered six suffragan bishoprics to be incorporated in the archbishopric of Mogilev, recognized the Uniate archbishopric of Polock, and reestablished the dissolved Uniate bishoprics of Łuck and Brest in order to calm the unrest that had broken out in Wolhynia and White Russia. In November 1798 he issued a reglament for the Catholic Church of the Latin and Uniate Rites. After expelling Lorenzo Litta he appointed Archbishop Stanisław Siestrencewicz-Bohusz as head of the Catholic Church in Russia. A ministerial instruction explained the decree by saying that the complete "outward aspect" of the Church was claimed by the state and only the "religious aspect" was part of the Pope's supremacy.[77]

Parallel to the development in western, central, and southern Europe, where the system of established Churches had to a large extent prevailed, the absolute claim of the state's leadership over the Church had become a reality in eastern Europe as well. Neither the Orthodox Church nor other Christian faiths could avoid this development.

---

[77] A. M. Ammann, loc. cit., 461.

CHAPTER 14

The Autonomous and the Uniate Churches in the East

After the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453 the Ottoman Empire reached the zenith of its power under Selim I (1512–20) with its expansion to Syria and Egypt and under Suleiman I (1522–66) with advances into southeastern Europe, the Mediterranean, and Asia, which made its sphere extend from Algeria and Tunisia to the Persian Gulf. In the seventeenth century a gradual decline set in brought about by interior crises as well as pressure from the Republic of Venice, the Habsburgs, Poland-Lithuania and the rise of Russia. The Sultans succeeded in spreading the Islamic faith to the Bulkans and in consolidating it in their empire, which spanned three continents.[1] The Koran was considered binding not only as a religious code but it also shaped the empire's political and cultural life. The "infidels" who did not embrace the faith of Mohammed were reaya ("grazing herd") and had to pay a head and property tax to the sultan. They had limited rights and were merely tolerated. The Moslems as representatives of the ruling religion designated the heretical religious communities as millet. This concept goes back to the Koran designating the Jews (Abraham's millet). In Turkish the word underwent a secular change coming to mean "nation." Thus the Orthodox Christians were combined in the rum millet, the Monophysite Christians in the ermeti milleti, which also included the Armenians, Copts, and Jacobites. A religious head (millet bashi) was responsible for the independent administration of these various bodies; he was directly under the sultan. The ecumenical patriarch, whose title the Greeks freely translated as "Ethnarch," was the most prominent. He could stabilize his ecclesiastical power by adaptation to the sultanate. The interests of the small groups of Catholics of the different Uniate rites and the even smaller ones of the Latin Rite, especially in the Holy Land, were represented by the Pope, French diplomats, and after the seventeenth century also by the German Emperor. Some Orthodox Churches were financially and politically supported by the Russian government. These factors contributed to the fact that the Ottoman Empire, imbued with the Islamic faith, guaranteed certain rights to individual Christian communities. But to a large extent the Eastern Churches, whether separated from or connected with Rome, were exposed to the caprice of the sultans and their officials. Consequently there were a great many defections from Christianity to Islam.

The Autonomous Eastern Churches

The constituents of the autonomous Eastern Churches were the four Eastern patriarchates of Christian antiquity,[2] the patriarchates in Bulgaria and Serbia, established in the Middle Ages, the Moscow patriarchate (founded in 1589),[3] the Orthodox Churches on Cyprus and Mount Sinai, the Eastern national Churches of the Orthodox Georgians, the Nestorians, and the Monophysites; among the latter we have to differentiate between the Churches of the Jacobites, the Christians of St. Thomas, the Copts, Ethiopians and Armenians.

---

[1] G. Vismara, Bisanzio e l'Islam, per la storia dei trattati tra cristianità orientale e le potenze musulmane (Milan 1950); T. Papadopoulos, Studies and Documents Relating to the Greek Church and People under Turkish Domination (Brussels 1952); B. Homsy, Les capitulations et la protection des chrêtiens au Proche-Orient aux XVI^e, et XVII^e, et XVIII^e siècles (Harissa 1956); A. Bombaci, "Das osmanische Reich," Historia Mundi VII (Berne 1957), 439–85; A. Fattal, Le statut légal des nonmusulmans en pays d'Islam (Beirut 1958); W. E. D. Allen, Problems of Turkish Power in the XVIth Century (London 1963); A. J. Arberry, loc. cit. II, 1–362; Atlas zur Kirchengesch. (Freiburg 1970), maps 72 and 96A.

[2] W. de Vries, Die Patriarchate des Ostens, bestimmende Faktoren bei ihrer Entstehung: I patriarcati orientali nel primo millenio (Rome 1968), 13–36.

The Orthodox Churches

Of the four Eastern patriarchates the youngest, Constantinople, achieved a leading position around the middle of the fifth century, a position it was able to maintain into the modern period. The appointment of Patriarch Gennadios Scholarios by Sultan Mehmed II in 1454 changed the harmonious balance, which had existed for a millennium between the Emperors and the patriarchal Church in Byzantium, into a state of dependence dictated by the state. Each newly elected patriarch had to request recognition by the sultan, for which he had to pay considerable sums of money. From the end of the fifteenth century on he also had to pay annual taxes, a large part of which he could only cover by selling ecclesiastical offices. In each case the official written recognition returned to the patriarch stipulated his authority. As the responsible head of the Orthodox population the patriarch was granted judicial and police powers on the basis of the millet system. By virtue of his political function as ethnarch he was considered governor of the sultan with the rank of a pasha. The disadvantages of such close ties to the Porte were evident in the fact that the patriarch's position was very insecure. Of the 162 "Archbishops of Constantinople, the New Rome, and Ecumenical Patriarchs" (their official title since 588) reigning at the time of the Ottomans, only 22 died in office.[4] Many of them—especially in the seventeenth century—were dismissed by the sultan and reinstalled,[5] some were executed at his order. As a result their average time in office between 1453 and 1821, the beginning of the Greek war of liberation, was only two and a half years. In the period from 1625 to 1700 the patriarchate was filled fifty times; in the eighteenth century there were 48 patriarchs in the course of seventy-three years.

After the Hagia Sophia was changed into a mosque, the patriarchs designated the monastery of Pammakaristos as their patriarchal church and relocated their see to the buildings of the monastery (1456–1586). Because the environs were inhabited almost exclusively by Turks they

---

[3] See Chap. 13.

[4] F. W. Fernau, op. cit., 73.

[5] Patriarch Cyril Lucaris even seven times: 1612, 1621–23, 1623–30, 1630–33, 1633–34, 1634–35, 1637–38. After his last dismissal he was strangled by Turkish soldiers on his way to the fortress of Rumelī Hisārī.

found a temporary abode in the palace of the prince of Walachia. Around 1600 they located their see in the Phanar, the Greek part of the city, where they raised the Church of Saint George to the status of patriarchal church. The Phanar was comparable to the Vatican. The great synods were convened in the Phanar; all matters were decided in the presence of as many archbishops and bishops as possible and the synods were frequently attended by the other Orthodox patriarchs or their representatives. The laymen involved in the administration of the Church rose to become the influential segment of the so-called Phanariots, who strengthened the Ottoman government in Moldavia and Walachia and strove for the Hellenization of the Orthodox Church on the Balkan peninsula.

The move to independence on the part of the Russian Patriarchal Church under Patriarch Jeremias II (1589), the Union of Brest (1595/96), the actions of the Curia to win over the Orthodox faithful, evidenced by the founding in Rome of colleges for the Eastern Churches, the appearance of Jesuits and Capuchins in Constantinople and other places forced the Orthodox Churches to counter Roman propaganda for the union and her mission policies. In the period of renewal within the Catholic Church and the time of the Counter Reformation, the Protestants had sought contacts with the Orthodox Church.[6] The scholarly Ecumenical Patriarch Cyril Lucaris (1624–38, with four brief interruptions),[7] who had been present at the Synod of Brest (1596) as representative of the patriarch of Alexandria and who had also been patriarch of Alexandria (1602–20), took from the works of Calvin arguments for use in his fight against Rome. He hoped that the creation of a united front of Orthodox and Calvinists would bring about a union in the true faith. His relationship with Cornelius Haga, the Dutch ambassador to Constantinople (1621–39), and with Antoine Léger, predicant at the Dutch embassy (1628–36), deepened his knowledge of Protestant confessional writings. He wanted to reform the Orthodox Church and to this end composed a Confessio fidei, which was published in Geneva first in Latin (1629) and then in a Greek translation (1633); in addition, one English and four French translations appeared simultaneously.[8] In this creed Cyril Lucaris relinquished important dogmas of the Eastern Church; he embraced the doctrine of the sola scriptura, denied the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, expressed regret at the veneration of icons, and called the invocation of the saints idolatry. The opposition against Cyril Lucaris was led by Metropolitan Contares of Berhoia, who took the former's place several times as Patriarch Cyril II (1633, 1635–36, 1638–39).[9] Contares was supported by the Vatican, as well as by French and imperial diplomats. The accusation that Cyril Lucaris had initiated treasonous connections with the tsar led to his fall; he was condemned to death. Three months later, on 24 September 1638,[10] his Confessio fidei was rejected by a large synod in Constantinople in which patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria and Jerusalem, twenty-one metropolitans and twenty-four other clerics took part. In 1640 Metropolitan Petrus Mogilas of Kiev drafted a Confessio orthodoxa which argued against the Calvinist views of Cyril Lucaris and represented the Orthodox point of view. Translated by the Greek theologian Meletios Sygiros from Latin into Greek, it was accepted by all the Eastern patriarchs at the Synod of Jassy in 1642 and the Synod of Constantinople in 1643.[11] The initial attempts by Cyril Lucaris to renew the Orthodox Church, to cleanse it of alleged falsifications by "papist innovations," and to bring about an approach to Protestantism had failed. The reorganization of the patriarchate of Constantinople, the establishment of a printing shop, and the translation of the New Testament into the Greek vernacular were stopped in their initial stages; only the planned educational reform of the priests was developed further at a later time. He failed in his attempt to involve the Phanar in the complicated maneuverings of European diplomacy along with the Sublime Porte, the Vatican, and the Catholic and Protestant powers in order to influence the presence and future development of Christianity. The ecumenical patriarchate remained in a state of dependence on the sultanate. Cyril II Contares was dismissed in 1639, arrested, deported to North Africa, and strangled in 1640.

---

[6] E. Benz, Wittenberg und Byzanz. Zur Begegnung und Auseinandersetzung der Reformation mit der östlich-orthodoxen Kirche (Marburg 1949).

[7] R. Belmont, "Le patriache Cyrille Lukaris et l'union des églises," Irénikon 15 (1938), 342–63, 535–53; G. A. Hadjiantoniou, Protestant Patriarch. The Life of Cyril Lucaris (1572–1638), Patriarch of Constantinople (London 1961); G. Hering, Ökumenisches Patriarchat und europäische Politik 1620–1638 (Wiesbaden 1968; biblio.)

[8] G. Hering, op. cit., 188; also cf. Jugie I, 505–7.

Under supervision by the government, the subsequent patriarchs made efforts to preserve their jurisdictional sphere and to consolidate it in present-day Albania, Yugoslavia, Bulgaria, Rumania, and Greece. By 1700 they were at the head of sixty-three metropolitans, eighteen exempt archbishops, and seventy bishops. Whereas the Slavic languages dominated the Balkans in the sixteenth century, the new upper class promoted Greek. Initially the Greek-speaking families furnished the higher ecclesiastical dignitaries, but after the seventeeth century the bishops were almost exclusively Greek. The Phanar, meanwhile, aimed at eliminating the autonomy of the Balkan Orthodox Churches. In 1766 the Serbian patriarchate of Ipek was abolished; in 1767 the autocephaly of the Bulgarian archbishopric of Achrida was dissolved by Sultan Mustafa III and incorporated in the ecumenical patriarchate and Hellenized by it. The Turkish designation of its dominion in Europe as Rumeli, Land of the Rum (Greeks), appeared justified. Patriarch Samuel Khanzeris (1763–68, 1773–74), a Phanariotic parvenue whose brother, the governor of Walachia, was recalled and executed by the Sultan for extortion, attempted to lessen the influence of the Sublime Porte on the election or appointment of the patriarchs by forming a college of councilors. But he could not keep the rival Greek families from increasing the dependence of the patriarchate upon the sultan by calling upon him as a referee in their fight for political and ecclesiastical positions.

---

[9] G. Hering, op. cit., 427.

[10] Mansi XXXIV, 1719–21.

[11] Ibid., XXXIV, 1629–38; Jugie I, 508–9; G. Hering, op. cit., n. 103.

The dependence of the ecumenical patriarchs on the government of the Ottoman Empire merely guaranteed outward security. The life of the Church was unable to develop. The threat of the death penalty for conversion to Christianity, the ban against building new churches, the apostasy of Orthodox faithful to Islam were dangerous implications. In the face of these, the patriarchs made efforts to improve the education of the priests; Cyril Lucaris (1627), Samuel Khanzeris (1767), Gregorios V (1798), and others set up printing shops. But the Orthodox heritage of the forefathers was primarily preserved by the monasteries. The monks and recluses on Mount Athos,[12] whose privileges were not touched by the Turks and were, in fact, expanded with the help of the Russian Tsars and Emperors, formed a religious center which was supported by the whole Orthodox Church. Their abbots did not shy away from traveling to the West asking for money, as did Abakum Andriani, abbot of Iberon, at the beginning of the eighteenth century.[13] The Athonias School near the monastery of Vatopädi had been planned as an academy; its director, Eugenios Bulgaris (1753–57), made a name for himself as editor of Greek authors and as a controvertist, but because of the resistance of numerous monks against all higher education the school did not flourish.

The patriarchs of the four Eastern sees had the title "Father and Shepherd, Pope and Patriarch of the Great City of Alexandria of Lybia, Pentapolis, Ethiopia, Father of Fathers, Shepherd of Shepherds, Bishop of Bishops, Thirteenth Apostle and Judge of the World." But even at the end of the sixth century the glory of the Alexandrian Church of Christian antiquity faded when most of the faithful joined a form of [12] Le millénaire du Mont Athos 963–1963, études et mélanges, 2 vols. (Chevetogne 1964); P. Huber, Athos. Leben, Glaube, Kunst (Zurich 1969).

---

[13] H. de Greeve, "Neue Quellen zur ersten Reise des Athosabtes Abakum Andriani in Westeuropa," OstKSt 16 (1967), 325–33.

Monophysitism under its own Coptic patriarch. Copts and Melchites (from the Syrian malko), as the Orthodox followers of the Byzantine Emperor were called, were equally oppressed by the Arabs. The dependence on Byzantium of the Melchite Orthodox patriarch of Alexandria, whose following was further decreased by anti-Christian government measures, brought with it the displacement of the stately old Alexandrian liturgy by the Byzantine liturgy. From 1209 to 1316 the patriarchs resided in Constantinople; they were represented in Alexandria by a deputy. After the fall of the imperial city many Greeks fled to Alexandria. Following the conquest of Egypt by Sultan Selim I, Patriarch Joachim Pany (1487–1567) established good relations with the Turkish rulers, but under his successors the patriarchate deteriorated into total dependence on the Sublime Porte and the ecumenical patriarch. Initially the patriarchs took up residence in Constantinople while an archimandrite ministered to the faithful, who were reduced to a mere five thousand in the eighteenth century. Several patriarchs of Alexandria played a fairly important role in the Phanar. Among them were Meletios I Pegas (1590–1601), who administered the ecumenical patriarchate in 1597/98; the already mentioned Cyril Lucaris (1602–20); Gerasimos Startaliotes (1620–1639), who founded the first Greek schools in Cairo and Alexandria and maintained connections with the Moscow patriarchate and the Anglican Church; Paisios (1657–77) who took part in the Moscow Synod of 1666 against Nikon; and, lastly, Samuel Kapasulis (1710–23).

At the time of the Arab rule and the Ottoman Empire, the patriarchs of Antioch also depended strongly on the patriarch of Constantinople. At the end of the thirteenth century they relocated their residence to Damascus, the capital of the Arab caliphate. After the conquest of Syria by Sultan Selim I in 1516 they had to submit to the Turks, whose taxation added greatly to the debt of the patriarchate. Patriarchs Joachim V (1584–87) and Makarios III (1647–72) made trips to Russia for the purpose of soliciting gifts of money. In the course of the seventeenth century, Jesuits and Franciscans achieved some success in their efforts regarding union. In 1683 Archbishop Euthymios of Sydan and Tyre embraced Catholicism. He initiated the establishment of an independent Uniate Melchite patriarchate (1724), which was joined by many Orthodox faithful. In 1718 Archbishop Euthymios was excommunicated by Ecumenical Patriarch Jeremias III and then arrested by the Sultan, but Louis XIV brought about his release. From 1724 to 1851 the Phanar made sure that only Greeks would hold the office of patriarch. Among the Arabic-speaking people they competed for influence with the Monophysites and the Uniate Catholics.

The island of Cyprus, originally under the patriarchate of Antioch,[14] preserved its autocephaly, recognized by the Council of Ephesus, for over a thousand years throughout all political and ecclesiastic disorders into the sixteenth century. When the Turks occupied the island in 1571, they introduced the millet system and appointed the archbishop as ethnarch of all the Greeks living there. They suffered greatly under the oppressive new rule, especially in the seventeenth century. The Synod of Leukosia (1668) under Archbishop Nikephoros condemned the Calvinist views of Patriarch Cyril Lucaris. Being isolated, the archbishops again reestablished a connection with the patriarchs of Antioch, from whom they received the Holy Myron in 1860.

After 1543 the patriarchate of Jerusalem, too, was occupied exclusively by Greeks. After Selim I incorporated Palestine into the Ottoman Empire, they were politically and ecclesiastically under the influence of Constantinople. Since they were leading the "Brotherhood of the Holy Sepulchre," the sultan granted them full jurisdiction over the holy places in Jerusalem and Bethlehem; this was contested by several other Christian communities. Patriarch Germanos Peloponnesios (1534–79) and many of his successors made frequent trips to the centers of Orthodox Christendom collecting funds for the places of pilgrimage. In addition, the ecumenical patriarchs and the ecclesiastical princes of Moldavia and Walachia also extended their efforts towards the preservation of those places. Some patriarchs made serious efforts to gain possession of the holy places. Among them were Patriarchs Theophanes III (1608–44), Paisios (1645–60), Nektarios (1660–69), and Dositheos II (1669–1707),[15] who enjoyed great esteem among the whole Orthodox Church. He established a Greek press with which to counter the propaganda of the Roman and Uniate Catholics. At a synod in Bethlehem-Jerusalem in 1672[16] he had the rejection of the Confessio fidei by Cyril Lucaris reasserted; the rejection was seconded by a synod in Constantinople the same year.[17] The struggle over the holy places was continued by Patriarchs Chrysanthos (1707–31) and Parthenios (1737–66). They succeeded in regaining possession of the places of pilgrimage, administered since 1689 by the Franciscans. At the beginning of the seventeenth century the patriarchate comprised six metropolitans, seven archbishops, and one bishop. Most of them lived in Jerusalem, four in their small eparchies, and one in the monastery on [14] Hippolytos, "Die Autokephale Apostolische Orthodoxe Kirche Cyperns," Ekklesia X 117–29.

---

[15] A. Palmieri, Dositeo, Patriarca greco di Gerusalemme (Florence 1909).

[16] Mansi XXXIV, 1651–1776; Jugie I, 509–10.

[17] Mansi XXXIV, 1777–90.

Mount Sinai. The patriarchal school established in 1736 intensified its activities under Patriarch Anthimos (1788–1808).

Closely connected to the patriarchate of Jerusalem was the small Orthodox church on Mount Sinai. It was led by an archbishop who at the same time was abbot of the Monastery of Saint Catherine.[18] Its monks received letters of safe passage from Sultan Selim I and his successors. The monastic buildings adjacent to the church and protected by a wall against attacks by the Bedouins contained a famous library with valuable Greek, Georgian, and Slavic manuscripts, as well as a pinacotheca with old icons. Its abbot-archbishop cultivated good relations with the patriarchs of Alexandria and Jerusalem and with the Orthodox Greeks on the island of Crete. The monks of Mount Sinai built a school in Herakleion on Crete among whose graduates were Alexandrian Patriarch Meletios Pegas and the painter Domenicos Theotokopoulos (1548–1614), known as El Greco. Because the patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch contested each other's jurisdiction over the archbishopric of Sinai, the Synod of Constantinople declared the church autocephalic in 1575; this ruling was recognized by all Eastern patriarchs in 1782. Each abbot of Sinai was consecrated as bishop by the patriarch of Jerusalem.

While the Church on Mount Sinai in the south of the Ottoman Empire gained its independence, the Bulgarian and Serbian Churches on the Balkan Peninsula lost theirs. Since the early Middle Ages the Byzantine Church had achieved great successes in its mission there. During the periods of 927 to 1018 and 1235 to 1393 the Orthodox Bulgarians had their own patriarchate with the residence in Achrida and Trnovo respectively. After the conquest of Bulgaria by the Turks in 1393 they were placed under the archbishopric of Achrida, which became ever more dependent on the ecumenical patriarchate in the centuries which followed.[19] Bulgarian rebellions (1595 and 1688) against the Turkish rule heightened the tensions between the monasteries adhering to the national traditions and the upper clergy installed by the Phanar. By order of Sultan Mustafa III the archbishopric was incorporated into the patriarchate of Constantinople in 1767; the books in Church Slavonic were removed and replaced by Greek ones. The Bulgarian language was suppressed by the Greek hegemony; the church administration was completely in the hands of Greeks. The same sort of development took place in the principalities of Moldavia and Walachia, where the Rumanian liturgical language began spreading after 1648, but the Greek influence nonetheless remained decisive after the eighteenth century.

---

[18] H. L. Rabino, Le monastère de Saint-Catherine du Mont Sinai (Cairo 1938).

[19] I. Snĕgarov, Istorija na ochridskata archiepiskopija-patriarsija ot padeneto i pod turcitĕ do nejnoto unišoženie 1394–1767 (Sofia 1931); A. P. Péchayre, "L archevêché d'Ochrida de 1394 à 1767," ÉO 35 (1936), 183–204, 280–323; S. Zankow, "Die Bulgarische Orthodoxe Kirche in Gesch. und Gegenwart," IKZ 48 (1958), 189–208.

The Serbian Church also lost its independence. In 1219 it had been granted its own archbishopric and in 1351 its own patriarchate in Peć (Ipek); in 1459 it was placed under the jurisdiction of the archbishopric of Achrida. In 1557 Grand Vizier Mehmed Sokolović, a Serb converted to Islam, reinstated the patriarchate and appointed his brother, the monk Makarios, patriarch of Ipek. For the next two centuries Serbs and Greeks fought for this office, which the sultan gave to those who offered the most for it.[20] From 1690 to 1765 a total of fourteen patriarchs succeeded one another, continually increasing the debt of the patriarchate from one decade to the next. The emigration in 1690 of thirty thousand Serbian families led by their patriarch Arsenije III into areas taken from the Turks by the Habsburgs and the emigration of a similar number under their patriarch Arsenije IV caused the Phanar to intensify its efforts to place only dependable Greeks in the patriarchates and the bishoprics. In 1766 Patriarch Samuel Khanzeris of Constantinople finally induced Sultan Mustafa III to abolish the Serbian patriarchate. It was combined with the metropolitanate of Prizren and incorporated in the ecumenical patriarchate. Several Serbian hierarchs turned to Tsarina Catherine II for help, but were unable to obtain relief. All bishoprics were subsequently filled by Greeks. The only exception was the metropolitan of Cetinje in Montenegro, whose princes had wrung some degree of independence from the Ottoman rule and established close connections with Russia. He managed to avoid the incorporation, and as a result the Orthodox Church of Montenegro became autocephalic.

The abolition of the national Serbian and Bulgarian Churches in 1766 and 1767 placed all Christian subjects of the sultanate in Europe under one uniform ecclesiastical administration. The ecumenical patriarch promoted the use of Greek for the Mass in every part of the patriarchate; he had Greek schools established and consolidated his position throughout the Ottoman Empire.

Only one numerically strong autocephalic Orthodox Church remained, the Greater Church of Georgia,[21] which had separated from the patriarchate in the early Middle Ages and formed a catholicate at the end of the seventh century. The Byzantine rule in the eleventh century produced an accommodation with the Church of the Byzantine Empire for which the adoption of the Byzantine liturgy in the Georgian language was symbolic. After the collapse of political independence in the late Middle Ages, Turks and Persians fought for Georgia, the larger part of which came under Persian supremacy. But the majority of the population remained Orthodox and resisted the Islamization by their rulers, although defections to Turkish tribes near Batum and on the coast of the Black Sea did occur and a so-called third faith, a mixture of Christian, Islamic, and heathen ideas, started spreading. The catholicos was dependent on the benevolence of the Persian governor. When Catholicos Jesse became susceptible to overtures by the Capuchin and Theatine friars regarding union, he was dismissed by a synod in 1755. King Erekle II of East Georgia (1744–98) sought closer connections with Orthodox Russia in order to decrease his dependence on Persia. His treaty with Catherine II (1783) initiated the eventual annexation by Russia. In 1801 Tsar Alexander I declared western Georgia and in 1803 all of Georgia to be Russian provinces. Catholicos Antonios II had to abdicate and go to Russia. The catholicate was dissolved and the Georgian Church was entrusted to a Russian exarch (1817) who had his residence in Tiflis. The construction of Russian monasteries in Georgia was intended to add to the number of the Russian Orthodox faithful.

---

[20] N. Djordjević, Die Selbständigkeit der Serbischen Kirche (diss., Berne 1922); A. Hudal, Die serbisch-orthodoxe Nationalkirche (Graz and Leipzig 1922), 21–38; L. Hadrovics, Le peuple serbe et son église sous la domination turque (Paris 1947); C. Jelavich, "Some aspects of Serbian Religious Development in the eighteenth Century," CH 23 (1954), 144–52; V. Pospischil, Der Patriarch in der Serbisch-Orthodoxen Kirche (Vienna 1966), 32–45.

[21] M. Tamarati, L'Église Géorgienne (Rome 1910); M. Tarchnišvili, "Die Entstehung und Entwicklung der kirchlichen Autokephalie Georgiens," Kyrios 5 (1940–41), 177–93; C. Toumanoff, "Introduction to Christian Caucasian History," Tr 15 (1959), 1–104.

The Oriental National Churches of the Nestorians and Monophysites

The Nestorian Church,[22] whose missionary work had spread its faith to Persia, Turkestan, Tibet, Mongolia, China, and to the Malabar Coast in India during the Middle Ages, was confined by the Mongols, especially Timur Lane (1360–1405), to the mountain regions of Northern Kurdistan and Persian Azerbaijan on Lake Urmia.[23] The Nestorian catholicos, i.e., patriarch, who had resided in Baghdad from 750 to 1258 moved his see to the monastery of Rabban Hurmuz near Mosul. Since the middle of the fifteenth century it had become customary to have nephew follow uncle in the catholicate. But after the death of Patriarch Simon VII bar Mamma, part of the clergy and laity refused to recognize his nephew Simon VIII Denha (1551–59) and instead elected John Sulaga, abbot of the monastery of Rabban Hurmuz. But the latter could not be consecrated for lack of an authorized Nestorian metropolitan. So John reestablished ties to the Curia, which had been fashioned by the Nestorians in the high and late Middle Ages. He went to Rome, embraced the primacy and the Catholic creed, was consecrated bishop in 1553 and proclaimed patriarch of the Chaldeans by Pope Julius III. When he returned home, he was arrested by the Turks, rulers of the land of the Euphrates and Tigris since 1534. He died a prisoner in 1555. In 1672 Simon XIII Denha separated from that Uniate patriarchate with its seat in Diarbekr west of the upper Tigris and founded his own, the so-called Mountain Nestorian patriarchate, with the residence in Kotschannes in Kurdistan. The old Nestorian patriarchate also remained; its faithful—in contrast to the Uniate Chaldeans—were called Assyrians. Defections by Uniate patriarchs to Nestorianism and back increased the confusion among the Nestorians (comprised of about forty thousand families).

---

[22] Atlas zur Kirchengesch. (Freiburg 1970), map 27.

[23] A. R. Vine, The Nestorian Churches (London 1937); B. Spuler, "Die nestorianische Kirche," Hdb. der Orientalistik, Abt. 1, VIII/2 (Leiden and Cologne 1961), 120–69; P. Kawerau, "Die nestorianischen Patriarchate in der neueren Zeit," ZKG 67 (1955/56), 119–31; A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 237–302.

Among the Monophysite communities there were the Churches of the Jacobites of western Syria, the Christians of Saint Thomas, the Copts, Ethiopians and Armenians.

The Jacobite Syrian Church,[24] having flourished in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, was divided in the late Middle Ages and split into four rival centers which suffered under the oppression of the Mongol Timur Lane. In 1495 Ignatius XII Noah (1483–1509) was able to reunite the patriarchate. But his successors, who had resided in Amida since 1555 and in Aleppo since the seventeenth century, had a mere twenty bishoprics under their jurisdiction; the number of faithful was estimated at fifty thousand families in 1583. The majority of them inhabited Tur-Abdin in the Izla Mountains, where their survivors are living even now. The existence of the Church was further weakened by successful efforts at union during the second half of the seventeenth century. Yet the Church experienced some growth when it was joined by Uniate Nestorians in South India during the patriarchate of Ignatius XXIII (1662–86). But the lack of seminaries for priests and monks prevented development of the Jacobite Syrian Church in the eighteenth century.

The Nestorian faithful in South India were called Surjani (Syrians) because of the language of their cult. They called themselves Christians of Saint Thomas after the Apostle Thomas.[25] Their bishops were ap-

---

[24] P. Kawerau, Die jakobitische Kirche im Zeitalter der syrischen Renaissance (Berlin 1955); B. Spuler, "Die westsyrische (monophysitische/jakobitische) Kirche," Hdb. der Orientalistik, Abt. 1, VIII/2 (1961), 170–216; A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 167–235.

[25] E. Tisserant, Eastern Christianity in India. A History of the Syro-Malabar Church from the Earliest Time to the Present Day (London, New York and Toronto 1957); B. Spuler, pointed by the Nestorian catholicos. The union effected under Portuguese rule in the sixteenth century and the decisions of the Synod of Diamper (Urdiamperur) near Cochin in 1599 met with considerable resistance. Archdeacon Thomas Palakomot, having protested unsuccessfully in Rome (1637) against the destruction of most of the Nestorian liturgical books and also against the Latinization of his Church, established contacts with the Nestorian, Jacobite, and Coptic patriarchs, asking them to furnish a bishop. In 1653 twelve priests declared him their Metropolitan Mar Thomas I by the laying on of hands. He is assumed to have been legally consecrated ex post facto by the Jacobite Bishop Mar Gregorios of Jerusalem. In an open letter he asserted the correctness of the Syrian faith and rite as opposed to the Catholic Church. The majority of the approximately two hundred thousand Christians of Saint Thomas joined him; only a small percentage remained obedient to the Portuguese Roman Catholic Archbishop Franciscus Garcia (1641–59).[26] Mar Thomas I started the line of metropolitans of the Christians of Saint Thomas who subordinated themselves to the western Syrian patriarchate. Mar Thomas II (1670–86) and Mar Thomas IV (1688–93) were able to offset Nestorian attempts at reconversion and solidify the Monophysite Church organization with support by the western Syrian patriarchs. Their struggle for autonomy progressed during the eighteenth century, but so did efforts at union by the Jesuits and Carmelites. By 1770 their Church comprised about fifty thousand faithful in thirty-two parishes under Metropolitan Mar Thomas VI, who assumed the name Mar Dionysios I (1765–1808) after his consecration in 1772.[27] That same year a congregation in the north of the Christian area which did not recognize the dependence on the western Syrian patriarchate defected and declared itself the autonomous Church of Annur. The fact that a considerable segment of the original Nestorian Christians of Saint Thomas changed to Monophysitism proves that the latter had more charisma than the Nestorian Church of the seventeenth century. Metropolitan Mar Dionysios I, who came from an aristocratic Catholic family but had been educated by his Monophysite uncle Mar Thomas V, repeatedly negotiated union

---

"Die Thomas-Christen in Süd-Indien," Hdb. der Orientalistik, Abt. 1, VIII/2 (1961), 226–39; P. J. Podipara, Die Thomas-Christen (Würzburg 1966); N. J. Thomas, Die Syrisch-Orthodoxe Kirche der Südindischen Thomas-Christen (Würzburg 1967); A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 357–88.

[26] K. Werth, Das Schisma der Thomaschristen unter Erzbischof Franciscus Garzia (Limburg a.d. Lahn 1937).

[27] J. Kollaparambil, "Mar Dionysius the Great of Malabar, for the One True Fold," OrChrP 30 (1964), 148–92.

with the vicar apostolic of Malabar. In 1799 he reembraced Catholicism, but reverted to Monophysitism after another six months.

The Coptic Church of Egypt, consisting of six million Christians in the early Middle Ages, called kibt (Copts) by their Arabian conquerors, lost in importance in the further course of the Middle Ages because of internal conflicts and anti-Christian measures by their Islamic rulers, especially the Mamelukes. By about 1400 they were a mere tenth in an Arab population embracing Islam. Under Turkish rule from 1517 to 1798,[28] which installed Mameluke governors in Cairo, the patriarchs residing in Cairo were unable to stop the deterioration of theological education and the decline in the number of their faithful. These were estimated at a mere one hundred fifty thousand around 1700. Most of their once flourishing monasteries had been either dissolved or had disintegrated. The Turkish government prevented contacts with other Monophysite Churches, such as the Egyptian Church, all of which were prosecuted as being dangerous to the state. In the second half of the eighteenth century the Coptic Church was indebted to the politically influential and wealthy Gauhari family for generous gifts. Ibrahim Gauhari had old Coptic manuscripts copied and given to several churches restored by him. Under Marcus VIII (1796–1809) the Coptic patriarchate showed the first signs of a renewal which was to continue throughout the nineteenth century. He relocated his residence to the property deeded to the Church by Ibrahim Gauhari in Ezbikije, a suburb of Cairo, where he rebuilt the old monastery church of Saint Mark, which had been burned in street fighting with the French in 1798.

The established Monophysite Church of Ethiopia[29] was dependent on the Coptic patriarch, who delegated to it a metropolitan as its abuna (our father). One of his tasks was to anoint the king (negus). The most prominent position next to him was occupied by the abbot of the monastery of Dabra Libanos; in his capacity as court confessor he was given the title of etschege (the one standing next to the assistant of the throne) in the fifteenth century. He was the one who supervised all monastic property. The Church's ties to its mother Church were not very close because of the spreading of the Islamic faith in Egypt and Nubia. Black tribes advancing from the periphery into the interior of the country increased its isolation. When new attacks by Islamic princes took place at the beginning of the sixteenth century and the Ottomans of Massaua in Eritrea threatened to shake the state structure of Ethiopia in 1527, Negus Lebna Denghel (1508–40) sought help from the Pope and the King of Portugal, who in turn was seeking bases in order to secure naval passage around Africa to his possessions in India. With the help of the Portuguese the negus and his successors managed to vanquish the fanatical Islamic invader Ahmad ibn Ibrahim al Ghazi, who had destroyed many churches and monasteries. The Jesuits who had come into the country with the Portuguese were later expelled by Negus Claudius (1540–59). Half a century later Negus Atnas Sagas (Za Denghel) was converted to Catholicism by the Jesuit priest Pedro Páez (1569–1622) just before he died. Páez also persuaded the former's successor, Malak Sagad III (Susenyos) (1607–32), to conclude a union. The abuna's protests against the union and against the patriarch of Ethiopia, Alonso Mendes, who had been designated by King Philip IV of Spain and recognized by Pope Urban VIII, and the rebellions against the Latinization of the Ethiopian Church by the Portuguese forced the negus to abdicate. His successor, Fasiladas (Basilides) (1632–67), canceled the union and imposed the death penalty on Catholic clerics who entered the country. The stirrings of union in the Ethiopian Church were reflected in various writings of the period in the colloquial language of Amharic. After its ties with the Coptic Church were restored (1632), translations of theological and legal works from the Arabic (of which there had been earlier evidence) increased, but ended in the eighteenth century as a result of civil wars and wars with the Hamitic nomads. In the seventeenth century the issue, discussed as early as the Middle Ages in rival monastic schools, of whether Jesus Christ received his divine nature at birth or later at the baptism on the Jordan (unctio, anointment) created the two parties of the Uniates and Unctionists. Around 1740 a third group maintained that Jesus was "anointed," "anointment" and "the anointed" in one. These and other Christological disputes extended into the nineteenth century. In the process there was no lack of mutual accusations of the Arian, the Nestorian, and the Cryptocatholic heresies. There were turbulent disputations and temporary predominance of one or the other current of thought, leading to victory by the abuna, a provincial prince, or the negus, often after bloody battles. But the basic Monophysite concept proved stronger in the end than all the quarrels concerning the interpretation of the one nature of Christ, and the unity of the Ethiopian Church remained intact.

---

[28] R. Strothmann, Die Koptische Kirche in der Neuzeit (Tübingen 1932); M. Cramer, Das christlich-koptische Ägypten einst und heute (Wiesbaden 1959); S. Chauleur, Histoire des Coptes d'Égypte (Paris 1960); B. Spuler, "Die koptische Kirche," Hdb. der Orientalistik, Abt. 1, VIII/2 (1961), 269–308; A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 99–101; A. J. Arberry, op. cit. II, 423–53.

[29] H. M. Hyatt, The Church of Abyssinia (London 1928); B. Spuler, "Die äthiopische Kirche," Hdb. der Orientalistik, Abt. 1, VIII/2 (1961), 309–24; E. Hammerschmidt, Äthiopien. Christliches Reich zwischen gestern und morgen (Wiesbaden 1967); A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 146–66; op. cit., 454–81.

In the Middle Ages the Monophysite Armenian Church,[30] also called Gregorian (after its founder Gregory the Enlightener), had broken up into several jurisdictions. This had been caused by the migrations and subsequent divisions of the Armenian people. In addition to the catholicate of Wagharchapat, or Aghtamar in its original homeland, a patriarchate with residence in Sis in the kingdom of Lesser Armenia had come into existence during the second half of the thirteenth century. It ministered to the Armenians in Cilicia, northern Syria and on the island of Cyprus. Since 1311 there had also been a patriarchate of Jerusalem. In 1441 several bishops, having quarreled with the patriarch of Sis, who had been raised from the office of catholicos, founded a new catholicate at the monastery of Etchmiadzin at Mount Ararat. In 1463 Sultan Mehmed II had the patriarchate of Constantinople established for the Armenians in the Ottoman Empire. Without clarifying the canonical aspects, the catholicos of Etchmiadzin came to be the most influential ecclesiastical shepherd of the Armenians for the next few centuries. In the middle of the seventeenth century he was recognized by the sultanate as the supreme Armenian ecclesiastic, although the patriarch of Constantinople retained his special civil position. Caught between the expansionary struggles of the Ottoman and Persian rulers, the Armenians repeatedly suffered persecutions which caused part of them to emigrate to the Holy Land, Poland-Lithuania, and India. The Persians forced those Armenians living on the western periphery of their realm to leave their settlements, assigning them new ones in Iran. Shah Abbas I (1587–1628) carried the catholicos off to his capital of Isfahan. The new Catholicos Moses III (1629–32), elected during his predecessor's imprisonment, had come from a reformed monastic order and renewed church life. Some of his predecessors as well as successors, such as Stephan V (1545–64) and Nahapet (1691–1705), were prepared for union with Rome. While pertinent negotiations were successful in the patriarchate of Sis, they were suppressed in the patriarchate of Constantinople by Patriarch John Golod (1715–41). In the second half of the eighteenth century the supreme shepherds of Etchmiadzin established ties with the Russian Empire, which was expanding into the Caucasus. In 1797 northern Armenia and in 1828/29 the largest part of Greater Armenia were annexed by Russia. After 1800 the catholicate was under Russian influence.

---

[30] F. Tournebize, Histoire politique et religieuse de l'Arménie (Paris 1910); M. Ormanian, The Church of Armenia (London 1955); B. Spuler, "Die armenische Kirche," Hdb. der Orientalistik, Abt. 1, VIII/2 (1961), 240–68; J. Mécérian, Histoire et institutions de l'Église arménienne (Beirut 1965); A. K. Sanjian, The Armenian Communities in Syria under Ottoman Dominion (London 1965).

During the first few decades of the nineteenth century all autonomous Orthodox, Nestorian, and Monophysite Churches suffered greatly under the strong pressure of their Turkish, Persian, and Russian rulers. This restricted their development and limited their work to the liturgical realm. The number of their faithful decreased, but in spite of all the oppressions those who remained loyal to their faith preserved the heritage of their fathers, the properties of their faith, and their liturgies, the essentials of which had their origin as far back as Christian antiquity. Their perseverance in the midst of trials and tribulation gives witness to their Christian history.

The Uniate Churches

The union of Rome with the Greeks, signed at the Council of Florence in 1439 and in 1442–45 joined by the Armenians, Copts, Syrian Jacobites, and groups of Nestorians and Maronites living on Cyprus, was but of short duration. The further the Ottomans advanced west and south, the more quickly the ties between the Apostolic See and the Uniate Churches in the Near East, the islands of the eastern Mediterranean and the Balkan peninsula were cut. The Popes had no means by which to counter these reverses. Their expectation that military victory over the Turks fighting under the banner of their prophet might pave the way for reunification of the separated halves of Eastern and Western Christendom proved illusory. They tried in the sixteenth and seventeenth century to bring about coalitions against the Turks, and at times were successful, as evidenced by the defense of Vienna in 1689. But their becoming part of the development of the Western world was manifested in the modern-day unions organized by them. To be sure, these unions bore a different stamp from the communio of all partial Churches in existence during the first millenium. In the West a uniformly and well-organized Church had been developed under the direction of Popes who had scant understanding of the autonomous administration of the Eastern Churches which had developed since Christian antiquity. In addition, many members of religious orders urged Latin spirituality upon the Uniate Churches and, further, the Greek (1576) and Maronite Colleges (1584) founded in Rome for the education of Uniate clerics were based (among other things) upon Scholastic theology. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith gave orders initially to win individual believers over to the Catholic Church but at first to have them remain in their mother Church. The intention was to gain influence slowly and—given a vacancy—to get a patriarch or catholicos appointed who would embrace Catholicism. One such instance was the elevation of Michael Garweh to the patriarchate of Antioch after the death of George III in 1783.[31]

For several reasons the unions—with the exception of the one concluded with the Maronites in 1515—lasted but a short time or proved to be durable only after several tries. The Popes paid close attention to keeping the privileges granted the Uniate Churches and safeguarding their Armenian, Byzantine, Chaldaic, Coptic, Maronite, and Syrian rites. But several Western rulers formulated plans to effect a union while pursuing their own motives, as for instance the Kings of France in the Near East, the German Emperors in Siebenbürgen (Hungary), and the Kings of Poland-Lithuania with their magnates in the Ukraine.

The unions were generally considered an intermediate step between Latin Christendom and an Eastern Christendom which was to be eschewed. In the course of the centuries the influences of Latin liturgy and Roman canon law became more and more noticeable in the life of the Uniate Churches. The blend of Eastern features and Latin traditions, sharply criticized as "Uniatism" by Eastern theologians, militated against the development of many unions in eastern and southern Europe, in the Near East, in northeastern Africa, and the Indies.

The union with the Ruthenians and Ukrainians in Poland-Lithuania, concluded in Rome (1595) and accepted at the synod in Brest (1596), was slow to permeate all segments of the population.[32] It lacked the support of the authoritative circle of the magnates, who were either Orthodox or Roman Catholic. Polish theologians considered union as a transitional phenomenon and therefore extended their efforts towards a reduction in the separate customs granted to the Uniate rites and towards a gradual Latinization of their cult. In 1620 when the Orthodox Church reestablished its metropolitanate of Kiev, which flourished quickly under the leadership of Archbishop Petrus Mogilas (1633–45), several Uniate bishops returned to it. The piecemeal defections from the union could not be stopped until the reign of King Jan III Sobieski (1674–96), when the Uniate Basilians formed a new congregation and several Orthodox eparchs switched to the union. The Synod of Samosc (1720),[33] convened by Archbishop Leo II Kiszka (1714–28), was presided over by the papal nuncio Girolamo Grimaldi. Its significance for the Uniate Ukrainians has been compared to that of the Council of Trent for the Latin Church. It wanted to eliminate abuses, elevate education and discipline among the clergy and populace and harmonize the Orthodox tradition with the demands of the time. Its decisions—in contrast to those of the Synod of Brest—demonstrated a certain amount of adaptation to the Latin Rite and the customs of the Roman Church. This synod gave to the Byzantine-Ukrainian Rite its special form, which has remained the most widespread non-Latin Rite of the Catholic Church to the present day. After just a few decades of undisturbed development, witnessed by the church architecture of Lemberg, Polock, and other towns, the Polish partitions and the westward expansion of Russia initiated strong political pressure against the Uniate rites within the Russian sphere of influence, forcing them to return to the Orthodox Church.[34] Only in Galicia, which had come under Austria, could they continue to develop their Churches.

---

[31] W. de Vries, Rom, 245 and 356.

[32] A. M. Ammann, Abriß der ostslawischen Kirchengeschichte (Wien 1950), 199–215, 299–336, 415–447; A. G. Welykyj, ed., Documenta Pontificum Romanorum historiam Ucrainae illustrantia (1075–1953), 2 vols. (Rome 1953–54); G. Lužnickij, Ukrainska cerkva miž schodom i zachodom (Philadelphia 1954); W. de Vries, Rom. 102–7; J. Krajcar, "The Ruthenian Patriarchate. Some remarks on the project for its establishment in the 17th century," OrChrP 30 (1964), 65–84.

[33] J. Bilanych, Synodus Zamostiana an. 1720 (Rome 1960); J. Madey, op. cit., 78–84.

In 1646, in accordance with the example of the Union of Brest, the Union of Užhorod[35] was concluded with the Ruthenians who had settled in Podcarpathia (Carpathian Ukrainians) who belonged to the Orthodox bishopric of Mukačevo, established in the second half of the sixteenth century. From 1633 to 1711 that area was the domain of the Princes Rakoczy, who enlisted sympathies for the spread of Calvinism. This prompted the bishops of Mukačevo to seek ties with the Catholic Church. Bishop Basilios Tarasovič (1633–51) negotiated union with the Latin bishop of Erlau, George Lippay (1637–42), who rose to become bishop of Gran and primate of Hungary (1642–66), as well as with Emperor Ferdinand III and the apostolic nuncio Gasparo Mattei. In 1642 he embraced the Catholic faith in Vienna, but was prevented by Prince George I Rakoczy (1630–48) from returning to his see. Although he reverted to the Orthodox Church, he did recommend shortly before his death (1651) the election of a successor who would be sympathetic to the union. In 1646, meanwhile, the union had been announced by the bishop of Erlau, George Jakušič. It was embraced by 63 of 650 priests and spread further by Bishop Petrus Partheneus Petrovič (1651–66). Upon his death a serious crisis set in when— in addition to the successor elected by the Uniate Church—the Emperor and Princess Sophie Rakoczy each appointed another successor. This confusion was not ended until the appointment of the vicar apostolic of Mukačevo, John Joseph Camillis (1689–1706), a Greek born in Chios and educated at the Greek college in Rome. He convened several synods, published a catechism and consolidated the union, which had 420 member parishes by 1693. During the first several decades of the eighteenth century the Latin bishops of Erlau managed to have the Uniate bishops of Mukačevo made subordinate to them. The Uniate clergy protested in vain against the restrictions placed upon their bishops. Not until 1771 did Pope Clement XIV alleviate the tense situation by issuing his bull Eximia regalium and granting personal jurisdictional rights to their bishops. The Uniate bishopric was comprised of 839 churches and 675 parishes; in 1776 it became a suffragan bishopric of the archbishopric of Gran.

---

[34] See Chap. 13.

[35] M. Lacko, Unio Užhorodensis Ruthenorum Carpaticorum cum Ecclesia Catholica (Rome 1955); idem, "Die Užhoroder Union," OstKSt 8 (1959), 3–30; idem, "Die Union von Užhorod 1646," W. de Vries, Rom, 114–131.

Similar to Podcarpathia, Calvinist rulers also had great influence in Siebenbürgen. When the region came under imperial supremacy and was placed under the Hungarian crown, the danger of domination by both Magyars and Calvinists was a growing threat. The Orthodox Bishop Theophilos Szeremy of Alba Julia detailed a plan for union on the occasion of a Rumanian synod in 1697. The members of the synod were favorably inclined, but demanded complete safeguards of their Orthodox rites and customs as well as equality with the Catholic clergy. The union was accepted under Bishop Atanas Anghel (1697–1713) at the Synods of Alba in 1698 and 1700[36] after the Emperor granted to the Uniate Church the same rights as were enjoyed by the Catholics. In 1701 the imperial court named Atanas bishop of the Rumanian nation in Siebenbürgen. Cardinal Leopold Karl Kollonics, archbishop of Gran, conditionally reconsecrated him, an action which was sharply protested by the Orthodox theologians and bishops. Yet the Uniate Bishop Atanas was joined by almost all the Orthodox Rumanians, about half a million. In 1721 Pope Innocent XIII established the bishopric of Fagaras for the Uniates, which was joined with the archbishopric of Gran by Emperor Charles VI. In spite of the difficulties created by the Calvinists and the emissaries of the Orthodox patriarch of Ipek the Uniate bishops were able to consolidate the union. In the town of Blaj the Uniate Bishop Peter Paul Aron (1752–64) founded a college led by Basilian monks and a press which published liturgical books and brochures for religious instruction. The union was further promulgated by his successors, such as Athanasios Rednik (1764–72) and Gregor Major (1773–82), with support by Empress Maria Theresa and many clerics who had studied in Rome.

The families who had emigrated from Bosnia to Croatia in 1573 were served by the Orthodox bishop who resided at the monastery of Saint Michael in Marca. In 1611 Bishop Simeon Vratanja embraced Catholicism before Cardinal Robert Bellarmin, but was able to persuade only a part of the monks of the Marca monastery and of the Orthodox Serbians to join the Union.[37] Subsequent tensions with the Latin archbishop of Zagreb (who considered the Uniate bishop a subordinate auxiliary bishop), efforts by the patriarch of Ipek to rejoin the Uniates with the Orthodox Church, the existence of a Uniate vicariate for Syrmia (1688–1706), whose ordinary resided at the Monastery of Hopovo, and the sacking and destruction of the monastery of Marca by members of the Orthodox Rite (1739) prompted Bishop Gabriel Palkovič (1751–59), who saw his bishopric endangered from within and without, to relocate it to Pribic. In 1777 Pope Pius VI issued the bull Charitas illa, creating the diocese of Kreutz for the Uniate Church of Byzantine Rite as part of the archbishopric of Gran.

---

[36] G. Patacsi, "Die unionfeindlichen Bewegungen der orthodoxen Rumänen Siebenbürgens in den Jahren 1726–29," OrChrP 26 (1960), 349–400; W. de Vries, Rom, 132–80, 394–423.

The majority of Greeks who had fled from Albania to southern Italy and Sicily, the so-called Italo-Albanians (Italo-Greeks) succumbed to a process of Latinization. After they had achieved the opening of seminaries for the education of their own priests at Piana in Sicily (1716), at Ullano in Calabria (1732), and at Palermo (1736), Pope Benedict XIV acknowledged in his constitution Etsi pastoralis (1742) the validity of the Greco-Albanian customs, but he stressed the praestantia of the Latin Rite. The Italo-Greeks were given an auxiliary bishop in Calabria (1735) and in Sicily (1784). Of the numerous Greek monasteries in Italy only Grottaferrata near Rome and Piana in Sicily preserved the Byzantine Rite although there, too, mixed forms of the liturgy were practiced along with the Latin liturgy.

In addition to the unions of different national groups of Orthodox Christians in eastern Europe, southern Europe, and Italy mentioned so far, there were the Monophysites who had emigrated from Greater Armenia to Poland-Lithuania and had an Armenian bishopric in Lemberg. Bishop Nikolaus Torosowič (1627–81) joined Rome in 1630. While he did become archbishop of the Uniate Armenians for Poland and Walachia with his residence in Lemberg (in 1635),[38] it was his coadjutor and successor Vatan Hunanian (1686–1715) who definitively broke with the catholicate of Etchmiadzin and stabilized the union. The [37] J. Šimrak, De relationibus Slavorum meridionalium cum Sancta Romana Sede Apostolica saeculis XVII–XVIII I (Zagreb 1926); G. Hoffman, "Urkunden zur Union des Bischofs Vratanja," OrChrA 8 (1927), 290–98; M. Lacko, "Die Union in Kroatien 1611," W. de Vries, Rom, 108–11.

---

[38] G. Petrowicz, L'Unione degli armeni di Polonia con la Santa Sede 1626–86 (Rome 1950).

Polish partitions caused the archbishopric to be split into a Russian and an Austrian part.

Efforts by zealous religious prompted some individual Armenian bishops in Constantinople, Etchmiadzin, and Sis to agree to the union. But the Dominicans in Transcaucasia, the Mechitarists[39] called into existence in 1701 by Mechithar of Sebaste (1676–1749), and the missionary order of the Armenian Antonites founded in Lebanon during the eighteenth century, had only limited success. In Syria the Catholics attempted to fill the vacant patriarchal see of Sis with one of their own in 1737. The Monophysite Armenians elected Michael, the Catholics elected Archbishop Abraham Ardzivian of Aleppo as successor.[40] The latter received recognition of his office and the pallium as Catholicos Abraham Peter I (1740–69) by Pope Benedict XIV in 1742. But his intention to relocate his residence to Constantinople was thwarted by the protest of the Monophysite Armenians. So he resided at the monastery of Krim in Lebanon and his successors in nearby Bzommar. They were responsible for the Uniate Armenians in Cilicia, Palestine, Mesopotamia, and Egypt. The members of the Uniate rites in the north and west of Asia Minor, in Constantinople, and the European part of Turkey were given their own vicar-bishop, who was subordinate to the Latin vicar apostolic of Constantinople.

While efforts towards union were initially unsuccessful among the Orthodox Georgians, they showed promise among the Orthodox Melchites, but could not come to fruition because of the rivalry among Uniate dignitaries during the eighteenth century. Although Capuchins, Carmelites, and Jesuits in Syria enlisted some bishops and patriarchs for the union, a widespread movement did not occur until the appointment of Archbishop Euthymios of Sidon and Tyre (1683–1723), administrator of all Catholic Melchites in the patriarchate of Antioch since 1701, and the engagement of the missionary congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, founded by him in accordance with the rules followed by the Basilian order. After the death of the Melchite Patriarch Athanasios (1724), who embraced Catholicism on his deathbed, the Catholic minority elected as his successor Seraphim Tanas, a nephew of Euthymios, who assumed the name of Cyril VI (1724–59). At the same time the opponents of the union elected a nephew of Athanasios as Patriarch Jeremias III. The latter had Cyril and his followers excommunicated at a synod in Alexandria in 1728. Having been forced to leave Damascus, Cyril VI took up residence in Sidon. He initiated the line of Uniate Melchite patriarchs of Antioch whose jurisdiction was broadened in 1772 to include all Catholics of the Byzantine Rite within the confines of the patriarchates of Jerusalem and Alexandria.

---

[39] P. Krüger, "Die armenischen Mechitharisten und ihre Bedeutung," OstKSt 16 (1967), 3–14.

[40] M. Terzian, Le Patriarcat de Cilicie et les Arméniens catholiques 1740–1812 (Beirut 1955).

After Capuchins and Jesuits had enlisted some individual Jacobites for the Church, Bishop Andreas Akidjian of Aleppo was elevated to the vacant Monophysite patriarchate (1662–77).[41] As a result of mediation by the French consul he was recognized as patriarch of the Syrian nation by the sultan. His successor Ignatius Petrus IV (1677–1702) was repeatedly persecuted for his adherence to the union, alleged to be an agent of France, and finally driven out. Many Uniate western Syrians left Monophysitism, part of them going over to the Maronites. Their number diminished in the course of the eighteenth century so that by 1768 no more than 150 Uniate families were counted in Aleppo and 50 in Damascus. Not until 1783 were they given a new patriarch in the person of Ignatius Michael Garweh (1783–1800). His election in Mardin in 1781 by four of the six Jacobite bishops was recognized neither by his opponents nor by the Turks. He was forced to make way for the Jacobite Patriarch Matthias and withdrew to the monastery of Scharfeh in Lebanon. In 1783 the Pope recognized him as the Syrian patriarch of Antioch whose line can be traced up to the present.

Since the Nestorians of eastern Syria had been split into several jurisdictional areas, the Chaldeans who had joined the union also formed several centers. The patriarchate of the Chaldeans in Diarbekr, created in the middle of the sixteenth century under John Sulaqa, came to an end by the return to Nestorianism of Simon XIII (1662–1700). Archbishop Joseph of Amida (Diarbekr), who had become Catholic in 1672, was elevated to the patriarchate as Joseph I (1681–96).[42] He ministered to about one thousand faithful. His successor Joseph II (1696–1713) called himself patriarch of Babylon and the nation of the Chaldeans. The Dominicans succeeded in recruiting for the union the nephew of the Nestorian patriarch, Elias XII Denha (d. 1778), who resided in the monastery of Rabban Hurmuz near Mosul. He was elected patriarch and then appointed metropolitan of Mosul and administrator of the patriarchate of Babylon. The rivalry between the two Chaldean patriarchates of Diarbekr and Mosul, which latter was comprised of a mere few thousand faithful, ended in 1834 with the enthronement of John Hormez as patriarch of Babylon.

---

[41] W. de Fries, "Dreihundert Jahre syrisch-katholische Kirche," OstKSt 5 (1956), 137–57.

[42] A. Lampart, Ein Märtyrer der Union mit Rom. Joseph I. 1681–96. Patriarch der Chaldäer (Einsiedeln 1966).

The Maronite Church of Lebanon[43] had been firmly tied to Rome since the Fifth Lateran Council. The embassy of the Jesuit Giambattista Eliano (1578 and 1580) introduced an increased Latinization of the Antioch Rite which was protested in vain by several monks and bishops. In 1584 Pope Gregory XIII created the Maronite college in Rome which produced a number of important priests and scholars, the members of the Assemani family (as-Simani) being especially prominent among the latter. In 1606 the Gregorian calendar was introduced among the Maronites. Patriarch Stephanus Ad-Duwaihi (1670–1704), who had been educated in Rome, had valuable help from the order of Saint Anthony of Saint Isaias in developing his Church. The disputes created by the elections of dual patriarchs and the rejection of increasing Latinization were to be resolved in 1736 at the Synod of Kesrowan. In the presence of the papal legate Joseph Simon Assemani,[44] the decisions of the Council of Trent and the Catechismus Romanus, which appeared in Arabic in 1786, were accepted. Latin vestments were prescribed for celebrating the Eucharist. In 1741 Pope Benedict XIV accepted the decisions of the synod. The following year he divided the patriarchate into eight dioceses, giving them the titles of old Syrian metropolitanates. Five Maronite monks were in sharp disagreement with the negotiations of the synod and the papal utterances. Not until the second half of the eighteenth century under Patriarch Joseph Estephan (1766–92) could unity be reestablished in the Maronite Church. The seminary founded by Estephan in Ain-Warka (1789) continued the activities of the Armenian college in Rome after it was dissolved in the tumult of the French Revolution. The Synod of Bkerke in 1790 contributed significantly to consolidating the Maronite Church.

Among the Monophysite Copts the contacts with Patriarch John XVI (1676–1718), initiated by Jesuits and reformed Franciscans, were unsuccessful.[45] The assistant to the patriarch of Cairo, the Coptic Bishop

---

[43] J. B. Chabot, Les listes patriarcales de l'Église Maronite (Paris 1938); B. Spuler, "Die Maroniten," Hdb. der Orientalistik, Abt. 1, VIII/2 (1961), 217–25; P. Dib, L'Église Maronite, 2 vols. (Beirut 1962); A. S. Atiya, op. cit., 389–423.

[44] P. Mahfoud, Joseph Simon Assimani et la célébration du concil libanais maronite de 1736 (Rome 1965).

[45] J. P. Trossen, Les relations du patriarche copte Jean XVI avec Rome 1676–1718 (Luxemburg 1948); A. Colombo, Le origini della gerarchia della chiesa copta cattolica nel secolo XVIII (Rome 1953); G. Giambernardini, I primi copti cattolici (Cairo 1958); G. D'Albano, Historia della missione francescana in alto-Egitto-Fungi-Etiopia 1686–1720 (Cairo 1961).

Athanasios of Jerusalem, who had embraced Catholicism in 1739, was given the leadership of the approximately two thousand Uniate Copts by Pope Benedict XIV in 1741. But since he was unwilling to terminate his connection with the Coptic Church, the Propaganda named Justus Maraghi vicar general (1744–49). He was followed in that office by prefects of the reformed Franciscans. In 1761 the former Coptic Archbishop Antonius Fulaifil became the first vicar apostolic in Cairo. He was unable to achieve much progress because the bishops and priests who were prepared to join the union insisted on conditional reconsecration.

After the initial successes in Ethiopia achieved by Portuguese missionaries in the seventeenth century collapsed, the union was unable to establish firm roots.[46] Capuchins and Franciscans who dared enter the country of the negus were either driven out or died a martyr's death. Efforts by the Franciscan Theodor Krump, in his capacity as royal physician (1701–02), to enlist the negus and etschege for the union came to nought. Father Liberat Weiss and his friends were condemned and stoned to death in 1716. Bohemian Franciscans were expelled from the country in 1752 after a brief sojourn. The native Bishop Tobias George Ghebragzer, consecrated in Rome in 1788, fled to Cairo in 1797.

The successful union concluded in the sixteenth century with the Christians of Saint Thomas in India was weakened by the creation of the Jacobite Church under Mar Thomas I in the middle of the seventeenth century. Those Thomas Christians who had remained Catholic were under a vicar apostolic directly subordinate to the Propaganda; at the same time they were under the Portuguese padroado, which in turn was under the influence of the Jesuits. The vicar apostolic, Mar Alexander Parampil (1663–94), was successfully supported by Carmelites who became his successors. The partition into two jurisdictional areas brought with it all sorts of difficulties which were overcome only when the Jesuit order was dissolved in 1773 and the Carmelite order started furnishing the majority of apostolic administrators.

In spite of the tensions from without and within to which the unions, concluded from the sixteenth to the eighteenth century, were exposed, the Apostolic See was able to unite both large and small religious communities with Rome. Reverses were inevitable and many unions were limited to small numbers of faithful. Yet the eastern border of the Catholic Church, rigid since the Middle Ages, became fluid. Several ethnic groups of eastern and southern Slavs, of Maronites, Thomas Christians, and others were joined to the Roman center of the Church.

---

[46] T. Somigli, Etiopia francescana nei documenti dei secoli XVII e XVIII, 2 vols. (Quaracchi 1928–48); G. Manfredi, "I minori osservanti riformati nella prefettura dell'Alto Egitto-Etiopia 1697–1792," Studia orientalia christiana 3 (Cairo 1958), 83–182.

CHAPTER 15

The Propagation of the Faith in America

The Waning of the Missionary Spirit and the Decline of the Missions

The manifest diminution of the missionary spirit in the seventeenth and eighteenth century contrasted with manifold, often heroic incidents of missionary activity. This fact alone shows clearly that the history of the propagation of faith in America did not follow a simple and transparent line of development, but was instead of a rather complex nature. The gradual flagging of the missionary spirit with its logical consequences goes back to events of the sixteenth century, which must be described briefly if one is to understand and judge fairly the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth century.

A decisive factor was the long struggle between Pius V (d. 1572) and Philip II (d. 1598) for the growing and potentially immense Church in the New World. Philip II demanded the establishment of an "Indian Patriarchate" which was to exist and be considered as a more or less autonomous Church parallel to the Roman Church. The patriarch was to be appointed by the King and reside in Madrid. This demand was emphatically rejected by Pius V, as was the moderated form of a "royal vicariate" for the overseas territories, which was also opposed in 1634 and 1643 by the newly founded Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith.[1] Pius V, on his part, sought ways in which to realize the papal claims and the papal influence in Spanish America. Upon the suggestion and with the collaboration of the Jesuit general Francis Borgia, he formed a congregation of cardinals in 1568 for the ecclesiastic and religious affairs in the overseas territories which—while its structure and goals already corresponded to those of the Congregation of Propaganda to be organized in 1622—could neither be an effective instrument nor a permanent one.[2] Subsequently Pius V strove in vain to foil the machinations of the Spanish crown, first by dispatching a nuncio and then, with the help of papal visitors composed in the main of Spanish or Hispanophile Jesuits, by at least providing himself with precise knowledge concerning the situation in the American lands.[3]

---

[1] P. de Leturia, S.J., "El Regio Vicariato de Indias y los comienzos de la Congregación de Propaganda," Relaciones I, 101–52.

[2] L. Lopetegui, S.J., "San Francisco de Borja y el plan misional de San Pio V. Primeros pasos de una Congregación de Propaganda Fide," AHSI 11 (1942), 1–26.

[3] P. Borges, "La Nunciatura Indiana. Un intento de intervención directa en Indias bajo

After the Pope had exhausted all means of subordinating the American Church to papal supremacy, he tried to make the powerful personalities of the New World responsive to the interests of the Church by means of personal letters and briefs.[4] But Pius V could hardly foresee that as of the end of 1568 all his efforts would be in vain. That year an event took place which—as we know today—assumed an essential, indeed decisive significance for the development of the Church in America: the Great Junta of Madrid in 1568.[5]

The Junta Magna, which in addition to selected members of the Council of Castile included all the members of the Council of the Indies and other prominent personalities, was to reach two goals which Philip II had in mind: (1) to expand the right of patronage to such an extent that any influence of Rome would be excluded for all times (Up to that point the patronage had been restricted more or less to the outer organization of the Church, the establishment and borders of the dioceses, the appointment of the bishops and other ecclesiastical dignitaries. From now on the system was to be extended to include not only every representative of the clergy, secular and regular, but also the internal affairs of the Church.); (2) to supplant the Indian Church coming into existence by achieving a breakthrough for a Church which would bear the Spanish imprint.

The implementation of the decisions of the Junta Magna was entrusted to the newly appointed viceroy of Peru, Francisco de Toledo,[6]

Felipe II., 1566–88," MH 19 (1962), 169–227; idem, "La Santa Sede y América en el siglo XVI," Estudios Americanos 21 (Seville 1961), 141–68 (mentions for the period of 1513–70 fourteen letters from America expressing an urgent desire for a vicar apostolic); A. de Egaña, S.J., La teoría del Regio Vicariato español de Indias (Rome 1958); J. Wicki, "Nuovi documenti attorno ai piani missionari di Pio V nel 1568," AHSI 57 (1968), 408–17 (publishes the list of the appointed groups of visitors).

[4] M. Monica, La gran controversia del siglo XVI acerca del dominio Español sobre America (Madrid 1952), 249 f., for example the brief of Pius V to Francisco de Toledo; see also Card. Grente, Le pape des grande combats. Saint Pie V. (Paris 1956), 189ff., 199ff.

[5] M. Monica, op. cit., 197–240; P. de Letuira, S.J., "Misiones hispanoamericanas según la Junta de 1568," Relaciones I, 205–31. For an evaluation of the Junta and its impact the following aspects appear important as well. Las Casas, the courageous pioneer in a fight for freedom of the Indians, had died in 1566. The proponents of his ideas in Spain, especially the professors in Salamanca, had no political influence. Philip II, moreover, thwarted them by appointing his confessor, Father Diego de Chaves, to the position of theologian. R. Richard summarized briefly in 1966: "C'est surtout à partir de Philippe II et davantage à partir de l'installation des Bourbons sur le Trône d'Espagne en 1700, que les progrès de l'esprit régaliste ont fait du patronage un instrument d'asservissements pour l'Église des Indes" ("La 'Conquête spirituelle du Mexique revue après trente ans," La Découverte de l'Amérique. Esquisse d'une synthèse [Paris 1968], 231).

[6] R. Levillier, Don Francisco de Toledo, Virrey del Perú, Supremo organizador del Perú, su vida, su obra (1515–82), 4 vols. (Madrid 1929–40).

who not only participated in several of the junta's meetings, but was also furnished a set of secret instructions. It was quite certainly a skillful move by Philip II that he selected a personal friend of the Jesuit general Francis Borgia to execute his plans while simultaneously acceding to the latter's repeated requests to permit the first large-scale expedition of twenty-four Jesuits to South America, a prelude to the missionary activities in Spanish America by that order.[7] It can be assumed that Philip II gave his viceroy some valuable instructions regarding missionary work, but most probably of such nature that he, i.e., the government, became the actual guarantor of the conversion of the Indians; the previous secular and regular missionaries turned into mere executive organs.[8]

As was the case for all Spanish laws overseas, it took some considerable time of compromises and transitional solutions until the patronage right was implemented down to its very last ramifications. In the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth century the King and the Council of the Indies received crucial help from theologians as well as jurists. As early as 1600 the Franciscan Miguel Agia, missionary in Guatemala, published his fundamental work on the necessity and importance of the secular arm for missionary work.[9] This work was concretely applied in three expert opinions on the forced labor of the Indians (1604).[10] Among the Augustinians it was the bishop of Santiago de Chile, Gaspar de Villaroel, who traced the line from the right of patronage to regalism in his comprehensive Govierno Eclesiástico Pacífico, which first appeared in 1656 and was reprinted in 1738. Actually his work was intended to reduce the tensions between Church and state in America.[11] An extreme partisan of regalism towards the end of the eighteenth century was the Carmelite José Antonio de San Alberto, bishop of Tucumán

---

[7] Preceded a few years earlier by the more modest mission in Florida, see F. Zubillaga, La Florida. La misión jesuítica (1566–72) (Rome 1941). The first Jesuit expeditions to Mexico took place in 1572.

[8] Even the Jesuits who maintained ties of friendship with the viceroy were made to feel this. In 1577, filling a need for the ministry, they built a branch in the mission town of Potosí with the viceroy's permission. By the latter's order they had to relinquish it (A. de Egaña, Monumenta Peruana II, 476–84, 542–54, 558–69; R. Vargas Ugarte, op. cit. I, 141).

[9] Streit I, 116.

[10] Ibid., 125. See the review of the critical edition (Seville 1947), Hisp. Am. Hist. Rev. (1947), 300–304.

[11] Streit, 233f., 421; A. J. González Zumariaga, Problemas del patronato indiano a través del "Govierno Eclesiástico Pacífico" de Fr. Gaspar de Villaroel (Vitoria 1961); J. López Ortiz, El regalismo indiano en el Govierno eclesiástico pacífico dι Don Fr. Gaspar de Villaroel. Real Academia de Jurisprudencia y Legislación (Madrid 1947). (G. de Villaroel was born in 1587 in Quito and died in 1665 as bishop of Buenos Aires.)

(Córdoba) and later archbishop of La Plata. With his legalistically oriented pastoral letter of 1786 he published a Catecismo real, as the work was called.[12] The scholarly Jesuit Pedro Murillo Velarde compiled the regalist canon law in the more than one thousand pages of his two-volume work Cursus Juris Canonici Hispani et Indici in 1743.[13] His fellow Jesuit Diego de Avedaño had taken a more reticent stance in his Encyclopädie für die Missionspastoral und für das Missions- und Kolonialrecht Thesaurus Indicus (Antwerp 1668).[14]

But in the final analysis neither theologians nor canonists exerted the decisive influence regarding the extension of the right of patronage; the most prominent part was played by the counsels for the crown. Among them were Pedro Fresso in Lima,[15] A. J. Álvarez de Abreu,[16] A. J. Ribadeneyra y Barrientos in Mexico,[17] and, most prominently, Juan de Solórzano Pereira (1575–1655). He was professor in Salamanca, official of the Curia in Lima, and after his return to Spain a member of the Council of the Indies. The first volume of his De Indiarum Jure appeared in 1629, the second in 1639.[18] They are a consistent continuation and development of the basic ideas of Ginés de Sepúlveda, the great adversary of Bartolomé de Las Casas. For more than two centuries this work determined the relations between the state and the Church in accordance with Spanish state law. To be sure, it was condemned and put on the Index by Rome in 1642.[19] But since the Council of the Indies did not recognize Rome's decision, it had no validity in Spain and America.[20] [12] The actual title was "Instrucción donde per lecciones, preguntas y respuestas se enseñan a los niños y niñas las obligaciones mas principales que un vasallo debe a su rey y señor." R. Esquerra, "La crítica sobre América en el siglo XVIII," Revista de Indias 22 (1962), 246ff.

---

[13] Streit I, 439.

[14] Ibid., 268f., with voluminous supplements from 1675 (ibid., 283) and 1686 (ibid., 307f.). See P. de Leturia, "Misioneros extranjeros en Indias según Diego de Avendaño," Relaciones I, 453–67 and A. de Egaña, "El P. Diego de Avendaño y la tesis teocrática 'Papa, dominus orbis'," AHS XVIII (1949), 195–225.

[15] De regio patronatu indiano 1671, 1679; Streit I, 287f. The work was placed on the Index in 1688.

[16] Victima real legal (Madrid 1726); Streit I, 379.

[17] Manuel Compendio de el regio Patronato Indiano (Madrid 1755); Streit I, 470.

[18] Streit I, 191, 262. The Spanish edition appeared in 1648 under the title Política Indiana (ibid., 217f.); its fourth edition appeared in 1776 and a third edition in Latin came out in 1777 (ibid., 529f.). See F. J. de Ayala, "Ideas Canónicas de Juan de Solárzano. El Tratado De Indiarum Jure y su inclusión en el Indice," Anuario de Estudios Americanos 4 (Seville 1947), 579–614; A. de Egaña, "La función misionera del poder civil según Juan de Solárzano Pereira (1575–1654)," StMis 6 (Rome 1951), 69–113; idem., La teoría del Regio Vicariato Español (Rome 1958), 106–73.

[19] P. de Leturia, "Antonio Lelio de Fermo y la condenación del De Indiarum Jure de Solórzano Pereira," Relaciones I, 335–408.

Theory and practice gradually led to extensive legislation which more and more constricted the activities of the Church. The final codification (1791) in the Recopilación de Leyes de los Reynos de las Indias[21] represented the finishing touch, predetermined as early as 1771 by the fourth provincial council of Mexico in accordance with the precise instructions of the Council of the Indies.[22]

Regalism or state absolutism proved to be one of the most serious obstacles to the missionary development of the American Church in the seventeenth and eighteenth century. Except for the papal bulls of investiture and some few privileges, all the influence of Rome was practically eliminated. This had a paralyzing and demoralizing effect on the total missionary effort.[23] Just how negative its effect on individual missions was can be gleaned from unpublished documents—unpublished because mention of such matters was not allowed in print—concerning the life of the Apostle of California, Junípero Serra.[24] For this reason his biography, written by his long-time companion and successor Francesco Palou (1787), speaks only of the positive aspects concerning the cooperation of Church and state and of the necessity for military protection of the missions in Mexico as well as California.[25]

---

[20] In fact there would hardly have been a person in Spanish America who knew of the condemnation by Rome. The work was used as a basic handbook by the temporal and ecclesiastic authorities.

[21] Especially in bk. I, Chap. 8, "Del Patronazgo Real de Las Indias." See F. J. de Ayala, "Iglesia y Estado en las Leyes de Indias," Estudios Americanos 1 (1948/49), 417–60; R. Gomez Hoyo, La Iglesia de América en las Leyes de Indias (Madrid 1961).

[22] M. Giménez Fernández, "Estudios para la Historia del Regalismo Español, I: El Concilio IV Provincial Mejicano," Anales de la Universidad Hispalense I and II (Seville 1939).

[23] G. Desdevises du Dezert, "L Église espagnole des Indes à la fin du XVIII^{e} Siécle," Revue Hispanique 39 (1917), 112–293. Basing his claims on numerous documents from the Indias-Archives, the author proves that all provincial synods were predetermined down to the smallest details by royal instructions (see 115–20), further, how complicated the appointment of parish priests by the local authorities was (172ff.), that the visitors of the orders were appointed by the Council of the Indies in Spain (221), and so forth. See also Alluto de la Hera, El Regalismo Borbónico en su proyección indiana (Madrid 1963).

[24] M. Geiger, The Life and Times of Fray Junípero Serra OFM, 2 vols. (Washington 1959). Volume II, 329ff. gives an example of the bureaucracy making the mission work more difficult. It took four years for the authorization by Rome for conducting confirmations to make its way through the various authorities in Spain and Mexico and another three years for the subordinate authorities to recognize the signatures and seals. The authorization granted in 1774 and limited to ten years could, in the end, be used by Serra for all of three years.

Not only was the application of the principle of regalism most injurious to the interests of the Church, but the brutal prevention of establishing an Indian Church turned an already bad situation into a catastrophe, because it was an Indian Church and not one after the Spanish model that was envisioned by the missionaries, especially the Franciscans, soon after the beginning of evangelization,[26] even if neither the goal nor the means were as yet fully recognized.[27]

That the Junta Magna of 1568 prevented the Indian Church from coming into being can be shown by several negative features which were clearly recognizable as the result of its decisions. Principal among them is the suppression of all publications relative to the propagation of the faith which stressed the great abilities and good qualities of the Indians. Of the Franciscan writings we mention Motolinia (Toribio de Benavente), Historia de los Indios de la Nueva España, a basic source, first published 1858 by its discoverer, the Mexican historian J. García Icazbalceta,[28] the Historia Eclesiástica Indiana by Gerónimo de Mendieta (also discovered by Icazbalceta; published in 1870),[29] and last but not least the life's work of the scholar Bernardino de Sahagún. Only one of his many works was published during his lifetime, the Psalmodia christiana (Mexico 1583). The manuscripts of his other works, his comprehensive Historia general de las cosas de Nueva España included, were confiscated and sent to Spain for examination only to disappear in government archives, where they were newly discovered in the nineteenth century.[30]

Whereas Bartolomé de Las Casas was able to have a number of his writings printed in 1552, among them the virulent Brevísima Relación de la destrucción de las Indias, his other works, especially the lengthy Historia General de las Indias, were not published until the ninteenth and twentieth century.[31] His fellow religious, Diego Durán, did not fare any better with his Historia de la Indias de la Nueva España, which was completed in 1581.[32] Conditions in other countries, especially Peru and Colombia, were no different from those in Mexico.

---

[25] See especially the English translations with the valuable notes by M. Geiger, Palou's Life of Fray Junipero Serra (Washington 1955).—Without this nationalistic direction Palou would hardly have received the required state and Church imprimatur.

[26] R. Ricard, "La Conquête spirituelle." The impressive lists (pp. 345–52) of the works written in Indian languages alone clearly show this direction; P. Borges, Métodos.

[27] J. L. Phelan, The Millenial Kingdom of the Franciscans in the New World. A Study of the Writings of Gerónimo de Mendieta (1525–1604) (Berkeley and Los Angeles 1956), which stresses the eschatological utopian characteristics in the work of the Mexican Franciscans.

[28] Streit III, 581.

[29] Ibid. III, 605–7.

[30] Ibid. II, 216–22.

The lifework of the Franciscan Pedro Aguado, the first chronicler of Colombia, which did not become well known until the twentieth century, was illuminated by the Colombian historian Juan Friede by means of a comparison of handwritings. In the process he sifted out the principles of government censorship (those of the Church had to be obtained beforehand in each case).[33] They were: (1) everything that diminished the good reputation of the conquista or the conquistadores had to be suppressed; (2) in treating the missions, all mention of conflicts, especially those with government offices, had to be left out; (3) the Indians had to be represented as a low human race without culture.[34] Authors, including chroniclers of the religious orders, who wanted to obtain the requisite imprimature had to follow these unwritten yet painstakingly enforced rules.

The discrimination against the Indians, carried out according to J. Friede by government censorship, shows clearly that it was aimed against an essential element in the creation of an Indian Church: the education of indigenous clergy.[35] Indeed the Council of Mexico had already prohibited the ordination of Indians in 1555, but in a more general context (in connection with the Muslims [moros], mestizos, and mulattos),[36] but at the Third Council of Lima in 1567/68 the prohibition already referred exclusively to the newly converted Indians.[37]

Judging from the text of the council, precluding priesthood for the Indians appeared to have been a temporary measure (hoc tempore). In point of fact it was to last until the eighteenth century. The Franciscans found this out in their college of Tlaltelolco (Mexico), which had been established by Bishop Zumárraga in 1536 primarily for the education of a native clergy. The various parties, those among the laity, the secular and the regular clergy—even among the Franciscans—who were hostile to the Indians continued to hold the upper hand and after the 1560s the formerly flourishing school was merely vegetating.[38] The same experience was had by the Jesuits working in the country since 1572. Under the spiritual leadership of Juan de Tobar, who was born in Mexico, they tried to get permission from the Jesuit general to establish a college for the education of Indian priests. After fifteen years of trying, their plan was categorically rejected.[39] The final decision by General Claudius Acquaviva had been indicated earlier by the guidelines of the junta of 1568.[40]

---

[31] Ibid. II, 27–32.

[32] Ibid. II, 226.

[33] "La Censura Española del Siglo XVI y los libros de Historia de América," Revista de Historia de América 47 (Mexico City 1959), 45–94.

[34] Aguado described the prominent tribe of the Muiscas Indians and according to the table of contents planned twenty chapters for that part (op. cit., 88–90), all of which were eliminated by censorship for the reasons stated.

[35] J. Specker, "Der einheimische Klerus in Spanisch-Amerika im 16. Jh. Mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der Konzilien und Synoden," in J. Beckmann, Der Einheimische Klerus in Gesch. und Gegenwart (Festschr. L. Kilger) (Beckenried 1950), 73–97; A. Pott, "Das Weihehindernis für Indianer im 3. Konzil von Lima," NZM 12 (1956), 108–18.

[36] J. Specker, op. cit., 78f.

[37] "Sentit sancta Synodus, et ita servandum statuit, hos noviter ad fidem conversos, hoc tempore non debere ordine initiari. . . ." R. Vargas Ugarte, Concilios Limenses (1551–1772) I (Lima 1951), 192.

In this connection the efforts of the Propaganda, i.e., of its first secretary Francesco Ingoli, are deeply moving. In letters and petitions to popes, cardinals, and generals of the orders he gave the most cogent arguments for the ordination of Indian priests in America, but the power of the Council of the Indies could not be broken even by the Popes.[41]

---

[38] R. Ricard, La Conquête spirituelle, 260–84.

[39] In addition to various references in the Monumenta Mexicana (I–IV) and in F. J. Alegre, op. cit., see also the summary study by J. Lafaye, "Une lettre inédite de XVI^{e} siècle, relative aux collèges indiens de la Compagnie de Jésus en Nouvelle-Espagne," Annales de la Faculté des lettres et Sciences humaines d'Aix, t. 38 (2d fasc.) (Gap 1964), 9–21, (19–21 contains the letter from Father Pedro Díaz to the general of the Society of Jesus, dated 21 June 1592).

[40] Father Juan de Tobar already demonstrated clear insight when he wrote: "se perdieron las mejores ocasiones que jamás tendremos moralmente hablando" (E. J. Alegre, op. cit. I, 546).—The education of a native clergy in Paraguay was therefore principally out of the question.

[41] J. Metzler, "Francesco Ingoli und die Indianerweihen," NZM 25 (1969), 262–72. Ingoli's perspicacity is shown by his summary of 1638 to the general of the Augustinian order: "If the Spanish regulars do not consecrate any Indians, the Church in both Indies will always be a small child and will never grow inwardly strong." (op. cit.). R. Ricard, who adduces these facts in a lecture of 1966 in the process of clarifying some details of his classical work of 1933 (La "Conquête spirituelle du Mexique" revue après trente ans: La Découverte de l'Amérique. Esquisse d'une synthèse [Paris 1968], 236), attempts to muster some understanding for his attitude against a native clergy. As its motive he cites the total strangeness of the Indian races and cultures to the Spaniards and also a certain fear of a "Luther" who might emerge from an "Indian Church." There was the distinct possibility that such reasons carried a certain weight in small circles, but decisive for the crown were political and economic reasons. As Ricard, too, sees clearly (p. 235f.), a native Church was rejected because ecclesiastical independence brought with it in the danger of political independence and because the Spanish conqueror caste and its successors scorned all physical labor to such an extent that they thought they could not exist without slaves or the slave labor of the Indians. These connec-

In his ideas of regalism Philip II was by no means guided by anti-Church sentiments. He was deeply convinced of the divine mission which he thought to have been given especially for the formation of the American Church. The bishops nominated by him were all well educated, pious and apostolic men, as were the visitors of the orders. The building of churches and monasteries, of hospitals and schools was supported. Beyond that he tried to promote everywhere the veneration and reverence for the Holy See and the Popes. Thus we witness the paradox that reverence for the Pope was nowhere greater than in the American territories, where practically all papal influence was eliminated.[42] It was well known that his opponent, Pius V, had the implementation of the Council of Trent close to his heart. So in order to keep him from making demands regarding the American Church, Philip II in a letter of 12 July 1564 had ordered the implementation of the Tridentine rules. Consequently, Archbishop Alonso de Montúfar as early as 1565 convened the Second Council of Mexico, which was to promulgate, adapt, and reacknowledge the Council of Trent. The Third Council of Lima in 1567/68 served the same purpose for South America.[43]

While the Council of Trent was a blessing for the European Church, it was a double-edged sword for the budding Indian Church. Quite aside from the fact that—as a result of the actions of Charles V and Philip II—America, in spite of the efforts by individual bishops, was not represented in Trent and its problems were nowhere discussed,[44] the centralist tendencies beginning at this point could not but have an impeding and in the long run seriously damaging effect.[45] The greatest damage was probably in discontinuing the already initiated organic growth of an Indian Church; the original main ideas concerning missionary work were discarded with noticeable haste. The first generation of missionaries had in mind the example of the original Church; the dogma of tions were clearly seen by Las Casas and Mendieta. On this topic, see R. Konetzke, "Einige Grundzüge der geschichtlichen Besonderheit Lateinamerikas in der westlichen Hemisphäre," HZ 204 (Munich 1957), especially p. 29ff. regarding unwillingness to work.

---

[42] Thus A. Ybot Leon in the chapter about the patriarchate in India, which according to the intentions of the Spanish rulers was to weaken the papacy outwardly as well, used illustrations of the twelve Popes from Leo X to Pius VI (op. cit. II, 1–23).

[43] J. Specker, Die Missionsmethode, 36f. The widespread acceptance of the Tridentine regulations led to the great councils of Lima (1583) and Mexico City (1585).

[44] P. de Leturia, "Perchè la nascente chiesa ispano-americana non fu rappresentata a Trento?" Relaciones I, 495–509; F. Mateos, "Ecos de América en Trento," Revista de Indias VI (1945), 559–605.

[45] Regarding the impact of the Tridentine regulations in America see R. Lebroc, "Proyección tridentina en América," MH 26 (1969), 129–207.

the Church as the mystical body of Christ was impressed very quickly on their Christians.[46] The message was deeply rooted in the Holy Scripture and the doctrines of the Fathers.[47] That the dogma was adapted especially to the intellectual capacity of the Indians, is supported by the expression Theologia Indiana.[48] In the sixteenth century this referred to the instructional books and tracts in the native languages. After the sixteenth century this intellectual attitude receded more and more, making way for a purely European-Spanish direction, for instance by translating European catechisms (like the one by Bellarmine) and relegating the Holy Scripture and the Fathers to a position of lesser importance.[49]

In the exterior realm it was primarily the execution of the Tridentine rules concerning the ministry of regulars and their relationship to the bishops which had appalling consequences, especially since both sides, bishops as well as the orders, were somehow right. On the side of the bishops were the regulations of the Council of Trent, at whose inception, however, no one had thought of missionary conditions. On the side of the mendicant orders were experience in missionary practice and the immense distances of the sees.[50] It was self-evident that the increase in the number of secular clerics would place the regular Spanish ministry in their hands. But the conditions were different in the often remote and extensive doctrinas (missionary stations) of the Indians. Their creation and expansion throughout was the work of the mendicant orders, who were executing their priestly functions on the basis of a papal bull of Hadrian VI (1522) known by its abbreviation Omnimoda.[51] These privileges were reaffirmed again and again by successive Popes, such as Pius V in 1567.

---

[46] In addition to the Doctrina of Pedro de Córdoba we should mention especially the works of the first bishop of Mexico, Juan de Zumárraga. See J. Beckmann, "Die Erziehung der Christen zum kirchlichen Denken in der jungen Kirche Mexikos," Novella Ecclesiae Germina (Nijmegen 1963), 45–60; P. Borges, Métodos, 31–44.

[47] J. Specker, "Die Einschätzung der Heiligen Schrift in den spanisch-amerikanischen Missionen," in Beckmann, Die Heilige Schrift in den Katholischen Missionen (Beckenried 1966), 37–71. On the church Fathers see for instance A. Etchegaray, "Saint Augustin et le contenu de la catechèse prétridentine en Amérique latine," RevÉAug 11 (Paris 1965), 277–90.

[48] The name given a few small volumes in an Indian language of Guatemala by Dom. de Vico, a companion of B. de Las Casas. Streit II, 325: the Franciscan Franc. Maldonado also named his religious treatise in three languages of Guatemala (thirteen volumes by the time of his death) "teología indiana muy útil a los ministros evangélicos de aquellas provincias, y muy provechosa a los neófitos" (Beristain de Souza, Bibliotheca Americana Septentrionalis III: Mexiko [1947], 178). One of the finest examples of subtle and tactful adaptation are the translations into the Aztec language of the sermons by the first Franciscans in Mexico preserved by Sahagún (W. Lehmann and K. Kutscher, Sterbende Götter und christliche Heilsbotschaft. Wechselreden indianischer Vornehmer und spanischer Glaubensboten in Mexiko 1524 [Stuttgart 1949]).

[49] The history of the Inquisition, too, has to be viewed in this context. Initially individual inquisitors were appointed as organs of the Spanish Inquisition for certain countries and periods. But toward the end of the sixteenth century independent, full-fledged tribunals were established in Lima (1569), Mexico (1571), and Cartagena (1610). They watched over the faith and morality not only of the Spaniards but also the Indians, who were made subject to the Inquisition in Mexico as early as 1573. See the various sources and histories by J. Toribio Medina. Brazil did not have its own Inquisition; instead the Portuguese crown appointed inquisitors for individual cases. Regarding Mexico see Lopetegui-Zubillaga, Historia, 438–47.

When efforts by the bishops resulted in an increase in the number of secular clerics in the second half of the sixteenth century, and the positions in the cathedral chapters and parishes heretofore administered by missionaries were occupied by them, the secular clergy pushed more and more into the well-established doctrinas of the Indians. The transfer of the doctrinas had already begun in the sixteenth century. In spite of resistance by some orders the change initially took place without resulting in great damage, especially since knowledge of the native language and suitability for serving in the doctrinas were required of the secular clerics as well. Only after the great councils of Lima and Mexico was the extent of the transfer of doctrinas to the secular clergy increased and the earlier missionaries with all their experience and linguistic ability were shunted into the large religious houses in the cities. The great disadvantages of this practice began to have a real effect in the seventeenth century. The most fatal actions in this connections were probably those of Bishop Juan de Palafox y Mendoza (1600–59), bishop of Puebla and visitor general of Mexico since 1639 (in 1642 he was viceroy of Mexico until the arrival of the newly appointed viceroy; he rejected the archbishopric of Mexico and returned to Spain in 1646, where he died as bishop of Osma). Barely having arrived in Mexico, he already submitted to the King an indictment against the Franciscans charging them with usurpation of jurisdiction. The same year he issued his first pastoral letter to the clergy of Puebla, in which he stressed the right of ministry on the part of the secular clergy for the total ministry. In 1642 the Dominican Luis de Orduna sent a defense to the King. But because of the bishop's authority all the doctrinas of the Franciscans were soon transferred to secular clerics. Other bishops in Mexico and South America followed this example. By these actions Palafox had inflicted upon the American Church what was perhaps the worst possible irreparable damage.[52] This becomes clear if one takes into account the fact that the mendicant orders, especially the Franciscans, maintained in their doctrinas, frequently serving more than twenty thousand Indians, relatively small religious houses with only three to five priests. Only one of these, the doctrinero, was paid from government funds, while the others, as auxiliary staff, depended upon the Indians for their livelihood. While the secular priests did use the religious houses as their parish houses, they had no auxiliary staff available to them.[53]

---

[50] J. Specker, Die Missionsmethode, 25–29; P. Borges, Métodos passim.

[51] P. Torres, La Bula "Omnimoda" de Adriano VI (9. 5. 1522) (Madrid 1946).

[52] F. Sánchez-Castañer, Don Juan de Palafox, Virrey de Nueva España (Sarragosa 1964),

The conflicts between the bishops and the Jesuits, resounding worldwide, were concerned with jurisdictional issues, but were primarily centered around the issue of the tithe which the bishop demanded form the missions' property.[54]

In view of the Tridentine reforms and state absolutism, Palafox acted correctly. Privately he had great respect for the Indians and their abilities;[55] he provided a thorough education for the clergy by establishing the first Tridentine seminary in the New World, combining with it the first public library in Mexico.[56] But Palafox overestimated his secular clergy, to whom he respectfully referred in his first pastoral letter as "Venerable Congregación de San Pedro";[57] they could not take the place of the missionaries of the mendicant orders in the doctrinas, especially in the barely accessible ones. Many a parish was soon dissolved as such or rarely visited by a priest, and the unadorned but attractive religious and parish houses fell into ruin.[58]

67–72 (Las doctrinas o Parroquias rurales); idem, comprehensive introduction to the new edition of the works of Juan de Palafox y Mendoza, Tratados Mejicanos, 2 vols. (Madrid 1968); L. Lopetegui and F. Zubillaga, Historia, 729–32.

[53] Individual statistics of the year 1565 already show this phenomenon (instead of two to three Franciscans, more than three Augustinians, five to six Dominicans, and so forth they merely indicate "1 clérigo") (P. Borges, Métodos, 532–34).

[54] The most detailed presentation of the Jesuit point of view is found in Astrain V, 356–411; C. E. P. Simmens ("Palafox and his Critics. Reappraising a Controversy," Hisp. Am. Hist. Rev. [1966], 394–408) tries to defend the measures taken by the bishop of Puebla against the members of orders, especially the Jesuits. He believes that the expulsion of the Jesuits would have been avoided if the bishop had been able to prevail with his reform ideas. Concerning the large land holdings of the orders, especially the Jesuits, see F. Chevalier, La formation des grandes domaines au Mexique (Paris 1952).

[55] He wrote the Virtudes del Indio (1650), a small treatise which went through several editions; Streit II, 515.

[56] This is the Seminario Palafoxiano and the Bibliotheca Palafoxiana in Puebla (J. Specker, "Die 'Bibliotheca Palafoxiana' in Puebla," ED 21 [Rome 1968] [Festschrift Rommerskirchen], 487–509).

[57] Streit II, 472.—For the genesis and significance of this appellation see R. Ricard, "El habito de San Pedro," Bulletin Hispanique 59 (1957), 304–8.

[58] Various illustrations in G. Kubler, Mexican Architecture of the Sixteenth Century, 2 vols. (New Haven 1948).

The problem can be illustrated by the following figures: in the sixteenth century 63.16 percent of the appointed bishops were from religious orders, in the seventeenth century it was still 50.81 percent, but in the eighteenth century it was only 24.25 percent.[59] The development reached a climax of sorts under Bishop Palafox even though it did not actually prevail in the more remote areas. Yet as late as 1722 the nuncio in Madrid received an instruction from Rome for the archbishop of Mexico concerning the transfer of Indian parishes to secular clerics.[60]

The above figures are not intended to represent a value judgment. Among both types of clerics there were superior missionaries. Among the bishops of the secular clergy we should mention the contemporary of Bishop Palafox, Alonso de la Peña Montenegro (1596–1687, bishop of Quito).[61] He, too, looked after his rights vis-à-vis the regulars, the Franciscans and the Jesuits,[62] but without onesidedness and imprudence. His Itinerario para parochos de Indios (Madrid 1668)[63] had an enduring influence throughout the Spanish colonial period. Its tenor is a sense of missionary responsibility and great respect for the Indians, although a strong canonistic-casuistic direction and a narrow application of the Tridentine regulations for the Indian mission are also noticeable.

In the initial stages of missionary work by the secular clergy the lack of linguistic knowledge had an important negative effect. But this was improved by the establishment of teaching chairs for the study of native languages at the large universities of Mexico and Lima and later on in Guatemala and other places; missionaries of the secular clergy produced some outstanding linguistic experts.[64] It was precisely their knowledge of languages and their solidarity with the people which enabled them to participate in extraordinary measure in missionary work and to serve the bishops as visitors or interpreters.[65] Some also fought paganism in their role as writers. In connection with Peru we should mention the works of the mestizo priest Dr. Francisco de Ávila, as well as those of Hernando de Avendaño, Pablo José de Arriaga,[66] and Juan Pérez Bocanegro.[67]

The displacement of the regular clergy gave rise to many a quarrel, especially on the issue of language. The Hispanicizing decrees of the Council of the Indies, applied to the Indian settlements as well, were for the most part without effect because no financial means were allocated for their execution, but especially because the priests in the Indian parishes, both the regular and the secular priests, but above all the mestizos, resisted the decrees most strenuously. Most deleterious was the decision by the archbishop of Mexico, Antonio de Lorenzana (d. 1804 as cardinal-archbishop of Toledo), in a pastoral letter to require the acquisition of Spanish for the benefit of the Indians and the elevation of religious life in Mexico.[68]

---

[59] A. Ybot León, La Iglesia II, 168.

[60] A. de Egaña, La teoría del Regio Vicariato Español (Rome 1958), 302 f.

[61] M. Bandin Hermo, El Obispo de Quito Don Alonso de la Peña Montenegro (Madrid 1951).

[62] Ibid., 189–96: relationship to the Franciscans; 197–222: relationship to the Jesuits.

[63] Streit I, 271 f. The work had five editions, the last one as late as 1771.

[64] C. Bayle, El Clero Secular y la Evangelización de América (Madrid 1950), 197–220.

[65] Ibid., 223–291, and the introduction to the "Crónicas peruanas de interés indígena," Biblioteca de Autores Españoles 209 (Madrid 1968); L. Millones, "Introducción al estudio de las idolatrías. Análises del proceso de aculturación religiosa en la área andina," Aportes (Paris 1967), 47–82.

[66] The Spanish works of these three authors in a new edition are contained in Vol. 209 of the Biblioteca de Autores Españoles. For Francisco de Ávila, see H. Trimborn and Klelm

The character of Portuguese Brazil was completely different from that of the Spanish territories.[69] The Spanish had occupied and settled whole countries, whereas the Portuguese for a long time limited themselves to individual coastal areas. They did not advance into the interior of the country until the seventeenth century and then only did so gradually. The establishment of bishoprics reflects both the colonial and the ecclesiastical expansion. After 1551 Bahia was the only bishopric for over a century. In 1676 it was joined by Rio de Janeiro, Olinda-Recife, and Maranhão; in 1745 by São Paulo and Marianna (Minas Gerais); in 1781 by Goiaz and Cuiabá. Missionary work, too, had initially limited itself to the coastal areas, where Franciscans and Dominicans, Jesuits and Capuchins, but also Benedictines and Carmelites were active in the seventeenth and eighteenth century. In order to Antje, Francisco de Ávila (Berlin 1967); concerning Arriaga and the entire problem, see J. Specker, "Das Weiterleben des Heidentums in den peruanischen Missionen des 17. Jh.," Jb für Gesch. von Staat, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft Lateinamerikas 3 (Cologne 1966), 118–40; C. Bayle, "Los Clérigos y la extirpación de la idolatría en los neófitos americanos," MH 1 (1944), 53–94.—The battle against the enduring paganism was of course also waged by the missionaries of the orders. For the sixteenth century, see P. Borges, Métodos, 247–306; L. Clark Keating, The Extirpation of Idolatry in Peru (Lexington 1968).

---

[67] Ritual, formular e institución de cura para administrar a los naturales de este reino (Lima 1631). Bishop Peña Montenegro also deals with this question comprehensively in his Itinerario para parochos de Indios 6k. II, tract IV (1754), 219–35. In all these works of the Peruvian secular clerics we should not ignore the antipathy, often strong, against the regular clergy. In addition to the documentation for the continuing existence of paganism, which reasonable Indian missionaries never denied, they should also document the deficient missionary work of the regular clergy.

[68] R. Konetzke, "Die Bedeutung der Sprachenfrage in der Kolonisation Amerikas," Jb. für Gesch. von Staat, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft Lateinamerikas 1 (Cologne 1964), 72–116; R. Ricard, "Le problème de l'enseignement du castillan aux Indiens d'Amérique durant la période coloniale," Bulletin de la Faculté des Lettres de Strasbourg 39 (1961), 281–96.

[69] R. Richard, "La Dualité de la civilisation hispanique et l'histoire réligieuse du Portugal," RH 216 (1956), 1–17; idem, "Comparison of Evangelization in Portuguese and Spanish America," The Americas 14 (Washington 1957/58), 444–53.

ameliorate the conflicts between the individual orders there was a rough jurisdictional division of certain areas between the Jesuits, Franciscans, Capuchins, and Carmelites. In the larger monasteries and colleges of the coastal areas the orders also educated native priests, sons of Portuguese settlers, mestizos, and some few Negroes (but no Indians), all of whom demonstrated a higher degree of adaptability and linguistic ability than the European missionaries.[70]

Aside from the effects of patronage, injurious in Brazil as well,[71] missionary work there was hampered in the seventeenth century by the Dutch occupation in the north and the French occupation in the south. But the greatest disaster was slavery. The Dutch occupation (with its center in Pernambuco) united all forces in the country, governmental and ecclesiastical, Portuguese and native, in a common defense. Yet the prevailing attitude towards slavery became a significantly divisive element in missionary work. The Franciscans sought to protect the Indian villages (Aldeias) which they served against the Portuguese slaveholders, whereas the Jesuits under the leadership of the most eloquent Antonio Vieira (d. 1697) pursued their fight against slavery in Brazil as well as in Portugal primarily in the public forum. Neither order achieved any lasting success. In 1640 the Jesuits were even driven out of São Paulo. They were not allowed to return until 1653, and then only after they promised not to oppose the slave expeditions of the Paulists or Bandeirantes inasmuch as the latter were concentrating on the Indians in the reductions of Guairá, which belonged to the Jesuit province of Paraguay. A royal edict of 1758 tried to put a definitive end to Indian slavery although the enslavement of Negroes continued until the end of the nineteenth century.

---

[70] An example of the increasing number of native-born priests is given by the statistics in S. Leite, Suma Histórica de Companhia de Jesus no Brasil (1549–1760) (Lisbon 1965), 257. This shows the Brazilian province in 1757 to have had 210 native-born among a total of 474 members, whereas the vice-province of Maranhão had only 13 Brazilians among 155 members. For the history of the Jesuits in Brazil, see S. Leite, Historia da Companhia de Jesus no Brasil, 10 vols. (Lisbon 1938–50); for the Franciscans, see V. Willeke, O.F.M., "Franziskanermission in Brasilien 1500–1966, NZM 1967 ff; for the Capuchins, see Metodio da Nembro, O.F.M. Cap., Storia dell'attivitá missionaria dei Missioni Cappuccini nel Brasile (1538?–1889) (Rome 1958); for an overview see A. L. Farinha, A expansão de fé na Africa e no Brasil (Lisbon 1942), 419–542. A comprehensive history of the mission in Brazil is lacking.

[71] B. Biermann, O.P., "Die Sklaverei in Maranhão—Brasilien im 17. Jh. Ein unveröffentlichtes Dokument aus der Tätigkeit des P. Ant. Vieira," NZM 13 (1957), 103–18, 217–25; G. Freyre, Casa-Grande e senzala, 2 vols. (Rio de Janeiro 1954), Eng.: The Masters and the Slaves (New York 1946), French: Maîtres et Esclaves (Paris 1952). Regarding the unceasing efforts of the missionaries for the human rights of the Indians, see M. Kiemen, O.F.M., The Indian Policy of Portugal in the Amazonas Region 1619–1693 (Washington 1954).

Under these conditions it is not surprising that the first synod in Brazil was not convened until 1707. On this occasion Archbishop Sebastian da Vida published the first constitutions of the archdiocese of Bahia after he had become personally familiar with the church situation in the country through laborious visitations.[72] The second synod of Brazil did not take place until 1888. The great significance of the Constitutiones of 1707 lies in the fact that for the first time the total religious life of Brazil, down to the last details, was dealt with and regulated in 1,318 paragraphs, giving thought to the Indians and Negroes in the appropriate places with the intention of securing their religious life.[73] The constitutions were printed in Lisbon (1719) and Coimbra (1720), but in 1750 Marquis de Pombal began his activities, which were to be equally disastrous for Brazil.

The Revival of the Missionary Spirit and the Expansion of the Missions

The extant religious missions in America again and again produced prominent men in the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth century, so that the orders cannot be said to have been decaying.[74] The original missionary spirit was revived by new foundations and orientations.

The Franciscans

The rejection of an Indian Church by Philip II and the Council of the Indies damaged the Franciscan mission more than others, as did the gradual transfer of the already established doctrinas to the secular clergy. To be sure, the Franciscans retained a number of doctrinas, even in Mexico, after the actions of such prelates as Bishop Palafox.[75] Propagation of the faith among the remaining pagan Indians was both started and continued, albeit with great sacrifices. But it took Antonio Llinás to bring about a true reorientation.[76] Born in Mallorca in 1635, he joined [72] O. Schulte O.F.M., De primis Archidiocesis Bahiae constitutionibus anno 1707 promulgatis (Rome 1962).

[73] Ibid., 140–66.

[74] The best overview of all the orders is probably A. Ybot León, Iglesia II, for the Franciscans: 243–510; Dominicans: 511–631; Mercedarians: 632–88; Augustinian Hermits: 689–794; Augustinian Recollects: 795–840; Jesuits: 841–994; Capuchins: 995–1028, with an abundant bibliography for each section.

[75] According to a report in 1691 by the archbishop of Mexico 147 parishes and doctrinas were served by regular clerics and only 79 by secular clerics (L. Lemmens, op. cit., 226).

[76] E. R. Paxos, De Patre Antonio Llinás Collegiorum Missionarum in Hispania et America Fundatore 1635–93 (Vich 1936); he is treated in detail by the chronicler F. de Espinosa, O.F.M., Crónica de los Colegios de Propaganda Fide de la Nueva España, ed. by Lino G. Cañedo (Washington 1964), books II–III, 233–443. A good summary is found in D.

the Franciscan order of strict observance and went to Mexico in 1664. After he worked as a lecturer in philosophy and theology for ten years, he became guardian in Valladolid in 1674. He did his duty and pursued music as a hobby. But the stricter observance of the rules of the order and devotion to apostolic work (popular missions) led to his being elected in 1679 as representative to the upcoming chapter general. At the beginning of 1680 he arrived in Spain and used his time until the chapter of Toledo to prepare his lifework, the foundation of mission colleges. For soon after he began his apostolic work, Llinás recognized that the required apostolic manpower could no longer be obtained from the large monasteries in the cities of Mexico, most of which had been in existence for more than one hundred years. In 1682 the general of his order agreed to the statutes of these mission colleges and designated the monastery of the Holy Cross in Querétaro, Mexico, for the planned new foundation; he allowed Llinas to recruit twenty-four missionaries in the Spanish provinces. Innocent XI approved the statutes through a brief of 8 May 1682, the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith did so by decree of 15 June 1682. The Holy Office also assigned the necessary faculties for the apostolic work.[77]

The constitutions of the mission colleges, probably authored by the general of the order, José Ximénez Samaniego,[78] but derived from Llinas's experiences, were based on the perception that true apostolic work is only possible in conjunction with the strictest observance.[79] The monastery of the Holy Cross in Querétaro, the cradle of the mission colleges, was already a monastery of recollection (recolección) and strict observance.[80] As were later mission colleges, it was released from the provincial structure and placed directly under the commissioners of the order in Mexico. The college was to be an institution for training in the missionary parish work and in the languages of the natives. It was planned to enable the missionaries to retreat there for longer or shorter periods of time for the purpose of contemplation. The rule for the new Indian missions was that the missionaries would only work there until the Indians were truly converted and could be left to the care of the

---

Saiz Diez O.F.M., "Los Colegios de Propaganda Fide en Hispanoamérica," MH 25 (1968), 257–318; 26 (1969), 5–113.

[77] The three documents were ratified by the Council of the Indies and approved in 1683 (see R. Pazos, op. cit., 72).

[78] V. Añibarro, O.F.M., "El P. José Ximénez Samaniego Ministro General O.F.M. y Obispo de Placencia," Archivo Ibero-Americano 3 (Madrid 1943), especially 292–309.

[79] F. de Espinosa, Crónica in the introduction by P. L. G. Cañedo, XXVff.

[80] M. B. McCloskey, The Formative Years of the Missionary College of Santa Cruz of Queretaro 1683–1733 (Washington 1955).

secular clerics.[81] Because of the disputes between the native Spanish regulars and the Creoles, the mission colleges sought to refill their ranks with new recruits from Spain, although in principle Creoles and members of other provinces in the country were not excluded.[82] This attitude with its attendant consequences prompted the founder of the college of Querétaro to return to Spain at the end of 1684 in order to save the endangered foundation.[83] The superiors both of the order and the Church renewed their approbation. But Llinás did not go back to Mexico because he was entrusted with a new challenge in Spain which he had not foreseen, but nonetheless accepted with pleasure: the founding of similar mission colleges in Spain, which were to secure a rising generation, grown up and already schooled in the missionary spirit of the overseas colleges. The colleges in Spain were also to take over the task of popular mission there.[84] Their title, Colegios de Propaganda Fide, is surprising and can be traced to the recognition of the foundation in Querétaro by the Propaganda. They were accorded great esteem but no more. The mission colleges were also subject to the Spanish right of patronage. When Llinás was negotiating in Rome in 1685/86, the Spanish ambassador received a letter from the Council of the Indies requesting him to make sure that no patronage rights were violated. It stipulated that Llinás was not to confer about the conversion of the Indians because the King himself, contrary to opinions in Rome, had manifested the greatest concern for the missionary work. All documents written in Rome prior to and at this time were to be submitted again to the Council of the Indies for their appraisal.[85]

---

[81] By means of this regulation the general attempted to prevent conflicts with the secular clergy. Thus the college of San Fernando in Mexico handed the flourishing mission in the Sierra Gorda over to the secular clergy (see M. Geiger, Palou's Life of Fray Junípero Serra (Washington 1955), 35 f.). The basis was the mutual esteem as expressed in the fraternal accord between the secular clergy of Queretaro and the College of the Holy Cross (see F. de Espinosa, Crónica, 217–21 [Hermanidad ejemplar que hizo la muy ilustre y venerable congregacion de Nra. Sra. de Guadelupe con el colegio, a chapter which is exemplary for the new spirit of the colleges]).

[82] For Querétaro, Father Lino Gómez Cañedo lists the following figures for the period of 1683–1750: 142 priests and 14 lay brothers who were from Spain, 58 priests and 36 brothers from among the Creoles who were accepted into the novitiate, and 11 priests and 4 brothers who transferred into the mission college from other provinces (F. de Espinosa, Crónica, XXVIII).

[83] R. Pazos, op. cit., 104ff.

[84] The care applied to the selection process for the mission college is shown by the regulations left for his successors by Father M. Mingo de la Concepción, who represented the mission college of Tarija (Bolivia) in Spain (P. Borges, "Trámites para la organización de las Expediciones misioneras a América [1780]," Archivo Ibero-Americano 26 [Madrid 1966], 405–72).

[85] R. Pazos, op. cit., 112f.

The most important mission colleges were founded in Mexico. The monastery of the Holy Cross continued to be the parent monastery, as it were. The missionaries initially worked in the pagan enclaves of the country, among the Otomis near Querétaro, the Tlaxcaltecs near Puebla, the Coles and Lacadones in the Verapaz, and among the Licques Indians of Honduras. To these were soon added the Talamanca mission in the southeast of Costa Rica and missionary work in what is now Texas. The mission in the Verapaz and among other Indian tribes of Guatemala prompted the establishment of the second mission college of the "Crucified Christ" in the city of Guatemala. Another foundation, "Our Dear Lady of Guadelupe" in Zacatecas, received royal acknowledgment in 1704. Emanating from Zacatecas, the southern stretch of land in the Gulf of Mexico known as Nuevo Santander was successfully missionized.[86] In 1733 the college of San Fernando was founded in the capital; it was confirmed by the King in 1733. Since the Discalced also opened a similar mission college (1733), designed to take over the mission in the barely accessible mountains of Zimapán, Mexico now had five colleges for the propagation of the faith.

Mexico also became the point of departure for the establishment of other colleges in South America. In Ocopa in the south of the archbishopric of Lima the Colegio di Santa Rosa was founded (1724). From 1779 to 1783 it was charged with the mission on the island of Chiloé and later on some additional ones, among them those of the expelled Jesuits.[87] In Colombia the colleges of Popayán (founded 1747 in Quito and relocated 1749 in Popayán) and Cali (1756) were set up. In Tarija (Bolivia) the local college took over the mission among the Chiriguanos in the Chaco, stagnant for over two hundred years. Their apostle was the venerable Franciscus del Pilar, who, living among them as helper and servant of all from 1765 until his death in 1803, gradually overcame their resistance. By 1810 the mission comprised twenty-two stations with 16,425 Christians.[88] In 1756 the college of Chillán (Chile) was founded; after 1767 it was in a position to take over the majority of the missions of the expelled Jesuits.[89] The last college to be founded in the eighteenth century was San Carlos on the Paraná (1784); it was designed especially for the conversion of the Indians in the southern Chaco and in Paraguay.[90] The historian of the Franciscan order justifiably speaks of "that glorious new epoch of the eighteenth century which begins with the entrance of the apostolic colleges into the vineyard of the Lord."[91] The new missionary spirituality is especially well reflected in the life of two men.

---

[86] F. de Lejarza, O.F.M., Conquista espiritual del Nuevo Santander (Madrid 1947). Here, too, the missionaries established twenty-three Indian villages (see pp. 187–295). Following the expulsion of the Jesuits the missionaries of Zacatecas were able to take over the Jesuit missions among the Tarahumara Indians as well (J. A. Alcocer, O.F.M., Bosquejo de la historia del Colegio de Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe y sus misiones. Año de 1788 [Mexico City 1958]; A. M. Carreño, "The Missionary Influence of the College of Zacatecas," The Americas 7 (Washington 1950/51), 297–320).

[87] O. Maas, O.F.M., Las Órdenes religiosas (contains a number of informative documents especially about the activities of this college).

[88] L. Lemmens, op. cit., 319–23. Another Bolivian college was established at the end of the eighteenth century in Tarate.

One of the founders of the Mexican colleges was Antonio Margil (1657–1726). He spent forty-three years in Central America and not only founded the colleges of Guatemala and Zacatecas, but to a large extent put his stamp on the spirit of the colleges. He worked as a missionary in all the areas of Central America, to Talamancas in Costa Rica, and on the other side up to Texas, where he spent the period from 1716 to 1722. After his sermons got him a firm foothold somewhere, he hurried on, leaving his successors to consolidate his achievements.[92] The apostle of California, Junípero Serra (1713–84), belonged to the mission college of San Fernando in Mexico. In 1750 he left the professorship of his native university (Palma de Mallorca) and at first worked among the Indians of the Sierra Gorda and after 1767 as superior of the Franciscan mission in California, initially in Baja California, where the Franciscans of the colleges took over the missions of the expelled Jesuits. Finally, he pioneered the mission in present-day California, where even now a number of Franciscan names are a reminder of the modest beginnings of Indian missions. In a constant fight with regalism, dominant even in California, Serra succeeded in establishing a chain of missionary stations all the way to San Francisco. The state of California has placed a statue of its actual colonizer in the capital in Washington.[93]

---

[89] L. Lemmens, op. cit., 312–16. In 1777 this college initiated the founding of a college for Indian priests the first three of whom were ordained in 1794 (ibid., 313). It was closed in 1811 when the new national government proved to be even more opposed to the Indians than the former Spanish rule.

[90] Ibid., 332. In his history Lemmens makes additional references to smaller colleges as well.

[91] Ibid., 239. F. de Espinosa, Crónica de los Colegios, 783–88 (contains a good summary of the first sixty years of the colleges in Mexico and their actual missionary work).

[92] The first account of his life is by his contemporary F. de Espinosa, El pelegrino Septentrional Atlante . . . (Valencia 1742); Streit III, 130; critical biography by Rios and Leutenegger, Life of Fray A. Margil OFM (Washington 1959).

[93] First biography by his countryman and successor F. Palóu, Relación Histórica (Mexico City 1787) (English translation with critical commentary by M. Geiger [Washington 1955]); The Writings of J. S., trans. and ed. by A. Tibesar, 3 vols. (Washington 1955–56); standard biography by M. Geiger, O.F.M., The Life and Time of Fr. J. S., 2 vols. (Washington 1959).

By the middle of the eighteenth century and the expulsion of the Spanish by the Americans the mission colleges had—with few exceptions—taken the place of the earlier missionaries of the Franciscan provinces in the newly opened missions in the north, and in the states of New Mexico, Texas, Arizona, and California (later annexed by the United States). The spirit of these colleges could only be broken by force,[94] in Mexico by their abolition in 1827, somewhat later in other countries. Just a few of them continued on into modern days, incorporated in the reorganized Franciscan provinces.

The Jesuits

A new impetus to the missionary spirit was expected from the Society of Jesus, which arrived in America relatively late. But government and Church alike wanted the Jesuits above all to serve the Spaniards, or rather the Creoles, especially in the field of education, where they indeed earned their greatest merits, indirectly of benefit to the Indian mission as well. Subaltern officials and the secular clergy were educated in their schools.[95] The dispatch of the Jesuits to America met with great opposition in Spain and indeed even within their own order.[96] Thus the Jesuits only gradually grew into their role as Indian missionaries. Even in the vice-kingdom of Peru, where they had arrived in 1568 and where the propagation of the faith had developed most intensively, it was not until 1576 that the provincial chapter of Cuzco took over the large missionary center of Juli on Lake Titicaca, sending the first missionaries there in the same year.[97] Yet at the colleges of Lima and Cuzco the Jesuits had already worked successfully among the Indians in those areas. The refusal to take over their own doctrinas or Indian parishes was probably based on the fear that this would tie them too closely to the civil and ecclesiastic authorities.[98]

---

[94] An abundance of details in the two volumes of O. Maas, op. cit.—Approximately eighty years after the establishment of the college of Querétaro the Capuchin Father Franc. de Ajofrín praised its apostolic spirit (B. de Carrocera, "Noticias Misionales de Méjico en los años 1763–1767." MH 11 [1954], 221ff.). The same spirit was still widespread in Spain as noted by a report of the Comisario Collector for the year 1811 (F. de Lejarza, "Las Levas misioneras en el siglo XIX," MH 13 [1956], 179–90).

[95] The Jesuits substantially elevated the education and social status of the secular clergy so that together they represented the third party (in addition to the bishops and the mendicant orders) (See R. C. Padden, "The Ordenanza del Patronasgo 1574. An Interpretative Essay," The Americas 12 [Washington 1955/56], 333–54, esp. 353f.).

[96] Astraín II, 284ff.; F. Mateos, "Antecedentes de la entrada de los jesuitos españoles en las Misiones de América (1538–63)," MH 1 (1944), 109–66.

[97] A. Echánovo, "Origen y evolución de la idea jesuítica de 'Reducciones' en las Misiones del Virreinato del Perú," MH 12 (1955), 95–144; MH 13 (1956), 497–540; A. de Egaña, Monumenta Peruana II (Rome 1958), see Index p. 875. But even later on complaints reached Rome which prompted General Claudio Acquaviva to issue his encyclical to the missions (dated 15 June 1584), which Egaña calls the "Carta Magna Misional" of the order (ibid. III, Doc. 100).

In the following period Juli not only became a model of Jesuit missionary work on Lake Titicaca, but a universal center of Peru. The missions of the Maynas (on the upper Amazon in eastern Ecuador), among the Moxos (in present-day Bolivia), and especially in Paraguay had their roots there. The Chiquitos mission in Bolivia, too, was indirectly connected with Juli.[99]

This expansion of the Jesuit colleges and missions in South America resulted in the formation of more and more provinces.[100] What gave these areas, especially the missions among the Indians during the seventeenth and eighteenth century, their very own character was the steady increase of non-Spanish missionaries. Jesuits from countries under Spanish dominion, such as Italians, Flemish, and Walloons were the first to be admitted.[101] Then, towards the end of the seventeenth century, subjects of the Habsburg lands received permission to travel abroad (1678),[102] and finally others as well, such as Germans and Swiss. The major portion of the non-Spanish missionaries went to the reductions in Paraguay. According to A. Huonder, the province of Paraguay, separated from Peru in 1606, included about one hundred twenty-five German-speaking missionaries, most of them in the reductions.[103] The reason for this was not only the fact that the foreign Jesuits in faraway Paraguay were at greater remove from supervision of Spanish officials, but also that their labor and skills were highly esteemed. They excelled as prominent architects and musicians, as for instance the Austrian Anton Sepp von Reinegg or the Swiss Martin Schmid;[104] as ethnologists like [98] In 1576 the eminent mission theoretician José de Acosta was the provincial of the Peruvian province. The decision for the taking over of the doctrinas can probably be attributed to him (L. Kilger, "Die Peru-Relation des José de Acosta 1576 und seine Missionstheorie," NZM 1 [1945], 24–38).

---

[99] In July, for instance, there was a rule that after twenty days of work in the doctrinas the missionaries had to return to the religious house for eight days of spiritual renewal and communal life (A. Echánovo, "Origen y evolución . . . ," MH 12 [1955], 117f.).

[100] Details in Streit II and III and in the supplementary volumes XXIV–XXVI; E. Cardozo, Historiografía Paraguaya (Mexico City 1959).

[101] P. Delattre and E. Lamalle, "Jésuites wallons, flamands, français, missionaires du Paraguay 1608–1767, "AHSI 16 (Rome 1947), 98–176.

[102] F. A. Plattner, "Die Groß-Expedition von Jesuiten deutscher Zunge," NZM 1 (1945), 169–83. These were the expeditions of 1680.

[103] Deutsche Jesuitenmissionare des 17. und 18. Jh. (Freiburg 1899), 139–51; A. Blankenburg, "German Missionary Writers in Paraguay," Mid-America 29 (Chicago 1947), 34–68, 122–31.

[104] F. A. Plattner, Ein Reisläufer Gottes. Das abenteuerliche Leben eines Schweizer Jesuiten P. Martin Schmid aus Baar (1694—1772) (Lucerne 1944); idem, Genie im Urwald. Das

Martin Dobritzhoffer, whose work on the Abipones is highly respected even today, or the Silesian Florian Paucke, whose observations were published only recently.[105] Very much in demand were the German and Flemish brothers who were highly skilled in the trades but were also working as artists and apothecaries. All of this was of great use to the reductions, but caused growing antipathy among the Spanish population in the surrounding countryside.[106] Immense herds of mules and cows provoked the envy of the urban Spaniards.[107] The major export articles were Paraguay tea, the production rights of which was granted to the Indians by a royal cedula on 1645,[108] and woven goods.[109] The tragic outcome of the courageous fight against the slave hunters of São Paulo, leading, in the end, to Portugal's claiming a number of reductions in the present Brazilian state of Paraná contributed significantly to the decline of the large-scale "Indian State" of the Jesuits. The order by the Jesuit general to obey in every way the regulations of the Portuguese and finally the cession to Portugal of seven reductions, together with all their territory (stipulated by the Treaty of Madrid in 1750), had a disastrous effect. The missionaries were forced to abandon their Indians when the latter, deprived of help from the fathers and the other reductions, were defeated in battle by a Portuguese-Spanish alliance. This completely undermined the Indians' confidence in their missionaries. The Jesuits, frequently with great ceremony, had assumed the legal protection over the Indians because they knew all too well that their Christians were sold without mercy on the slave markets of Brazil, especially since they were more valuable to the sellers than other Indians by virtue of their skills in agriculture and the crafts. In 1768 when the Jesuits, together

---

Werk des Auslandschweizers M. Schmid (Zurich 1959); idem, Deutsche Meister des Barock in Südamerika im 17. und 18. Jh. (Freiburg 1960).

[105] Zwettler Codex 420 of P. Florian Paucke. Jesuiten-Mission in Paraguay I (Vienna 1959); II (ibid. 1966); H. Hoffmann, "Der Indianermissionar Florian Paucke SJ aus Winzig in Schlesien," Beiträge z. schles. Kirchengeschichte. Gedenkschrift für Kurt Engelbert (Cologne and Vienna 1969), 376–81.

[106] See especially M. Mörner, The Political and Economic Activities of the Jesuits in the La Plata Region (Stockholm 1953); pp. 6–21 have a thorough introduction to the published and unpublished sources especially of the reductions; pp. 229–41 contain an excellent bibliography.

[107] Even in 1680 there were thirty-five hundred mules sold from Cordoba to Peru (M. Mörner, op. cit., 167). In addition to the mules the college of Buenos Aires, where the superiors of Paraguay province resided, regularly exported approx. twenty thousand other animals (ibid.).

[108] M. Mörner, op. cit., 100. See 150f. regarding the planting of yerba, as the tea was called commercially, its expansion and the resulting decrease of its price on the world market.

[109] M. Mörner, op. cit., 163.

with about one hundred thousand Indians, were driven out of their remaining thirty reductions, there was no resistance on the part of the Indians.[110]

Closely connected with these events was probably the downfall of the social utopias which had initially been nurtured by older Jesuits and then taken root among the Indians, leading to some syncretistic movements among them.[111] In the end, this undermined the vitality of the Indians of Paraguay and the surrounding reductions. Adding the totally paternalistic attitude of the missionaries, which had after all prevailed for 150 years,[112] one can understand in historical terms the extent of the tragedy inherent in the downfall of such an idealistic undertaking. But one must also know that the missionaries of other orders, especially the Franciscans, were no more successful. By 1802 the thirty former Jesuit reductions contained a mere 30,116 inhabitants. A large number had retreated into the forests.

The arrival of the Jesuits in the vast areas of New Granada (Colombia) and Venezuela occurred relatively late and they had few missions there. But early on they built a large college in the port city of Cartagena, the point of entry for vast areas of South America and at the same time the largest place of reshipment in the slave trade. At least two names should be mentioned among the missionaries of this college as an example of the apostolate among the black slaves. Alonso de Sandoval (1571–1652) was not only the actual organizer of this ministry, but also the first and only theoretician of the Negro mission in America. In 1627 a Spanish-language version of his work appeared in Seville.[113] The thirty-two chapters of the first part of his De Instauranda Aethiopum salute dealt with Africa and its cultures, primarily those between the islands of Cape Verde and Angola, from where most of the slaves were coming. The second part describes the miserable conditions of the Negro slaves; the third part treats the qualities and methods required for this special kind of ministry;[114] the fourth part gives the reasons which call for Jesuits above all to dedicate themselves to this task.[115] Sandoval's pupil and successor, the Catalan Pedro Claver (1581–1659), sought to ameliorate the social conditions of his charges as much as possible. He secured the privilege for Negroes of attending Mass in the college church of the Jesuits. He defended them before the courts and the Inquisition. By taking on the role of "slave of the slaves" day after day he was protesting the practice of slavery.[116]

---

[110] R. Lacombe, "Problème et mystère des Jésuites du Paraguay," Sciences Ecclésiastiques 17 (Montreal 1965), 89–109, 283–95. The most informative treatment of the war and its background is provided in G. Kratz, S.J., El Tratado Hispano-Portugues de Límites de 1750 y sus consecuencias. Estudio sobre la abolición de la Compañía de Jesús (Rome 1954).

[111] M. Humbert, "Indiens et Jésuites au Paraguay. Rencontre de deux messianismes," Archives de Sociologie des Religions 27 (Paris 1969), 119–33.

[112] idem, La vie quotidienne du Paraguay sous les Jésuites (Paris 1967).

[113] Streit I, 188. The Spanish title is Naturaleza, Policia sagrada i profana, Costumbres, Ritos, Disciplina—Catechismo Evangélico de todos Etíopes. The work was probably supposed to have had the Latin title De instauranda Aethiopum salute. This is indicated in the preface. A second printing (Madrid 1647) comprised only the first three books (Streit I, 217). A reprint of the Seville edition appeared in 1956 in Bogotá under the title De instauranda Aethiopum salute. El mundo de la esclavitud negra en América.

The Jesuits did not come to the vice-kingdom of Mexico until 1572. Here, too, their principal service was initially to the white population. By and by colleges were built in Mexico, Puebla, Oaxaca, and Valladolid, the great novitiate of Tapozotlán, the seminary of San Ildofonso in Mexico, and the residences in Guadalajara, Pátzcuaro and Vera Cruz. For some time there was no actual Indian mission, a fact which was deplored in contemporary documents by those Jesuits who were eager to missionize. An order by the Jesuit General Acquaviva was required to initiate Indian missionary work of more sizeable proportions;[117] this started in 1584 in the northwestern part of the country. The work not only comprised the Tarahumara Indians,[118] but also the tribes of Sonora and the Pimeria Alta and spread from there across the area of present-day Arizona to Southern California. The most prominent figure among these Jesuit missionaries was a native of Trent, Eusebio Francisco Kino (1645–1711),[119] trained in that southern German province not only to become one of the greatest missionaries, but also a superior explorer and cartographer. The world owes him the first precise knowledge of California.[120] But Father Kino was foremost a missionary and organizer of the far-flung northeastern missions, architect and builder of mission stations and churches. He was so modest about his mission theory that it was not discovered until very recently; it has yet to be evaluated.[121] His greatest worry was the dearth of suitable missionaries; his requests for additional missionaries, especially from German-speaking countries, were fulfilled. H. E. Bolton remarked that more and more "black robes" with non-Spanish names emerge from the annual reports of Pimeria Alta, Sonora, and California during the eighteenth century.[122] Yet the shortage persisted. In his annual report to the general of 1 December 1751 the Swiss provincial Johann Anton Balthasar mentioned that of the 624 members of the Mexican province there were only 111 missionaries available for the territories of the northwest and California.[123] [114] See also the hardly known instructions of the archbishop of Seville, Pedro de Castro y Quiñones, of 1614 for the conversion and ministry of the Negro slaves (Ed. 1956, 463–75).

---

[115] In spite of the zeal for the religious care of Negro slaves there is not a single chapter challenging the principle of Negro slavery either because the author as a product of his time did not consider it a problem or because censorship did not allow it. Unfortunately, a critical appraisal of Sandoval's work is still lacking, as is a general treatment of the religiomissionary problems of the Negro slaves in the Americas.

[116] For the numerous biographies, see Streit II, III, XXIV, XXVI. The last critical biography was written by A. Valtierra, S.J., El santo que libertó una raza (Bogotá 1959), Eng.: Peter Claver Saint of the Slaves (London 1960).

[117] F. Zubillaga, op. cit. III (1585–90) (Rome 1968). Even in 1589 reports indicate that of a total of 180 Jesuits no more than 12 or 13 were in the Indian mission (p. 384).

[118] P. Master Dunne, S.J., Early Jesuit Mission in Tarahumara (Berkely 1948).

[119] The best biography is by the American scholar of the "border mission," H. E. Bolton, Rim of Christendom. A Biography of Eusebio Francisco Kino, Pacific Coast Pioneer (New York 1936, 1960). The most important source for his lifework is the Favores Celestiales, written in 1699–1710 in the nature of a biography, ed. with critical commentary by H. E. Bolton, Kino's Historical Memoir (Rome 1954) (letters by Kino to the generals of the Society of Jesus); idem, Kino writes to the Duchess (Rome 1965), Span. (Madrid 1964) (letters to the great patroness, the duchess of Aveiro); idem., Kino's Plan to the Contrary to Hispanic America, the Jesuit mission in Brazil (after 1503) and Maranhão (after 1627) was more limited in its development, though not for lack of manpower. The Portuguese homeland allowed neither the establishment of a university nor of a press. Industries whose development the Jesuits had aided were restricted or prohibited altogether lest the colonies become too strong. The predominant Jesuit of the seventeenth century was Antonio Vieira (1608–97), whom we have mentioned before.[124] His parents had brought him

---

Development of Pimeria Alta, Arizona and Upper California (Tucson, Arizona 1961) (the great justification to the viceroy of Mexico [1703]).

[120] E. J. Burrus, La obra cartográfica de la provincia mexicana de la Compañía de Jesús (1567–1967), 2 vols. (Madrid 1967), especially I, 15–26 (lists thirty-one maps of areas explored and mapped by Kino; ten of them are published in Vol. 2).

[121] E. F. Kino, S.J., Vida del P. Francesco J. Saeta SJ Sangre Misionera en Sonora, ed. by E. J. Burrus (Mexico 1961). The eighth book of this bibliography is entitled: "Dictámenes de Misionero Apostólico del Venerable Padre Francisco Javier Saeta, sacados de sus cartas y de su religiosa conversación," 159–83.

[122] Rim of Christendom, 594.—For the first two areas he names: Benz, Fraidenegg, Gerstner, Gratzhoffer (= Kratzhoffer), Hoffenrichter, Hlava, Keller, Klever, Kolub, Kürtzel, Middendorff, Miner, Mentwich, Och, Pauer, Rhuen, Sedelmayr, Segesser, Slerag, Steb, Stiger, Wazer and Weiß; for California: Baegert, Bischoff, Consag, Ducrue, Gasteiger, Gordon, Helen, Link, Neymayr, Retz, Tempis, Teursch and Wagner. Concerning the missions in California see P. M. Dunne, Black Robes in Lower California (Berkeley 1968).

[123] Ms. in the archive Al Gesù "Fondo Jesuitico," 630 C.

[124] R. Ricard, Antonio Vieira et les missions du Brésil septentrional au XVII^e^ siècle (Louvain 1927) (also in Études et documents [Louvain 1930], 189–203); C. R. Boxer, A Great Luso-Brazilian figure: Padre Ant. Vieira (Paris 1960); M. Haubert, L'Église et la défense des "sauvages": Le Père Ant. Vieira au Brésil (Brussels 1964). These new works list the collections of sources, his writings, and fifteen volumes of his sermons.

to Brazil as a little boy; in 1623 he joined the Society of Jesus. Having worked as Portuguese legate in various countries, he returned to Brazil as a missionary in 1652. Because of his fair and humane partisanship for the Indians he and the other Jesuits of the college of Belem were deported to Portugal by the colonists. Some individual doctrines in his prophetic, utopian works, primarily in his Esperanças de Portugal, Quinto Imperio do Mundo and the Historio de futuro, resulted in his being jailed by the Inquisition after a trial lasting four years. A change of government brought about his release in 1669.[125] Vieira viewed the widely expanded system of patronage as the instrument willed by God for the final realm of the Messiah, the fifth realm of the eschatology coinciding with the universal rule of Portugal.[126] While he was in Rome to justify himself from 1669 to 1675, he was removed from the jurisdiction of the Portuguese Inquisition, but he rejected all ecclesiastical offices offered to him. After twenty years of banishment he returned to the Maranhão mission, where he died at the age of eighty-nine at the college of Bahia. The strength of the Society of Jesus in Brazil now seemed to be spent. The discovery of the gold mines of Minas Gerais and the coffee plantations of São Paulo no longer offered the same possibilities for missionizing as before. In 1759 the Jesuits were expelled by Pombal.

After an auspicious start, the wars between the Iroquois and Hurons and the killing of the Jesuits working among them (1642–49) brought an end to the mission in the French colonies. Only after 1665, when Carignan secured Canada for the French, was missionary work able to be resumed in earnest. The Jesuits joined in it until the Peace of Paris in 1763, which relinquished Canada to England. During these 100 years they furnished 320 missionaries, most of them for the five Indian villages built after the fashion of Paraguay.[127] As a result of an agreement between the Jesuits and the French Capuchins (1632), the latter worked in Nova Scotia while the Sulpicians, the Paris Missionaries, and the [125] The trial is treated in the 2-volume work of Hernani Cidade, Ant. Vieira, Defesa Perante o Tribunal do Santo Oficio (Bahia 1957).

---

[126] R. Ricard, "'Prophecy and Messianism in the Works of Antonio Vieira," The Americas 17 (April 1961), 357–68.

[127] For sources and literature see Streit II and III. F. B. Steck, O.F.M., Marquette Legends (New York 1960) (Attempts to prove that Marquette was not the discoverer of the Mississippi, but two of his younger fellow religious who used the great reputation of the older man to issue the reports under his name); also C. de Rochemonteix, Les Jésuites et la Nouvelle France au XVIII^e siècle, 2 vols. (Paris 1906); S. Delacroix, op. cit. II, 281–99.—C. C. O'Neill, Church and State in French Louisiana (New Haven 1966).

Recollect Franciscans supported the work of the Jesuits in Canada proper.

During the Indian Wars a number of Catholic Indians had been pushed south and southeast. This occasioned the great explorations of the Jesuits, foremost the ones by Jacques Marquette (1637–75), who reached the Mississippi in 1673 and worked among the Illinois and Miami Indians. Other Frenchmen, such as de la Salle, among whose companions was the Franciscan Louis Hennepin (d. 1701), succeeded in exploring the entire stream to its estuary. The Jesuits restricted their mission work to the Indian tribes in the northern areas with whom they were familiar, while others, especially those of the Foreign Missions of Paris, were active farther in the south. None of these groups was truly successful. In spite of all efforts Louisiana was not given its own church organization; it was under the jurisdiction of Quebec until the eighteenth century.

Other Orders

The Dominicans were the first missionaries of Peru; from there they spread all over South America. The two saints of this order in Peru can be considered as programmatic symbols: Rosa of Lima (1586–1617), a Creole, member of the Third Order and example of a contemplative, mystical life,[128] and Martín de Porras (or Porres, 1569–1639), a mulatto from Lima trained in the art of healing, a Dominican brother who gave himself in charitable love to all, regardless of class or race.[129]

The Dominicans also maintained the Indian missions established in the sixteenth century and further expanded them during the next two centuries. They achieved special merit in the promotion of higher education. In addition to the state universities in Lima and Mexico City founded in the sixteenth century, they operated the University of Santo Domingo from 1538 into the eighteenth century. In 1620 they initiated a studium generale in Guatemala which was expanded into a full-fledged university as the Real y Pontificia Universidad de San Carlos, recognized in 1676. Following this, two more universities were founded: the Universities of Santiago de Chile (1685) and Quito (1688). The seventeenth century also marked the beginning of a most quarrelsome competition with the Jesuits, who were able to base their claim on papal briefs similar to those of the Dominicans. As a result, places such as

---

[128] The first biography appeared in 1654 (Streit II, 536), a second one in 1659 (ibid., 550); further biographies appeared almost annually in all sorts of languages.

[129] Sanctification in 1962. More recent biographies by Vargas Ugarte (Buenos Aires 1949), John Jordan (Dublin 1957), and E. Romero (Lima 1959).

Bogotá, Quito, and Santiago de Chile soon had a Dominican and a Jesuit university. The Dominican monastery of San Juan de Letrán in Cuba was expanded into a university in the eighteenth century, as was their Colegio Seminario of Caracas.[130] In some fashion all these institutions were in the service of the Indian mission because the secular as well as the regular clergy received their education and their training in the native languages there.

The humanistic aspect of missionary work in the sixteenth century was primarily represented by the Augustinian Hermits. Alonso de la Vera Cruz was the first professor of theology in the New World (University of Mexico); even his first lectures in 1553/54 dealt with the Indian problem in the spirit of Las Casas and with the weapons of a theologian schooled in Salamanca.[131] The fact that succeeding generations of Augustinian Hermits of the seventeenth century were filled by his spirit is demonstrated by the chronicles of Fray Antonio de la Calancha[132] and Francisco Romero. The latter, a Creole Augustinian from Peru and itinerant missionary of South America, wrote the very moving Llanto Sagrado de la América Meridional, printed in Milan in 1693. It was a fearless indictment of the Spanish policy of exploitation of the Indians and was immediately confiscated by the Inquisition.[133] In spite of their efforts Romero and the missionaries recruited by him did not succeed in converting the Tames Indians in the province of Popayán in present-day Colombia.[134] At the beginning of the seventeenth century the wilderness of Raquira became the site of the first hermitage, Our Lady de la Candelaria, founded by the reform movement of the Barefoot Augustinians (Recollects). It became the focus of renewed missionary zeal and religious renewal for Colombia, Venezuela, Central America, and later on for Peru and Mexico. But the Philippines ultimately were to become the most fertile missionary field for them.[135] [130] R. Konetzke, "Spanische Universitätsgründungen in Amerika und ihre Motive," Jb. für Gesch. von Staat, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft Lateinamerikas 5 (Cologne 1968), 111–59.

---

[131] E. J. Burrus, "Las Casas and Veracruz: their Defense of the American Indians Compared," NZM 22 (1966), 201–12; idem, The Writings of Alonso de la Vera Cruz II: The Defense of the Indians: Their Rights. Latin Text and English Translation (Rome and St. Louis 1968).

[132] Cronica Moralizada del Orden de San Augustín en el Perú I (Barcelona 1639), II (Lima 1653).

[133] For the long title of the Milan edition see Streit II, 655.

[134] J. Metzler, "Das Missionsunternehmen des Francisco Romero O.E.S.A. Ende des 17. Jh.," NZM 21 (1965), 1–17.

[135] In addition to A. Ybot León, op. cit. II, 795ff., see especially J. A. Salazar, Los Estudios eclesiásticos superiores en el Nuevo Reino de Granada 1563–1810 (Madrid 1946), 123ff. and the Bullarium Ordinis Recollectorum S. Augustini I (Rome 1954), II (1961).

The last Spanish missionaries in the Americas of the seventeenth century, the Capuchins, initially went to what is now Venezuela. The Council of the Indies had been unwilling to admit yet another order to America. But the lay brother Francisco de Pamplona, formerly General Don Tiburcio de Redín (with excellent connections to Philip IV), prevailed in having missionary work initiated first in Darien and then in Venezuela proper (1650).[136] The first Capuchins did not establish large monasteries nor did they accept novices from the ranks of the Creoles. Thus they maintained closer ties with their Spanish homeland provinces than the other orders.[137] They also sought to implement a new method of missionary style. From the north they advanced to the yet unconverted Indians, establishing small houses and gradually moving farther and farther south and southeast. Thanks to their unobtrusive method they were able to survive the tumult of the times.[138]

It is a striking fact that the participation of the nuns in the task of conversion in America has either been omitted or at best just cursorily described.[139] Remarks by early writers permit us to conclude that the problem of women's education was indeed tackled, since Bishop Juan de Zumárraga, to whom Queen Isabella had sent help in the persons of tertiaries (Beatas) in 1531 and 1535. Towards the end of the seventeenth century there were twenty-two convents in the city of Mexico alone and ten in Puebla.[140] All of these convents counted among their pupils Spanish, Creole, and Indian girls.[141] Such convents were also founded exclusively for Indian girls, daughters of caciques, among them the convent of Corpus Christi in Mexico (1724).[142] Emanating from here, the Indian convents of Cosamalsapán (1737) and Oaxaca (1782) were established with the particular aim of avoiding tensions among the races. Indian women had never been denied admittance to the orders.[143] The provincial synod of Charcas (Sucre, Bolivia) of 1629 indeed stressed that all sisters would enjoy equal rights in the convents. It emphasized that half-castes were to be accepted among the officiating nuns, "cum apud Deum fides non genus in pretio sit."[144] In the more distant provinces missionaries probably followed the example of the Beatas of the sixteenth century, founding Beaterios with the daughers of Indians. Two such convents are mentioned by the Capuchin friar Francisco de Ajofrín in his memoirs concerning his mendicant travels in Mexico.[145] The chronicler of the Dominican province of Guatemala reports that Benito de Villacañas founded such Beaterios in Guatemala and San Juan Sueatepequez and wrote the life of Christ and of Saint Catherine of Siena in the language of the sisters, that is, in Cacchiquel.[146] Only a thorough study will be able to show the extent of the contribution to the cultural life of the individual countries made by the convents. At this time it is enough to mention the poetess, dramatist, and essayist Sister Juana Inéz de la Cruz (1648–95), a Creole and Carmelite nun, still recognized throughout the tumultuous history of her native land as "the most important author ever born in Mexico."[147]

---

[136] The first biography was written by the Capuchin chronicler Mateo de Anguiano, Vida y virtudes del Capuchino Español, el Venerable Servo de Dios Fray Francisco de Pamplona (Madrid 1686); a modern critical one by L. de Aspurz (Madrid 1951); see also B. de Carocera, "F. Francisco de Pamplona, organisador de Misiones y conductor de Misioneros," MH 9 (1952), 5–51.

[137] For the American Capuchin mission see Froilán de Rionegro, Relaciones de las Misiones de los PP. Capuchinos en las Provincias españoles hoy República de Venezuela (1650–1817), 2 vols. (Seville 1918). Additional sources and literature in A. Ybot-León. op. cit., 1021ff.

[138] Information about the ethnological and linguistic works of the Capuchin friars provided in their journal Venezuela Misionero I (Caracas 1938)ff.

[139] I am not aware of any comprehensive work on this topic although reference is made to it in individual sources and in monographs about several convents.

[140] F. Chevalier, La formation des grands domaines au Mexique (Paris 1952), 330f.

[141] Ibid., 331. About the convents of Mexico City see the monograph by J. Muriel, Conventos de monjas en la Nueva España (Mexico City 1946). At the beginning of the seventeenth century Lima had six convents. B. Cobo, S.J., Fundación de Lima, ed. by F. Mateos (Madrid 1956), 428–33; of special interest is the chapter on the Carmelite nuns, "Del colegio de Nuestra Señora del Carmen," 434–36; it also maintained a girls' school and a girls' orphanage. For the educational work of a Dominican convent in Oaxaca, see J. Muriel, "Notas para la Historia de la educación de la mujer durante el Virreynato," Estudios de Historia Novohispaña II (1968), 25–33.

---

[142] J. Muriel, Las indias caciques de Corpus Christi (Mexico City 1963); in addition to a thorough introduction this work contains eight biographies of Indian sisters.

[143] F. de Lejarza, O.F.M., "Expansión de la Clarisas en América y Extremo Oriente," Archivo Ibero-Americano 14 (1954), 446f., 450f. Another convent was dedicated in the province of Michoacán (Valladolid) in 1743. The dedicatory sermon was given by the secular priest Juan Wallo Anguita. It was published under the title: Oración panegírico de la dedicación del convento de indias capuchinas de Valladolid de Michoacán (Mexico City 1743). Beristain de Sousa, Bibliografía Hisp. Am. Sept. I (Mexico City 1947), 144.

[144] MH 21 (1964), 120.—That Negresses were accepted is shown by a remark of the Franciscan chronicler Diego de Córdova Salinas, Crónica Franciscana de las Provincias del Perú, ed. by L. G. Cañedo (Washington 1957), 950. He speaks of a Negress who entered the Clarisse convent of Cuzco together with her daughter when they were freed from slavery.—Poor Indian women who did not have the required dowry often came as servants to their Creole mistresses, whom they continued to serve in the convent and in whose cells they usually lived. (See the reference in J. de Palafox y Mendoza, Virtudes del Indio [Madrid 1893], 58).

[145] B. de Carrocera, O.F.M.Cap., "Noticias Misionales de Méjico en los años 1763 à 1767," MH 11 (1954), 218 (Xalapa), 227 in Salvatierra. About the Beaterios of the Indian sisters in the sixteenth century, see esp. G. de Mendieta O.F.M., Historia Eclesiástica Indiana (Mexico City 1870), 420–24.

[146] F. Ximénez O.P., Historia de la Provincia de San Vicente de Chiapa y Guatemala II (Guatemala 1930), 49. The Calle de las Beatas Indias in Guatemala is mentioned on p. 282.

The alleviation of misery and disease was the goal not only of all the religious orders but also of the native societies, such as the numerous brotherhoods, founded for Spaniards, Indians, and Negroes. Social aid in all of Brazil was taken over primarily by the brotherhood of the Misericordia, whose model dates back to 1498 in Lisbon. The Hospitalers of Saint John of God, active in Mexico since 1603, especially excelled in the nursing of the sick. From Mexico they spread out to the Central and South American countries, establishing their hospitals and gaining the recognition of all levels of the populace in the service of lepers and those sick with the plague. In Mexico alone sixteen of their number died during the plague of 1736.[148] Long before this, in 1594, Clement VIII had granted the privileges of hospitalers to a society in Mexico founded by Bernardino Álvarez. They were named Hippolites, after the first hospital they built in Mexico dedicated to Saint Hippolyte. After the first vow dedicating themselves to the care of all the sick, they also took the vow of obedience and after 1700 also that of celibacy.[149]

The order of the Bethlemites, originated in Guatemala, maintained its own character. It went back to Pedro de San José Betancur (1616–67), who initially undertook the education of children, but then included the care of convalescents, especially of strangers and transients. After Betancur's early death his helpers continued his work. They founded an order of lay brothers which was recognized by the Pope in 1672 and spread surprisingly fast to Mexico and South America. Towards the end of the eighteenth century the order deteriorated and was dissolved in 1820. At this time it still operated ten hospitals in the Mexican and twenty-two in the Peruvian provinces.[150] A similar foundation for women, started by Maria Anna del Galdo in Guatemala (1688), did not grow very much and was also discontinued in 1820.[151]

Every one of these hospitaler orders had physicians trained in the native country. The fact that racial discrimination had no place in the treatment of the sick constitutes a great part of its missionary importance.

---

[147] Most recent collected works in Mexico City 1969.—In a monograph R. Ricard shows the poetess combined Spanish-Creole and native Indian elements into a natural unity: "Sur 'El Divino' Narciso de Sor Joana Iñés de la Cruz," Mélanges de la Casa de Velasquez 5 (Paris 1969), 309–29.

[148] L. Lopetegui and F. Zubillaga, Historia, 736–38.

[149] Ibid., 736; Heimbucher I, 607f.

[150] J. Specker, "Der Spiritualorden der Bethlehemiten in Lateinamerika (1667–1820)," Das Laien-Apostolat in den Missionen (Festschr. Joh. Beckmann) (Schöneck/Beckenried 1960), 181–99.

[151] Heimbucher I, 609.

The Enlightenment and Its Consequences

A fair evaluation of the Enlightenment in Latin America is a difficult undertaking even now. The intellectual history of Spain and Portugal of the eighteenth century as a period of obscurantism and Scholastic rigidity has received scant attention up to the most recent past. This holds true even more so in regard to America, little of whose intellectual life in the colonial period is known in Europe. As a consequence, historical research has shown little interest in the cultural phenomena in which the missionaries had a significant part.[152] The first generation of missionaries in Mexico, such as the Bishops Juan de Zumárraga and Vasco de Quiroga, were guided by contemporary humanists: Zumárraga by Erasmus,[153] Quiroga by Thomas More.[154] This intellectual attitude continued to be the determinant, especially for the missionary work. Two institutions were always connected with European intellectual life: the libraries, especially those of the monasteries, and the universities.

Although there are only a few monographs and precious few particulars or even inventories of books from the earliest times, references in letters, chronicles, and books relating to libraries[155] manifest two facts: 1. their collections were comprehensive; theological works most surely predominated, but there was no dearth of works from classical and modern literature; 2. new European publications, even from distant or

---

[152] "The history of rationalism and Enlightenment in Brazil has remained almost totally uninvestigated; their impact on the religious life of Brazil cannot yet be estimated" (R. Konetzke, "Forschungsproblem zur Gesch. der Religionen und ihrer Bedeutung in den Kolonisationen Amerikas," Saeculum 10 [1959], 95).—This remark to some degree is true also for Spanish America, for which there is no comprehensive work either. The thorough treatise by J. Sarrailh, L'Espagne éclairée de la seconde moitié du XVIII^e siècle (Paris 1954) is limited to Spain, but does permit some conclusions regarding the New World.

[153] M. Bataillon, Erasmo y España, 2 vols. (Mexico City and Buenos Aires 1950), esp. the last chapter of Vol. 2 concerning the influence of Erasmus in Mexico; this chapter is missing in the French edition.

[154] S. Zavala, La "Utopia" de Tomás More en la Nueva España (Mexico City 1937); newly edited with supplementary studies in Recuerdo de Vasco de Quiroga (Mexico City 1965).

[155] F. Fernández de Castillo, Libros y Libreros del siglo XVI (Mexico City 1914) (mostly booklists compiled by officials of the Inquisition on the arrival of ships in Veracruz). The Argentinian Jesuit and historian G. Furlong refers to such a work ironically: "A los pobres de espíritu que creen y propagan que el Nuevo Mundo no llegaban sino novenas y trisagios, les recomendamos nuestra monografía sobre las Bibliotecas Argentinas durante la Dominación Hispánica (Buenos Aires 1944)" (Nacimiento y desarrollo de la Filosofía en el Río de la Plata 1536–1810 [Buenos Aires 1952], 52).

Protestant cities, reached the Spanish American countries relatively quickly.[156]

The universities were decisive elements of intellectual life. Towards the end of the colonial period there were twenty-three universities in Spanish America. Seven of them were comprehensive state universities, probably with a faculty of theology, but—just as in Spain—operated by secular and regular priests. In addition to the state universities there were sixteen other ones, recognized by the state, with only faculties of philosophy and theology. Fourteen of these were led by the various orders, two of them by bishops. The preponderance of higher education was undeniably in the hands of the state universities, in which laymen had the major influence.[157]

Libraries and universities prepared the way for the advance of new ideas and the advance of the Enlightenment with its positive and negative elements. The Jesuit college of Saint Paul in Lima contained the collected works of Isaac Newton, as well as histories and publications of the Académie des sciences and the Prussian Academy in Berlin. The major works of one of the most important forerunners of positive Enlightenment, the Benedictine Benito Gerónimo Feijóo y Montenegro (d. 1764), the Teatro crítico universal in eight volumes and the Cartas Eruditas in six volumes were to be found not only in the college libraries but also in the private libraries of the professors.[158] Even works by the English deists were widely represented in the libraries. But the French deists Bayle, Voltaire, Rousseau, and the Encyclopedists were not available in the overseas territories until the Spanish minister Count de Aranda ordered their importation.[159] The Latin works of the German philosopher Christian Wolff could be found in several libraries of Latin America.[160] (see Chap. 18)

---

[156] See for example J. Beckmann, "Alte Basler Drucke im Dienste der Christianisierung Mexikos," ZSKG 59 (1965), 107–12. In arguing that the activities of the Inquisition militated against the exchange of ideas with the European centers of culture, the great difference between theory and practice is often overlooked. There were, to be sure, very strict regulations for the export and import of suspect or even heretical books. But the findings of M. Defourneaux (L'inquisition espagnole et les livres français au XVIII^e siècle [Paris 1963]) regarding the eighteenth century are valid for the seventeenth and sixteenth centuries as well: for periods of years and, indeed, decades the book dealers of Seville were not at all checked by the officials of the Inquisition. The lists published by F. Fernández de Castillo (op. cit.) are representative for the import; again and again there is a notation that so and so many crates of books were destined for members of the orders who were exempt from the controls of the Inquisition. The remainder, rather superficially catalogued, was probably only for sale by the bookdealers.

[157] Of 150,000 academic degrees awarded between 1550 and 1821 the number awarded by the University of Mexico alone amounted to 39,367 (J. T. Lanning, "The Church and the Enlightenment in the Universities," The Americas 15 [1958/59], 334).

[158] L. Martín, The Intellectual Conquest of Peru, The Jesuit College of San Pablo (New York 1968), 93–96. The works of Feiyóo in Spanish and Latin were present in all libraries "from Mexico City to Tucumán" (G. Furlong, op. cit., 64).

These books were eagerly studied everywhere and used in lectures at the universities and colleges. Wherever the well-educated Creoles, even missionaries at remote stations, manifested familiarity with the intellectual currents of Europe, they owed it to the education they had received at the universities or at their monasteries.[161] The two examples of the Jesuit universities of Quito and Córdoba demonstrate the reception of modern European intellectualism. The Swiss Jesuit Jean Magnin in Quito was probably the first to deal systematically with René Descartes after 1746.[162] The English Jesuit Falkner, a pupil of Newton, introduced experiments in the natural sciences in Córdoba and closely followed Christian Wolff in his philosophy lectures.[163] His fellow Jesuit Domingo Muriel before him had incorporated modern philosophy in his lectures. In 1749 one of his students wrote about him: "In order to further the understanding of the old scholastic philosophy he added a precise knowledge of the modern."[164] Richard Konetzke justifiably countered the wrong impressions by saying "that rationalism and the Enlightenment were propagated early and quickly in Spanish America, where contemporary European currents were almost immediately experienced . . . it was precisely the priests, monks, and prebendaries who were the forerunners of the Enlightenment in Spanish America . . ., modern ideas were promulgated especially by the Jesuits . . ."[165] Thus the ideas of the Enlightenment were able to be promulgated on all the cultural levels of the individual American countries through the universities, colleges, and seminaries. Initially they had a positive effect. The level of studies was raised everywhere and expanded; a fresh wind blew through the institutions of learning, which had become somewhat rigid.[166] Research centers in the natural sciences were established, as were associations of scholars. There was a first wave of periodicals, but it died out after a few years even in the large countries such as Mexico and Peru. In all these movements the clergy furnished the initial contributors; the episcopate promoted participation or at least did not oppose it. The Inquisition generously granted permission for the reading of proscribed books or overlooked violations of the Index.[167] Overall, the Enlightenment in Latin America was able to develop more freely than was initially the case in Europe.

---

[159] G. Furlong, op. cit., 47.

[160] G. Furlong, op. cit., index, 751.

[161] Although the individual orders had the upper levels of philosophy and theology taught by their own members, the latter nonetheless had to earn their required degrees for teaching at the universities.

[162] He had translated a work about Descartes from French into Latin, a manuscript of 262 pages, which is kept at the National Library of Quito. J. Beckmann, "La première Traversée de la Colombie par un missionaire suisse (1725). Le Père Jean Magnin SJ," Annales Fribourgeoises 46 (1964), 33–65.—G. Furlong, Filosofía, gives the subtitle "Cartesianismo" to the second part, which treats mainly the philosophy after the expulsion of the Jesuits to the end of the eighteenth century (223–483).

[163] G. Furlong, op. cit., 177f.

[164] "Añadiendo a la comprensión de la antigua filosofía escolástica, el conocimiento puntal de la moderna" (G. Furlong, op. cit., 178).

[165] Research topic 95. The reaction of the individual orders to the Enlightenment was not alike. The Franciscans everywhere had explicit orders to follow "modern" currents and in a good many places, esp. in Guatemala, were members of the leading circles. The Dominicans did not have a uniform direction. Depending on conditions and pressure they either defended the old Scholastic methods or took over the new ones (J. T. Lanning, op. cit., 343ff.).

Initially the intellectual elements of the Enlightenment had less of a negative impact than the abuses of regalism (Chap. 11), whose anti-Roman tendencies were strengthened by the skillful promotion of Gallican and Febronian ideas.[168] Most fatal—especially overseas—was the implicit acceptance of decisions by the state in religious matters, which became more and more a matter of course. Two events had far-reaching consequences. The expulsion of the Jesuits, initiated in 1759/60 by the Marquis de Pombal both in Portugal and the colonies, was followed by the Spanish colonies in 1767. It was executed smoothly but mercilessly, ending in 1768 in the deportation of the missionaries from the reductions of Paraguay. In regard to Brazil and the Spanish colonies various reasons were advanced to justify the expulsion of the Jesuits. The main one was that the Jesuits because of their inner structure could not be made an integral part of the regalist framework of enlightened absolutism.[169] Just how seriously the regalist attitude, especially of some bishops, obstructed a realistic view of the issue is demonstrated by the pastoral letter of the bishop of Puebla, Fabián y Fuero, dated 28 October 1767, which referred to the expulsion of the Jesuits as part of the "rightful use of privileges which God accorded to the King along with the crown."[170] The other equally portentous event was the provincial synods of 1771, invoked by the Spanish King. A detailed list of points to be negotiated, the tomo regio, had been given beforehand to the members of the synods by the Council of the Indies. Archbishop Francesco Antonio de Loranzana presided over the synod of Mexico; those of Lima and La Plata took place in 1772. Loranzana submitted decrees drafted by him and the bishop of Puebla, Fabián y Fuero, and then simply called for a vote, precluding any discussion. In order to prove their loyalty to the representative of the viceroy they added two provisions which threatened the penalty of excommunication for any form of resistance to a royal decree or any insult to the King.[171] When the bishop of Durango, José Vicente Díaz Bravo, called this procedure tyrannical, he was put on trial, deprived of his bishopric, and sent to Madrid to defend himself. He died on the journey to Spain.[172] Loranzana and his colleague from Puebla, on the other hand, were promoted, the former to the office of archbishop of Toledo (1789) and to the cardinalate, the latter was elevated to the bishopric of Valencia.[173] These regalist synods were never recognized by Rome and even Loranzana did not dare submit the acta to Rome.

---

[166] In the somewhat modest San Carlos University of Guatemala the number of baccalaureate examinations in philosophy was 108 during the first quarter of the eighteenth century; it was 538 in the last quarter; the corresponding figures for philosophy were 22 and 79 resp. The licentiates and doctorates in theology at the University of Mexico increased from 107 to 184 (J. T. Lanning, op. cit., 339).

[167] K. Schmitt, "The Clergy and the Enlightenment in Latin America," The Americas 15 (1958/59), 381–91.

[168] It is typical that the works of the French Oratorian Fleury, of Bernhard Zeger van Espen, professor at Louvain, and of the suffragan bishop of Trier, Hontheim (=Febronius) were prohibited by the Roman Index but not by the Spanish one (N. M. Farris, op. cit., 102).

[169] M. Mörner, The Expulsion of the Jesuits from Latin America (New York 1965), a collection of opinions by prominent historians of all persuasions; idem, "The Expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain and Spanish America 1767 in the Light of 18th Century Regalism," The Americas 23 (1966/67), 156–64. A more recent French Americanist, P. Chaunu, expresses the opinion of historians which prevails today: "Il est incontestable que l'acte de l'expulsion des Jésuites de 1767 a porté un coup extrêmement dur à

The negative elements of the Enlightenment as an intellectual movement were noticeably slow to develop in America. They were, moreover, of a different nature from those in Europe (Chap. 18). Eighteenth-century America appeared not at all to be a carbon copy of European mentality. Even in the transition to the nineteenth century, America represented the most diverse views encompassing the entire l'œuvre de l'Espagne dans le nouveau monde. Sur ce point, adversaires et amis sont définitivement d'accord: puisque, dans leur œuvre civilisatrice, dans l'aide qu'ils apportèrent à la colonisation, les milliers des Jésuites expulsés n'ont pu être remplacés" (RH 214 [1955], 159). The same is stated for the Portuguese territories by C. R. Boxer: "Whatever the failings of the Jesuits, the fact remains that they were the best educators, teachers, and missionaries in the Portuguese colonial world. Their sudden and drastic removal left gaps which were not filled for centuries, if indeed they have all been filled at the present day" (Four Centuries of Portuguese Expansion, 1415–1825. A Succinct Survey [Johannesburg 1963], 84).

---

[170] N. M. Farriss, op. cit., 52.

[171] Ibid., 32–38.

[172] Ibid., 26f.

[173] Ibid., 35.

spectrum from strict spirituality to rationalistic thought. G. Furlong has called this period in Argentina that of "Eclecticismo."[174] An actually anticlerical, radically nationalistic current appeared later when the university chairs were occupied by Creoles who had received their education in Coimbra (dominated by Pombal),[175] or at French universities, and to a lesser extent in Spain. Yet at the turn of the nineteenth century political freedom was the one element which unified all the different currents.

The paradoxical aspect of the Spanish movement of liberty and independence lies in the fact that it was triggered primarily by the enlightened absolutism of the mother country and especially by the often farsighted and just rules for reform. Although many a utopian concept may have been connected with them,[176] the improvement of conditions, especially for the Indians, and the elimination of the vestiges of slavery and forced labor were based precisely on these rules.[177] The abovementioned role of the Creoles in the context of the Enlightenment is very ambivalent, for the ideals of freedom valid for all mankind contradicted their traditional economic and political world. While they did claim these freedoms for themselves, they denied them to the Indians. From this Creole element emerged the Spanish-speaking clergy who were in the front lines in the wars of independence.[178]

The victims of these conflicts were the Indians. The Spanish had oppressed and exploited them, but for all that they had at least created a paternalistic relationship which was sought to be further improved by the enlightened monarchs and their ministers. Although the Indians for the most part had fought on the side of the Creoles against the Spaniards, they were soon ignored by the victors and indeed considered as nonexistent.[179] Their particular problems have remained unsolved even today, as have those of the mestizos, Negroes, and mulattos. From this point of view, Richard Konetzke has characterized the movement for independence as a "reaction against historical progress. In this regard the era of the waning Spanish colonial rule was at any rate more modern than the subsequent epoch of independent states during the nineteenth century."[180]

---

[174] G. Furlong, op. cit., 487–717.

[175] A typical example is the life of José Joaquino de Cunha de Azeredo Coutinho (1742–1821), born in Rio de Janeiro, who studied theology in Coimbra, became bishop of Pernambuco in 1794, and founded the seminary of Olinda in the spirit of Coimbra. He was later promoted to bishop of Braganza and Miranda (E. Bradford Burns, "The Role of Azeredo Coutinho in the Enlightenment of Brasil," Hisp. Am. Hist. Rev. [May 1964], 145–60).

[176] The count of Aranda seriously planned the partition of Spanish America into three kingdoms for the three sons of Charles III, who was then to assume the title of Emperor (J. Sairrailh, L'Espagne éclairée [Paris 1954], 58).

[177] Count Aranda wrote: "I do not understand why there should be a distinction, not only between the Creoles and natives of Spain, but also regarding the Indians; only the suitability of the individual should be taken into account." R. Konetzke adds the remark: "These Spanish statesmen of the second half of the eighteenth century can not be accused of European arrogance towards the overseas possessions nor of racial prejudice towards the native populations" (Staat und Gesellschaft in Hispano-Amerika am Vorabend der Unabhängigkeit," Saeculum 12 [1961], 165).

[178] In the appendix for Mexico N. M. Farris lists all those priests named in the sources who were called "subversive," "insurgent," "conspirator," "collaborator," etc. The list contains the names of approximately 250 secular and 160 regular clerics from the various orders (op. cit., 254–65).

---

[179] This gradual state of "no longer existing" is reflected in the decrease of language studies in new states and especially the abolition of chairs for native languages at the state universities.

[180] "Staat und Gesellschaft," op. cit., 164.

CHAPTER 16

The Propagation of the Faith in Africa

Whereas the Church in America comprised large but defined areas and paganism was pushed to the peripheries or hard-to-approach regions, only a few coastal areas of Africa, aside from the Congo and Angola, could be missionized, most of them only temporarily.

The north of Africa can not be included in the actual missionary area, at least not in the narrow sense because there the Islamic and Christian faith had been opposing each other in implacable enmity ever since the Middle Ages. And yet the land belt from Morocco to Tunisia developed a Christian idealism and heroism often superior to that in the actual missionary countries. Free exercise of religion and with it missionary activity were ensured by treaties.[1] Franciscans, Mercedarians, and Trinitarians had been working there since the Middle Ages. The treaties and their own religious rules prescribed their primary task to be the ministry to Christian merchants and the ransom of Christian slaves. As the great distress in connection with the Berbers surfaced, Vincent de Paul's first letters of 1643 demonstrate that the ministry to Christian slaves and the actual missionary task, initially consisting of returning the renegades to the fold, had become his main concern. He therefore purchased—through the great missionary benefactress, the duchess d'Aiguillon—the French consulate in Algiers. After 1646 he had its affairs conducted by his fellow religious, the Lazarists. Under their protection others were able to pursue their ministry.[2] The mission of the Lazarists was able to be maintained with growing skill until Tunisia and Algeria were conquered by France.

---

[1] For a survey of these treaties see T. Grentrup, Jus Missionarium (Steyl 1925), 361–69; Streit XV, 74–79.

Catholic missionary work among actual followers of Islam was not permitted. Yet again and again there were conversions by Muslims to Christianity, most of which could be kept secret. But individual cases, often those occurring abroad in Italy and Spain, were divulged and frequently resulted in persecution of the Christians and the death of missionaries in the respective North African countries.[3] The Franciscans were especially well prepared for this apostolic task because of their excellent knowledge of Arabic.[4]

Aside from the often orphaned dioceses of Spanish and Portuguese enclaves in western North Africa,[5] the missions had been under the authority of the Propaganda since the middle of the seventeenth century. This was not so for West and East Africa. All of West Africa was under the two bishoprics of the Cape Verde Islands and São Tomé, established in 1534; East Africa was under the bishopric of Goa, established separately from Funchal at that time. As early as the sixteenth century Portuguese missionaries (Jesuits, Augustinians, and Dominicans) had started missionizing in the various West African countries. Along the coast of Guinea, in the arch stretching from present-day Portuguese Guinea to Nigeria, and especially in their initial area, Sierra Leone, and the final extension, the old Kingdom of Benin, they had achieved some successes, albeit of varying duration. But towards the end of the century and increasingly during the seventeenth century the weakening of the military impetus of the Portuguese also impaired the missionary thrust. The English and Dutch now obtained secure footholds in these territories. The Dutch effort was crowned by the occupation of Luanda in Angola (1640) and São Tomé (1641). Although the Dutch were driven out again (1645), a coastal area of about four hundred kilometers contained more than thirty fortresses manned by different nations, Portuguese, Spanish, French, Dutch, Danish, Swedish and Prussian, who, succeeding each other, sought to acquire the profitable slave trade.

---

[2] Among the most prominent representatives was Jean Le Vacher, who started working in Tunisia and Algeria. In 1650 he was appointed vicar apostolic and in 1677 French consul. He was shot by Muslims in 1683; Streit, XVI, 728–33.

[3] One of the most significant conversions was that of the young Moroccan Sidi Muhammad ben Muhammad el Hadji ed Dilai (1654), who went on to become a Jesuit priest. He received the call for the mission in India, but died before his departure in Lisbon (J. Henninger, NZM 10 [1954], 207; Streit XVI, 653 f.).

[4] A. Kleinhans, Historia Studii Linguae Arabicae et Colegii Missionum OFM in Conventu ad S. Petrum in Monte Aureo Romae erecti (Karachi 1930).

[5] A. Lopez, O.F.M., Obispos en el África Septentrional desde el siglo XIII (Tangier 1941).

In these territories the Propaganda succeeded in breaking through the rigid barriers of the Portuguese system of the Padroado. After repeated reconnaissance, Capuchin monks from Brittany were sent to the west coast in 1634, especially to Benin. But all their attempts failed. In 1651 when the provincial of Brittany reported about it, he noted only that nine Breton Capuchins had already died on the coast of Guinea. They were followed by the Spanish Capuchins, who—with great sacrifice and scant success—again and again pursued missionary work in Sierra Leone and Benin until about 1700.[6] In present-day Dahomey, at the time the Kingdom of Arda, a group of Spanish Capuchins started missionizing in 1660, but in spite of repeated efforts they failed.[7] In the eighteenth century French Dominicans tried to renew the mission in Guinea. Gottfried Loyer was appointed apostolic prefect by the Propaganda, but the difficulties encountered were so great that they retreated to France.[8]

The main concentration of Portuguese missionary work in the sixteenth century took place in the large reaches of the Congo and in Angola. But there, too, Christianity regressed after some initial successes because of a shortage of missionaries. The Congo Kings attempted to establish direct contact with Rome by means of their own embassies in order to extend their political independence to the religious realm as well and to obtain non-Portuguese missionaries through the Pope and the Propaganda. Thanks to the untiring efforts by the Capuchin friar Francisco de Pamplona, the former Spanish General Tiburcio de Redín,[9] resistance by the Spanish and Portuguese was gradually overcome. In

---

[6] L. Kilger, O.S.B., "Die Missionen in Oberguinea und Ostafrika nach den ersten Propaganda-Materialien 1622–1670," ZMR 20 (1930), 297–311; idem, "Die Missionsversuche in Benin," ZMR 22 (1932) 305–19. At about the same time, various attempts to found missions in Oeri or Overo (present-day Owerri in Nigeria) were made.

[7] H. Labouret and P. Rivet, Le Royaume d'Arda et son Evangélisation au XVIII^{e} siècle (Paris 1929; facsimile of the Arda-Catechism of 1658); B. de Carrocera, O.F.M. Cap., "Misión Capuchina al Reino de Arda," MH 6 (Madrid 1949), 523–46.

[8] G. Loyer, O.P., Relation du Voyage du Royaume d'Issing . . . (Paris 1714); J. Schmidlin, "Die Afrikamission nach Fortiguerra (1707)," ZMR 16 (1926), 125.

[9] L. de Aspurz, Redín, soldado y misionero 1597–1651 (Madrid 1951); idem, "Un momento de contacto entre el Consejo de Indias y la Congregación de Propaganda Fide (1644–51)," MH 8 (1951), 505–24; B. de Carrocera, "Fray Francisco de Pamplona, organizador de Misiones y conductor de Misioneros," MH 9 (1952), 5–51; F. Bontinck, "Répercussion du conflit entre le Saint Siège et le 'Padroado' sur l'évangélisation de l'Ancien Royaume du Congo," AHPont 4 (1966), 197–218.

1645 the first group of missionaries, seven Spanish and five Italian Capuchin friars, were sent to the court of King Garcia II of the Congo.[10] Subsequent expeditions came to the Congo aboard Spanish ships. But after the defeat of the Dutch by the Portuguese in 1648 the Portuguese influence was strengthened. The Spanish missionaries had to leave the country and the Italians were forced to travel on Portuguese passports via Lisbon, which was always connected with lengthy negotiations.

A first significant success by Capuchin missionaries was the return to the faith of Queen Anna Nzinga of Matamba. Although baptized in Luanda in 1622, she had defected. After she was reaccepted in the Church in 1656, she zealously tried to propagate Christianity at her court and in her realm. With the help of the Capuchins she built churches and towns and sought to Christianize the life of her subjects by means of education and upbringing.[11] Her sister, who succeeded her in 1663, continued to support and consolidate the work of the missionaries. After paganism won out briefly, the Capuchins again managed after 1684 to strengthen Christianity in Matamba. But towards the end of the century domestic wars and unsafe routes forced the Capuchins to shift their attention more and more to the Kingdom of Congo and to Angola, with their center in Luanda.

From the start the Propaganda had elevated the Capuchin mission to the level of an apostolic prefecture, although to some extent subordinated to the bishops of Congo and Angola. The latter had been residing in Luanda beginning in the seventeenth century. Unfortunately this jurisdictional structure again and again gave rise to disputes and quarrels within as a consequence of claims of patronage and opposition to the secular clergy.[12]

Just how serious the Italian Capuchins were about their missionary work in the Congo and Angola is shown by their linguistic works, such as grammars, dictionaries, and catechisms,[13] their many different questions to the Propaganda, and, above all, their handbook on missionary behavior and work in the eighteenth century.[14] Using new sources, L. Kilger, an expert in African missionary history, demonstrated a mere few decades ago how groundless the oft-repeated accusations of precipitous baptism were.[15]

---

[10] Jean-François de Rome, O.F.M.Cap., La fondation de la mission des Capucins au Royaume du Congo (1648), ed. by F. Bontinck (Louvain 1964).

[11] F. M. Gioia, La maravigliosa conversione alla Santa Fe della regina Singa e del suo regno di Matamba (Naples 1669).

[12] L. Jadin, "Le clergé séculier et les Capucins du Congo et d'Angola aux XVI^e et XVII^e siècles," Bulletin de l'Institut hist. Belge de Rome 36 (Rome and Brussels 1964), 185–483. Only in 1726 was a balanced jurisdictional agreement between Portugal and the Propaganda worked out which was valid until the missions treaty of 1940; the text is in A. Brasio, Spiritana Monumenta Historica. Series Africana I/1 (Pittsburgh and Louvain 1966), 16–20.

[13] B. de Carrocera, "Los Capuchinos españoles en el Congo y el primer Diccionario congolés," MH 2 (Madrid 1949), 209–30.

We should add the fact that for 150 years the missionary work of the Capuchins had to proceed under continually unfavorable conditions. The tropical climate often killed the missionaries within a very short time after their arrival; at times they suffered a violent death, as did their fellow brother Georg von Geel (d. 1652).[16] The Spanish chronicler Father Mateo de Anguiano presents an impressive list of 230 names for the period of 1645 to 1705.[17] By the end of the Capuchin mission in the Congo approximately 400 members of the order lost their lives in the service of this fruitless mission.[18] Toward the end of the eighteenth century, French secular priests attempted to missionize a part of the Congo, an area generally lacking in priests.[19] For them the Propaganda established the apostolic prefecture of Loango, where nine priests and six lay assistants were active from 1766 to 1776.[20]

---

[14] Pratique missionnaire de PP. Capucins italien (Louvain 1931). A compilation of rules in missionary methodology from 1747 by the missions' prefect Fr. Giacinto da Bologna. This work with its trenchant observations and critical appraisal of customs and usages was not the only one of its kind, as demonstrated by the as yet unpublished "Avvertimenti salutevoli alli apostolici Missionari nè Regni del Congo, Angola e circunvicini" by P. Giovanni di Roma of 1681 (see NZM 24 [1968], 210).

[15] L. Kilger, "Die Taufpraxis in der alten Kapuzinermission im Kongo und in Angola," NZM 5 (1949), 30–40, 203–16 (Schriftenreihe NZM 7) (Schöneck/Beckenried 1949). But all the efforts by the missionaries, whose number was always small, could not prevent the formation towards the end of the seventeenth century of the syncretistic sect of the Antonites. Essentially a precursor of the movements of religious fanatics in modern day Africa, it was named after a Christian Negress who asserted that she was possessed by Saint Anthony (L. Jadin, "Le Congo et la secte des Antoniens 1694–1718," Bulletin de l'Institut hist. Belge de Rome 33 [Brussels and Rome 1961], 411–615.

[16] P. Hildebrand, Le Martyr Georges de Geel et les débuts de la Mission du Congo (1645–52) (Antwerp 1940).

[17] Misiones Capuchinas en África I (Madrid 1950), 468–79.

[18] L. Jadin, L'Afrique et Rome, 53. For the slow extinction of the old Congo-Angola Mission, see L. Jadin, Les Missionnaires du Congo à la fin du XVIII^e siècle (Lisbon 1961); for the period of 1746 to 1761, see J. Cuvelier, "Le Vén. André de Burgio," CollFr 22 (1952), 85–115. They show a high rate of decline in the number of missionaries.

[19] In 1669 the Jesuits had already relinquished their college in San Salvador, the capital of the Congo kingdom; the Capuchins started their work in neighboring Matamba and were subsequently unable to furnish more than a few missionaries for the Congo.

[20] J. Cuvelier, Documents sur une Mission Française au Kakongo 1766–76 (Brussels 1953), 14 f. For earlier missionary attempts of the Flemish Franciscans, see L. Jadin, "Rivalités luso-néerlandaises au Sohio, Congo 1600–75, "Bulletin de l'Institut hist. Belge de Rome 37 (Brussels and Rome 1966), 137–360.

The greatest impediment not only to the Capuchin mission but to all the missions in West Africa was the slave trade, gaining ground from the seventeenth century on, in which nearly all the countries of Europe were participating.[21] A fatal flaw was the fact that missionaries, too, were caught up in the ideas of their time: they treated the slaves benignly, but did not question slavery as a social institution. Jesuits as well as Capuchins were slaveholders, the so called esclaves de l'église. Secular priests, in the absence of pay from Portugal, frequently ensured their livelihood by participating in the slave trade. Others participated without any qualms at all, including some from São Tomé.[22] Farsighted methods in missionary work, as on the issue of the native clergy, did not make up for this tacit approval of slavery.[23]

In South Africa neither the care of souls nor mission work was possible. Only after the conquest of the cape by the English did the situation appear to improve. But the Treaty of Amiens in 1802 ceded the Cape of Good Hope back to the Dutch, who were now more open to the question of ministry for their Catholic soldiers and inhabitants. In 1804 Jan Lansink became apostolic prefect; he started his work with two secular priests. But in 1806 when the English permanently reconquered the cape, the Dutch priests were expelled.[24]

---

[21] The great worldwide significance of the African slave trade is highlighted in C. R. Boxer, Salvador de Sá and the Struggle for Brazil and Angola 1602–86 (London 1952). For the slave trade as an impediment to the mission see C. P. Groves, op. cit. I, 160–64; R. M. Wiltgen, S.V.D., Gold Coast Mission History 1471–1880 (Techny 1956), 93–105.

[22] Around 1760 the Jesuit college in Luanda, for instance, had more than one thousand slaves on its various properties (DHGE 15, 426); J. Cuvelier and L. Jadin, L'ancien Congo d'après les archives romaines, 1518–1640 (Brussels 1954) (in various documents, esp. 85–92, there is a summary of the slave trade and the participation of the missionaries). Among the Capuchin missionaries the Spanish seem to have been opposed the most to the slave trade. According to the information provided by the chronicler of the order, Mateo de Anguiano, this is shown not only by their petitions to the King of Portugal and the Pope, but even more so by the fact that they were expelled from the Congo and the West-African territories precisely "for damaging Portuguese trade" (= slave trade) (Misiones Capuchinas en Africa II [1957], 199f.; pp. 131–46 contain a detailed description of the slave trade). Of course there were individual missionaries and bishops who spoke for the slaves and attacked especially the slave expeditions which violated contemporary law. But only the newly baptized Queen Nzinga addressed the Propaganda by letter in 1660 asking for a decree which would forbid the sale of baptized Negroes as slaves (Mateo de Anguiano, op. cit. II, XIII).

[23] L. Kilger, "Der erste einheimische Ordenspriester in der alten Kongo-Mission," NZM 14 (1958), 50–52; B. de Carrocera, "Los capuchinos españoles en el Congo y sus trabajos en pro la formación del clero indígena," España Misionera 2 (Madrid 1945), 183–206.—The extent to which Portuguese circles as well were convinced of the necessity for a native clergy is shown by the Portuguese polyhistor Manuel Severino de Feria (d. 1655), who emphasized in a memorandum of 1622 that a true success in the christianization of Guinea could only be achieved by educating a black clergy (J. Faro, "Manuel Severino de Feria e a evangelização da Guiné," Boletim Cultural de Guinea Portuguesa 14 [Bissau 1959], 459–97).

In the eastern half of Africa three missionary areas can be clearly marked: in the southeast there was Mozambique and the bordering land of the Monomotapa (Rhodesia), Mombasa with its immense Jesus Fortress securing the Portuguese maritime route to India, and in the northeast there was Ethiopia.

Following the failure of the Jesuit mission in the sixteenth century, the Dominicans had resumed missionary work in southeast Africa in 1577. In 1607 they were again followed by the Jesuits. The lack of clearly defined borders between the missions of the two orders led to many a dispute. After the Dominicans succeeded in converting the Monomotapa and his sons in 1629, all the missionary work in the realm of the "Golden Emperor" gradually passed to them. The Jesuits engaged in the conversion of the ethnic tribes on the Lower Zambezi. In 1612 Mozambique and its surrounding lands was elevated to the status of a free prelature, which it retained into the twentieth century. A report to the Propaganda in the 1730s indicated eleven mission stations staffed by eleven secular priests, one Augustinian, twenty-five Dominicans and eighteen Jesuits.[25] The Dominicans, mostly Goanese, were foremost in striving to educate many good native clerics. Two of their African members were known as lecturers of theology in Goa, Father Manuel around 1670 and Father Constantino de Rosario around 1712.[26]

As a result of wars and political power struggles the realm of the Monomotapa and with it the Dominican mission collapsed. The order subsequently restricted itself to Mozambique. The Jesuit mission on the Zambezi was able to develop until its expulsion by Pombal in 1759. At that time the Jesuits were replaced by Franciscan and Dominican missionaries. Aside from some secular priests only Dominicans appear to have been active in Mozambique as of the end of the eighteenth century,[27] until the abolition of all religious orders in the Portuguese territories in 1835 paralyzed the missions for a number of decades.[28]

---

[24] J. Rommerskirchen, Die Afrikamission um das Jahr 1805: 50 Jahre katholische Missionswissenschaft (Münster 1961), 157 f.

[25] L. Kilger, "Die Mission in Oberguinea und in Ostafrika nach den ersten Propaganda-Materialien (1622–70)," ZMR 20 (1930), 307.

[26] L. Jadin, L'Afrique et Rome (Louvain 1965), 62.

[27] J. Rommerskirchen, Die Afrikamission um das Jahr 1805, 154.

[28] For a complete overview of the mission in Southeast Africa, see esp. Harald v. Sicard, Karangafolkets äldsta Missions-Historia (Stockholm 1943); also P. Schebesta, Portugals Conquistamission in Südostafrika. Missionsgeschichte Sambesiens und des Monomotapareiches (1560–1920) (St. Augustin 1966), 54–292; F. Hoppe, Portugiesisch-Ostafrika in der Zeit des Marquês de Pombal (1750–77) (Berlin 1965).

The decisive achievement of the Portuguese in the eastern half of Africa was the rolling back and weakening of Islam beyond Mombasa. The two decades of Portuguese dominance on the east coast of Africa is described by L. Kilger as follows: "The Portuguese policy concerning Islam managed successfully to hold down the Mohammedans in the south and kept them from obtaining a sizeable and dominating position in the north."[29] In 1592 Mombasa with its fortress became the seat of the Portuguese governor; at this time the Portuguese Hermits of Saint Augustine began their missionary work. In 1630 Jussuf ben Hassani, a Christian prince educated by the Augustinians in Goa, became ruler of Mombasa. In his initial zeal he violently turned upon his former brothers in faith. But he soon recognized that this was not the way to make his government popular. So he promptly reembraced Islam, took the Portuguese fortress in a surprise attack, and created a horrible bloodbath among the Christians, both Portuguese and natives. But in 1631 Mombasa was reoccupied by the Portuguese and the missionary work of the Augustinians could be resumed with growing success. Portuguese rule and the mission lasted until 1729, at which point both had become severely weakened and had to make way for the stronger Islam. From their sizeable seminary in Mombasa the Augustinians were able to expand their work southward to the islands of Pemba and Zanzibar. They achieved few conversions among the Muslims, but they were more successful among the Negro population.[30]

From its stronghold in Goa, Portugal had decisively resisted the advance of Islam in remote Ethiopia and through the heroic fight of its Fidalgos (1541 and after) saved it for Christianity. The rest of the troop settled there under the ministry of the Jesuits, who were unceasingly working for the union of the Ethiopian Church with Rome (which came to pass in 1622). The same year, the Jesuit Pêro Pais, one of the great missionaries and promoters of the union, died.[31] In 1625 the new patriarch appointed by Rome arrived in the Ethiopian highland. But the union was of short duration. In 1632 a change in government and the Latinizing tendencies of the Jesuits brought the Monophysite form of Christianity back to power. The patriarch and the rest of the Jesuits were expelled from the country; those arriving later were murdered in 1638. After this failure the newly founded Propaganda took over the mission in Ethiopia. Unfortunately the congregation was prone to make mistakes from the beginning. It permitted itself to be convinced by the fraudulent Zaga Christos that the cancellation of the union in his homeland was based solely on dislike for the Jesuits; he did not rest until the mission work was transferred to the Franciscans. They took over the new task joyfully and enthusiastically, but were soon disappointed in their expectations.[32]

---

[29] "Christliche Islam-Mission und Islam-Politik in Ostafrika," ZMR 7 (1917), 16–36. This appraisal is supported by the German colonial historian J. Strandes, Die Portugiesen-Zeit in Deutsch- und Englisch-Ostafrika (Berlin 1899), 314. According to him the Portuguese deserve thanks for having prevented the Turkish-Muslim rule from gaining a foothold in East Africa and India (L. Kilger, op. cit., 36). The excellent treatise by Justus Strandes is supplemented by new sources in C. R. Boxer and C. de Azevedo, A Fortaleza de Jesus e os Portugueses em Mombaça (Lisbon 1960).

[30] The most important source for the Augustinian mission is the "Manual Eremitico da Congregação da India Oriental . . . pelo Fr. Manuel da Ave Maria" of 1817, published by A. da Silva Rego in "Documentoção para a Historia das Missões do Padroado Português do Oriente," India 11 (Lisbon 1955), 95–833; Manuel da Purificação, "Memorias da Congregação Agostiniana na India Oriental," India 12 (Lisbon 1958), 3–98; A. Hartmann, "The Augustinians in the Land of the Swahili," AAug 25 (Rome 1962), 326–39.

French Capuchins also attempted to advance to Ethiopia from Egypt, as did Jesuits from Goa via Mombasa and smaller places along the Red Sea. But even the smallest of successes had to be paid for with great danger and suffering: in 1638 the two Capuchin friars Agathangelus de Vendôme and Cassian Vaz were murdered, as were the Franciscans Francisco de Mistrella and Ludovico de Laurenzana (1668), and Liberatus Weiss and his companions of the same order (1716).[33]

In 1788 the Propaganda tried a new tactic in having the Ethiopian priest Tobias George Ghebragzer consecrated bishop and sending him and others of his countrymen back to Ethiopia. But after a short sojourn he was subjected to severe sufferings, for never before had an Ethiopian been bishop of his country. The patriarch of Alexandria excommunicated him. For several years he had to flee for his life. He died in Cairo in 1801.[34]

Cairo should have become the center and gateway of the Ethiopian mission, but circumstances turned it more and more into a point of departure for the Coptic mission in Lower Egypt, which is to be treated in another connection. Striking out from Egypt, Franciscans tried to establish a mission in Central Sudan (Boznu) at the beginning of the eighteenth century. It failed because of the great difficulties in getting there.[35]

---

[31] This Spanish Jesuit Pedro Páez wrote the Historia Ethiopiae, which was edited by Beccari in Vols. II and III of his collection of sources (1905–06). A critical Portuguese edition was done by Lopez Teixeira, Pêtro Pais, Historia da Etiopia I–III (Oorto 1945–46).

[32] T. Somigli de Detole, Etiopia Francescana (1928–48); J. Dindinger, "Bemerkungen zu den ersten Missionsversuchen der Franziskaner in Äthiopien," Antonianum 20 (Rome 1945), 97–126.

[33] See the bio-bibliographical data on the individual missionaries in Streit XVI, 219–21, 627; XVII, 137–38.

[34] N. Kowalsky, "Tobias Georg Ghebragzer. Ein "schwarzer" Bischof im 18. Jh.," NZM 15 (1959), 198–204.

Many efforts were made by the Propaganda to missionize the large island of Madagascar. Following unsuccessful attempts by Portuguese Dominicans in the sixteenth century and by Jesuits at the beginning of the seventeenth century, the Italian Jesuit Cristoforo Borri submitted to the Propaganda a memorandum concerning the establishment of a mission on the island, one that allowed it to serve as a center for expanded mission in the newly discovered lands of the South Seas. The Propaganda actually did establish an apostolic prefecture for the Discalced Carmelites in 1640. But because the French had gained a foothold on the island at the same time, the sending of Italian Carmelites had to be canceled and the offer by Saint Vincent de Paul to transfer this new mission to the Lazarists had to be accepted.[36] The first two Lazarists arrived on Madagascar in 1648. The murderous coastal climate claimed many victims, whom the homeland again and again sought to replace until in 1674 the French mission station was removed and with it the backbone of the missionary effort.[37]

In the seventeenth and eighteenth century the French had also occupied and settled the islands of Mauritius and Réunion. When the Lazarists were charged with an apostolate, they hoped to renew from there the old mission on Madagascar. They made some attempts to this end, but none of them succeeded.[38]

---

[35] J. Schmidlin, "Die ersten Madagaskarmissionen im Lichte der Propagandamaterialien," ZMR 12 (1922), 193–205.

[37] Streit XVI, 421 ff., 547 ff., about the first linguistic works and the first catechism of the Vincentians.

[38] J. Rommerskirchen, Die Afrikamission um das Jahr 1815: 50 Jahre katholische Missionswissenschaft (Münster 1961), 154–57; F. Combaluzier, "François-Marie Halnat (1760 bis 1808)," NZM 10 (1954), 208–23, 264–78; 11 (1955), 42–55.

CHAPTER 17

The Propagation of the Faith in Asia

While the activities of the Church were able to develop within a relatively uniform framework in America, the Asian continent was full of contrasts. There were the Islamic realms of the west with that of the Moguls extending deeply into the Hindu territories, the Hindu and Buddhist states, and, finally, China, which had put a Confucian stamp on its peripheral tributaries. Following the Portuguese, who had obtained strategic footholds in Asia since the end of the fifteenth century, the Spanish—after several attempts—managed to get to the area of the Spice Islands and, in 1565, to the Philippines. Their conquest of Portugal gave them nominal rule over the Portuguese overseas territories from 1580 to 1640 as well. Following the overthrow by the new ruling house of the Braganza in 1640, Rome, under pressure from Spain, was unable to appoint Portuguese bishops. Not until 1670 did a papal nuncio resume residence in Lisbon. The improvement in the relations between Rome and Portugal was also repeated in the vast colonial territories. In 1600, East Indies companies were founded both in England and Holland. The Dutch, anti-Catholic and uninterested in missionary work, displaced the Portuguese from their dominant position in the commerce with Japan and conquered the fortress of Malacca in 1641. This gave them a key position regarding Indonesia and the vast coastal areas of Indochina, which they ultimately lost to the Danes and the English. The French East Indies company, founded in 1664, first settled in Surat and then in Pondicherry (1674).

These often bloody conflicts between the European powers, who were frequently allied with indigenous forces, more and more impeded the missionary work. Additional obstacles were raised within the ecclesiastical ranks, especially by the collision between the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, established in 1622 and called the Propaganda for short, and the Portuguese system of the Padroado. The latter was of such importance for the entire missionary history of the seventeenth and eighteenth century that it merits description before we treat the missions in the individual countries.

The Propaganda and the Portuguese Padroado

The Popes and the Propaganda reluctantly accepted the established church system in America because those territories were actually ruled by Spain and Portugal and had become true colonies, whereas the commercial colonization was satisfied with individual bases.

The Propaganda held the view that these bases and the hinterland dominated by Portugal should be subject to the Padroado, but not those countries independent of Portugal. But the latter insisted on a universal system of the Padroado. It took a long time and many reversals for both the Propaganda and Portugal slowly to recast these sharp differences into a bearable modus vivendi. Until this happened, the mission in the Portuguese areas and those under the jurisdiction of the Propaganda suffered greatly.[1] The extent to which collaboration between the missionaries of the Propaganda and the Padroado was impaired was demonstrated by the modest activities of the Franciscans, most of them Italian, in the northern Chinese province of Hopei during the eighteenth century. Neither the orders from Rome nor those from the bishops, in fact not even bloody persecution were able to enforce harmony in the preaching of the faith.[2]

The first and most enduring success of the Propaganda was brought about by the dispatch of the first vicars apostolic to East Asia.[3] The idea for this undertaking came from a missionary of the Padroado, the Jesuit Alexandre de Rhodes (1591–1660) of Avignon.[4] As a result of the persecutions in Japan he and his companions from the Japanese provinces had established a flourishing community of Christians in Tongking. Its backbone was the domus dei, with carefully trained catechists. Adapting to local conditions, these religious communes put their very own stamp on the entire mission of the East Indies for centuries.[5] To be sure, de Rhodes had written a catechism for the purpose of training his catechists,[6] but priests and bishops who could ordain them were sorely lacking. In 1649 he arrived in Rome and was instructed to look for suitable candidates himself. After unsuccessful efforts in Italy he went to Paris in 1653, where he met the future vicars apostolic in a community of young priests (Les Bons Amis) led by his fellow Jesuits. But in 1654, probably at the instigation of Portugal, he had to take on another task; he died in 1660 as superior of the mission in Ispahan. While de Rhodes was awakening a missionary spirit in France, Rome hesitated. Not until July 1658 were two members of the Bons Amis consecrated bishops and vicars apostolic: François Pallu (1626–84) and Pierre Lambert de la Motte (1624–79). A third, Ignatius Cotolendi, died en route in 1662. The bishops and their companions from the newly founded missionary seminary of Paris had to take the difficult overland route through Syria, Persia and northern India.[7] In 1662 and 1664, respectively, they arrived in Ajuthia, the capital of Siam, but a war forced them to stay there. So they established the center of their East Asian mission in Ajuthia, combining it with a central seminary for the training of a native clergy.[8]

---

[1] A. Jann, op. cit.; B. J. Wenzel, Portugal und der Heilige Stuhl (Lisbon 1958); A. da Silva Rêgo, O Padroado Português do Oriente. Esboco Historico (Lisbon 1940) (French; Lisbon 1957); J. Wicki, "Il patronato portoghese d'Oriente," CivCatt III (1955), 527–29.

[2] G. Mensaert, O.F.M., "Les Franciscains au service de la Propagande dans la Province de Pékin 1705–1784," AFrH 51 (1958), 161–200, 273–311.

[3] H. Chappoulie, op. cit.; A. Launay, Histoire générale, I (Paris 1912); idem, Mémorial; G. Goyau, Les prêtres des Missions étrangères (Paris 1925); L. Baudiment, François Pallu, principal fondateur de la Société des Missions Étrangères (1626–84) (Paris 1934).

[4] H. Chappoulie, op. cit. I, 3–41, 102–13; A. Launay, Histoire de la Mission du Tonkin (Paris 1927).

[5] N. Kowalsky, "Die Anfänge der 'Domus Dei' in Tongking und Cochinchina," in: J. Specker and W. Bühlmann, Das Laienapostolat in den Missionen (Festschr. Beckmann) (Beckenried 1961), 155–60.

[6] Catechismus pro ius qui volunt suscipere Baptismum (Rome [press of the Propaganda] 1651), new ed. with Vietnamese text, introduction and commentary by A. Marillier, CC. Larre and Pham Dink (Saigon 1961); a French translation by H. Chappoulie, op. cit. II, 147–261.

The arrival of the first vicars apostolic in Siam definitely represented not only the most significant measure by the Propaganda in the entire course of missionary history, but the most important one for the young Church of the Far East overall.[9] Most important was the advance of Rome into the hitherto Portuguese jurisdictional sphere. The achievement was of course not reached by the mere dispatch of vicars apostolic. Initially the vicars did not even have the necessary papal jurisdiction for Siam. This was finally granted to Louis Laneau (1637–96) in 1673. But foreign jurisdiction in Portuguese territory was so unusual that the missionaries hardly paid attention to it except for the difficulties created by the Inquisition emanating from Goa and by the bishops appointed after 1670. This prompted Pallu to go to Rome, where he convinced the Propaganda to take firm steps. These included corresponding briefs by Clement IX (1669). But the latter's successor, Clement X, had his mind changed by the Portuguese ambassador, until the vicars apostolic remonstrated anew. In 1673 briefs were issued to the inquisition and to the cathedral chapter of Goa, withdrawing from them all jurisdiction outside the Portuguese territories.[10] In 1677 the Propaganda ordered all Jesuit missionaries to swear an oath of obedience to the vicars apostolic. In 1678 the oath was extended to include all missionaries in the Far East. In 1680 this was reaffirmed by another decree. Portugal consequently demanded from all missionaries departing from Lisbon an oath of loyalty to the Padroado which encompassed the political interests of Portugal as well.[11] Thus one oath was pitted against another.

---

[7] See the detailed travelogue by Pallu from his diaries and letters in L. Baudiment, op. cit., 99–161.

[8] P. Destombes, M.E.P., Collège Général de la Societé des Missions Étrangères (Paris 1934).

[9] The new element regarding the vicars apostolic appointed in 1659 was that they were given full jurisdiction for large territories and were, at the same time, titular bishops. Prior to this their only function had been to represent a bishop who was in some way prevented from exercising his office. The change was intended for a brief transitional period but instead it endured for more than 300 years (N. Kowalsky, "Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der apostolischen Vikare," NZM 13 [1957], 217–86).

[10] H. Chappoulie, op. cit. I, 233ff.

While this affair was settled relatively soon in East India—probably because of the bloody persecutions and the vastness of the countries—the China mission erupted in a storm of protest. Pallu came to China as vicar apostolic of Fukien and administrator of China in January 1684 and immediately published the decree of 1680. At the same time he transmitted an order by the Jesuit General to the missionaries of the Padroado. As a result all but one Spanish missionary took the oath. But Spanish Franciscans, Dominicans and Augustinians had heretofore obeyed only their superiors in Manila, and therefore resisted the oath.[12] The Jesuits, sent to Siam and China under Louis XIV, were prohibited by the state from taking the oath. Closure of the seminary of the Parisian Missionaries and the recall of the vicars apostolic were imminent. But compromises and jurisdictional reordering indirectly invalidated the Roman oath. Yet Lisbon insisted on an oath to the Padroado. As a result the situation was severely aggravated throughout the eighteenth century. Given this attitude by Portugal, which stiffened even more after its newly won independence (1640), the missionaries were forced to seek new routes by which to get to the Far East. Jesuits had earlier contemplated a land route to China via Russia and had sought to acquire precise knowledge of it by means of expeditions.[13] Unfortunately all their efforts were in vain. The Propaganda recommended the land route via Persia and Mesopotamia and strongly requested avoidance of all Portuguese territories.[14] For his first trip Pallu had already reconsidered the land route through Russia. For his last trip he actually attempted to get permission for it from the Russian Tsar through the good offices of the French King.[15] Towards the end of the seventeenth century the [11] Delacroix, op. cit. II, 190f.

---

[12] A. van de Wyngaert, "Mgr. Fr. Pallu et Mgr. Bernardino della Chiesa, Le Serment de fidélité aux Vicaires Apostoliques, 1680–88," AFrH 31 (1938), 17–47; O. Maas, "Zum Konflikt der spanischen Missionare mit den französischen Bischöfen in der Chinamission des 17. Jh.," Spanische Forschungen der Görres-Gesellschaft III (Münster 1930), 185–95.

[13] B. Zimmel, "Bemühungen um den Landweg nach China. Die Expedition P. Aimé Cherauds S.J. nach Chorassan 1659," NZM 25 (1968), 102–8 (with references to earlier efforts).

[14] Instruction of 1659 (H. Chappoulie, op. cit. I, 394). A possibility to get to East Asia through America, considered earlier, had to be abandoned as utopian (J. Schmidlin, "Projekt eines nordamerikanischen Missionsweges nach China in der Frühzeit der Propaganda," ZMR 15 [1925], 147–49).

[15] L. Baudiment, Pallu, 88, 360f.—It is surprising that missionaries even before were not so much blaming Russia but Lisbon for failing to gain an overland route to China. The French sinologist P. Pelliot states emphatically that all efforts for an overland route foundered on the resistance of Portugal, which was intent on securing Macao as a Portuguese rule to effect entry exclusively through Macao became meaningless because the English and French were only too glad to transport the missionaries on their vessels.

More difficult than opening up land routes was the problem concerning new missionaries. The cardinals of the Propaganda were perhaps privately convinced that those missionaries operating under the Padroado, at least those outside the Portuguese territories, would agree to go under the jurisdiction of the French bishops. But the large religious orders, foremost among them the Jesuits, who were doing the major portion of the missionary work in the provinces of the vicars apostolic, had no intention of exchanging the Padroado, which had proved its excellence for over 150 years, for an unproven new institution.

As early as 1658 the vicars apostolic—in addition to Pallu and Lambert de la Motte, there was the first vicar apostolic of Quebec, de Laval—had sent a petition to the Propaganda which mentioned for the first time the establishment of a seminary. They maintained that the education of a native clergy in Canada, China, and Tongking required helpers who had to be prepared in their own seminaries. The secretary of the Propaganda noted on the margin; "Will be heeded!" But the plan was actually realized by the procurators of the missionary bishops. In 1663 they founded the seminary in the Rue du Bac, where it continues today. In the same year it received royal sanction as the Séminaire pour la conversion des Infidèles dans les pays étrangers. Recognition by Rome followed in 1664.[16]

The second religious community to place its members at the disposal of the Propaganda was the Capuchin order. Their first vicar apostolic was the famous "grey eminence" of Cardinal Richelieu, Father Joseph Leclerc du Tremblay or Father Joseph of Paris. Missionaries for Canada, Brazil, and the French bases in India (Surat, Madras) also came from the French provinces.[17] Members of the gateway for the Catholic missionaries (T'oung Pao 26 [Leiden 1929], 192f.). In 1707, in fact, Peter the Great had let Clement XI know that he would permit the Catholic missionaries to use the route through Russia (AFrH 27 [1934], 181).

---

[16] J. Guennou, M.E.P., Les Missions Étrangères (Paris 1963), 67 (the author also treats the pertinent French background, esp. the Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement); idem, "Le troisième centenaire du Séminaire des Missions Étrangères de Paris," NZM 19 (1963), 290–99.

[17] G. ce Vaumas, L'éveil missionaire de la France (Lyon 1942); idem, Lettres et Documents du Père Joseph de Paris concernant les Missions Étrangères (1619–38) (Lyon 1942); idem, "L'activité missionnaire du P. Joseph de Paris," RHM 15 (Paris 1938), 336–59; O. M. Jouve, "Le Père Joseph Leclerc du Tremblay, Capucin, et les Missions de la Nouvelle France (1632–33)," RHM 16 (Paris 1939), 206–32; G. Goyau, "Le Père Joseph et les Missions Capucines," L'Église en Marche V (Paris 1936), 63–93.

Italian province of the Carmelite order also entered the service of the Propaganda. The initial impetus owed a lot to certain of its members. They had had a mission in Persia since the beginning of the seventeenth century and had spread from there to various countries of Indochina and finally also to India. Leandro de la Anunciación—a native Spaniard to be sure—succeeded in founding a first branch in Goa, followed by a second one in 1630 which was actually a missionary seminary. Its graduates soon became missionaries for those parts of India occupied by the English.[18] The Italian province of the Franciscans also gave missionaries to the Propaganda who were primarily active in China. In 1687 the first Italian arrival, Bernardino della Chiesa, was consecrated bishop by Pallu. In the following period the Italian Franciscans were especially active in the northern provinces of China.

The Propaganda itself, especially its first secretary Francesco Ingoli, preferred secular priests, especially for the office of vicar apostolic. The congregation founded in 1646 in Naples as the Congregazione delle Apostoliche Missioni developed well, but domestic and foreign political events thwarted all missionary work.[19] In 1639 when the Augustinian Recollects (or Barefoot Augustinians), a reformed branch of Augustinian Hermits with origins in Spain, placed their experience in the Philippines at the disposal of the Propaganda for service in China, the latter did not accept the offer;[20] only members of the Italian province could now and then work in China.[21] On the other hand the Italian association of the Congregation of Secular Clergy of the Battistini, recognized in 1753 by Benedict XIV, was readily used for the China mission. Among the ranks of the religious orders the Propaganda also employed the Italian Barnabites for the mission in Burma.[22]

The conflict caused by the complexity of the organizational structure of the missions was demonstrated by a papal visitation in Cochinchina conducted by the French Mgr. E. F. des Achards de la Beaume (d. 1741), who heightened the confusion rather than eliminating it.[23] To some extent these difficulties were the fault of the Propaganda itself. All the missionaries of the Padroado were obedient to the superiors of their respective orders, yet the Propaganda immediately wanted to remove them from their traditional structure and subordinate them directly to the Propaganda.[24] Furthermore, the Propaganda was largely lacking in understanding of the ideals and way of life of the regular clergy.[25] In the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth century there was a growing necessity to separate the missionary dioceses by religious orders and congregations and to appoint separate vicars apostolic for the Franciscans, Dominicans, and Parisian missionaries.

---

[18] Florencio del Niño Jesús, La Orden de Santa Teresa, la fundación de la Propaganda Fide y la Misiones Carmelitas (Madrid 1923), 91ff.

[19] J. Metzler, "Das erste Weltpriesterinstitut im Dienste der Propaganda," NZM 17 (1961), 161–74.

[20] This is shown esp. in Bullarium Ordinis Recollectorum S. Augustini II (1623–83) (Rome 1961).

[21] J. Beckmann, "Zur Missionstätigkeit der italienischen Unbeschuhten Augustiner im Fernen Osten," NZM 22 (1961), 62–65.

[22] L. Gallo, Storia del Cristianesimo nell'Impero Barmano, 3 vols. (Milan 1862).

[23] Streit VI (Aachen 1931), 454.

A decisive element for judging the work of the Propaganda in the Far East was the new spirit manifest in the principal documents and in the work of its missionaries. Ever new formulations emphasize the purely religious character of the mission, placing the spreading of the Gospel at the center of all endeavors.[26] This basic character of the mission was most emphatically demonstrated in the instruction of 1659 to the newly appointed vicars apostolic.[27] In part one, regarding the selection of their missionaries, the departing bishops are exhorted above all to pay attention to the spiritual and religious qualities and the character of the candidates over and above their physical condition. Part two deals with the travel route. The third and most thorough part contains the basic missionary program: "Do not demand of those peoples that they change their ceremonies, customs, and habits if these do not quite obviously contradict religion and decency, for what could be sillier than to want to import France, Spain, Italy, or any other country into China? Not these but the faith is what you shall bring to them, which neither rejects nor fights against any peoples' customs and traditions, but rather seeks to keep them inviolate."[28] Commercial and political activities were forbidden to the missions; the training of an indigenous clergy was demanded. The confrontation of this instruction with the practice in the missions in Siam resulted in the Instructiones ad munera apostolica rite obeunda[29] in ten chapters and several practical appendices.

---

[24] As a result the home provinces and monasteries showed little interest in the fate of their brothers in the Propaganda. When the Capuchins, for instance, complained to the Propaganda that they could not live in accordance with the rules of their order, the congregation asked the mission prefect, Father Joseph de Paris, to remove them "de peur qu'ils se fissent turcs" (G. de Vaumas, L'éveil Missionnaire de la France [Lyons 1942], 121).

[25] This is manifest from many letters from missionaries kept in the archive of the Propaganda which have not yet been closely examined.

[26] K. Pieper, "Ein Blick in die missionsmethodischen Erlasse der Propaganda," ZMR 12 (1922), 31–51; J. Beckmann, "Der religiöse Charakter von Mission und Missionar nach den Bestimmungen der Propaganda-Kongregation," Kath. Missionsjahrbuch der Schweiz (1946), 13–23.

[27] A critical edition Instructio Vicariorum Apostolicorum ad Regna Sinarum Tunchini et Cocincinae proficentium 1659 by H. Chappoulie, op. cit. I, 392–402; see also the commentary in L. Baudiment, Pallu 61ff.

[28] H. Chappoulie, op. cit. I, 400.

The goals and means of the mission were attuned to each other. The very important eleven articles concerning the catechumate were the first systematic and probably deliberate renewal of an institution going back to Christian antiquity. It represented the first fundamental break with the medieval missionary method. The guiding thought of conversion was no longer embodied in the principle of working down from the top, that is, the conversion of the masses by their political leaders as the Jesuits in East Asia aspired, but rather in the reverse procedure of working up to the top, that is through the conversion of the masses and the establishment of Christian communities.[30] Very important was the third chapter De recto mediorum humanorum usu,[31] a declaration of war against the missionaries of the Padroado and—probably not intended for them at the time—against the Jesuits as well, who provided, after all, the greater number and the most prominent of the missionaries of the Padroado.[32] The fight was concentrated against the close connection between the mission and the politics of Portugal, the world power, and the involvement of missionaries in commerce. The number of Jesuit missionaries alone departing via Lisbon and supported by Portugal made any blunt solution of the problem impossible.[33] The Propaganda, moreover, did not take into account the immense sacrifices that Portugal, small as it was, had made for the total missionary effort from Goa to [29] This work was first printed in 1669 by the press of the Propaganda (Streit I, 275). The instructions were reedited again and again; since 1840 they have been entitled Monita ad Missionarios. The following is based on the Hong Kong edition of 1893.

---

[30] The chapter "De regimine cuiuscumque particularis Ecclesiae, maxime ubi Sacerdos deficit," op. cit., 130–35, probably contributed in a decisive way to the fact that the congregations founded by the Paris Missionaries were able to save themselves even in the bloodiest persecutions.

[31] Op. cit., 21–35.

[32] A thorough investigation of the Monita ad Missionarios is still lacking.—Pallu and his companions assuredly were not basically opposed to the Jesuits. They had gone through the ascetic school of P. Bagot in Paris; the Jesuit de Rhodes had selected them; two of Pallu's brothers were Jesuits and the Jesuit General Paul Oliva even saved the new undertaking from being abolished by Louis XIV. Initially Pallu considered harmonious collaboration with the Jesuits completely natural. For individual references see esp. H. Chappoulie, op. cit. I (index).

[33] J. Wicki, S.J., Liste der Jesuiten-Indienfahrer 1541–1758: Aufsätze zur portugiesischen Kulturgeschichte VII (Münster 1967), 252–450. In 1541–1658 the number of Jesuits departing from Lisbon was 1,047. In the period 1658–1758 it was 1,073.

Japan even though after 1600 it was no longer capable of protecting its bases or its missionaries.[34] The dogged obstinacy of Portugal's claim for power vis-à-vis the mission was experienced not only by individual members of the Parisian Missionaries who were caught and were languishing in the jails of the Inquisition in Goa, but also by the papal legate Maillard de Tournon (d. 1710), who was deported by the Chinese to Macao after an unsuccessful missionary effort and held in jail by the Portuguese until his death.[35]

Even Pallu was not free from the same political ambitions of which he accused the missionaries of the Padroado. He advised the French East Asia Company and, more than that, tried to influence the royal minister Colbert towards bringing the power of France to bear in India and East India.[36] In this way he helped initiate the policy which in 1685/86 led to an exchange of ambassadors between France and Siam and, a 100 years later—with the help of the vicar apostolic of Cochinchina, Mgr. Pierre Pigneaux de Béhaine (d. 1799)—resulted in France obtaining a firm foothold in East India.[37] The first problem to arise was the participation by the missionaries in commerce, involving primarily the Jesuit mission in Japan, in part because of the extremely high costs of operation and in part because of insufficient subsidies from Portugal and other sources in Europe. The visitant of the Far East, A. Valignano, in opposition to the general of the order, Claudio Acquaviva (d. 1615), took the stand that the mission could only be maintained through participation in the commerce between Macao and Japan.[38] After the collapse of the Japanese mission the missionaries who had been expelled or newly designated for Japan were sent to East India, where participation in the trade was probably upheld as a sort of traditional privilege. At any rate, the report of the vicars apostolic in Ajuthia was followed by the pointed brief of Clement IX Sollicitudo Pastoralis officii (17 June 1669), which reiterated all prior regulations and prohibitions of trade by the missionaries.[39] The Instructiones of the Paris Missionaries, who fought against commerce, were published in the same year.[40] The fact that the Jesuits—in spite of all the prohibitions and claims by their superiors—did not stop their involvement in commerce is shown by an inquiry of 23 June 1797 by Ángel de la Fuente, administrator of the assets of the suppressed Society of Jesus in the Philippines. He wanted to know what was to happen to the 254,320 pesos, invested by the Jesuits in the trade between China and Mexico. In 1775 this sum had been 306,341; by 1793 it had grown to 393,454 pesos.[41]

---

[34] B. Biermann, O.P., "Das Spanisch-portugiesische Patronat als Laienhilfe für die Missionen," Das Laienapostolat in den Missionen (Festschr. Beckmann) (Beckenried 1961), 161–79.

[35] The main task of Cardinal de Tournon was not to end the rites quarrel but to establish a direct relationship between Rome and Peking (on the basis of a nunciature). This would have ended the Portuguese influence in Peking (F.-A. Pouleau, "Maillard de Tournon," AHSI 31 [1962], 264–323).

[36] H. Chappoulie, op. cit. I, 278–82.

[37] G. Taboulet, La geste française en Indochine I (Paris 1955) (161–239 about Mgr. Pigneaux de Béhaine).

[38] A. Valignano, Sumario de las Cosas de Japón (1583), ed. by J. R. Álvarez-Taladriz (Tokyo 1954), 334–39 and the editor's introduction, 41–50.—According to the unpublished dissertation by L. Bourdon, "La Compagnie de Jésus et le Japon" (Paris), Pierre Chaunu quoted the expenditures of the Japan mission for 1579 at 6,000 cruzados; by 1582 they increased to 12,000. From 1581 to 1582 the mission needed 8,650 cruzados for subsistence for the personnel, for buildings, presents, etc. and 2,100 for necessary purchases in India and Europe. Of this, the Portuguese exchequer paid 4,000. In addition there were the gifts by certain benefactors (such as Pius V) and the revenues from the port of Nagasaki, granted to the Jesuits, and their possessions in Macao and Bazain. The silk trade brought in 4,000 cruzados and the remainder was taken in by private trade of individual missionaries (P. Chaunu, "Une grande puissance économique et

The reorientation of the mission relinquishing the principle of "working down from the top" required a different missionary method.[42] This involved the formation of individual parishes with catechists, priests, sisters, and a native episcopate. These aspects will be treated in detail as we deal with the respective countries. In general it can be said that the method of proceeding from the princely courts, advocated especially by the Jesuits of the Padroado, in the final analysis was ineffectual. The Propaganda, for its part, had to postpone its lofty program of a native Church led by indigenous bishops because the foundation of individual parishes initially claimed all the available energy.

The position of the Propaganda, or rather of its missionaries, on the financière: les débuts de la Compagnie de Jésus au Japon [1547–83]," Annales—Economies. Sociétés. Civilisations V [Paris 1950], 198–212).

---

[39] The connections are shown by the fact that the regulation was emphasized to apply also to the Society of Jesus and even if the trade was the only means to maintain the mission (T. Grentrup, "Das kirchliche Handelsverbot für Missionare," ZMR 15 [1925], 257–68).

[40] "De illicita et indigna Viro Apostolico negotiatione" (Monita, op. cit., 23–25). At the same time the generals of the Society of Jesus had renewed the prohibition of trade (J. Humbert, "Some Answers of the Generals of the Society of Jesus to the Province of Goa," AHSI 36 [1967], 72–103).

[41] P. S. Lietz, Calendar of Philippine Documents in the Ayer Collection of the Newberry Library (Chicago 1956), Doc. 256, p. 129.—The author explains that the Jesuits (in the Philippines) invested their assets one third each in trade with Mexico, with China and Indonesia, and as a reserve, idem, Doc., 257, p. 130.

[42] The chapter by H. Bernard-Maître, "La Rencontre du Padroado et du Patronat: l'affrontment des méthodes," Delacroix, op. cit. II, 323–36, and its thesis of the tabula rasa on the part of the Spanish and a progressive method of accommodation among the Padroado missionaries (i.e., Jesuits) is historically untenable.

issue of Chinese and Malabar Rites is also connected to the new methodological direction.[43] The third chapter of the Monita ad Missionarios[44] clearly shows the position of the Paris Missionaries, although at the time of its writing this issue was not at all contemplated, since it was hardly known to exist beyond a small circle.

Development and Decline of the Missions in the Asian Countries

The development of the Propaganda missions in Asia brought about an expansion of their territories into those of the Padroado. Initially both sides employed every means at their disposal to hold fast to their respective right to propagate the faith. Not until the eighteenth century did this attitude give way to an implicitly recognized, sometimes geographically separated coexistence, the form of which differed from one country to the other.

INDIA

Throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth century India was the heart of the Portuguese rule and with it of the mission. The city of Goa was still wealthy and powerful, the seat of the viceroy and of the great convents and monasteries of the various religious orders. From here spread the impulse for the missions and ministry in all the countries from East Africa to Japan. The archbishop of Goa was the highest ecclesiastical authority in all these territories. Thus the fact that the bishoprics were vacant for decades in the hard years of political and jurisdictional crises had a fatal effect. Portugal had achieved its political independence in 1640. Yet for the next thirty years Spain was still powerful enough to prevent any direct connection between Portugal and Rome. Only after 1670 was it possible to appoint new bishops for India.

Until the middle of the eighteenth century the Jesuit college was the backbone of the mission in all the Padroado countries. The Jesuit press operating since 1556 was the only one to continue printing the necessary books in the various languages.[45] After 1572 the strongest mendicant order in Goa were the Augustinian Hermits, who trained their own missionaries for work in the Muslim areas from Africa through Indochina all the way to Bengal. It was from them that the viceroys preferred to select their ambassadors to the courts of the Mongolian rulers.[46]

---

[43] Sources and literature esp. in Streit V, VI, VII (with supplements in Vols. XII–XIV). More recent literature in DHGE XII, 741 and LThK VIII, 1324.—In the dispute over the rites and in other decisions it has to be noted that the Propaganda Congregation had no theologians of its own; instead all decisions were made by the Holy Office (J. Metzler, "Controversia tra Propaganda e S. Officio circa una commissione teologica [1622–1658]," Annales Pont. Univ. Urbaniana [Rome 1968–69], 47–62).

[44] De recto mediorum humanorum usu (op. cit., 21–35).

[45] "Impresa em Goa." Boletim do Instituto Vasco da Gama (Bastora and Goa 1956). Memorial vol. for the four hundredth anniversary.

The five councils of Goa (1567, 1575, 1585, 1592, 1606) were concerned most with adapting the Tridentine reforms to the native conditions.[47] Yet in Goa especially the actual conditions were behind the stated ideals, most of all in the social sector. Slavery, as at the time of Francis Xavier,[48] was still a wide-spread practice in the seventeenth and eighteenth century. It was calculated that an average Portuguese civil servant needed fifteen to twenty male and female slaves. Even the one convent in India, the Augustinian convent of Saint Monica (founded in 1606), was granted 120 female servants and slaves by no less than royal order. Black male and female slaves were highly regarded because of their capacity for work.[49] We know—not only from numerous prohibitions by various offices in the homeland, but also from actual reports—that the male orders were keeping slaves.[50] The slaves, as well as Indians and Brahmins, were refused Communion, though not as a matter of principle, but yet in practice. The Italian Theatine Father Antonio Ardizone Spinola was the first to give a sermon against this discriminatory practice. It was entitled: "Sigh of the Christian Brahmins and Canarins and many other castes and peoples because they never in all their life . . . are allowed to commune."[51]

Equally fatal was the effect of the Inquisition, active in Goa from

---

[46] A. da Silva Rêgo, "Documentação," India XI, IX–XIII stresses the importance of the Augustinians for the missions of the East and publishes the Manual Eremitico da Congregação da India, which was finished by Manuel da Ave-Maria in 1815, pp. 95–833.

[47] J. Wicki, S.J., "Die ältere katholische Mission in der Begegnung mit Indien," Saeculum VI (1955), 345–67, (335–60: the Goan councils and India); idem, "Die unmittelbaren Auswirkungen des Konzils von Trient auf Indien (ca. 1565–85)," AHPont I (1963), 241–63.

[48] G. Schurhammer, Franz Xaver, sein Leben und seine Zeit II/1 (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1964, Index).

[49] L. Kilger, "Das erste Frauenkloster in Portugiesich-Indien. St. Monika 1606–1834," NZM 7 (1951), 119–23, esp. 121ff.

[50] When a Portuguese religious or nobleman traveled, he had himself carried by blacks in a sedan (A. Zerlik, P. Xav. Ernbert Fridelli S.J., China-missionar und Kartograph [Linz 1962], 13).—The fact that Propaganda missionaries held identical views is attested to by a letter from Pallu to Paris (20 Dec. 1683) in which he ennumerates the persons for whom he had to care, "sans compter un grand nombre d'esclaves" (Lettres de Mgr. Pallu, ed. by A. Launay, I [Angoulême 1914], 378).

[51] R. Cantel, "Le Père Ardizone Spinola et son 'Cordal Triplicado de Amor a Jesus Sacramentado'," Mélanges Marcel Bataillon-Bulletin Hispanique 54 (Bordeaux 1962), 347–57. Subsequent sermons on the same topic in 1645, 1646, 1647, 1648.

1560 to 1812, which decreed penalties ranging from flogging to public burning at the stake. As in America the Inquisition was above all the highest office for the safeguarding of patronage rights. Several missionaries of the Propaganda became rather familiar with the inside of the Goan jails of the Inquisition.[52] Of great help to the Christian congregations was the Pai dos Christãos. The office of this "Father of the Christians" was usually entrusted to such missionaries who were able to work in the field of social welfare and against the exploitation of the new Christians, especially in the vicinity of Goa and other bases.[53]

The area around Goa was apportioned to the three major orders who were initially working in India: the province of Bardez went to the Franciscans, a number of islands off the coast of Goa to the Dominicans, and the peninsula of Salsette to the Jesuits. From the seventeenth century on the Goan clergy gained more and more importance. It is among the merits of the Padroado that it stressed from the very beginning the education of a native clergy.[54] To be sure, the Portuguese in India had their own racial prejudices;[55] in the early period only members of the Brahmin caste were ordained in the priesthood. Up until the eighteenth century Indians were accepted into religious orders only in individual cases.[56] Yet a great number of secular priests were educated at the Jesuit College of Saint Paul in Goa, in the Franciscan seminaries in Reis Magos (Bardez) and Kranganore, in the Thomas Academy of the Dominicans in Goa, and later at the archdiocesan seminary of Goa and at the Great Seminary of Rachol.[57] Not only were these clerics suitably trained to take over the parishes founded by the individual orders, but they also performed capably as missionaries in the countries of the Padroado.[58] It was Goan priests who saved the Christian congregations in the areas which were lost by Portugal in the course of the centuries. Thus one of them wrote: "Although these priests had to do without the help of the Jesuits since 1760, forego the help of all the other orders since 1834, and since the middle of the nineteenth century were deserted by a government formerly sympathetic to the mission, the Goan clergy, especially since the eighteenth century, has worked with great dedication towards maintaining the congregations founded and built up by the missionaries of the Padroado."[59] Contrary to the widely held opinion that the Padroado, or rather the state exchequer, paid the expenditures of the congregations, it is a fact that these were also born by the faithful themselves. A certain basic asset were the lands of the suppressed Hindu temples.[60] Numerous brotherhoods in almost all the congregations paid for other expenditures, such as the celebration of religious high holidays.[61] These brotherhoods, invariably led by laymen, were an important element of Christian life.

---

[52] A. Baião, A Inquisição de Goa, 2 vols. (Coimbra 1930–49).—See also the discourse in A. D'Costa, S.J., The Christianisation of Goa Islands (Bombay 1965), 193–200, who proves that the Inquisition did not extort forced conversion from the missionaries.

[53] J. Wicki, S.J., O Livro do "Pai dos Cristãos" (Lisbon 1969).

[54] C. Merces de Melo, The Recruitment and Formation of the Native Clergy in India (Lisbon 1955) 65–205; J. Wicki, S.J., "Der einheimische Klerus in Indien (16. Jh.)," in J. Beckmann, Der einheimische Klerus in Gesch. und Gegenwart (Festschr. Kilger) (Schöneck/Beckenried 1950), 17–72.

[55] C. R. Boxer, Race Relations in the Portuguese Empire 1415–1825 (Oxford 1963), 57–85.

[56] A. Meersman, "The Question of Admitting Indians to the Franciscan Order," NZM 13 (1957), 29–34; J. Wicki, S.J., "Pedro Luis, Brahmane und erster indischer Jesuit," NZM 5 (1950), 115–26.

[57] The annual report of 1646 by the provincial mentions that the colleges of Goa, Rachol, and Bassein also taught the Brahmans Latin, philosophy, morals, and speculative theology, paid for by the Society of Jesus, until they were ordained (M. de Melo, The Recruitment, 183f.).

In Ceylon it was the establishment of the Oratory of the Holy Cross in Goa[62] which gave the clergy a special apostolic impulse and saved the Ceylonese Church. Its moving spirit was Joseph Vaz (1651–1711), "the Apostle of Ceylon."[63] He came to Ceylon in 1687 disguised as a beggar. After 1696 he was supported by other priests of the Oratory of Goa, which alone had carried the burden of that hard-pressed Church for 150 years.[64] In its main features the organization of this mission can be traced back to Father J. Vaz.[65] In very perilous times the Kingdom of Kandy, which was independent of Holland, offered refuge. Here too originated the major portion of the Catholic Singhalese literature.

---

[58] In faraway Ethiopia the Goan B. da Silva worked from 1598 to 1613 (Streit XV, 621, 637f.; XVI, 2); and in Madagascar three Goan Oratorians tried to found a mission in 1726 (AHSI 41 [1962], 244).

[59] F. Coutinho, Le régime paroissial 24/25. See also p. 282.

[60] A. D'Costa, S. J., "Demolition of the Temples in the Islands of Goa and the Disposal of the Temple Lands," NZM 18 (1962), 161–76.

[61] F. Coutinho, op. cit. 130–38.

[62] M. da Costa Nuñes, Documentação para a historia da congregação do Oratorio de Santa Cruz del Clero natural de Goa I (1681–1727) (Lisbon 1966).

[63] S. G. Perera, Life of the Venerable Father Joseph Vaz, Apostle of Ceylon (Galle 1953).

[64] When the Dutch had conquered the Portuguese territories of Ceylon (1638–58) they prohibited all Catholic cults and ordered forced Calvinization (19 Sept. 1658) (R. Boudens, O.M.I., "Negombo. Un centre de résistance catholique à Ceylon sous l'occupation hollandaise [1658–1796]," NZM 11 [1955], 81–91; idem, The Catholic Church in Ceylon under Dutch Rule [Rome 1957]).

[65] Ibid., 89–115; see 173–88 for the method of the Oratorians.

Father Vaz himself acquired an excellent knowledge of the language, but he persuaded his younger fellow Oratorian Jacome Gonçalvez (d. 1742) to dedicate himself to the apostolate of the book.[66] That the missionary spirit of the Oratorians stayed alive was witnessed by the Capuchin Marco della Tomba, who was traveling through. In 1783 he reported of fourteen Oratorians who attended to 90,000 Catholics in 400 parishes of varying size.[67] In 1796 the Dutch were driven out by the English, but the Catholics did not get full religious freedom until 1806. Later on the Oratorians had to be replaced by European missionaries of the Propaganda.[68]

The intervention of the Propaganda in India came to pass through an individual case. In 1625 the young Brahmin Matthaeus de Castro arrived in Rome and was ordained for the priesthood five years later.[69] In 1633 he was sent back to India as a missionarius apostolicus. But his faculties were recognized neither by the secular nor by the ecclesiastical authorities. So he traveled to Rome a second time and was appointed vicar apostolic of Bijapur[70] and consecrated bishop in 1637. Before entering into his office he was to accompany the newly appointed Bishop Francesco Antonio de S. Felice Frasella to Japan.[71] But since the latter was not longer able to travel there, de Castro began his work as vicar apostolic. But his unwise actions and efforts to have the Dominican, Augustinian, Franciscan, and Jesuit congregations taken over by the Brahmin priests ordained by him caused Lisbon to institute harsh measures which de Castro was able to evade only by flight to Rome (1644). After an interlude as vicar apostolic in Ethiopia he returned to India in 1653. But in the meantime the sultan there had established good relations with the Portugese so that the Portuguese Jesuits were able to resume their work and de Castro found his see occupied. At this time he wrote the pamphlet The Brahmin Mirror, attacking the Portuguese and the Jesuits. In 1658 he again traveled to Rome but received no cooperation this time. He died in 1677 at the College of the Propaganda. His successor, Custodio de Pinho (d. 1697), a Brahmin as well, did live in peace with the representatives of the Padroado, but he was unable to repair the damage his predecessor had done.[72] It was to no avail that Rome appointed him apostolic visitant for Malabar, where the Italian Carmelites had taken the place of the Jesuits in 1656.[73]

---

[66] R. Boudens, Catholic Church (Index); Streit VI, 217–19 (list of his works in Singhalese, Tamil, and Portuguese); E. Peiris, O.M.I., Singhalese Christian Literature of the XVIIth and XVIIIth Centuries (Colombo, n. d.).

[67] R. Boudens, Catholic Church, 169f.

[68] Because of resistance by the Dutch and the native population the Oratorians could not consider the training of a native clergy until the second half of the eighteenth century; even then they were unsuccessful (see R. Boudens, Catholic Church, 186–88).

[69] T. Ghesquière, Mathieu de Castro, Premier Vicaire Apostolique aux Indes (Louvain 1937); J. Metzler, "Der Brahmanenspiegel des Matthäus de Castro," NZM 23 (1967), 252–65.

[70] Bijapur was a Muslim sultanate east of Goa, inaccessible to the archbishop of Goa.

[71] A. Meersman, "A Few Notes Concerning Archbishop Franc. Ant. Frascella O.F.M. Conv. in Goa 1640–1653," MF 59 (1959), 346–51.

In 1669 the vicariate of Bijapur was enlarged by the Muslim state Golconda in the east and in 1697 by the complete realm of the grand mogul; as a result the mission see comprised ninety percent of the Indian subcontinent. But the establishment of a native hierarchy, envisioned by the secretary F. Ingoli at the time of de Castro's appointment, was stopped abruptly in 1696 by the appointment of the papal nephew Petrus Palma-Pignatelli as vicar apostolic by Innocent XIII. This action delayed the envisioned development by centuries. Palma-Pignatelli had worked as a missionary in Malabar; in 1701 (five years after his appointment), he died at Surat.[74] His successors continued to be selected from the Carmelite order.

Goa had not reacted strenuously against the appointment of Indian vicars apostolic except in de Castro's case. But then ensued the real conflict between the Padroado and the Propaganda in which the latter did not realize that Portugal's influence in Asia was still quite strong. The Portuguese bishops claimed territories of the Propaganda and in 1709 the viceroy of Goa expelled the Carmelites, active in Goa since 1620.[75]

In 1661 when the marriage contract between Charles II of England and Catherine of Braganza ceded (yet) unimportant Bombay to England, the Portuguese Franciscans were able to continue their missionary work in full freedom. But in 1730 they were finally expelled and replaced by Italian Carmelites.[76] From 1789 to 1791 Goa again exercised jurisdiction over Bombay with the result that the Carmelites now had to leave. This was followed by the disastrous compromise of the double jurisdiction by which the parishes were divided among the Padroado and the Propaganda missionaries. This also happened in several parts of British India[77] and was especially disadvantageous for the so-called Christians of Saint Thomas of the Malabar Coast. In these congregations of the Eastern Rite, which had been afflicted by earlier schisms and were unwilling to acquiesce to Latinization, Propaganda and Padroado bishops had worked side by side since 1704.[78] According to a report by the Carmelite missionary Paulinus a S. Bartholomeo, who worked on the Malabar Coast,[79] there were at that time eighty-four Uniate and thirty-two non-Uniate congregations. The former were split up among the bishops of Kranganore (twenty congregations) and the vicars apostolic in Verapoly (sixty-four congregations).[80]

---

[72] G. Radaelli, "Mons. Custodio de Pinho e la sua opera Missionaria," Pensiero Missionario (1942), 23–37; idem, "Le Missioni Cattoliche di Mogul, Golcanda e Idalcan alla metà del secolo XVII," Pensiero Missionario (1941), 214–26.

[73] Idem, "Un Visitatore Apostolico indigeno nel Malabar," Pensiero Missionario (1942), 122–35.—Mgr. de Pinho had been consecrated bishop by the vicar apostolic of the Comorin Coast, the Brahman Thomas de Castro, who was a cousin of M. de Castro.

[74] Ambrosius a S. Theresia, Hierarchia Carmelitana III, 101–8.

[75] The Carmelites had been well prepared at the mission college in Rome (see L. Kilger, "Eine alte Hochschule missionarischer Fachbildung," ZMR 5 [1915], 207–24).

[76] A. Meersman, The Franciscans in Bombay (Bangalore 1957), 81–102; J. H. Gense, The Church at the Gateway of India 1720–1960 (Bombay 1960), 32–69.

In the Jesuit literature the Malabar mission not only comprised the actual Malabar Coast, but the total area of the earlier Malabar province established in 1610. Part of it was Madura, probably the most flourishing mission of the entire seventeenth and eighteenth century.[81] Located outside the Portuguese territory, it was affected by the wars of native princes, Muslims, and Hindus, and additionally by the terror of native despots. The Portuguese Jesuit João de Britto (1647–93) died a martyr there and was canonized in 1947.[82] The missionaries of this mission founded by Father Nobili were foremost in creating values which are still alive today by making use of Indian doctrines of wisdom and the native languages for the propagation of the faith.

The so-called Malabar Rites in India had a considerable bearing on the missionary method of Roberto Nobili and his successors. But protest against certain customs arose from the ranks of his own brethren, the Portuguese Jesuits. In 1623 Gregory XV had approved Nobili's practices. But these concessions were seriously questioned by the missionaries of the Propaganda, especially by the Capuchin Father M. de Tours. Since Mgr. Maillard de Tournon had been appointed apostolic legate for East Asia and China in 1701, he was charged with clarifying the issue of Indian customs on the spot. In July 1704 Tournon issued a decree in Pondicherry which prohibited the Malabar Rites. This was protested above all by the archbishop of Goa, so that the legate's decree was not given papal recognition until 1734 and then again in 1739. The final condemnation of these and the Chinese Rites came from Benedict XIV in his bull Omnium sollicitudo of 1744. Modernization and secularization prompted the Propaganda to issue a decree in 1940 concerning the toleration of these rites.[83]

---

[77] Concerning the legal position of the Catholics in English territories, see M. Arputhasamy, L'Église catholique dans l'Inde. Étude Historico-juridique (diss., Fribourg 1948).

[78] K. Werth, Das Schisma der Thomas-Christen unter Erzbischof Franciscus Garzia (Limburg 1937); E. Tisserant and E. R. Hambye, Eastern Christianity in India (London 1957), esp. 69–97; Placid J. Podipara, Die Thomas-Christen (Würzburg 1966).

[79] Concerning his works: Ambrosius a S. Theresia, Bio-Bibliographia Missionaria omnis Carmelitarum Discalceatorum (Rome 1940; Index); L. Wetzel, Der österreichische Karmelit Paulinus a S. Bartholomaeo, Persönlichkeit und Werk (Vienna 1936); Streit VI, 187–91.

[80] See E. Tisserant and E. R. Hambye, op. cit., 97; P. Placid, an Indian Carmelite writes: "In perusing the documents and works of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth century one is quite surprised to see how the Thomas Christians became victims of the conflicts between Franciscans and Jesuits, between Jesuits and Carmelites, between the dioceses of Cochin and Angamale (Cranganore), and between the jurisdiction of the Padroado and the Propaganda" (op. cit., 137).

[81] D. Ferroli, The Jesuits in Malabar II (Bangalore 1951).

[82] The first and fundamental biography was written by his brother Pereyra de Britto (Coimbra 1722).

Among the great successors of Nobili were the Italian G. C. Beschi (1680–1747)[84] and the German E. Hanxleden (1681–1732).[85] G. Constancio Beschi worked for about twenty years in the area of Travancore, dominated by the Danes, where a German Lutheran mission had also established itself under Ziegenbalg. Circumstances and the order of his superior Dom Madeira made him the first controvertist theologian in the Tamil language.[86] In his annual report on the Madura mission to which Tanjore belonged as well, Beschi wrote that every priest attended to from five to twenty thousand Christians.[87] The missionaries always held fast to Nobili's guidelines: among the Brahmins and the higher castes the missionaries worked as Sannyasei; the pariahs had their own padres. The dispute over the Malabar Rites, rekindled around 1700 in distant Madras—in Travancore itself the tolerated rites were fought by the Lutherans as idolatry—actually had little influence on the missions because the last condemnation by Benedict XIV of 1744 was hardly known prior to the expulsion of the Jesuits by Pombal.

Portuguese Franciscans who had been active in some areas since the sixteenth century were also working in the Tamil-speaking part of the Jesuit province of Malabar. After the expulsion of the Jesuits they were able to take over their stations.[88] In contrast to other countries, the collaboration between the mendicant orders, Jesuits, and the secular priests of the Padroado—except for some minor disputes—was rather more harmonious in India.

---

[83] AAS 32 (1940), 379.

[84] For a list of his works, see esp. Streit VI, 30–41; M. Ledrus, Beschi (Louvain 1931); D. Ferroli, op. cit., 298–314.

[85] D. Ferroli, op. cit., 315–32; A. Huonder, Deutsche Jesuiten-Missionare (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1899), 175. For the complete Christian literature in Tamil see Devanesan Rayarigam, Christliche Literatur in der Tamilsprache (Gütersloh 1961) (reviewed by A. Lehmann in ThLZ [1962], 306f.).

[86] The Danes were more tolerant than the Calvinist Dutch so that Catholic missionary work could be continued in their territories (A. Meersman, "The Catholic Church in Tranquebar and Tangore During the Formative Years of the Lutheran Mission," Indian Church History Review 1 [1967], 93–112 [about Beschi see 110–12]).

[87] A. Meersman, op. cit., 111.

The missions in the vast realm of the grand mogul were also part of the Malabar province of the Jesuits. Those missions had had a promising start under the rulers Akbar and Jahangir, but in the seventeenth and eighteenth century they had to be confined to ministering to the already converted Christians and those who migrated there. Among the most important Jesuit missionaries the following deserve special mention: the Germans Heinrich Roth (1620–88), author of the first Sanskrit grammar,[89] and Andreas Strobl (1703–70), who worked at the Muslim courts of northern India as a distinguished natural scientist, and the Tyrolian Joseph Tieffenthaler (1710–85), probably the most important geographer of India.[90]

The Portuguese Franciscans who organized two large expeditions to northern India had no lasting successes.[91] The Carmelites of the Italian province who started missionary work in Persia in 1607 and from there advanced to the northern Indian province of Sind were forced to confine themselves to the ministry of Portuguese and other Christians in the large port of Tatta, where they had arrived in 1672.[92] The same was true for the Augustinian Hermits who also gained a foothold in Tatta in 1624 in order to hold on to the important Portuguese bases for the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Goa and for the Padroado.[93]

Even in Tibet the interests of the Padroado and the Propaganda collided. The Portuguese missionary Antonio d'Andrade managed to settle in Tsaparang in 1624, but six years later wars within the country forced the missionaries to leave Tibet.[94] In 1704 the Propaganda transferred the mission to the Capuchin friars of Piceno. They arrived in Lhasa in 1707, but were forced to return to Bengal in 1712.[95] In the meantime Ippolito Desideri had been selected for the Tibet mission by the Jesuit provincial of Goa. He arrived in Lhasa in 1716, where he encountered the new Capuchin mission, but he did not believe that he was entitled to transfer his charge to them. In 1718 Rome consequently was required to entrust the Tibet mission to the Capuchins for a second time. Father Desideri thereupon left Lhasa and returned to Rome in order to render his report (d. 1733).[96]

---

[88] A. Meersman, The Franciscans in Tamilnad (Schöneck/Beckenried 1962).

[89] A. Camps, "Fr. Heinrich Roth SJ (1620–68) and the History of his Sanscrit Manuscripts," ZMR 53 (1969), 185–95.

[90] Concerning the cultural and scientific achievements of the India Missionaries see A. Ballini, "Il contributo delle Missioni alle conoscenza delle lingue e della cultura dell'India," Le Missioni Cattoliche e la Cultura dell'Oriente (Rome 1943), 233–60; L. Ambruzzi, S.J., "Il contributo dei Missionari cattolici alla conoscenza delle religioni, dei costumi e della geografia dell'India," Le Missioni Cattoliche e la Cultura dell'Oriente (Rome 1943), 261–92.

[91] A. Camps, "Franciscan Missions to the Mogul Court," NZM 15 (1959), 259–70.

[92] E. Berden, "The Carmel in Sind" NZM 11 (1955), 169–78, 241–50.

[93] J. Beckmann, "Die Augustiner-Eremiten in Sind," NZM 13 (1957), 191.

[94] G. Toscano, La Prima Missione Cattolica nel Tibet (Hong Kong 1951). The reports by Father d'Andrades are backed by Tibetan historical sources; A. H. Francke, "Die Jesuitenmission in Tsaparang im Lichte der tibetanischen Urkunden," ZMR 15 (1925), 269–76.

The beginnings of the Capuchin mission in Lhasa were modest, but thanks to their linguistic and religious knowledge the missionaries—especially under their prefect Francisco Orazio Oliverio della Penna di Billi (d. 1745)—were able to establish a peaceful relationship with the Mongols.[97] Yet in 1742 the Capuchins had to retreat before the persecution instigated by the leaders of the Lama. They withdrew to Nepal until 1771, when they were driven out from there as well. They continued their hard work in Hindustan.[98]

The East Coast of India around the vast Gulf of Bengal was part of the diocese of São Tomé, Mylapore. This was the area in which the conflicts between the European powers were to be decided in favor of England.

These territories remained free from ecclesiastical conflicts: the Capuchins, missionaries of the Propaganda, received jurisdiction only for the French settlements, initially in Madras and later in Pondicherry; missionary work among the natives remained the prerogative of the Padroado missionaries. Bengal was a traditional missionary field of the Augustinian Hermits and the Portuguese Jesuits. In the neighboring provinces, especially in distant Carnate, the French Jesuits operated their own mission. They had their own superior and enjoyed a certain amount of independence. During the eighteenth century their mission was conducted by an average of 20 Jesuits, whose activities were not affected by Pombal's anti-Jesuit policy. In 1776, after the abolition of the Society of Jesus, their mission was entrusted to the Paris Missionaries.[99] The English victory and the effects of the Revolution on Pondicherry, which had stayed French, impeded the mission. One of their most significant representatives was Jean Antoine Dubois (1766–1848), whose somewhat pessimistic work about Indian customs and traditions determined the European attitude towards India during the nineteenth century.[100]

---

[95] L. Petech, I Missionari Italiani nei Tibet et nel Nepal. I Cappuccini Marchigiani I–IV (Rome 1953).

[96] L. Petech, op. cit.; Ippolito Desideri S J, V, VI (Rome 1954–55); G. Castellani, "Un trattato di Missionologia del sec. XVIII," CivCatt, 1933, III, 127–40; DHGE XIV, 1503–5.

[97] A. Jann, "Zur Kulturarbeit der katholischen Kirche in Innerasien. Die missionarische und literarische Tätigkeit des Apostolischen Präfekten von Tibet, P. Franz. Horatius Oliverius della Penna di Billi 1712–45," Studien aus dem Gebiet von Kirche und Kultur (Festschr. Gustav Schnaürer) (Paderborn 1930), 128–207; Streit VI, 96–100.

[98] Abundant source material for this period in A. Jann, Monumenta Anastasiana I (Lucerne 1939), 970–1152.—Perhaps the largest obstacle was the abject poverty of the missionaries. For this reason the missionaries in Mexico were permitted to conduct a collection for the mission from 1763 to 1767 (see F. de Aljofrén, Diario del Viaje . . . a la América Septentrional en el siglo XVIII, 2 vols. [Madrid 1958–59]).

Burma, respectively the Kingdoms of Ava and Pegu were also part of the diocese of Meliapur. Portuguese Franciscans had worked there and especially in Pegu since the sixteenth century.[101] In 1721 when the missionaries of the Propaganda (Barnabites) arrived there, they met with heavy resistance, which they tried to avoid by confining their work to the Kingdom of Ava. Pegu always remained the preferred domain of the Franciscans. In 1766 Giovanni M. Percoto was named vicar apostolic of Ava and bishop of Maxula. The West owes him the first Buddhist manuscripts in Pali (on palm leaves). In various manuscripts and works not published until the nineteenth century he proved himself to be an expert on Burmese Buddhism.[102]

Far distant from India, yet part of Portuguese India, there was a number of Christian centers in Indonesia. After the conquest of Malacca (1640) by the Dutch, Macassar (on the island of Celebes) briefly became the center of the Padroado mission in Indonesia. But in the treaty of Batavia of 1660 the Dutch managed to force the ruler, Sultan Hassan Udin, to deport all Portuguese and their followers, i.e., Catholics.[103] But with heavy sacrifices the Dominicans were able to save their Solor mission into the nineteenth century.[104] Always weak, they nonetheless managed to uphold the remainders of Catholic congregations in neighboring Flores as well.[105] Again and again the Franciscans, too, sent individual missionaries to Indonesia; some of them using disguises were able to get to Malacca to minister to the native Christians.[106] North of Sumatra a new field of mission even offered itself to them. There the much feared Atjehr (or Achin) were reconciled with the Portuguese so that the Portuguese Franciscans could work there again from 1688 to 1775.[107]

---

[99] A. Launay, Histoire des Missions de l'Inde I (Paris 1898); J. Lafrenz, Précis de l'Histoire de la Mission de Pondichéry (Pondicherry 1953). From 1736 to 1741 the Capuchin Norbert de Bar-le-Duc (1697–1769) worked in Pondicherry. His works on the conflict over the Malabar Rites poisoned the atmosphere in the mission; he also made it impossible for the first European sisters, the French Ursulines, to work in India. They had settled in Pondicherry in 1738 (J. Lafrenz, op. cit., 4f.).

[100] The English East India Company published the manuscript in London in 1817 (Streit VIII, 27f.).

[101] A. Meersman, "The Franciscans in the Burmese Kingdoms of Ava and Pegu 1557–1818," AFrH 31 (1938), 356–86.

[102] P. Anatriello, "I Cattolici ed il Buddismo Birmano," NZM 22 (1966), 260–69.

[103] B. Biermann, O.P., "Frei Luis de Andrade und die Solormission," ZMR 43 (1959), 176–87, 261–75 (on Makassar 274f.). For the sojourn of the Franciscans in Makassar, see A. Meersman, O.F.M., The Franciscans in the Indonesian Archipelago (Louvain and Paris 1967), 115–22.

INDOCHINA

In 1664, two years after their arrival in Ajuthia, the capital of Siam, the missionaries of the Paris Seminary established a seminary for the education of a native clergy which was to become the central seminary for all of East India and southern China. It was destroyed during the invasion by the Burmese in 1769, but found a new home near Pondicherry where it fell victim to the French Revolution a few decades later. In 1808 it was opened again in English-owned Pulo-Penang.[108] Beyond this the new missionaries also developed a direct apostolic activity in Siam. For 100 years the Dominicans had had a monastery and church in the Portuguese quarter for the ministry to the Portuguese. The Jesuits, driven from Japan by persecutions, found a new sphere of activity in the Japanese quarter and the Paris Missionaries found theirs in the Chinese quarter. The first vicar apostolic, Louis Laneau (1674–96), transferred his residence to Bangkok and through Goa and Rome he prevailed in having all regular clerics subordinated to his jurisdiction. But in spite of his excellent knowledge of the language[109] he and his missionaries did not succeed in gaining ground among the Buddhist population of the Thai, good relations between France and Siam notwithstanding. The opening of a mission in Burma failed as well and in 1693 the first two missionaries of the Seminary of Paris were murdered. Yet by the formation of a native clergy Laneau had created a tranquil and secure center.

---

[104] B. Biermann, "Die alten Dominikanermissionen auf den Solorinseln," ZMR 14 (1924), 12–48, 269–73.

[105] Idem, "Lieder der Florinesen," NZM 10 (1954), 141–45.

[106] A. Meersman, op. cit., 184ff.

[107] Ibid., 123–44.

[108] A. Launay, Histoire de la Mission de Siam 1662–1811 (Paris 1920); idem, Documents Historiques, 2 vols. (Paris 1920); H. Chappouli, op. cit. I, 131ff.; T. Destombes, Le Collège Général de la Societé des Missions Étrangères de Paris (Hong Kong 1934); G. Cassac, "Les Missions d'Indochine après l'arrivée des Vicaires Apostoliques (1658–1799)," Delacroix II, 213–26; H. Bernard-Maître, Pour la compréhension de l'Indochine et de l'Occident (Paris, n. d.).

[109] A. Launay, Memorial, 356–59. Laneau was the first to translate the Gospels into the Thai language.

Lambert de la Motte, the first vicar apostolic to Cochinchina,[110] whose mission also included neighboring Cambodia, briefly worked there on two separate occasions. In 1671/72 he got as far as the port of Faifo, where he conducted a synod with three of his missionaries and several catechists. In spite of its modest character this synod was to form the legal basis for the mission of the Propaganda. In 1675/76 he worked as a ship's chaplain on a French ship. Francis Pérez (1687–1728) later worked there as vicar apostolic. In spite of violent persecutions, especially in 1698 and 1700, he succeeded—probably because he was a native and quite independent—in unifying the missionaries under the jurisdiction of the Propaganda. Later on there ensued some serious dissension, primarily between the Spanish Franciscans from the Philippines and the French missionaries. Two Roman visitations in 1740 and 1744 failed. In 1750 all missionaries and their Christians were afflicted by a general persecution[111] from which the congregations had great difficulty recovering. For the most part they were attended by Chinese and native priests.

In 1666 by order of Mgr. Pallu the first missionary of the Paris Seminary, François Deydier (1637–93), pushed up into the vast areas of the north, to Tongking,[112] supported after 1670 by his colleague Jacques de Bourges (1630–1714). When Pallu suggested dividing the area into two vicariates apostolic, the latter became vicar apostolic of West Tongking in 1679; in the same year he consecrated his colleague François Deydier bishop of East Tongking. At this time the two vicariates already contained three hundred thousand Christians. Although the Tongkinese Church had been founded by Alfonso de Rhodes and the Jesuits driven out of Japan (missionaries of the Portuguese Padroado), Tongking became the area where the Paris Missionaries could execute the principles and the program of the Propaganda. Moreover, Tongking represented the first sizeable sphere of activity for the native clergy, part of whom had been trained locally (mostly on fishing boats because of the persecutions), the rest in Siam. The future vicar apostolic, Louis Néez (1680–1764), who during fifty-two years of active missionary work got to know most of them personally, wrote biographical sketches of fifty-three of them, stressing their personal merits during the times of persecution.[113] In 1694 Mgr. de Bourges nominated one of them to be his successor as bishop and vicar apostolic. Along with the education of a native clergy, the organization of catechists and of the first congregation of native sisters, the Lovers of the Cross, who worked for the education of women and girls, proceeded apace. Around 1765 West Tongking alone included twenty branches with twenty to thirty sisters each.[114] But during the seventeenth and eighteenth century periods of toleration and tranquility were rare[115] and bloody persecutions frequent. Nonetheless, there were disagreements between the missionaries of different nationalities and religious orders, although the common goal prevented serious conflicts. An initial fundamental solution appeared to have been found in the transfer of the vicariate of East Tongking to the Spanish Dominicans of the Philippines (1679), who had been working in the country since 1675. But in addition to the Dominicans there were also some Italian Discalced Augustinians working there who disputed parts of the Dominican territory. But in 1757 these Augustinians were recalled by the Propaganda and their station handed over to the Spanish. In different places of West and East Tongking there were Jesuit missionaries of the Padroado who went over the heads of the vicars apostolic of both regions. This attitude hardened when after decades of a sedes vacans a bishop was finally residing again in Macao in 1692 who as the next Padroado bishop also claimed jurisdiction in Tongking. The strong ties of the missionaries to their congregations, strengthened in times of persecution, made any delineation of territories impossible. As a result there were constant conflicts via Rome or Lisbon until the abolition of the Society of Jesus.

---

[110] A. Launay, Histoire de la Mission de Cochinchine (1658–1823), 3 vols. (Paris 1923–25).

[111] The two bishops and seven of the Paris Missionaries, two Italian Dominicans and a priest from Nepal, nine Spanish Franciscans from the Philippines and eight Jesuits of the Padroado, five Portuguese and three Germans were caught. Only Johannes Koffler, S.J., was able to remain (as a physician at the royal court of Hué).

[112] A. Launay, Histoire de la Mission du Tonkin. Documents Historiques I (Paris 1927).

CHINA

Thanks to the influential position of the Cologne Jesuit J. A. Schall von Bell (1592–1666) under both the Ming and Manchu dynasties (the latter since 1644) the tumultuous domestic politics at first had no damaging effects for Christianity in China. But the persecutions of 1664 came upon the young Church like a whirlwind. Father Schall, already beyond the age of seventy, was removed from his governmental positions and condemned to death. His penalty was later reduced to imprisonment.[116] All churches were destroyed and twenty-five missionaries of the Jesuit and mendicant orders taken off to be imprisoned in Canton.

---

[113] Documents sur le Clergé tonkinois au XVIII^e siècle, ed . by A. Launay (Paris 1925).

[114] N. Kowalsky, Stand der katholischen Missionen 1765 (1957), 26.

[115] About the scientific works, see Streit VI, XI and G. Dindinger, "Il contributo dei Missionari cattolici alla conoscenza del Siam e dell' Indochina," Le Missioni cattoliche e la cultura dell'Oriente (Rome 1943), 293–338.

The Belgian Jesuit Ferdinand Verbiest (1623–88)[117] and two of his brethren were not banished to Canton. Thanks to his knowledge of astronomy, which he had displayed as a coworker of Father Schall, he became the savior of the mission. Called upon again to work in the mathematical institute of the court, he became its director in 1670. One of his first acts was to obtain the release of Father Schall so that the latter could die in freedom in 1666. After the Manchu ruler Kangshi ascended to the throne in 1667,[118] Verbiest gained his confidence and became his teacher of mathematics and astronomy. In 1671 the missionaries imprisoned in Canton were able to return to Peking.[119] Verbiest became interpreter for the court's relations with foreign ambassadors, a position held by Catholic missionaries into the nineteenth century. Appointed vice-provincial in 1677, he employed all the means at his disposal to increase the number of missionaries. This included letters to the Jesuit general and the Pope, but, most importantly, an appeal of 15 August 1678 to his brethren in Europe.[120] This appeal, supported by Philipp Couplet (1624–92), was most successful in France. Not only did many Jesuits there enlist for duty in China, but Louis XIV also assumed the cost of travel and subsistence for the missionaries. On 7 February 1688, ten days after the death of Verbiest, the first five French Jesuits arrived in Peking.[121]

The French Jesuits gave a great impetus to the Chinese mission. The Manchu ruler maintained good relations with them, above all with Father J. Bouvet (1656–1730), who became his ambassador to Louis

---

[116] A. Vath, S.J., Joh. A. Schall v. Bell (Cologne 1933), 295 ff.; about the Jesuit missionaries in China, L. Pfister, S.J., op. cit.

[117] H. Josson and L. Willaert, Correspondance de Ferdinand Verbiest de la Comp. de Jésus (1623–88) (Brussels 1938).

[118] L. Wei Tsing-sing, "Louis XIV et K'and-Hi. L'épopée des missionnaires français du Grand Siècle en Chine," NZM 19 (1963), 93–109, 182–204.

[119] Verbiest's letter to Innocent XI (1678) praises the missionary importance of astronomy (Correspondance, op. cit., 227–28).—H. Bernard-Maître, S.J., La science européene au tribunal astronomique de Pékin (Paris 1952).

[120] Correspondance, 230–53. On the success of this appeal by Ferd. von Fürstenberg, bishop of Münster and Paderborn (1682), see O. Maas, "Die Stiftung Ferd. von Fürstenbergs zum Besten der ostasiatischen Missionen," ThGl 25 (1933), 701–10.

[121] P. Bornet, "La Mission Française à Pékin (1688–1775). Notes sur son origine et son personnel," Bull. Cath. de Pékin 25 (1938) 555–63, 609–16; C. de Rochemonteix, Jos. Amoit et les derniers survivants de la Mission Française à Pékin (Paris 1915).

XIV and his biographer.[122] He gave a piece of property near his palace to the French for a church and missionary station where a sizeable library was installed.[123] The French Jesuits became the most eager promoters of Chinese culture in Europe, especially by means of the seventeen-volume Lettres Édifiantes et Curieuses, published from 1702 to 1726,[124] and the voluminous folios about China by J. B. du Halde.[125] These works played an important role in the criticism of followers of the Enlightenment concerning the Christian belief in revealed religion and religious history.[126]

The French Jesuits were not about to submit to the laws of the Padroado. Louis XIV demanded categorically that his missionaries were not to be placed under the authority of foreign, non-French superiors, which was in contradiction to the basic rules of the order. This brought about tedious negotiations between the general of the order, Tirso González, and Louis XIV, respectively his father confessor de la Chaise. The French Jesuits were given their own superior, but legally they remained part of the vice-province of China.[127] Even on the issue of the rites they were not uniformly among the Ricci front.

While the persecutions in China were followed by a quiet reconstruction of the missions, King Pedro II of Portugal attempted to call everything into question again. He prevailed with Pope Alexander VIII (1689–91) in the establishment of two new bishoprics of the Padroado, Nanking and Peking, which were approved by the Pope in 1690 as though no vicariates apostolic existed there. Portugal sought to weaken the objections of the Propaganda by suggesting the two vicars apostolic for these bishoprics. But the Propaganda could not be satisfied with this. The next Pope, Innocent XII (1691–1700), tried to make up for the overly compliant action of his predecessor. By a brief of 15 October 1696 he confined the Portuguese bishoprics of Macao, Nanking, and Peking to two provinces each; vicariates apostolic were to be established in the rest of the provinces. In the course of time some vicariates were converted into administrative regions. For almost 100 years the three Padroado bishoprics existed side by side with the three vicariates apostolic of Fukien, Szechwan, and Shansi.[128]

---

[122] J. C. Gatty, Voiage du Siam du P. Bouvet (Leiden 1963), esp. the introduction and bibliography of his works; L. Wei Tsing-sing, op. cit., 185–87. Bouvet published the Histoire de l'Empereur de la Chine 1699 in Paris.

[123] See esp. the introduction by H. Verhaeren, C.M., Catalogue of the Pei-tang Library (Peking 1949), I–XXVII. A photomechanical reprint appeared in Paris in 1969.

[124] A. Rétif, "Brève histoire des Lettres édifiantes et curieuses," NZM 7 (1951), 37–50.

[125] Description géographique, historique, chronologique, politique et physique de l'Empire de la Chine (Paris 1735).—See also A. Brou, S.J., "Les Jésuites sinologues de Pékin et leurs éditeurs à Paris," RHM 11 (1934), 551–66.

[126] B. Guy, The French Image of China before and after Voltaire (Geneva 1963). See chapter 19 of this volume.

[127] G. Guitton, S.J., Le Père de la Chaise, confesseur de Louis XIV, 2 vols. (Paris 1959).

The lines of the bishoprics and vicariates had been precisely adapted to the geography of the Chinese provinces, but were disregarded in personnel matters. Thus the Spanish Franciscans of the Philippines were working in the areas of the Padroado as well as those of the vicars apostolic. By and by the mission fields were divided by orders. Well into the nineteenth century Peking had four stations and churches, two of the Jesuits of the Padroado, one of the French Jesuits, and one of the Propaganda missionaries. From the end of the seventeenth century on the jurisdiction of the whole China mission was as follows: The missionaries of the Padroado, mostly Jesuits, attended to a broad strip stretching from Macao beyond Peking via Nanking.[129] The Dominicans of the Rosary Province of the Philippines worked in the coastal provinces, first in collaboration with the Paris Missionaries and later by themselves. From the beginning of the eighteenth century they were also in charge of the vicariate of Fukien, to which the provinces of Kiangsi and Chekiang were joined in 1718.[130] The Paris Missionaries concentrated more and more on the vast provinces of western China, consisting of the provinces of Kweichow, Kwangsi, and Yünnan.[131] A prepared missionary field in the northwest, long since abandoned by the Jesuits, was encountered by the Italian Franciscans. This was the vicariate of Shansi, together with Shensi and Kansu, joined in 1792 by the double province of Hukuang (Hunan and Hupei).[132]

The missionaries' differences of nationality and order did not prevent the uniformity of their efforts. An exception were the missionaries in Peking who were in the service of the Chinese Emperor. Both Padroado and Propaganda missionaries worked as painters and musicians, physicians and engineers, but especially as astronomers and mathematicians.

---

[128] P. d'Elia, "L'Istituzione della Gerarchia Episcopale e dell'Internunziatura in Cina," StMis II (1946), 1–31; J. Beckmann, "Die hierarchische Neuordnung in China," NZM 3 (1947), 9–24.

[129] The best information about this is still contained in L. Pfister, also the surveys by J. Dehergne mentioned in n. 158.

[130] J. M. González, O.P., Historia de la Misiones Dominicanas de China, 5 vols. (Madrid 1964–67).

[131] A. Launay, Histoire des Missions de Chine. Mission du Se Tchoan, 2 vols. (Paris 1920); idem, Mission du Kouy-Tchéou, 3 vols. (Vannes and Paris 1907); idem, Mission du Kouangsi (Paris 1903); idem, Missions du Kouang-Tong (Paris 1907).

[132] Sinica Franciscana, ed. by A. von den Wyngaert, G. Mensaert, F. Margiotti and S. Rossa, vols. II–VII (Karachi and Rome 1933–65).

Even during the cruelest persecutions of the eighteenth century they were protected, but their spiritual activities were more and more confined to the ministry of Christians in the capital, while the mission stations in the countryside were left to other missionaries and native priests who waited in vain for the help of their Peking brethren, who in reality no longer had any influence. Even Emperor K'anghsi, who as late as 1692 had issued a decree of toleration for Christianity, in 1717 reacted favorably to a memorandum from his ministries which was radically hostile to Christians. This was the prelude to the local persecutions in the provinces, which became ever more widespread and cruel under the Emperors Yung Cheng (1722–35) and Ch'ien Lung (1735–96). Just how serious the situation in the middle of the eighteenth century was, even in Peking, is shown by a letter of 1753 from the Jesuit Antonio Gaubil (1689–1759) to the general of the order: "The Emperor is still tolerating a certain amount of religious freedom in Peking, but all Chinese and Tartars (i.e., Manchus) know full well that he hates the Christian name and know his resolve not to tolerate missionaries in the provinces and not to permit any Mandarin to become a Christian. . . . The Emperor thinks that he has done enough for us by elevating four of us to the rank of Mandarin. . . ."[133]

But not all the Peking missionaries showed such discernment. During the hard periods of persecution in the provinces most of them were living as on an island, aggravating their lives by quarrels connected with national rights and canon law. The most disastrous of them was the so-called Peking Schism.[134] After the death of Bishop Polykarp de Souza (d. 1757), until then the only bishop able to reside in Peking, disagreements ensued among the Peking missionaries concerning the administration of the bishopric by the neighboring Bishop Gottfried von Laimbeckhoven (1787) of Nanking. The quarrel was aggravated by the appointment and consecration of the Italian Augustinian Salusti in 1780. His successor Alexander de Gouvea, who arrived in Peking in 1785, was able to eliminate the schisms and realize the last eighteenth century revival of Catholicism in Peking.[135]

[133] In C. de Rochemonteix, Jos. Amiot (Paris 1915), 35.

[134] R. Primon, O.S.M., "L'atteggiamento della Congregazione di Propaganda Fide nello scisma di Pechino," Missionswissenschaftliche Studien (Festgabe Dindinger) (Aachen 1951), 315–31; G. Mensaert, O.F.M., "Nouveaux documents sur le soi-disant Schisme de Pékin," (Festgabe Dindinger), 332–46.

[135] J. Beckmann, "Bischof Alexander de Gouvea von Peking (1771–1808) im Lichte seiner Bibliothek" (Festschr. Rommerskirchen) in ED 21 (1968), 457–79. In a report to the Propaganda the new bishop writes in 1785: "Pekini omnia erant calumniae, rixae, murmurationes et charitatis fraternae violationes," and then he complains that the missionary activities of his priests had been reduced to zero. "Non loquor de omnibus, sed de maxima parte" (C. de Rochemonteix, Jos. Amiot [Paris 1915], 542–47).

While the situation of the Peking Church was in many ways serious, the provincial congregations were ailing badly yet always fighting heroically. The persecutions began in the province of Fukien in 1723. The harsh decree of the local viceroy against the Christians was immediately approved by the Emperor and consequently applied in the other provinces as well. In short order about thirty banished missionaries arrived in Canton. When several of them managed to return to their missions in secret, all banished missionaries were later transported to Macao. The individual congregations were affected even more severely by the laws of persecution.[136] Most of them were left for decades without a resident priest. Among the missionaries who returned from Canton the blessed Pedro Martyr Sanz and four of his brethren who accompanied him were condemned to death.[137] In 1784/85 all of China was involved in the persecution of Christians. On 27 August 1784 four new Franciscan missionaries designated for the Shansi/Shensi mission were arrested. Because a dangerous Muslim revolt had broken out in the western border region, the prisoners were immediately suspected of collusion with the enemy (popular view considered Islam and Christianity one and the same religion). To be sure, the trial in Peking clearly established their innocence, but the case had grave consequences. The Peking authorities were surprised that in spite of all imperial prohibitions there were still so many Christians in the country. Forty priests were finally caught and transported to Peking; seven Europeans among them died of the extreme exertion. The rest of the Europeans were deported to Macao, while the native priests and Christians were condemned to banishment beyond the Great Wall.[138] The matter of Christianity and the missionaries henceforth became the responsibility of the subordinate authorities, who were outdoing themselves in tracking down Christians.[139] And yet new missionaries were able again and again to reach their stations by covert routes. Naturally the persecutions resulted in considerable attrition in the Christian communities. The China mission was burdened by the problem of apostates for a number of decades. But many missionaries and Christians of this era manifested great heroism.[140] The causes of the persecution are manifold. The one of 1784/85 shows clearly that Christians and Muslims were considered as potential allies of foreign or domestic opponents of the regime. The fact that K'anghsi admonished his successor Yung Cheng to tolerate the missionaries in his service in Peking, but never in the provinces, demonstrated the limits of even that Emperor's attitude. A special problem was posed by the Mandarins. Many of them intensely disliked having foreigners on equal footing with them or, worse yet, having them as their superiors. In addition, most missionaries misunderstood Buddhism and Taoism. Their attacks on Buddhist and Taoist superstitions frequently affected the Confucian circles of the Mandarins as well because syncretism had taken place among them long ago.[141] The missionaries in Peking and to a larger extent their defenders in Europe pointed to the papal condemnation of the Chinese Rites as the main cause. A connection cannot be denied. Yet the issue of the rites and their significance requires a more subtle treatment.

---

[136] According to a "Catalogus omnium missionariorum qui Sinarum imperium ad haec usque tempora ad praedicandum Jesu Xi Evangelium ingressi sunt" written shortly before the persecution (Revue de l'Extrême-Orient 2 [Paris 1883], 58–71), there were eighty-eight churches and mission stations in the provinces. In addition there were sixty missionaries in the four churches and residences of Peking.

[137] J. M. González, O.P., Misiones Dominicanes en China (1700–1750) (Madrid 1952).

[138] B. Willeke, O.F.M., Imperial Government and Catholic Mission in China During the Years 1784–85 (New York 1948).

[139] After the persecution the procurator of the Propaganda, J. B. Marchini, reported on 10 December 1785 that the following missionaries were still at their posts: Bishop Gottfried von Laimbeckhoven (Nanking) with one European and one Chinese priest; the vicar apostolic of Szechwan, Mgr. Pottier, with three European and six Chinese priests; in Fukien four Spanish Dominicans and three Chinese priests; in Shantung one Spanish Franciscan; in Kwangsi and Kwantung one native priest each; in Shansi three native priests; in the Peking outer missions seven Chinese priests. In addition there was

The issue of the rites refers to the often violent quarrels regarding the sanction of Chinese ceremonies and observances for use by the Christians. Closely connected with this were the proclamation and obligation of the positive commandments of the Church.[142] Four stages in this issue can be identified in China.

Thanks to the authority of the mission's founder, Matteo Ricci (d.

Bishop A. de Gouvea in Peking with sixteen European missionaries (Propaganda Archives, Rome, Scritture riferite nei Congressi 38, fol. 255/56).

[140] We need only mention the Austrian Jesuit Gottfried von Laimbeckhoven, who was appointed bishop of Nanking in 1752, but could not enter his bishopric until 1768 because of the fear of his Christians. Until his death in 1787 he had no fixed residence, being forced to wander constantly. After the abolition of his order Portugal did not pay him a salary for a period of years. He nonetheless felt bound to his oath as a Padroado bishop, which, in turn, brought him into conflict with the Roman authorities (J. Krahl, S.J., China Missions in Crisis. Bishop Laimbeckhoven and His Times 1738–87 [Rome 1964]).

[141] The Dominican Domingo Fern. Navarrete wrote about this phenomenon after his sojourn in China (1658–69) and added that he had heard of a Christian in Peking who also wanted to merge Christianity with these three religions (J. S. Cummins, The Travels and Controversies of Friar Domingo de Navarrete (1618–86) II [London 1962], 249 [see also I, LXIX]).

[142] Concerning these peripheral questions, see X. Bürkler, Die Sonn- und Festtagsfeier in der katholischen China-Mission (Rome and Immensee 1942); idem, Die Fasten- und Abstinenzpraxis in der chinesischen Mission," NZM 1 (1945), 258–71.

1610), the Jesuits initially proceeded in concert.[143] The problems within the ranks did not surface until after his death. His successor, N. Langobardi (d. 1654), took the stance that the heretofore tolerated rites and terminology were not permitted. He probably knew that Ricci's predecessor, Michele Ruggieri (d. 1607) did not have in mind an adaptation to the Confucian ideas of the well educated, but rather to the religious forces residing within the people in the form of Buddhism and Taoism.[144] The firm rejection of accommodation by the missionaries of Japan probably affirmed him in his own position.[145] Just how serious a question this was within the orders is shown by the fact that by 1665 seventy-four conferences on the issue had taken place. While Ricci and his followers, as it appears, referred to the original Confucianism, his opponents were convinced that they should consider the doctrines of the commentaries published at that time. The arrival of the Spanish mendicant orders from the Philippines in the midst of the negotiations broadened the conflict. To come to their own conclusions, the latter proceeded from the conditions as they actually were. But since they could not arrive at an understanding with the Jesuits, who were positively inclined towards the rites, they sent the Dominican J. B. de Morales to Rome, which decided the disputed issues in their favor in 1645. Shortly thereafter when the Jesuit Martin Martini of Triest (d. 1661) presented the purely private character of the rites to the Roman authorities, they were permitted by Alexander VII in 1656. For the time being there were two views which were diametrically opposed to each other. The conferences by the missionaries interned in Canton (1664–70), the efforts by the Spanish Dominican D. E. Navarrete (d. 1688),[146] and even the letter to Philipp V (1647) and Pope Innocent X (1649) by the otherwise respected and influential bishop of Puebla in Mexico, Juan de Palafox y Mendoza, were unable to change the matter in favor of the mendicant orders.[147] In addition to the objective differences there were also the political ones between Portugal and Spain. The arrival of the Paris Missionaries (1684) changed the situation. The Portuguese and Spanish combined to oppose the vicars apostolic. Pallu's successor, Charles Maigrot (1652–1730), decided against the rites in his letter of 1693. He was not only vicar apostolic of Fukien, but had also been appointed apostolic administrator for all of China by Pallu prior to the latter's death. After years of negotiations which escalated the disputes, which up to then had been pursued objectively, Clement XI condemned the Chinese rites (1704). Within China Maigrot's pastoral letter had split the missionary community into two camps: The Propaganda missionaries joined by the Spanish missionaries from the Philippines and, on the opposite side, the Padroado missionaries, most of them Jesuits. But in 1687 the French Jesuits, the "mathématiciens du Roi" (Louis XIV), had also come to China. They were not inclined to accede to the claims of the Padroado. They produced the men who, later on, were called the figurists or symbolists and who embarked on a third path. They searched the Chinese classics, especially the Tao Te Ching, for prophetic images and sayings which anticipated certain teachings of Christianity. They also thought that they were best able to render the Christian name of God by the ambiguous "Tao." Yet neither the superiors in China nor in Europe agreed with their ideas.[148]

---

[143] Among the more recent historians of the Society of Jesus H. Bernard-Maître esp. tried to prove that Matteo Ricci considered permission, while not certain, yet at least probable. Except for a brief reference in his Storia there is nothing at all regarding the problem of the rites. The most recent presentation of the Jesuit point of view is G. H. Dunne, Generation of Giants (Notre Dame 1962) (opposing viewpoints: B. Biermann, O.P., in ZMR 46 [1962], 296–302; B. H. Willeke, O.F.M., in NZM 22 [2966], 144–46).

[144] J. Shih, S.J., Le Père Ruggieri et le problème de l'évangélisation en Chine (Rome 1964).

[145] G. Schurhammer, S.J., Das kirchliche Sprachproblem in der japanischen Jesuitenmission des 16. und 17. Jh. (Tokyo 1928).

[146] J. S. Cummins, The Travels and Controversies of Friar Domingo de Navarrete 1618–88, 2 vols. (London 1962).

[147] Idem, "Palafox, China and the Chinese Rites Controversy," Revista de Historia de América 51 (Mexico City 1961), 395–427.

The issue of the rites was one reason, though not the most important one, for dispatching the first papal legate to China, Maillard de Tournon. On 31 December 1705 he had an audience with Emperor K'anghsi—an extraordinary achievement considering Chinese circumstances—but he could not bring about the establishment of direct relations between Rome and Peking which would shunt aside the Padroado.[149] When the legate's health became precarious, Chinese custom forced him to leave the capital in August 1706. He was therefore unable to execute the second part of his task, the visitation of the Chinese mission. On top of it all, his departure from Peking was followed by a sharp reversal of the Emperor's formerly favorable attitude. In 1707 de Tournon published the decision of Clement XI of 1704 against the rites in a pastoral letter. Twenty-two Jesuit missionaries and the Spanish Augustinian de Benavente[150] appealed to Rome, but they made the mistake of submitting this church matter to Emperor K'anghsi as well, who decided in their favor.[151] Upon the publication of his pastoral letter the legate was banished to Canton, where he founded the procuration of the Propaganda for the Chinese and East Indian missions which for about 150 years formed the backbone of the Propaganda mission in East Asia.[152] By his efforts he achieved the subordination in principle of all missionaries under the jurisdiction of the Padroado bishops, respectively vicars apostolic.[153] After an appeal by the proponents of the rites the Pope upon further examination issued the brief of 1715, reiterating the decree of 1704. Another legate, A. Mezzabarba (1719–21), was as unsuccessful as his predecessor. Besides, he had created new problems by his Permissiones of 1721. His orders caused Rome to reexamine the whole issue. By his bull Ex quo singulari (1742) Benedict XIV definitively rejected the rites.[154] Because of the persecutions by the Chinese authorities the papal bull did not meet with any substantial resistance. But towards the end of the century the issue of the rites briefly flared up again between the two vicars apostolic of the seminary of the Paris Mission, Pigneaux de Béhaine of Cochinchina and de Saint-Martin of Szechwan in western China. This time the issue was focused on certain rites of Chinese funerals, held to be permissible by the former and forbidden by the latter.[155] Because both the times and the meaning of the rites had changed, they were permitted with certain conditions and stipulations in 1939.[156]

---

[148] J. Beckmann, "Die katholischen Missionare und der Taoismus vom 16. Jh. bis zur Gegenwart," NZM 26 (1970), 1–17.

[149] F.-A. Rouleau, S.J., "Maillard de Tournon. Papal Legate at the Court of Peking," AHSI 31 (1962), 264–323.

[150] An Augustinian in Colombia wrote a Latin work against this appeal; it appeared in Bogota in 1712 (see NZM 15 [1959], 180).

A historian will find it difficult to render a balanced judgment on the issue of the rites in China. Both sides had in common their goodwill and the goal of building a Chinese Church. Any judgment is made more difficult by the fact that the persecutions prevented the two theories from being evaluated in actual missionary practice.[157]

---

[151] The vicars apostolic Maigrot and Mezzafalce were expelled; the Lazarist Appiani, who was accompanying the legate, was arrested and imprisoned for twenty years.

[152] S. De Munter, O.F.M., De S. Congr. de Prop. Fide Procurae Cantonensis Primordiis (Rome 1957).

[153] Later on the legate was himself imprisoned until his death by the Portuguese in Macao. The Pope approved of his behavior and elevated him to the cardinalate in 1707.

[154] The disputes in Europe were aggravated in 1700 by the actually justified intervention of the Sorbonne; Charles Maigrot was a doctor of theology of the University of Paris (J. Davy, "La condamnation en Sorbonne des Nouveaux Mémoires sur la Chine du P. Le Compte," RSR 54 [Paris 1950], 366–97).

[155] The correspondence of the two bishops in A. Launay, Histoire des Missions de Chine, Mission du Se-tchoan II (Paris 1920), Appendix, 21–82.

[156] AAS 32 (1940), 24 ff.

[157] The difficulty of an appraisal of the rites problem even for an objective historian is shown in the contribution of H. Bernard-Maître, "La correspondance Becker-Brucker sur la question des rites chinois (1885–1907)," RSR 54 (Paris 1966), 417–25. J. Brucker, S.J., had written the article about the rites in DThC on which Pastor and most

Persecutions and even the conflict of the rites led to a substantial reorientation of the missionary method in China. As of the end of the seventeenth century the main stress of missionary work was undeniably placed on the individual congregations in the provinces.[158] Knowledge of the languages, something all the orders tried to achieve, was a condition for fruitful missionary work. The first Chinese grammar was published by the Spanish Dominican Francisco Varo (1627–87) in 1703.[159] It was surpassed by the Jesuit de Prémare's Notitia Linguae Sinicae, completed in 1728 in Canton.[160] The first comprehensive Chinese-Latin lexicon was written by the Italian Franciscan Basilio Brollo de Gemona (1648–1719), who had been vicar apostolic of Shensi since 1700.[161] The missionaries were also pioneers in the research of Chinese dialects.[162]

Aside from the rites issue, all the missionaries were in agreement regarding their outward adaptation to the Chinese way of life and thought. All of them were satisfied with Chinese food; they clothed themselves and lived in the Chinese manner.[163] The most profound understanding was manifest in their deep respect for the social structure, the community spirit, and the spirit of the greater family. An example of true Sinicism of the Catholic form of prayer were the forms of the chanted public prayers alive all over China. As far as we know, the form of private prayer in the European manner did not develop in China.[164] of the other historians based their work. Father Émile Becker was superior of the China mission in the province of Hopei; in reference to the rites problem he wrote: "Quand on veut justifier la Compagnie dans la question des rites chinois, il ne faut pas chercher à rejeter sur les autres tous les torts" (op. cit., 419).

---

[158] The individual investigations by J. Dehergne, S.J., of the status of the missions around 1700 provide an extremely valuable overview (see AHSI 22 [1953], 314–38; 24 [1955], 251–94; 28 [1959], 289–330; 30 [1961], 307–66; 36 [1967], 32–71, 221–46; idem, "La mission de Pékin à la veille de la condemnation des rites," NZM 9 [1953], 91–108).

[159] J. M. González, O.P., "Semblanzas Misioneras: P. Francisco Varo OP," MH 12 (Madrid 1954), 145–91.

[160] De Prémare sent the manuscript to his "friend" Fourmont in Paris, who had just written his own grammar, that is he had translated the one by P. Varo from the Spanish; so the manuscript disappeared. It was published in Malacca in 1831 by Protestant missionaries (1666–1736) (Streit V, 958).

[161] Streit V, 874 f.; Sinica Franciscana VI, 789–802.

[162] Yang Fu-mien, S.J., "The Catholic Missionary Contribution to the Study of Chinese Dialects," Orbis 9 (Louvain 1960), 158–85.

[163] The first doubts concerning the suitability of a Chinese diet for Europeans appeared in the nineteenth century; they were increasingly affirmed.

[164] For the text of the prayers, see Paul Brunner, S.J., L'Euchologe de la Mission de Chine (Münster 1964). The rich Mass proclamation of the Alsatian Jesuit R. Hinderer (1669–1744) was sung by the Christians (P. Brunner, S.J., "La Messe Chinoise du Père Hinderer," NZM 15 [1959], 271–84).

With the exception of Macao there was no possibility of establishing true convents in China. So the Dominican missionaries went back to the form of the Beata popular in Spain. The Chinese virgins, while taking their vows, continued to live with their families, where they taught the women and children and during the times of persecution became the true pillars of the faith within the greater families.[165] The Paris Missionaries introduced this institution in their missions in Szechwan. In 1744 the vicar apostolic de Martillac published the first rules of conduct for them in a pastoral letter. Later on these rules were adapted to changing conditions, especially by the blessed Jean-Martin Moyë (1730–93), who implemented this institution outside the family as well. The synod of Szechwan of 1803 extended it to include all of China. One of the most beautiful documents of a natural and generous adaptation are the so-called Ordonnances de la Sainte Église, which originated during the persecutions after 1644 and served as guidelines for parishes deprived of their priests.[166] The Ordonnances also instructed the catechists and Christians how to propagate the faith without polemics running counter to accepted Chinese views.[167]

One of the consequences of the persecutions from 1664 to 1670 was that probably all the missionaries accepted the need for a native clergy. After the return to their stations they were able to see what the first Chinese priest, the Dominican Lo Wen-tsao (1617–91),[168] had done to save the congregations. But differences of opinion arose in regard to their education. By his brief Romanae Sedis Antistes of 27 June 1615 Paul V had allowed the use of Chinese as a liturgical language. During the persecutions Ludovico Buglio had started the necessary translation, but his Jesuit superiors in Macao had not released the brief for purposes of practical missionary work.[169] So the missionaries of the order and later on the missionaries of the Paris Seminary sought to apply papal permission. Yet as time went on they encountered less and less understanding for their wishes in Rome. Initially their efforts led to a compromise. As early as 1659 the vicars apostolic received permission to ordain Chinese natives, as long as they could read Latin, even if they did not understand it. In accordance with that, the first Chinese bishop, the abovementioned Lo Wen-tsao, ordained the first Chinese priests in China on 1 August 1688.[170]

---

[165] B. Biermann, O.P., Die Anfänge der neueren Dominikanermission in China (Münster 1927), 163–65.

[166] H. Verhaeren, C.M., "Ordonnances de la Sainte Église," Monumenta Serica 4 (Peking 1939–46), 451–77 (Chinese text with French trans.)

[167] Op. cit., 456 f. We should mention the areas of Christian art, the liturgical vestments and the churches (as late as 1936 I was permitted to visit the church in Shanghai built by Father Brancati in 1640, which had the shape of a Chinese temple) (S. Schüller, Die Gesch. der christlichen Kunst in China [Berlin 1940]).

[168] J. M. González, O.P., El primer Obispo Chino (Villalva 1967).

[169] J. Jennes, "A propos de la liturgie chinoise. Le Bref Romanae Sedis Antistes de Paul V (1615)," NZM 2 (1964), 241–54; for a treatment of the entire problem, see F. Bontinck, *La lutte autour de la liturgie chinoise au XVI*e *et XVIII*e siècles (Louvain 1962).

It was strictly an expedient, for all the orders tried to give their Chinese clerics a thorough education in Latin, the Jesuits in Macao, the Dominicans in Manila, and the Paris Missionaries in their Seminary General in Siam. There the German Lazarist Johannes Müllener (1673–1742), vicar apostolic of Szechwan since 1715, had personally trained men for the priesthood and was able to ordain four of them before he died.[171] The Propaganda missionary Mateo Pipa (1682–1746) even tried to educate seminarians in the imperial city of Peking, but defamations forced him to give up his undertaking. Yet as one of few European missionaries he received permission to take his Chinese students to Europe in 1723. In Naples he founded a college, the congregation for secular priests of the Holy Family. Since the missionaries of the Propaganda, especially those of the vicariate of Shensi, regularly sent over candidates who were already trained, more and more new missionaries could be sent from Naples to China.[172] However, the perils of the trip and the disadvantages of a lengthy and alienating sojourn abroad prompted the missionaries to educate native priests in China. The blessed J. M. Moyë, one of the most eager champions of this idea, was the first to take on this task, which he later transferred to his fellow religious, Thomas Hamel (1745–1812). The latter continued this work for thirty-five years in the hard-to-approach border region between Szechwan and Yünnan. Before he died, he graduated twenty priests from his seminary.[173] All of these Chinese priests pursued their apostolic work during the periods of persecution in the eighteenth century.[174] The diary (not intended for publication) of one of them, Andreas Li (1692–1775), for a long time the only priest of the province of Szechwan, offers an intimate insight into the details of the work and problems of the Chinese clergy.[175] He refused the rank of bishop, which his European brethren intended for him to have. In view of this attitude during a period of persecution the Propaganda seriously considered the consecration of bishops from the ranks of the Chinese priests,[176] even though the larger circles were lacking the necessary sympathy for this plan.

---

[170] J. Beckmann, Die lateinische Bildung des chinesischen Klerus im 17. und 18. Jh.; J. Beckmann, Der einheimische Klerus in Gesch. und Gegenwart (Festschr. L. Kilger) (Schöneck/Beckenried 1950), 163–87.

[171] J. v. den Brandt. op. cit., 17.

[172] M. Ripa, Storia della Fondazione della Congregazione et del Collegio dei Cinesi, 3 vols. (Naples 1832). Until the closing of the college by the Italian government in 1869 it had graduated 106 Chinese priests (Elenchus Alumnorum, Decreta et Documenta quae spectant ad Collegium S. Familiae Neapolis [Shanghai 1917], 1–10).

[173] A. Launay, Mémorial, 307.

[174] X. Bürkler, "Die Bewährungsgeschichte des chinesischen Klerus im 17. und 18. Jh.," in: J. Beckmann, Der einheimische Klerus in Gesch. und Gegenwart (Festschr. Kilger) (Schöneck/Beckenried 1950), 119–42.

In 1762, in the midst of persecutions and quarrels within the missionary community, Pombal's order to arrest the Jesuits arrived; twenty-four fathers and brothers were taken to Lisbon. In the interior of China it was the actual papal abolition of the order in 1773 that had a disastrous effect after it arrived in 1775 and was announced by Bishop von Laimbeckhoven in his role as bishop of Nanking and administrator of Peking. The few Jesuits in the interior were able to continue their work because the power of Portugal could not reach them there. In Peking this measure caused a schism. After almost ten years of negotiations the Portuguese and French Lazarists were finally willing to continue the work of the Jesuits.[177] The advances on the part of the French and the Spanish to establish a French patronage bishopric in Mukden (Manchuria)[178] and a Spanish one in Fukien[179] were rejected by Rome. On 29 April 1785 when the first French Lazarists arrived in Peking with the new bishop of Peking, A. de Gouvea, the latter succeeded in allaying the schism. The new superior of the French Lazarists and of the Peitang, Joseph Raux (1754–1801), was not only a superior mathematician (in 1795 he was appointed mandarin of the mathematical institute), but he also had a well-balanced personality. Thus he was able to win over the French Jesuits while opposing all attempts for autonomy of the French mission.

It was during the last decades of the eighteenth century that the Korean Church originated. After some initial fleeting contacts and a few conversions in the course of the Japanese wars of conquest of the 16th century,[180] Christian ideas were spread in Korea by means of religious literature created by the Peking missionaries in the seventeenth and eighteenth century. It is certain that the first Korean baptized in the Church of the Peitang in 1784 already knew of the necessity for baptism; he became the first apostle of the as yet priestless Church of his country. The Korean embassies to Peking were a way to create firmer ties with the young lay Church. But not until 1793 did Bishop de Gouvea, to whom the Propaganda had expressly given the direction of the Korean Church, succeed in sending one of his Chinese priests to Korea; he was executed in 1801 as a victim of persecution. As early as 1791 persecutions had flared up here and there; cases of martyrdom show that the Church was firmly anchored. In his report to the Propaganda of 1797 Bishop de Gouvea spoke of four thousand Korean Christians.[181] [175] Journal d'André Ly, 1746–1763, ed. by A. Launay (Paris 1906). The diary containing almost seven hundred pages consists of the annual reports.

---

[176] J. Beckmann, "Beratungen der Propaganda-Kongregation über die Weihe chinesischer Bischöfe (1787–1819)," Missionswissenschaft und Religionswissenschaft 3 (Münster 1940), 199–217.

[177] H. Cordier, "La suppression de la Compagnie de Jésus et la Mission de Pékin," T'oung Pao 17 (Leiden 1916), 217–347, 561–623; Mémoires de la Congrégation de la Mission. La Chine II (Paris 1912); C. de Rochemonteix, Jos. Amoit (Paris 1915), 258ff., 379ff.

[178] C. de Rochemonteix, op. cit., 437–53. Memorandum by Jos. Amiot of 1 October 1774; this was supported by another by the Count de Vergennes in Paris of 1 March 1779 (text in the Propaganda Archives, Rome, Scritture riferite nei Congressi, Vol. 36, fol. 35ff.).

[179] J. Beckmann, "Ein spanischer Versuch zur Errichtung von Patronatsbistümern in China und Hinterindien (1778–82)," ZMR 27 (1937), 164–72.

JAPAN

Most accounts of missionary history end the presentation of the Kirishitan period with a note on the persecutions. The actual time of suffering by the Japanese Christians, however, did not start until Japan was completely sealed off from the outside.[182] Yet by no means did the efforts by Christendom to aid the Japanese Church stop. After the peasant revolt of 1637/38, initially a social act of desperation on the part of the exploited populace, the Christians had to pay a high tribute in blood. Thirty thousand men, women, and children were executed. The most stringent regulations forbade any and all connections with other countries, including the Philippines and Macao. In 1640 when Macao, hit hard by the prohibition of trade, tried to change the minds of the Japanese by sending its own delegation of ambassadors, the four ambassadors and fifty-seven of the ship's crew were executed. Thirteen were allowed to return to Macao in order to spread the word of the horrible deed.[183] Deshima, a small island off Nagasaki, which had served as a residence for Portuguese merchants, was assigned to the Dutch in 1640; from there they barely managed to maintain their trade monopoly with Japan until 1854.[184] The closing off to the outside world, applying of course also to Japanese who wanted to travel abroad, was accompanied by ruthless actions against the native Christians. In 1640 the "Office of Inquisition for Christian Affairs" was established in Edo (i.e., Tokyo) with its own buildings, jails, trial procedures, and judges. Approximately two thousand trials against Christians were conducted under its first inquisitor, Inoue Masashige (1585–1661).[185] The surveillance of Christians was closely tied to the social system of the "Five Families," which were answerable for one another.[186] Especially artful was the procedure of the E-Fumi.[187] Usually around New Year's all inhabitants of the island of Kyushu, but also those of other areas, had to step on a Christian picture or a cross, an act which was carefully recorded by the authorities in the form of a protocol. Even foreign merchants, with the exception of the Dutch, were forced to undergo this test upon landing on Japanese shores. This procedure was not abolished until 1857. In addition there were official rewards for the denunciation of Christians the amounts of which were scaled in accordance with the stature of the accused within the Church.[188] The uncovered Christians were taken to the jail of the inqusition in Edo, most of them to be tortured most horribly. During the tsurushi those tortured were hung by their feet above a deep hole; the slightest movement was considered a sign of apostasy. In 1633 the Jesuit provincial Cristovão Ferreira broke under this torture. He married and became a spy and interpreter for the Japanese inquistion.[189] But the apostates did not have it easy; for generations they and their descendants were subject to humiliating special rules. When the persecution reached its climax (about 1680–1700), all visible signs of Christianity had disappeared, but the Japanese authorities knew their countrymen well: the uncovering of the Old Christians of Nagasaki in the nineteenth century attested to the presence of a [180] J. Laures, "Koreas erste Berührung mit dem Christentum," ZMR (1956), 177–89, 282–87.

---

[181] A. Choi, L'Érection du premier Vicariat Apostolique et les origines du catholicisme en Corée (Schöneck/Beckenried 1961), 1–60.

[182] Arimichi Ebisawa, "The Jesuits and their Cultural Activities in the Far East," Cahiers de l'Histoire Mondiale 5 (Neuchâtel 1959), 345–74.

[183] C. R. Boxer, The Great Ship from Amacon, Annals of Macao and the old Japan Trade, 1555–1640 (Lisbon 1959), 163ff., 331ff.

[184] It is not true that the Dutch also demanded "stepping on the pictures."

---

[185] For the official accounts of his activities, his guidelines for the conduct of trials, etc., see Kirishito-Ki; German by G. Voss and H. Cielsik, Kirishito-Ki und Sayoyo-roku. Japanische Dokumente zur Missiongeschichte des 17. Jh. (Tokyo 1940); H. Cieslik, "Das Christen-Verbot in Japan unter dem Tokugawa-Regime," NZM 6 (1950), 175–92, 256–72; 7 (1951), 24–36.

[186] H. Cielsik, "Die Fünferschaft im Dienste der Christenüberwachung," Monumenta Nipponica 7 (Tokyo 1951), 102–55.

[187] M. Marega, "E-Fumi," Monumenta Nipponica 2 (Tokyo 1939), 281–86; idem, "Memorie cristiane della Regione di Oita," Annali Lateranensi 3 (1939), 9–59.

[188] Details in H. Cieslik in NZM 6 (1950), 188f.

[189] Ibid., 259; Ferreira died in 1650; it can probably not be ascertained whether he died a repentant martyr as rumored in India. There were also local persecutions of Christians where they were killed on the spot: Cieslik lists a number of such cases of martyrdom involving hundreds of Christians from 1657 to 1680 on the island of Kyushu (ibid., 262).

Christian underground. Missionaries kept arriving, such as the second Rubino group of four fathers, one brother, and five catechists, who were caught immediately upon landing. Although the inquisitor Inoue later told the Dutch that they had apostatized during the tsurushi, this was not likely because none of them was freed, as Ferreira had been. All of them, in fact, died in prison.

The former missionaries of Macao, especially, tried to help the Japanese Christians by means of literature, but the authorities quickly composed lists of banned books.[190] Even at the end of the century it was decreed: "Whoever secretly introduces Christian writings or articles into Japan, will be executed without exception."[191] Yet again and again European ideas, especially in the fields of the natural sciences and medicine, but also in religion, infiltrated Japanese writings. At about this time there were lively discussions by Buddhist and other parties about Christianity.[192] Some learned Japanese who no longer wanted to be apart from European sciences published their work under a Dutch name, under the tolerated "Dutch Flag." They even managed to designate Jesuit works imported from China as works by Dutch scientists.[193]

As soon as it was established, the Propaganda paid close attention to the Japanese mission, especially after the Dominican Diego Collado arrived in Rome in 1622. The long negotiations resulted in the bull Ex debito Pastoralis officii (1633), which assured missionaries of all orders free access to Japan by any and all routes.[194] The lack of familiarity with conditions in Japan and the efforts by Rome to exclude Japan from the Portuguese Padroado led to difficulties and delays in the appointment of new bishops.[195] But the Propaganda did not neglect the Japan mission; it sought information from the missionaries in China.[196] A remarkable undertaking was that of the Italian secular priest Giovanni B. Sidotti (1668–1715), who arrived in Manila in 1704 and four years later made a covert landing on the Japanese coast. After three days he was caught and taken to the inquisition's jail in Edo, where he died in 1715 what was probably a martyr's death.[197] During his imprisonment he encountered the Japanese philosopher and statesman Arai Hakuseki (1657–1725), who interrogated him for three years. In the process Hakuseki obtained excellent insight into the Christian religion, which he put down in two works. Although he rejected Christianity as an absurdity, his was one of the best presentations written in Japanese. It was helped by the fact that he was a confirmed Confucian who did not hide his rejection of Buddhism and Shintoism. Thus, through him Sidotti influenced the educated Japanese well into the nineteenth century.[198] [190] Such lists also form the basis of the works by H. Bernard, "Traductions chinoises d'ouvrages européens au Japon durant la période de fermeture (1614–1853)." Monumenta Nipponica 3 (1949), 40–60.

---

[191] H. Cieslik in NZM 6 (1950), 185.

[192] J. van Hecken, "Le problème du dialogue chrétien avec les Bouddhistes du Japon," NZM 23 (1967), 3ff.; H. Cieslik, "Nambanzi-Romane der Tokugawa-Zeit," Monumenta Nipponica 6 (1943), 13–51. These anti-Christian novels, some of which were not printed until the Meiji period, especially demonstrated the fact that Christian views among the people remained alive for centuries.

[193] Cf. Arimichi Ebisawa, op. cit., esp. 369ff.

[194] L. M. Pedot, La S. C. de Propaganda Fide e le Missioni del Giappone (1622–1838) (Vicenza 1946); Text of the bull in L. Magnino, Pontificia Nipponica I (Rome 1947), 160–64.

[195] H. Cieslik, "Zur Gesch. der kirchlichen Hierarchie in der alten Japanmission," NZM 18 (1962), 42–58, 81–107, 177–95 (esp. 188–95); also L. M. Pedot, op. cit., 163–221.

[196] L. M. Pedot, op. cit., 314–41.

The continued spread of persecutions after the 1720s prompted many Japanese Christians to flee abroad, as long as flight was still possible. This is how the Japanese Christian congregations in the large port and mercantile city of Faifo originated. In this Japanese quarter the expelled missionaries found a new field of action.[199] Another refuge was Ajuthia, the capital of Siam, where the Japanese merchants already had a base. Here, too, the Jesuits took care of the Christians and converted others.[200] Manila also became a haven for many Christians from the missions of the Spanish mendicant orders. Japanese seminarians and religious were able to receive their ordination either in Macao or Manila and some of them were able to return to their native land as missionaries.[201] Yet the congregations abroad did not endure, since the Japanese were assimilated more and more by their host countries. But the interest in Japan stayed alive among the missionaries. Even in distant Mexico a Japanese grammar was printed as late as 1738 in the unshakable hope that it would serve new missionaries in Japan.[202]

---

[197] A bio-bibliographical sketch in Streit VI, 403–5; for the years in Edo, see R. Tassinari, "The End of Padre Sidotti. Some New Discoveries," Monumenta Nipponica 5 (1942), 246–53.

[198] Furukawa Tetsushi, "The Growth of Anti-Religious Rationalism and the Development of the Scientific Method in Japan," Cahiers de l'Histoire Mondiale 7 (1963), 739–55.

[199] H. Chappoulie, op. cit. I, 170, 180.

[200] H. Cieslik, "Die erste Jesuitenmission in Siam 1626–30," NZM 26 (1970).

[201] H. Cieslik, "Das Schicksal der letzten Japan-Missionare im 17. Jh.," NZM 13 (1957), 9–28, 119–38; idem, "The Training of a Japanese Clergy in the Seventeenth Century," Studies in Japanese Culture (Tokyo 1963), 41–73.

[202] J. Laures, Kirishitan Bunko (Tokyo 1957), 125–26.

The Philippines and the South Seas

Concerning the Philippine Church in the seventeenth and eighteenth century there is abundant source material[203] which has hardly been evaluated.[204] And yet these two centuries were of decisive importance for the Christianization of the Philippines. After 1595 Manila and its suffragan bishoprics of Nueva Segovia, Nueva Cáceres and Cebú were an archbishopric. Five orders had organized their own provinces: the Augustinian Hermits, the Jesuits, Dominicans, Franciscans, and the Augustinian Recollects. As far back as 1594 Philip II had divided that vast island realm among the various orders. The most important islands were conquered by the Spanish almost without bloodshed; the natives joined the Christian faith without resistance. To be sure, violent acts by the Spanish, who initially thought they could continue their American methods of colonialization on the Philippines, here and there led to bloody revolt and the assassination of missionaries, but by and large the islands enjoyed a tranquil political and religious development.

By the end of the seventeenth century the Islamic faith, whose missionaries were active mostly on Mindanao, but also on Luzon among the Malay tribes at the time of the arrival of the Spaniards, had been pushed back. As a consequence Islam made no additional progress towards the east. This was made possible only through the Christianization of the Philippine populace and the tight organization of their congregations. In the cities these formed around the core of the Spanish population; in the more sizeable villages they were centered around the churches and monasteries. The attempt at enslaving the Filipinos, a continuation of the method in South America, was quickly turned back by the government and the Church. The country was poor; the colonists subsisted mainly on the trade between China and Mexico. A population on such a low level did not have a particular attraction for the missionaries either. The first generation considered the Philippines to be no more than a transit station on the way to China.[205] In fact the mendicant orders always maintained missions there, as they did in China, East India, and previously in Japan, whereas the Jesuits were prohibited by their superiors from any sort of activity in the provinces of their brethren of the Portuguese Padroado.[206] In the course of the seventeenth century the direction of the missionary effort seems to have changed, concentrating as it did on the Philippines. More and more reinforcements arrived from Mexico and Spain. Missionizing the population in the environs of the bases on the major islands was concluded around 1650. It was then expanded to the less accessible islands. The Augustinian Hermits, carrying the main burden of mission and ministry, had to request protection by royal laws from having their reinforcements, destined for the Philippines, intercepted in Mexico.[207] When local superiors in Spain put up increasing numbers of obstacles, the Philippine province of the Name of Jesus founded the Real Colegio Seminario of Valladolid (1743), which is still a replacement center even today.[208] [203] Streit V, 237–361 for the seventeenth century and VI, 239–400 for the eighteenth century. The most important collection of sources, The Philippine Island, by Blair-Robertson, comprises fifty-five vols. of documents, mostly trans. from the Spanish (Cleveland 1903–9). The collection by Torres y Lanzas, Catálogo de los documentos relativos a las islas Filipinas (Barcelona 1925–36) totaled nine vols.

---

[204] E. g., the four-volume work by S. Delacroix II. The most recent Catholic history of the mission by A. Mulders (1960) also deals very briefly with the beginnings in the sixteenth and seventeenth century (221–23), continuing with the history of the nineteenth century (387–88). Only K. S. Latourette, Vol. III, 307–21 continues to the end of the eighteenth century.

[205] J. Beckmann, China im Blickfeld der mexikanischen Bettelorden im 16. Jh. (Schöneck/Beckenried 1964), 46–65.

This uninterrupted supply of missionaries demands deep respect[209] inasmuch as the work outside the urban centers required extreme physical exertion.[210] It was there that a realistic counterweight to the China rapture was created which can compare even with the martyrdom in Japan.[211]

The tranquility of the development of the Philippine Church was disturbed by disputes between the bishops and the regular clergy.[212] In 1567 upon the request of Philipp II, Pope Pius V made an exception for the mission countries with their vast distances and small number of bishops. He granted permission to the orders to pursue their ministry independently of all episcopal authority. But in 1585 the Spanish king, first for the Council of Mexico and then for all Spanish dominions, ruled that the orders be subject to episcopal visitation. This led to many a conflict in the Philippines. For all practical purposes the bishops throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth century had to give in on this issue, especially since the privations during travel did not make the visitations very attractive. Archbishop Felipe Pardo (1611–89) therefore attempted to prevail in his privileges in Manila against the opposition of the secular authorities as well as the Jesuits.[213] But the latter enjoyed enough political support to make the archbishop lose the ensuing lawsuits.[214] A closely related issue was the authority to be granted the secular clergy to whom the organized parishes were to be transferred according to an order of Philip III (1603). But almost all the Spanish secular priests were living in the cities, occupying the positions of the cathedral chapters, so that every time there was the merest threat of a conflict with the bishop, the orders threatened to remove all their members from the mission stations. This invariably forced the bishop to give in. The idea of a native clergy was as yet rejected, even by Archbishop Pardo, although he changed his mind shortly before his death in 1689.[215] It does appear that while Pallu was being held by the Philippine authorities in 1672 he first formulated a plan for training a native clergy.[216] In 1680 high ranking civil servants sent a pertinent letter to Madrid. In 1702 Philip V ordered the establishment of a seminary for eight seminarians. Two years later Sidotti arrived in Manila and with the help of the citizens there founded the seminary, but large enough for seventy-two seminarians. It was demolished by order of the King and replaced by one for eight seminarians, as had been ordered. This aroused a spirit of opposition in Manila. Although its seminary was not built until 1772, Dominicans and Jesuits, in the spirit of sincere competition, must have admitted Filipinos to the study of theology before that. At any rate, around the middle of the century there was already a relatively strong native clergy in existence who were not limited to auxiliary service, as Philip V had ordered.

---

[206] Some Jesuits even considered this prohibition the cause of many a case of depression of younger missionaries and of their untimely death (H. de la Costa, op. cit., 244–45).

[207] J. Beckmann in NZM 23 (1967), 148.

[208] M. Merino, op. cit., XVIII–XX.

[209] The number of Augustinian Hermits until about the eighteenth century would have been over fifteen hundred according to the necrology compiled by M. Merino for the occasion of the four hundredth Anniversary of the Christianization of the Philippines (op. cit.). Until their abolition the number of Jesuits was on the average one hundred fifty in the course of the eighteenth century (H. de la Costa, op. cit., 553).

[210] A vivid picture is provided by J. Schmitz, Die Abra-Mission auf Nordluzón, Philippinen (1598–1955) (St. Augustin 1964).

[211] Cases of martyrdom were exceptions in the Philippines.

[212] H. de la Costa, "Episcopal Jurisdiction in the Philippines During the Spanish Regime," in G. H. Anderson, op. cit., 44–64.

This sign of opposition[217] can be seen as well in connection with the attempted Hispanization of the islands, demanded again and again by Madrid. The state wanted to suppress the native languages by any means. Yet with the exception of Manila no country did as little as the Philippines in cultivating the Spanish language. The missionaries everywhere were propagating the faith in the native languages and the orders, in fact, demanded of them the requisite linguistic skills.[218] Paradoxically, Spain owed its great success in the Philippines precisely to the opposition of the lower level provincial bureaucrats and to the missionaries.[219] Not only did the latter create the linguistic basis, such as grammars and dictionaries, needed for research in the most important languages of the Philippines,[220] but an abundant Christian literature as well.[221]

---

[213] H. de la Costa, The Jesuits, esp. 489–502 and passim; F. Fernandez, op. cit., 189–93.

[214] In the anti-Jesuit disputes this trial was given widespread attention in Europe. See the work about him published in Lugano in 1760 (Streit VI, 308).

[215] J. S. Cummins, "Archbishop Felipo Padro's 'Last Will,' " G. H. Anderson, op. cit., 105–12.

[216] H. de la Costa, "The Development of the Native Clergy in the Philippines," in G. H. Anderson, op. cit., 65–104.

[217] H. de la Costa, The Development, 86ff.

The tranquil development of the Philippine Church was suddenly interrupted by the expulsion of the Jesuits by Charles III in 1767. It involved 148 Jesuits, six colleges, nine residences and three missions.[222] But since the Society of Jesus did not have a dominant part in the ministry there, their expulsion could be compensated for more quickly in the Philippines than in other countries. But the state absolutism which manifested itself in this matter was fraught with serious consequences.[223]

Because their general had forbidden the Jesuits to work in the territories of the Portuguese Padroado, they looked for other missionary fields in the Pacific, foremost on the Mariana and Caroline Islands. The founder of the first permanent mission on Guam was Diego Luis Sanvitore (1627–72), who was murdered by an apostate a few years later. In the ensuing revolts of the natives in 1674–76 and 1684/85 twelve more Jesuit missionaries were killed. Yet the main islands were already predominantly Christian around 1740. The Mariana and Caroline Islands gradually turned into way stations and were no longer attended by missionaries on a regular basis.[224]

As early as the turn of the seventeenth century Franciscans from Peru who had come to the South Seas with the discoverer Pedro Fernando de Quirós explored the Solomon Islands and the New Hebrides.

---

[218] The Augustinian Recollects even planned the establishment of a monastery in Salamanca for the study of the major language, Tagalog. The plan was approved by the Propaganda in 1626, but probably disallowed by Madrid (see Bullarium Ordinis Recollectorum S. Augustini II [Rome 1961], 77, 78, 82).

[219] J. L. Phelan, The Hispanization of the Philippines. Spanish Aims and Filipino Responses 1565–1700 (Madison 1959).

[220] J. L. Phelan, op. cit., 51f.; idem, "Philippine Linguistics and Spanish Missionaries 1565–1700," Mid-America 37 (Chicago 1955), 153–70; N. Cushner, "A Note on Jesuits, Linguistics and the Philippine Missions," NZM 19 (1963), 116–21.

[221] The references in the volumes of Streit alone provide abundant material for a history of this Christian literature yet to be written.

[222] N. Cushner, Philippine Jesuits in Exile. The Journal of Francisco Puig SJ 1768–1770 (Rome 1964).

[223] K. S. Latourette, History III, 313.

[224] E. J. Burrus, "Jesuits and Terra Australis," NZM 22 (1966) 89–97; idem, "Sanvitores" Grammar and Catechism in the Mariana (or Chamorro) Language (1668)," Anthropos 49 (Fribourg 1954), 934–60; Streit XXI, 1–82.

But their plans for a mission became illusory after the untimely death of de Quirós.[225] Later attempts by Juan de Silva (1617–94) were also unsuccessful, as was an expedition to Tahiti in 1774/75, inasmuch as it did not result in a permanent mission station there. But successes are not a measure of Christian missionary spirit.

---

[225] C. Kelly, La Austrialia del Espíritu Santo, 2 vols. (Cambridge 1966).

PART TWO

The Established Church and the Enlightenment

SECTION ONE

Concepts

CHAPTER 18

Foundations and Forms of the Established Church in the Bourbon States of the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries

The decline of papal power from the middle of the seventeenth century, contrasted with the intellectual and spiritual flowering of baroque Catholicism and the development of royal absolutism, is manifested not only by the European peace congresses,[1] the unsuccessful protests against the Prussian demand for the royal title (1701), and the establishment of the house of Hanover as the ninth electorate (1707). The papal elections and the use of the ius exclusivae by Catholic powers[2] demonstrate even more clearly the deterioration of the international esteem in which the papacy had been held previously[3] and the growing strength of the concept of the established Church. To be sure, the papal elections during the seventeenth and eighteenth century almost invariably fell on deserving candidates. Yet they were aged and in many cases because of age and illness they were unable to respond to the demands of their office.

The interests of the state and the ambitions of absolutist rule over the Church turned almost every conclave into a battleground mainly between France on one side and Spain and Austria on the other, with all parties seeking preliminary decisions reflecting their ambitions for an established and national Church. Until the middle of the eighteenth century each succeeding pontificate endured growing pressure from Spain, France, Austria, and the Bourbon secundogenitures of Italy. In addition, the militarily helpless, irreparably indebted Papal States, which could no longer fulfill their original purpose of ensuring freedom of action for the head of the Church, inescapably enmeshed the Popes in the tumult of the Italian policies of the great powers. Rigid adherence to outdated legal claims, such as feudal supremacy over the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies and the duchy of Parma-Piacenza challenged those states which were in the process of integrating to take ever harsher countermeasures against palpal church supremacy, pirateria beneficiale, nunciatures, and ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

---

[1] J. Müller, Das Friedenswerk der Kirche (1927) (inadequate). Except in Pastor XIV–XVI, the role of the Popes in the European congresses after 1648 and the peace nunciatures is only treated in monographs, e.g., A. v. Reumont, "Mons. Agostino Franciotti und der Aachener Friede von 1668," Zschr. des Aachener Geschichtsvereins 5 (1883), 53–74; C. Terlinden, "La diplomatie pontificale et la paix d'Aix-la-Chapelle de 1668," Bulletin de l'Institut Historique Belge de Rome 27 (1952), 249–68; S. v. Lengefeld, Graf Domenico Passionei, päpstlicher Legat in der Schweiz 1714–16 (Zurich 1900) (needs to be supplemented); G. V. Vella, Il Passionei e la politica di Clemente IX, 1708–16 (Rome 1953); I. P. Dengel, Die politische und kirchliche Tätigkeit des Monsignor Josef Garampi in Deutschland 1761–63. Geheime Sendung zum geplanten Friedenskongreß in Augsburg und Visitation des Reichsstiftes Salem (Rome 1905).

[2] E. H. Feine, RG, 575f., with biblio.

[3] "The conditions under Benedict XIII reduced the Pope to an object of ridicule by the European governments, as clearly indicated by the reports of ambassadors" (Seppelt-Schwaiger V, 424).

The desire to influence the papal elections had grown in proportion to Italy's having become the battleground of the European powers and the growing conviction that the inviolability of the Papal States appeared better safeguarded by an Italian prince than by the head of Christianity. The ius exclusivae of the Kings of Spain, France, and the German Emperor, applied more and more frequently since the middle of the seventeenth century and based on legalities of the established Church, was "in reality a demand of the voters not to give their vote to a certain candidate in the interest of peace between the state and the Church"[4] and to exclude that candidate legally.

At the very beginning of the conclave following the death of Urban VIII (d. 29 July 1644) Spain eliminated the candidate of the Barberini party, Cardinal Giulio Sacchetti, by means of the ius exclusivae. It repeated this action against the same candidate in the conclave of 1655. In 1644, however, Mazarin's veto against Cardinal Giambattista Pamfili arrived too late to forestall his election (Innocent X, 1644–55). At the next election in 1655 Mazarin also failed in his opposition to Fabio Chigi (Alexander VII, 1655–67). The election of Giulio Rospigliosi was by no means owing to the protection of Louis XIV alone, even though it was later represented in this manner by the French. The Spanish, not knowing of France's sympathy for him, had also supported Rospigliosi. Finally, the latter had also impressed the Squadrone volante as the most suitable candidate. Clement IX, whose election, then, had not been clouded by any exclusion, was granted the privilege of having a part in ending the war between Spain and France and bringing about the Peace of Aachen (2 May 1668). By doing so, he was able to attenuate the humiliation of the papacy by the Peace of Pisa (1664) and to weaken the French concept of an established Church.[5]

---

[4] Wahrmund, Die kaiserliche Exklusive im Konklave Innozenz' XIII., 15.

[5] Regarding the intention of Franz Egon von Fürstenberg to play the role of a peace

The conclave upon his death was again characterized by opposition between Spain and France and a heretofore unprecedented influence by the ambassadors. The French ambassador Chaulnes formally applied the ius exclusivae to Cardinal d'Elce, whereas the Spanish ambassador Astorga presented the reservations of his queen-regent against Cardinal Vidoni and caused the candidacy of Cardinal Brancaccio to run aground on the ius exclusivae. The mediation of Venice finally steered the election to the eighty-year-old, kind, but insignificant Emilio Altieri (29 April 1670, Clement X, 1670–76). His successor, Innocent XI (Benedetto Odescalchi) was not elected until the approval of Louis XIV had been delivered to the entrance of the conclave on 20 September 1676. Although the War of the Spanish Succession prompted great efforts in connection with the election of Alexander VIII (1689–91), neither Louis XIV nor Leopold I was able to exert any decisive influence this time. The next lengthy conclave (12 February–12 July 1691) was again dominated by opposition between the French and the Spanish-Austrian parties. The promising candidacy of Gregorio Barbarigo, who was later canonized, failed by virtue of the fact that Emperor Leopold I, while foregoing formal exclusion, called his election undesirable, the Spanish ambassador conspired against it, and Louis XIV resisted it out of consideration for his allies. Cardinal Antonio Pignatelli (Innocent XII, 1691–1700), who was elected in the end, was a compromise candidate already seventy-five years of age.

The Spanish succession—Charles II, the last of the Habsburgs on the Spanish throne had died little more than a month after Innocent XII (d. 27 September 1700)—and the prospect that because of the dead Pope's partisanship for the French succession, the feudal claim over the Kingdom of the two Sicilies, and the helpless military condition of the Papal States the Apostolic See would be involved in that European conflict overshadowed the conclave (9 October to 20 November 1700). In this conclave the Zelanti were finally able to prevail with their candidate, Gian Francesco Albani (Clement XI,[6] 1700–1721). On 2 April 1721 during the scrutiny prior to reaching a two-third's majority, Cardinal Althan announced the imperial exclusion preventing the election of the mediator in Aachen, see A. Franzen, "Französische Politik und Kurkölns Beziehungen zu Frankreich unter Erzbischof Max Heinrich (1650–88) in römischer Sicht," RQ 52 (1957), 200.

---

[6] "Clement XI was the last Pope who represented the lofty ideas and principles of Gregory VII in all respects with the energy and firmness of his great predecessor. A noble, dignified personality with the most sensitive conscience and full of the fear of God, imbued with the desire to restore the peace between Church and state, he personally pursued that peace for fully twenty years with the greatest sacrifices, but never came to enjoy it" (F. J. Sentis, Monarchia Sicula, 157f.).

candidate of the nepotist party, Fabrizio Paolucci.[7] After the Emperor and France had reached an understanding, Cardinal Conti (Innocent XIII, 1721–24) was elected. Nine years later the candidate of the Zelanti, Lorenzo Imperiali, foundered on the protest of the Bourbon courts and Paolucci on the exclusion of the previous conclave. The papal election of 1730 also marked the first appearance of the Savoy Party. The last public exclusion was issued by France on 24 June 1758 against Cardinal Cavalchini because of his position in the canonization of Bellarmine and on the issue of the constitution Unigenitus.

The ius exclusivae was to serve the fulfillment of aims regarding the established Church and the attainment of other long-range goals. For the common disputes with the Church either the already existing institutions of the pre-Tridentine established Church were further developed or new means created. The confinement of the nunciatures to a position of mere diplomatic representation of the Papal States,[8] put into effect by the established Churches in an alliance with episcopalism, was complemented by the institution of the Agenzie,[9] developed in Spain and France and taken over in 1714–17 by Charles VI first for his Dutch and Italian possessions and then for the hereditary lands and the Empire as well. In 1759 the ordinariates of the Habsburg monarchy were ordered to make use of the Roman Agenzie; after 1767 all business with Rome, with the exception of the forum internum, had to go exclusively through this state institution. More than anything else the established Church made use of the Appellatio tanquam ab abusu and of the placet in its disputes with the hierarchy.

The Appellatio ab abusu, also called Recursus ab abusu, Recursus ad principem, Appel comme d'abus, or Recurso de fuerza, is the appeal to state authority against an alleged misuse of church authority, especially in connection with jurisprudence and administration.[10] Even in its initial stages this institution, which grew from various roots in Spain, France, and in the medieval communities and principalities of Italy, signaled the claim of absolute rule over the Church. If possible all jurisdiction competing with that of the state was to be eliminated. In conjunction with the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges (1438), the Appel comme d'abus had been expanded, acknowledged by Leo X in the Concordat of 1516, and legalized in the Ordonnance of Villers Cotterêts of 1539. In the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth century the Recursus ab abusu, although condemned since 1581 by the bull In Coena Domini and censured by the Church, was developed in all Catholic states "as a weapon of territorialism against the hierocratic system."[11] In Lorraine, where the conflict regarding the Code Léopold (1701–10) was almost exclusively focused on the Recursus ab abusu,[12] it represented a means of defense on the part of national autonomy. The Recursus ab abusu was intended to express the territorial sovereignty of the state and to complete the development initiated by the Privilegium de nonevocando, with state control of church jurisdiction. But it was also intended to delineate the respective competencies of the state and the Church. While it was primarily an instrument of the established Church, it also contributed towards putting into disuse the Pope's recourse to a general council.

---

[7] For Paolucci, who had been nuncio in Cologne from 1696 to 1698 and cardinal secretary under Clement XI, see H. Raab, "Die Finalrelation des Kölner Nuntius Fabrizio Paolucci," RQ 55 (1960), 129–50; L. Jadin, L'Europe au début du XVIII^e siècle. Correspondance du Baron Karg de Bebenbourg, Chancellier du Prince-Évêque de Liège Joseph Clément de Bavière, Archevêque Électeur de Cologne avec le Cardinal Paolucci, Secrétaire d'État (1700–19) (Brussels and Rome 1968).—Wahrmund (Die kaiserliche Exklusive im Konklave Innozenz' XIII., 23) views the exclusion of Paolucci perhaps as the "somewhat rash step of a cardinal less experienced in the practice of the elections in Rome."

[8] See Chap. 23; K. Walf, Die Entwicklung des päpstlichen Gesandtschaftswesens in dem Abschnitt zwischen Dekretalenrecht und Wiener Konkordat (1159 bis 1815) (Munich 1966), 219f.

[9] R. Blaas, "Die k. k. Agenzie für geistliche Angelegenheiten," MOESTA 7 (1954), 47–98; H. Herrmann, "Die Römische Agenzie für kirchliche Angelegenheiten Deutschlands und Österreichs," RömHM 11 (1968), 188.

[10] E. Eichmann, Der Recursus ab abusu nach deutschem Recht (Breslau 1903); P. G. Caron, L'appello per abuso (Milan 1954).

The sharpest weapon of the established Church, "the main guarantee of the rights of the state,"[13] was the placet (also called the Placetum regium, Exequatur, Jus retentionis, and, in Lorraine, Pareatis). It was first formulated in England; after the tumult of obedience ensuing from the Great Western Schism it was used as a prescriptive right by the sovereign princes. It represents the right on the part of the sovereign or those offices charged by him—as the Inquisition tribunal in Spain—to examine with a view towards the interests of the state certain church decrees, especially by foreign superiors, to permit their publication and execution or to prohibit them under certain penalties, of which those ordered by Philip II in 1569 were especially harsh (they included banishment and even the death penalty). Within the concept of the established Church the placet was part of the Jura circa sacra and of the sovereignty of the state. It was based on council resolutions, the Catholic view of the state, the responsibilities of the sovereign prince, and, during the eighteenth century, increasingly on natural law. The state has the placet vis-à-vis the Church, but not the other way around because the Church is in the state, whereas the state is not within the Church. In the seventeenth and eighteenth century the placet was applied against papal and episcopal decrees of disciplinary as well as dogmatic content, even though Philip IV (10 June 1659), emphasizing that it was unnecessary in connection with instructional announcements, at that time prohibited such innovative application in the Netherlands. The greater duchy of Tuscany, as well as Spain, France, Venice, Naples, and Vienna, denied the Exequatur for the bull Auctorem Fidei (28 August 1794) of Pius VI condemning the Synod of Pistoia.

---

[11] E. Eichmann, op. cit., 58.

[12] L. Just, Clemens XI. und der Code Léopold (1702–10). Die kuriale Politik im Kampf mit dem lothringischen Staatskirchentum (Frankfurt a. M. 1935).

[13] E. Friedberg, Die Gränzen zwischen Staat und Kirche, 799.

The placet had the purpose of maintaining law and order in the state, preventing intervention or abuse by the Roman Curia in the affairs either of the state or the competent bishops. Ever since Innocent VIII and his Bull In Coena Domini the placet was censured, but not until the middle of the nineteenth century was the ius, quod vocant "exequatur" actually condemned.[14] An ordinance of 1475 by Louis XI had ordered the placet for papal edicts as part of the Gallican Liberties. An inspection placet had existed in Lorraine since 1484. Recommended by Cardinal Ximenes and emphatically prescribed for all Catholics by Ferdinand (1509), it was one of the fundaments of the Spanish concept of the established Church. It became a model via the Netherlands and Northern Italy for the Habsburg established Church, which increased its application even under Leopold I.

A treatise published in 1712 by the well-known Louvain canonist van Espen took on special importance for the theoretical justification of the placet.[15] Van Espen viewed the placet not as a means of limiting the independence of the Church, but rather as a means of the authorities, who were instituted by God, of maintaining both ecclesiastical and political order. Van Espen's views were of enduring influence on the Josephinist study of canon law. During the last few years of Charles VI the glare of public attention focused on the discussion regarding the appointment to the chair of canon law at the University of Innsbruck, which was to be taken away from the Jesuits and conferred on Paul Josef Rieger. As admitted by the government, the crux of the matter was to protect the students from the very injurious principles aimed at the predominance of the clergy and instead to teach them "the true doctrine as reflected in Covarruvias, Van Espen et similibus."[16]

In an unsuccesful effort Innocent X and Clement XI tried to counter the placet by the bull Nova semper of 9 November 1714. The fight with the established Church, which had grown in strength since the Counter Reformation and had displayed ever stronger aspirations in the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth century, is reflected in the history of In Coena Domini, in the form of its text as well as in the measures by the various sovereign princes. Its publication in Spain had led to serious conflicts even under Charles V and Philip II. In 1763 a new prohibition was issued in Spain. In retaliation to the papal monitory, In Coena Domini was suppressed in 1768 in Parma, Venice, Naples, Spain, Austrian Lombardy, and Bohemia. After 1770 it was no longer announced. The established Church also ignored the Roman Index librorum prohibitorum. Under the principle of advocation the Ius proscribendi libros perniciosos was claimed for the state, which then could refuse the request of the Church for intervention and could even act against the wishes of the Church. The Church was forced to suffer its most infamous defeats of the eighteenth century in this arena in the form of repeated failure to proscribe Hontheim's ("Febronius") De statu ecclesiae and Osterwald's Wider die geistliche Immunität in zeitlichen Dingen, and, finally, it had to tolerate the abolition of the Apostolic Book Commissariat in Frankfurt am Main.[17]

---

[14] Litt. Apost. Ad Apostolicae, 22. 8. 1851; Syllabus 8. 12. 1864, par. 6, ART. 41.

[15] E. Von Espen, Tractatus de promulgatione legum ecclesiasticarum ac speciatim bullarum et rescriptorum Curiae Romanae ubi et de placito regeo, quod ante earum publicationem et executionem in provinciis requiritur (1712); see also L. Willaert, "Le Placet royal aux Pays-Bas," Revue belge de philologie et d'histoire 32 (1954), 466–506, 1075–1117.

[16] G. Mraz, Geschichte der Theologischen Fakultät der Universität Innsbruck von ihrer Gründung bis zum Jahre 1740 (Innsbruck 1968), 193.

The established church system, promoted by the Church during the Counter Reformation for the sake of self-preservation and reform, differed in the structure attained during the seventeenth and eighteenth century from the pre-Tridentine form by its consistent systematism and doctrinarianism. It flourished in the absolutist Catholic states, in Spain and France, the Bourbon states of Italy, in the Spanish Netherlands, Lorraine, the Republic of Venice, several Catholic cantons of Switzerland, in the Electorate of Bavaria, and in Austria.[18] In regard to canon law the established Church was a complex system whose bent for episcopacy, national Church, and opposition to the Curia differed from one state to the other. Gallicanism, deeply rooted in French history and closely related to the growing strength of a national kingdom, the weakness of the papacy during the Avignon exile and the Great Western Schism, was firmly placed on a course of maintaining the national unity of the Church in the time following the Reformation. Its goal in counteraction to papalism was the reform of the church constitution in the episcopal or Richerian sense, but above all it aimed at the predominance of the state over the Church. Its claim was based on the Pragmatic [17] The end of the apostolic book commission, connected with the imperial one by personal union, came about on 28 February 1780 when Emperor Joseph II appointed the Reformed book dealer Johann Konrad Deinet to take the place of the deceased Worms suffragan bishop Franz Xaver Anton v. Scheben (H. Raab, "Apostolische Bücherkommissare in Frankfurt a. M.," HJ 87 [1967], 326–54).

---

[18] See Chap. 24.

Sanction of Bourges (1438) and, after its abolition by the Concordat of 1516, on the latter's stipulations which granted the King the right of appointment to almost all bishoprics and abbeys and, with it, factual dominance over the Church of France. The introduction of the placet for papal decrees (1475), the Appel comme d'abus (1539), and the writings of Pierre Pithou, Dupuy, de Marca, and Richer[19] around the turn of the sixteenth century strengthened the system of the established Church and the concept of the so-called Gallican Liberties, which according to Pithou's authoritative interpretation merely paraphrased the rule of the King over the Church in France.

Following the quarrel over the quartering privilege and the Peace of Pisa (1664), which humiliated the papacy, the issue of Gallicanism reached its climax in the regalia dispute and the Declaratio cleri gallicani of 19 March 1682. Next, Louis XIV treated the regalia right as an essential right to the crown. He extended the right of nomination according to the Concordat of 1516 to all the bishoprics and abbeys; he also claimed the ecclesiastical regalia, which enabled him to fill all the benefices of a bishopric while the latter was vacant. When Innocent XI demanded the revocation of the edict, the Assembly of the Clergy under the influence of the King and with decisive participation by Bossuet, who had been appointed bishop of Meaux, decided to accept the expanded regalia right and the Declaratio cleri gallicani de potestate ecclesiastica. According to these four Gallican articles (19 March 1682), which constituted a revival of the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, the authority of the Pope did not extend to civic and temporal matters (John 18:36; Luke 20:25, Rom. 13:1f.). According to divine order, kings and princes are not subject to ecclesiastical authority in temporal matters. Thus they can neither be directly deposed by it, nor indirectly by releasing their subjects from their oath of loyalty. In spiritual matters as well the authority of the Apostolic See was limited in France by the decrees of the Council of Constance concerning the superiority of the council. These decrees had been approved by the Apostolic See, acknowledged by their application throughout the Church, and most scrupulously observed, especially by the Gallican Church. The exercise of papal power was regulated by the canones, the statutes of the church Fathers, tradition, and the prescriptive law of France and the Gallican Church. In matters of faith the Pope was most favored, but his judgment was subject to change unless the total Church agreed to it.

The four articles were published as state law and taught at the universities. Not until 1690 was a declaration of nullification pronounced by Alexander VIII. The tensions with Rome concerning the regalia right and the Declaratio were aggravated by the quarrel about the quartering privilege, but a schism was avoided. Innocent XII reached a compromise (1693) by which Louis XIV forewent the implementation of the four articles in exchange for toleration of his regalia right and recognition of the bishops appointed by him. But well into the nineteenth century the established church law continued to be determined largely by the Declaratio cleri gallicani. In 1749 an amortization law against the acquisition of property by the Church was passed; in 1762 the Society of Jesus in the French province was dissolved by application of the Appel comme d'abus.

---

[19] See Chap. 4.

The Spanish established Church was tightly structured. Owning a disproportionate part of the real property and national income, it was totally in the hands of the state. Its rise and fall proceeded in tandem with the political development. The King had nomination right for all bishoprics and—as under the weak Habsburgs in the seventeenth century and the Bourbons of the eighteenth century—many an unworthy person was appointed. The princely income of many bishops was in glaring disproportion to the condition of the ministering clergy, to the poverty of the lower classes, and the meager theological education among large segments of the regular and secular clergy. Attempts at reform by the Jesuit Eberhard Nidhard (d. 1681 as a cardinal), whom Queen-Regent Anna Maria had appointed grand inquisitor and member of the Secret Council of State, were doomed to failure. The consolidation of absolutism under Philip V also began to have its effects on the relationship with the Church. When Clement XI recognized the Habsburg pretender to the crown, Charles III (1709), the results were the cessation of diplomatic relations with Rome, the closing of the nunciature in Madrid, the suspension of the temporalities, and—as a countermeasure—refusal by the Pope to confirm the bishops appointed by Philip V. In 1713 Melchior Raphael de Macanaz, treasurer of the Council of Castile, summarized the doctrines and demands of the regalists: abolition of the bull In Coena Domini, abolition of the Pope's supremacy over the kings, and universal patronage over all church benefices. The concordats of 1717 and 1732 could not allay all the disputes; they actually pleased neither party. The concordat, concluded in dire straights by Benedict XIV, gave to the Spanish King the universal patronage he demanded, with the exception of fifty-two benefices, besides "creating an almost total change in the discipline of the Spanish Church."[20] And yet new conflicts were created under Charles III when

---

[20] P. A. Kirsch, "Das durch Benedikt XIV. im Jahre 1753 mit Spanien geschlossene Konkordat," AkathKR 80 (1900), 320.

P. R. Conde de Campomanes (1723–1892) intensified the placet (1761) and expelled the Jesuits.

On the basis of the privilege Quia propter prudentiam tuam, granted Count Roger by Urban II (5 July 1098), the kings of the Two Sicilies ever since the end of the Middle Ages had claimed the title and rights of a legatus natus papae or a legatus a latere and with them all those rights not expressly reserved for the Pope. Ever since the sixteenth century this legatine power was characteristically called Monarchia Sicula. Ferdinand I, "the Catholic" (d. 1516), possessing the ecclesiastical jurisdiction as well, had himself called Monarca. The Monarchia Sicula involved the claim of the right of visitation of dioceses and monasteries, the right of decision in the election of church superiors, the right of excommunication and absolution even of cases in the papal reserve, the penal right for bishops, nuncios, and cardinals, and the right of demoting secular and regular clerics. When Philipp II failed to obtain a confirmation of the Monarchia Sicula from Rome, he appointed Nicolaus Stizzia to the position of the first permanent judge of the "Monarchy" (Judex Monarchiae Siculae) on 13 July 1579. In so doing he created "a central authority which systematically combined the highest ecclesiastical jurisdiction in one hand."[21] The trials before the tribunal of the "Monarchy" were not permitted to be advocated by the Pope nor brought to Rome by way of recourse.

The constant conflicts with the Monarchia Sicula, the latter being motivated by rigorous principles of an established Church and extreme "schismatic principles,"[22] reached a climax under Pope Clement XI during the Spanish War of Succession and the disputes connected with the efforts by Joseph I and Charles VI towards an established Church. The cause, insignificant on the surface, was the filling of the episcopal see of the Lipari Islands, on which occasion a small tax was levied. This appeared to Bishop Tedeschi, the secretary of the Congregation of Rites, a violation of ecclesiastical immunity in the sense of the bull Coena Domini.[23] So he reacted by excommunicating the responsible civil servants, whereupon the judge of the "Monarchy" pronounced absolution. When the dispute went to the Congregation of Immunities in Rome by way of recourse, it quickly became part of the fierce quarrel between Clement XI and Philip V.

By recognizing the Habsburg pretender Charles III as "Catholic King of Spain" (10 October 1709) Clement XI had gained some concessions in the Emperor's Italian policy, but at the same time he had to suffer harsh retaliatory measures by Philip V: Nuncio Zondadari was expelled from Madrid, all relations with Rome were prohibited, all revenues of the Holy See in Spain were frozen, ecclesiastical immunity and jurisdiction came under attack. On 11 October 1711, Clement XI declared all decrees directed against church immunity and jurisdiction null and void, and their originators to be subject to church censure. In addition he refused to confirm the bishops nominated by Philip V.

---

[21] F. J. Sentis, op. cit., 130.

[22] Ibid., 139.

[23] K. Pfaff, "Beiträge zur Gesch. der Abendmahlsbulle 51," Censure of encumbering ecclesiastical persons and institutions without papal permission.

This immediate quarrel intensified the conflict over the Monarchia Sicula. A decree by the Congregation of Immunities (26 January 1712) and a brief by Clement XI (12 June 1712) declared the absolution by the judge of the "Monarchy" of those involved in the excommunication as being invalid and reconfirmed their excommunication. The response was given in the form of an edict by the viceroy: all papal decrees and edicts were null and void because they violated municipal laws, privileges, customs, and the regalia of the realm. The battle was then propelled to its climax by excommunications and local interdicts by one side, countered on the other side by absolution from Church censure by delegates of the "Judge of the Monarchy," suspension of temporalities, and the expulsion of the bishops of Catania, Girgenti, and the archbishop of Messina.

Disregarding the feudal claims of the Pope, the Peace of Utrecht (1713) demanded the transfer of Sicily from Spain to Duke Victor Amadeus II of Savoy. Additionally, the already tense relations between the Curia and Piedmont were aggravated to the extreme by exceedingly harsh measures in Sicily. As a consequence Clement XI on 20 February 1715 annulled the Monarchia Sicula by his bull Romanus Pontifex, predated by exactly one year.

The annulment received attention only because of an appeal by the procurator of the treasury prompting Philip V of Spain to insist on his rights by means of a formal protest. Less than three years later the establishment of the Quadruple Alliance (2 August 1718) gave Sicily to Austria in exchange for Sardinia. After difficult negotiations Emperor Charles VI agreed to return Comacchio to the Papal States (1725), a process in which Prosper Lambertini, the future Pope Benedict XIV, collaborated. This opened the door to a compromise regarding the Monarchia Sicula. Benedict XIII—while not expressly revoking the absolution bull—insisted in his bull Fideli (ratified 30 August 1728; in Vienna: 10 November 1728) that the causae vere maiores remain in the province of the Roman Curia or a special papal delegation in Sicily, that, furthermore, the title "Judge of the Royal Monarchy" be changed to iudex ecclesiasticus delegatus. The King received the privilege to appoint as the highest juridical office a Iudex delegatus in partibus.

The Vienna Treaty (3 October 1735)—again in complete disregard of the papal feudal rights—gave Naples and Sicily to Don Carlos as a Spanish-Bourbon secundogeniture. Under his rule (which he assumed after the death of his half-brother), but even more so under his minor son Ferdinand IV, the minister of state and chairman of the council of regents, Bernardo Tanucci,[24] articulated the claims of dominance of an enlightened absolutist state by means of passionate attacks on the Church, harsh reforms, and endless harrassment. The excommunication of the duke of Parma by Clement XIII (30 January 1768) furnished the pretense for reprisals by the Bourbon family alliance against the "ridiculous and scandalous pretentiousness" of the Roman Curia. These reprisals included the occupation of the papal enclaves of Benevento and Pontecorvo. Only after the abolition of the Society of Jesus, which Clement XIII was still rejecting at that time, were these territories returned (1774).

In implementing his church reforms, many of which were not without inner justification, Tanucci invoked the Monarchia Sicula and the presuppositions created by the unfortunate Pietro Giannone (1676–1748),[25] whose Istoria civile del Regno di Napoli (4 vols., 1723) has been called "the bible of anticurialism."[26] He also invoked kindred spirits among Jansenists and enlightened Freemasons. An Italian translation of Mesenguy's Exposition de la doctrine chrétienne appeared between 1758 and 1760.[27] The Enlightenment, regalism of the Spanish variety, Jansenist and Freemasonic influences under Tanucci were meshed into a system whose anticlericalism continued well beyond his fall, brought about by Maria Carolina (1776).

Even the enfeoffment of the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies (10 May 1738) granted by Clement XII did not improve the tense relations between Rome and Naples. Nor did the concordat[28] concluded by Benedict XIV after difficult negotiations (2 June 1741) lead to a modus vivendi, but instead to ever new conflicts in spite of the fact that the Pope—much to the chagrin of several cardinals—made substantial concessions. Agreement concerning the controversial "Tribunal of the Monarchy" was reached by which a court consisting of three clerics and two laymen appointed by the King was to execute church jurisdiction on a higher level as well. Rome made concessions in the matter of personal, local, and property immunity; the right of sanctuary was circumscribed; foreigners were excluded from holding benefices in the kingdom and a few smaller bishoprics were abolished. In exchange the placet was to be eliminated and the Recursus ad principem modified.

---

[24] Most recent monograph: R. Mincuzzi, Bernardo Tanucci, ministro di Ferdinando di Borbone 1759–76 (Bari 1967).

[25] L. Marini, Pietro Giannone e il giannonesimo a Napoli nel Settecento (Bari 1950).

[26] G. Schnürer, Katholische Kirsche und Kultur im 18. Jh. (Paderborn 1941), 13.

[27] E. Passerin d'Entrèves, "La riforma "giansenista" della Chiesa e la lotta anticuriale in Italia nella seconda metà del Settecento," RSIt 71 (1959), 210: according to the author there was a close "collaborazione fra riformatori . . . giansenisti e filogiansenisti e campioni della lotta anticuriale."

[28] A. Mercati, Raccolta di Concordati, 338–64.

But soon the interpretation of the concordat and the unchanged establishmentarian, anticlerical course set by Tanucci in Naples resulted in endless new disputes. Tanucci, who made the Church responsible for the economic miseries of the kingdom, disregarded the Benedictine concordat; he reduced the number of monasteries, restored the amortization regulations, eliminated the spolia right, and claimed for himself the power of appointment to all bishoprics and the awarding of all benefices. The unscrupulous expansion of the placet, which had been founded in "international law and the peaceful spirit of religion," to include even the forum internum, the confinement of the Church to the sacraments and liturgy, and, finally, the expulsion of the Jesuits from the realm (1769) were expressions of that harsh establishmentarianism and radical anticlericalism for which Tanucci formulated the recipe regarding relations with Rome: "Raise the stick high! Keep your mouth shut! That is the way to tame that Roman tiger."[29]

Tanucci's fall meant the end of the reforms, but not the end of anticlericalism and vexatious oppression of the Church. In 1778 all connections between the monasteries and Rome were interrupted. The placet was refused for all briefs and dispensations if the royal permission for recourse to Rome, the so-called Liceat scribere, was not obtained first. In point of fact, this procedure cut off all communication with the head of the Church. The claim of a royal presentation right in all bishoprics led to thirty vacant sees in 1784 in Naples alone; in 1798 there were more than sixty.[30] In 1787 the King of the Two Sicilies formally refused to recognize papal feudal rights by refusing the presentation of the White Horse (Chinea), customary sign of vassalage since the time of Charles of Anjou, and payment of the usual seven thousand gold ducats, invoking international law and historical grounds. The papal protest ceremoniously pronounced in Saint Peter's on 29 June 1788 fell on deaf ears.

During the second half of the seventeenth century and in the eighteenth century as well, anticlerical policies and strict establishmentarianism continued to flourish in the Republic of Venice even after the worst of the conflicts over Paolo Sarpi was overcome. In 1754 the republic demanded government permission for all communication of its subjects with Rome, as well as for the execution of papal bulls and decrees. Gifts to the dead hand were forbidden, monasteries were closed, and the religious orders were placed under the authority of the bishops, who were not permitted to leave their dioceses without government permission.

---

[29] From Tanucci to Galiani, dated 30 April 1768. Quoted in Pastor XVI, I, 875.

[30] F. J. Sentis, 195.

Establishmentarianism assumed even harsher forms in Parma under Guglielmo Du Tillot and after the excommunication of the duke (30 January 1768), but after the fall of the prime minister the latter's successor reverted to a more moderate course (1771). In Sardinia the Appel comme d'abus remained in effect even after the concordats of 1727 and 1742; it was further expanded by additional regulations in 1770 and 1771. The right of sanctuary was modified, but the bishop was enabled to invoke the aid of the temporal authorities against the clergy. Establishmentarianism in Tuscany was not developed until the rule of the dukes of Lorraine. Francis I transferred the book censorship to the temporal authorities; he issued an amortization law and closed several monasteries and convents. The canonical reforms of his son Leopold, for which Pompeo Nero and Giulio Rucellai had paved the way, with some few modifications were basically identical to those in Austrian Lombardy, the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, Parma, and Piacenza, but Leopold's aims went far beyond theirs and the establishmentarianism of Josephinism. The formative development of the Habsburg establishmentarianism, starting with the consolidation of imperial power and the integration of the state under Leopold I, Joseph I—the conflict involving Comacchio and the recuperation policy in Italy—and under Charles VI was influenced by the model of Venice, the Spanish Netherlands, and Lorraine.

CHAPTER 19

The Enlightenment

Concept

The epoch of intellectual history called "La crise de la conscience européenne,"[1] "Lumières" (French), "Enlightenment" (English), "Illuminismo" (Italian) indicated not so much a tendency towards crisis but rather its distant origin: the metaphysics of light[2] left to the formative

---

[1] P. Hazard, Krise (1939).

[2] L. Oeing-Hanhoff, "Licht, II Philosophisch," LThK VI (1961), 1024.

Western world by Augustine. The designation "Aufklärung" (C. W. Wieland), applied since the middle of the eighteenth century to the intellectual progress taking place, corresponds to the older French "éclaircissement."[3] But the Augustinian "illuminatio" of God within man was now conceived to mean man's self-illumination in the light of autonomous reason. This authorization of the human intellect which had its prehistory in the power asserted by Thomism that enables man in the knowledge of creation to rise to an analogous knowledge of God, except that rationality (according to Scholastic philosophy) is to be combined with the belief in revealed religion, now sought its reason within itself. The rationalism of Enlightenment is historically inconceivable without the philosophy of Scholasticism.[4] By the same token, the anti-institutionalism of Enlightenment, initially aimed at the constituted Church and accepting for the time being the absolutist state, which in turn took its ideological foundation from the rational law of nature, but then ended in the Revolution, had its roots, through its ties with the religious inwardness of Pietism,[5] in the Christian concept of the uniqueness and freedom of the individual person. Rationalism and anti-institutionalism, which was in the process of emancipation from its own tradition, furnished the conditions for the universal concept of Enlightenment of the one humanity. But for its part the latter is inconceivable without the Passion and Salvation of Christ, which in its original form was universal ("Jews and Gentiles" in Rom. 11:25; 1:16; 10:12), but then again historically particular (gesta Dei per Francos). But even if Enlightenment can be viewed as the result of centuries of "diastasis" of medieval history (Mayer-Pfannholz),[6] the diastasis between the ecclesiastical and political realm, between inwardness and institution, freedom and authority, the world and God, it is precisely because of the result of that diastasis that it constituted a crisis of the European intellect. This crisis is institutionally characterized by the fact that the Church now "lost its position of leadership" and that Christianity, from which Enlightenment stemmed, was "publicly put on trial"[7]—with different degrees of intensity, to be sure, varying in accordance with the people and countries involved—without the accuser being able to be distinguished from the accused even before the end of the epoch had been determined. In looking at the characteristics of this crisis, not only [3] Regarding the concept of the period of Enlightenment, absolutism, and baroque, see F. Wagner, Handbuch, 2–5 (incl. biblio.).

---

[4] "The deepest roots of Enlightenment reach back to the Middle Ages." (F. Valjavec, op. cit., 16).

[5] See below, p. 537.

[6] A. Mayer-Pfannholz, "Phasen des Mittelalters," Hochland 36 (1938/39), 188.

[7] P. Hazard, Vernunft, 25.

its origin in the tradition of Western thought,[8] but also its complexity, indeed its inner contradictoriness must be taken into account. Skepticism was not only turned on the dogmas of Christian faith; it was the innermost element of man's reason itself and this reason could therefore be celebrated enthusiastically, be subjected to criticism and—although only on the periphery at first—be cynically discredited. Against the certainty of Cartesian consciousness and its "innate ideas" the psychological empiricism of J. Locke was raised, for whom the soul is a blank page. He was to have a profound influence on Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau and others, finally ending in sensualism. Hume attacked Locke's deism as a new dogma and criticized the concept of "natural religion," which was to be the dome over all the revealed religions, as an empty construct. In its place he posited, in terms of psychology, the religious need, rooted in fear and hope, as only one of the many other needs. Theology, more substantially than in the course of the English Enlightenment, continued to be an ever present partner in the dialogue of the German philosophy of Enlightenment from Leibniz to Kant, albeit a partner separated by a critical line of demarcation. This clearly supports for the overall context of Europe the fact that in the aspirations towards Enlightenment "Christianity was the infinite object of toil for the centuries constituting the modern age."[9] And if one is not deceived by the acid quality of the language, this partnership was also felt in French Enlightenment, in the person of Pierre Bayle, son of a pastor, whose relationship with Calvinism is controversial, and in the anticlerical hatred of Voltaire's "Ecrasez l'Infame." If one considers the Enlightenment in its totality without arbitrarily separating the great personalities from the multiplicators, who had a profound effect on the broad segment of the educated, including those people who, while they could not read, had themselves read to, then the scope of the Enlightenment reached from an "insipid striving for bliss to the sublime mysticism of Spinoza and Malebranche."[10]

---

[8] This element is usually given scant attention in the Catholic literature on the Enlightenment. The undifferentiated negative cliché of "indifferentism, rationalism, agnosticism, naturalism, materialism" (Funk-Bihlmeyer III [1934], 217f.; more subtle in the seventeenth ed. [1961], 249 ed. by H. Tüchle) regularly appears together with the positive cliché "humanization of the law, the fight against superstition esp. the belief in witchcraft, interest in pedagogy, bourgeois tolerance" (the latter with some qualifications); see also A. Schwarz, "Aufklärung," LThK I (1957), 1058 with the additional remark that the positive, to be sure, refers "only to watered-down Christian ideals."

[9] H. Freyer, Weltgeschichte Europas (Stuttgart 1954), 527.—"Too credulous and too sceptical" is the appraisal of the Enlightenment by C. L. Becker (op. cit., 30f. He continues: "There is more of Christian philosophy in the writings of the 'Philosophes' than has yet been dreamt in our histories." Critical of this "brilliant" piece of work, A. Cobban (op. cit., 228) stresses that "the Enlightenment is correctly identified as the source of the current conflict in ethical values and the consequent pessimism."

Next to the concept of philosophy as the "universal process of philosophizing," which intended to bring about a new order,[11] the natural sciences were a determining element of this epoch. Their observations and experiments provided an ever growing consciousness of man's sovereignty. Although the mathematics and physics of Newton created a lasting understanding, whereas the biology of the seventeenth and eighteenth century in the aggregate is no more than historically significant, an epochal turn of events made all of nature including man the object of empirical research. Its results confronted the traditional theory of creation, a confrontation not lightly undertaken by the prominent natural scientists.[12]

This endogenous process of the European Enlightenment corresponds with the criticism prompted by reaction to world exploration, a criticism of Western traditions, of Christianity (or at least its practice in Europe), brought about by comparison with the high cultures of Asia or primitive peoples of America. Its significance—at the time unintended yet innate—lies in the fact that it was above all the reports by missionaries from Asia, especially China, and from America which caused a "cultural crisis," just as Saint Francis Xavier had done before, intending at first to raise up a Tacitean mirror to their native countries. But the result was that precisely those men who had stepped out into the world for the sake of Christian faith and its propagation unintentionally laid the foundation for doubting the complex claim of Christianity's absolute nature through criticism which had actually been intended for only that form of the claim representing an identification of christianitas with Western culture.[13] Thus the Christian faith proved to be an "enlightenment" inasmuch as it questioned its own historical embodiment and with it the whole Eurocentric view of the historical world. Just as the doctrine of creation became a problem vis-à-vis empirical knowledge of nature, so did the doctrine of salvation become problematic for the experience of a universal history, notwithstanding the lack of clear factual knowledge.

---

[10] F. Wagner, Handbuch, 129.—"Not only was there in some of the intellectual leaders a great aspiration to demonstrate that the universe ran like a piece of clockwork, but this was itself initially a religious aspiration" (H. Butterfield, Origins, 119).

[11] E. Cassirer, op. cit., Foreword, X.

[12] In the bibliography to Chap. 6 see esp. E. J. Dijksterhuis, H. Butterfield, H. Lange, E. Ungerer; in Chap. 7: O. Zöckler, W. Philipp, P. Althaus, R. S. Westfall, and the individual scholars of the period.

[13] See above, p. 305.

The "rationalism" of the Enlightenment represents radicalization of Western rationality as well as misunderstanding of the secret which man will always be; "naturalism" is both discovery of the world and the loss of its total dimension in the abbreviation of materialistic interpretation; the detheologization of natural law in a line from Grotius to Pufendorf and Thomasius is at once the foundation of the tolerant state as well as its becoming an absolute concept as the primum principium of political and social life; in actuality "indifferentism" is both nihilistic skepticism and the tolerance which was indicated intellectually and politically after the dissolution of medieval universalism (which had its own problems) and was reaching for a new universality of truth. The Enlightenment can only be understood in the light of this ambivalence, which is especially noticeable in its mixed relationship with the idea of progress which had taken the place of the promise represented by the traditional belief in salvation.

The altercation with tradition was reflected also in the system of education. The old institutions, the universities and the ecclesiastic and municipal schools for a long time were averse to the Enlightenment. Its major influence emanated from the academies and scientific associations, followed by the private tutors of the aristocratic families and the salons. Almost all the proponents of the Enlightenment were occupied with pedagogical questions. The most prominent pedagogues of this period were John Amos Comenius (1592–1670 [Amsterdam]) with his Orbis sensualium pictus (1654) and his Didactica magna (1672)[14] and J.-J. Rousseau (see below). Reaching the broad masses of the people with the spirit of the Enlightenment, however, is a long process which—moved from within by a "second Enlightenment"—has lasted into our century. The communications media played an important part in this.[15]

If the Enlightenment is considered solely in its historical context, it is not easy to determine its beginning. It is different from humanism inasmuch as the latter—in spite of its strong pagan features—is yet part of criticism and reform within the Church;[16] where it initiated secularization, it tended generally to avoid the theological realm. This can be seen most clearly in the development of its attitude towards history. Regional areas are subjects of humanistic historiography; it takes them out of the medieval horizon of Christian salvation, applies its criticism to its proper objects, but—contrary to Voltaire—it leaves the Historia Divina unscathed. It can hardly be said that "only a return to life on a Christian basis" after humanism led to overcoming the "static thinking of antiquity" (which was not all that static).[17] This much of it is indeed valid, namely, that the radical argument between the Enlightenment and the Christian faith received both from this argument and from the secular reinterpretation of Christian eschatology those dynamics which characterized the new age. The Enlightenment was by the knowledge of itself distinguished from the Renaissance and humanism. Because of this the dispute between the "Ancients" and the "Moderns" conducted in French literature since the seventeenth century inclined progressively towards the side of emancipation from antiquity (Fontenelle [1657–1757] spoke of the "absurdities" of Greek mythology;[18] Voltaire criticized the "blind adoration of antiquity,[19] although the art of antiquity at the same time remained the absolute model for the Neoplatonism of A. Shaftesbury [1671–1713]). Criticism of antiquity and of the relationship between humanism and antiquity is part of the Enlightenment's criticism of tradition on the whole. Benedetto Croce viewed the intellectual consciouness of the time by saying that it not only emerged from the "darkness" of the Middle Ages, but also from the "dawn" of humanism and the Renaissance into the full light of reason.[20] The changed relationship with the Christian faith is the most essential element of the connection as well as of the difference between humanism and the Enlightenment—not only in the context of church history.

---

[14] K. Schaller, Die Pädagogik des J. A. Comenius (Heidelberg 1962).—See chap. biblio.

[15] C. Ledré, Histoire de la Presse (Paris 1958).—See biblio. under the heading of individual countries.

[16] Humanism and the Reformation "merely reduced the decisive importance of tradition" (F. Valjavec, op. cit., 9). The "destruction of universalism" in the vast political-economic spaces of absolutism was first described by F. Wagner (Europa im Zeitalter des Absolutismus [Munich 1948], 3f.) as the end of the Middle Ages.

The Enlightenment within the Political and Social Conditions of Individual Countries

The course of the Enlightenment proceeded in several phases, in intellectual climates which differed according to the countries involved. The individual proponents of the Enlightenment also occupied opposing positions; their personal relationship to each other could change from affinity to pronounced hostility. Regardless of the way in which the Enlightenment was a consequence of processes in the history of Western ideas, it was conditioned in the totality of history by the extremely rapid consumption of religious views during the religious wars for the purpose of undergirding positions of political power. This consumption was aggravated by the indifference of purely political acts of tolerance, in the bottleneck of establishmentarian censorship of French absolutism as much as in the abolition of precensorship and the supervision of book imports in England (1695). In the context of social history the consumption took place mainly in the rise of an educated bourgeoisie,[21] which relegated the orthodox clergy to backwardness. Even though it was isolated from the common folk, it yet claimed a monopoly in education.

---

[17] H. Lange, Physik I, 166.

[18] Quoted in P. Hazard, Vernunft, 79.

[19] L'Histoire du Parlement de Paris, cap. 50.

[20] B. Croce, Theorie, 208; E. Cassirer, on the other hand, emphasizes that the Enlightenment, regardless of loosening its traditional ties, "relishes a return to intellectual motives and problems of antiquity" (op. cit., 314).

In England[22] the religious opposition of the Puritans and the parliamentary opposition established an alliance against the Anglican absolutism of James I (1603–25). This was followed by the "Holy War" of Oliver Cromwell, to which not only Charles I (1649) fell victim but also the Presbyterians of parliament. Yet during the Restoration under Charles II (1660–85) religious engagement of the public had remained so strong that religious statements were among the most important arguments in the fight for seats in parliament. But in this body the "genuine Protestantism was defended by those who unscrupulously fulfilled the Test Act (1673; prescribing the Anglican Communion and the oath of supremacy of the Anglican Church for all occupants of government offices), because they were for the most part freethinkers."[23] After the Glorious Revolution the Toleration Act of 1689, while still stipulating the Anglican faith to be that of the realm and at least for the time being not barring nonconformists from holding state office, provided an arena[24] in which the Enlightenment could develop in a more or less unfettered way, especially after the succession of George I (1714) from the Lutheran house of Hanover. The Royal Society[25] had been founded in 1662; ten years later it counted Isaac Newton as its most prominent member among such others as the founder of scientific chemistry, Robert Boyle, the mathematician John Wallis, the physicist, astronomer, and architect Christopher Wren, and others. The Royal

---

[21] E. Labrousse, "Voies nouvelles vers une histoire de la bourgeoisie occidentale aux XVIII^e et XIX^e siècles (1700–1850)," Relazioni del X Congresso Int. di Scienze Storiche IV (Florence 1955), 365–96; O. Brunner, " 'Bürgertum' und 'Feudalwelt' in der europ. Sozialgeschichte," Gesch. in Wiss. u. Unterricht 7 (1956), 599–614.

[22] C. R. Cragg, From Puritanism to the Age of Reason 1660 to 1700 (Cambridge 1950, 1966); L. Stephen, English Literature and Society in the 18th Century (London 1904, 1963); H. M. Carre, Phases of Thought in England (Oxford 1949); W. K. L. Clarke, 18th Century Piety (London 1944).

[23] K. Kluxen in F. Wagner, Handbuch, 319.

[24] R. B. Barlow, Citizenship and Conscience. A Study in the Theory and Practice of Religious Toleration in England during the 18th Century (Philadelphia 1963).

[25] M. Purver, The Royal Society. Concept and Creation (London 1967); M. Ornstein, The Role of the Scientific Societies in the 17th Century (Chicago 1928).

Society was a model for the founding of academies everywhere; they were progressive institutions compared to the universities. In 1709 the Tatler appeared, followed in 1711 by the Spectator, the model for the daily and weekly papers which spread the great intellectual movement for the benefit of the progressively minded reader. Following the London Gazette, which appeared at irregular intervals (1665), the Daily Courant appeared (1712), on which the leading intellectuals of England were collaborating.[26]

In the Discourse on Freethinking (London 1713) Anthony Collins (1676–1729) for the first time generally applied the term "freethinker" to fellow deists (formerly used for John Toland specifically), whereas in France "libres penseurs" primarily denoted atheists such as Helvetius and Holbach. It was also in England that Freemasonry originated, that "self-demonstration of a European society which was freeing itself from the ties of the estates, from political forms of authority, and from church dogmata."[27] In the course of the seventeenth century the associations of church stonemasons that also had technicians and natural scientists as honorary members had grown into intellectual groups, into lodges. The association of the Greater Lodge of England (1717), whose constitution was drafted in 1723 by the Anglican cleric James Anderson at Saint Paul's in London, was a signal for similar foundings in almost all the European countries, albeit with different intellectual tendencies which indeed led to some divisions.[28] English Freemasonry was dedicated to the moralistic ideal of "Men of Honor and Honesty," to be enhanced by deistic piety.

Such was the political and social context which permitted England to be the first country in which the Enlightenment developed, although with a certain degree of dispassionate moderation. The movement was able, moreover, to benefit from the footing of centuries of empiricism as an intellectual trait of the nation. In his Novum organum scientiarum sive indicia vera de interpretatione naturae (1620) Francis Bacon (1561–1626)[29] had tried to refute atheism by means of a sharp separation of theologia naturalis and theologia revelata. He offered a theory of empiric-inductive science founded on philosophy as one who, much like a bee, not only (empirically) gathers, but also (interpretatively) alters. The Philosophiae naturalis principia mathematica (1687) of Isaac Newton (1643–1727), insisting on an absolutely inductive method, is as different from Bacon as it is from Cartesianism. In his introduction Newton defined the method according to which the "force of gravity" is deduced from "celestial phenomena" by means of mathematical postulates and maintained that "the other phenomena of nature should be deduced from mathematical principles" as well. As an author of theological works on the Old Testament, the discoverer of calculus was "ever intent on investigating the total intellectual structure of the empirical world, which permitted an inference of the Christian God of creation."[30] From the first to the third edition of his Principia, to be sure, he exhibited a tendency towards a theory of an absolute absence of presuppositions in natural science. Around the middle of the seventeenth century the physician William Harvey (1578–1657), who had studied in Padua and become professor of anatomy in London in 1615, gained fame as the discoverer of the circulatory system, for which he was censured by the Sorbonne. In his Exercitationes de generatione animalium (London and Amsterdam, 1651) he applied the causal-inductive method. To be sure, he formulated his theory "ovum esse primordium commune omnibus animalibus" without ever having seen a mammalian egg. The turn of the century brought the English form of empirical criticism, systematic empiricism. In his Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1690) John Locke (1632–1704),[31] not one of the most profound, yet one of the most successful intellectuals of his time, especially in his political writings, turned the subject of who investigates nature into the object of his concern. This empiricism rather than the "innate ideas" of Descartes henceforth dominated the period (even though George Berkeley [1685–1753], continuing in Locke's footsteps, considered human perceptions as being arranged by God [Treatise Concerning the Principles of Human Understanding (1710)]). Locke's substantiation of deism in the Letters Concerning Toleration (1689/92) were no less important than his influence on political theory (contract, separation of powers). In the Letters Locke attempted to imbed historical revelation and the proof of its reasonableness in the general system of rationality (The Reasonableness of Christianity [1695]). The doctrine of "Natural Religion" had already been offered by Herbert of Cherbury (1582–1648) under the title De veritate, prout distinguitur a revelatione, a verosimili, a possibili et falso (1624). John Toland (1670–1722), initially raised in the Catholic faith, who influenced such materialists as Holbach, drew more radical conclusions than Locke from the rationalization of revealed religion. In his publicly burned essay Christianity not mysterious (1696; reprint 1969) he maintained that faith did not contradict reason, but conversely did not contain anything beyond that either. Matthew Tindal (1656–1733) on the other hand interpreted the Gospel as a restoration of natural religion (Republication of the Religion of Nature) in his Christianity as old as the Creation (1730). In addition to his psychological writings (Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding [1758]), those on moral philosophy (Enquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals, [1751]), and political science (Political Discourses, [1752]) David Hume (1711–76), probably the most important figure of the English Enlightenment, was also an incisive critic of natural religion and deism. His Natural History of Religion (1755) and Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (posthumously; 1779) influenced Rousseau, J. G. Herder, and especially Kant. According to Hume, man is determined not by his perceptions, part of which is natural religion, but by his behavioral modes (in the case of religion, by fear and hope), which should be analyzed by psychology. The theologians, he maintained, are intent on proving the greatest paradox; instead, man should admit that "the whole of the world is an enigma, an unfathomable mystery" (History of Religion, sec. XV).[32] In his important early work A Treatise of Human Nature Hume prophetically related all sciences to the doctrine of man, from which a "complete system" was to be developed (Introduction). A work by the Socinian J. Priestley (1733–1804),[33] A Comparison of the Institutes of Moses with those of the Hindoos and other Ancient Nations (1799), is characterized by one of the most important elements of the Enlightenment: the knowledge of non-Christian religions, promoted most of all by Christian missionaries. His History of the Corruption of Christianity (1782), a theme also of the pietist J. G. Arnold, is an example of the kind of criticism to which Christian morality, too, was subjected. Sociological and political theories—although characteristic for all of the Enlightenment and its rationalization of natural law—are yet a special feature of the English variant. Whereas an individual and social catalogue of virtues could be derived from the psychology of the liberal David Hume, H. Bolingbroke (1678–1751),[34] politically a Tory (in 1714 he was forced to flee to France), but intellectually an extreme freethinker, replaced the moral idea with his sensualism, of influence also on Voltaire. His ideas were followed by Bernard de Mandeville (1670–1733), born the son of French parents in Holland, who developed the thesis that egoism is the only real social principle (The Table of the Bees [1714]). Next Adam Ferguson (1723–1816)[35] attempted to elevate sensualism into a sociohistorical concept. In it, history, brought about by the human species, becomes the essential differentiation from the animal world (Essay on the History of Civil Society [1766]). Egoism was viewed as the central principle of social life regardless of the fact that T. Hobbes (1588–1679)[36] developed a theory of absolutism (Leviathan sive de materia, forma et potestate civitatis ecclesiasticae et civilis [1651]; De homine [1658]) from the formula "Homo homini lupus" or that Adam Smith (1723–1790) a century later offered a theory of liberalism (Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations [1776]).

---

[26] K. K. Weed and R. P. Bond, Studies of British Newspapers and Periodicals from their Beginning to 1800. A Bibliography (Chapel Hill 1946); F. S. Siebert, Freedom of the Press in England. 1476–1776; the Rise and Decline of Government Controls (Urbana, Ill. 1952); J. Frank, The Beginnings of the English Newspapers, 1620–1660 (Cambridge, Mass. 1961).

[27] F. Wagner, Handbuch, 123.

[28] J. Anderson, The Constitutions of the Free-Masons (London 1723; reproduction, Twickenham 1952); G. Martin, Manuel d'Histoire de la Franc-Maçonnerie française (Paris 1934); H. Boos, Gesch. der Freimaurerei. Ein Beitrag zur Kultur- und Literaturgeschichte des 18. Jh. (Aarau 1906; reprint 1967); B. Fay, La Franc-Maçonnerie et la révolution intellectuelle du XVIII^e Siècle (Paris 1935, 1942); R. F. Gould, The History of Freemasonry, 6 vols. (London 1884–87; revised ed. by H. Poole, 4 vols., London 1951); G. Serbanesco, Histoire de la Franc-Maçonnerie universelle, 6 vols. (Paris 1963ff.), Vol. I; P. Naudon, La Franc-Maçonnerie (Paris 1963); idem, La Franc-Maçonnerie et le divin (Paris 1960). See biblio. under individual countries.

---

[29] The Works, coll. and ed. by J. Spedding, R. L. Ellis and D. D. Heath, 14 vols. (London 1858–74; reprint, Stuttgart 1963).—Lit. in P. Hassfeld, "Francis Bacon und die naturwissenschaftl. Begriffe seiner Zeit" (unpubl. diss., Bonn 1951).

[30] F. Wagner, Handbuch, 137; idem, "Kirchengeschichte und Profanhistorie im Spiegel Newtons und seiner Zeit," Saeculum 17 (1966), 193–204; F. Dessauer, Weltfahrt der Erkenntnis. Leben und Werk Isaac Newtons (Zurich 1945); Isaac Newton. Theological Manuscripts, selected and ed. with an introduction by H. McLachlan (Liverpool 1950); L. T. More, Isaac Newton, A Biography (London and New York 1934); F. E. Manuel, Isaac Newton as Historian (Harvard 1963); A. Koyré, Newtonian Studies (London 1965); M. C. Jakob, "John Toland and the Newtonian Ideology," Journal of the Warburg Institute 32 (1969), 307–31.

[31] The Works of John Locke, a new ed., corrected, 10 vols. (London 1823; reprint, Aalen 1963); M. W. Cranston, John Locke. A Biography (London 1957).

---

[32] Quoted in Cassirer, op. cit., 244f.—D. Hume: The Philosophical Works, ed. by H. Green and T. H. Grose, 4 vols. (1882–86; reprint, Aalen 1964).—Lit. in F. H. Heinemann, David Hume. The man and his Science of Man (Paris 1940).

[33] A. Holt, A Life of Joseph Priestley (London 1931).

In France[37] the politically motivated confessional toleration under

---

[34] C. A. Petrie, Bolingbroke (London 1937).

[35] W. C. Lehmann, A. Ferguson and the Beginnings of Modern Sociology (New York 1930).

[36] Opera philosophica quae latine scripsit omnia, 5 vols. (1839–45; reprint, Aalen 1961);—English Works, ed. by W. Molesworth, 11 vols. (1839–45; reprint, Aalen 1966); Leviathan, ed. with intro. by M. Oakeshott (Oxford 1957)—Lit. in F. C. Hood, The Divine Politics of Thomas Hobbes. An Interpretation of Leviathan (Oxford 1964); M. M. Goldsmith, Hobbes's Science of Politics (New York 1966).

[37] P. Sagnac, "La Révolution des idées et des mœurs et le déclin de l'Ancien Régime (1715–1788)," La formation de la societé française moderne 2 (Paris 1946); B. Benichou, Morales du Grand siècle (Paris 1948); L. G. Crocker, An Age of Crisis. Man and World in the Eighteenth Century French Thought (Baltimore 1959); H. Kirkinen, Les origines et la conception moderne de l'homme-machine. Le problème de l'âme en France à la fin de règne de Louis XIV sur l'histoire des idées (Helsinki 1960); P. Gay, The Party of Humanity. Essays in the French Enlightenment (New York 1964); L. G. Crocker, "Recent Interpretations of the French Enlightenment," Cahiers d'histoire mondiale (1964), 426–56; R. R. Palmer, Catholics and Unbelievers in 18th Century France (Princeton 1939); C. Le Bras, Introduction à l'histoire de la pratique religieuse en France, 2 vols. (Paris 1942–45); idem, Études de sociologie religieuse, 2 vols. (Paris 1955–56); R. L. Bach, Die Entwicklung der frz. Ge-

Henry IV (Edict of Nantes [1598]) had created a climate in which, parallel to Catholic renewal in the first half of the seventeenth century, an attitude ranging from indifference in matters of Church and religion all the way to atheism was able to flourish as well. Indifference was indirectly promoted by the conflict with Jansenism, whose political persecution (aside from that by the Church) finally led to its own politicization, just as its religious spiritualism gradually converged with the Enlightenment. But the most important element was the radical move initiated by Richelieu to make the Church into a function of the state whether it be an antipapal move (Declaration of the Gallican Liberties [1682]) or—following an understanding with the Curia—consisted of granting the bishops special privileges vis-á-vis parliament and the lower clergy (Edict of 1695). The revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685), an outgrowth of establishmentarianism and the authoritative attitude of Louis XIV, had a considerable impact within France when it prompted the emigration of about half a million Huguenots. It was especially important within the European intellectual context, for in addition to the lodges of the Freemasons these refugees represented an "adhesive of European consciousness." Furthermore, their younger, elitist generation, outgrowing their church ties, "replaced the parish congregation with an international republic of letters" (F. Wagner).[38] Aside from the religious nonconformists of France, the Calvinists and Jansenists, who were fighting among themselves, the rationalists as well became increasingly suspect to the absolutist state. While the state had founded the Académie des Sciences in Paris (Colbert in 1666), it also maintained the strictest control over the system of publication and the press within the framework of its mercantile policies. On the other hand, the bourgeoisie,[39] experiencing a powerful rise under Louis XIV, was both bearer and audience of the intellectual movement. During the political and economic decline and in spite of continuing censorship after the death of Louis XIV[40] the Enlightenment was able to develop strongly schichtsauffassung im 18. Jh. (diss., Freiburg i. Brsg. 1932); H. Vyverberg, Historical Pessimism in the French Enlightenment (Harvard 1958); G. Snyders, La pédagogie en France aux XVII^e^ et XVIII^e^ siècles (Paris 1965).

---

[38] F. Wagner, Handbuch, 118, 120; idem, "Die Hugenotten—ein europäisches Schicksal," Der deutsche Hugenott 27 (1963), 103–16; E. Haase, Einführung in die Literatur des Refuge. Der Beitrag der frz. Protestanten zur Entwicklung analytischer Denkformen am Ende des 17. Jh. (Berlin 1959).

[39] B. Groethuysen, Die Entstehung der bürgerlichen Welt- und Lebensanschauung in Frankreich, 2 vols. (Halle 1927–30); C. Moraze, La France bourgeoise. XVIII^e–XX^e siècles (Paris 1946).

[40] D. T. Pottinger, The French Book Trade in the Ancien Régime. 1500–1791 (Cambridge 1958).

and even to deviate into extremes. The literary circles and salons, whose members had equal rights of membership after the middle of the century, were the centers of the movement. But the most significant propagator was the Encyclopedia, initiated by Jean-Lérond d'Alembert (1717–83); he was named Jean le Pond after the church where he had been abandoned as an illegitimate baby;[41] his intellectual guide was Denis Diderot (1713–84) who was the son of a smith and had studied with the Jesuits.[42] His Pensées philosophiques (Paris 1746), publicly burned as anti-Christian, was crowned by the Promenade d'un sceptique and a materialistic philosophy of nature. The Encyclopedia[43] documented the second half of the century of France by the different positions of its authors, the predominance of empiric sciences, and in its history (1751–72: twenty-four volumes, by 1780: seven supplementary volumes); it was initially granted imprimatur by the Sorbonne, prohibited in vain in 1752, and indexed by Clement XIII. About a decade before the Revolution, almost a century after England, the censorship laws were practically overcome. In 1771 the Journal de Paris began to appear. Together with the literary salons the lodges of the Freemasons[44] were the social foundation of the Enlightenment; the Scottish current was conservative, the merger of many lodges forming the Grand Orient de France (1773) was a radical and emphatically anticlerical move. In 1738 and 1751 papal prohibitions were issued against it.

Twenty years after the death of René Descartes (1596–1650),[45] his philosophy was banned in France. Its method of doubt was considered as absolute skepticism; there was fear that it was dissolving the authority of the state and society. The Jesuit pupil Descartes (1606–14 at the college of La Flèche), who all his life considered himself to be a devout Catholic, but for the most part was forced to live outside of France, had questioned daily experience as well as general concepts. In this process of critical thinking he had found "clear and explicit" certainty only in the res cognitans itself. Equally clear to him was the concept of God: as He is perfection, human cognatio possesses but one aspect of Him (his major works: Meditationes de prima philosophia [1641]; Principia philosophiae [1644]). To speak of Descartes's emancipation of philosophy from theology is valid only in a limited sense by virtue of the fact that only by means of the theological implication of the truth of God can the res extensa of divisible matter of physical things be called certain, representing of course a single geometric mechanism. Yet within this mechanism Descartes's Discours de la méthode (1637) qualitatively equates the universal saving nature of God's help in the execution of the natural laws, initially created for the chaos, with the act of creation itself. Here is a profound difference from the physicist Pierre Gassendi (1592–1655), who, contrary to both Aristotelian and Cartesian philosophy, viewed all processes in nature as being caused by forces contained in the atoms.[46] The philosophy of Descartes can be interpreted as an endeavor to overtake the emancipation—triggered by Galileo's[47] interpretation of the Copernican view of the world—not only from theology but also from traditional philosophy in an attempt to "trace mathematics back to philosophy"[48] and to do so by means of logic and its direction from the general to the specific. This led to the anti-Cartesian reaction of the empirically oriented eighteenth century. Based on Descartes, the Oratorian Nicole Malebranche (1638–1715)[49] attempted to go back to Augustinian metaphysics of light. In his concept of "Vision en Dieu," merely stimulated by sensual experience, in which all ideas are directly seen (as distinguished from Descartes's "innate ideas") he sees in God the sole causa activa seu efficiens, which makes use of human action as the causes occasionelles (Recherche de la verité [1674]). This was of great influence on Leibniz. But these attempts to obtain in an era of autonomous reason and mathematical-scientific thought a new central position for theology were rejected alike by the Sorbonne, the traditional theologians (especially the Jesuits), and in part by the Jansenists, as well as by the intellectuals of the Enlightenment, whose philosopher was not Descartes but Locke. In the person of Pierre Bayle (1647–

---

[41] R. Grimsley, Jean d'Alembert, 1717–83 (Oxford 1963).

[42] A. M. Wilson, Diderot. The Testing Years 1713–1759 (New York 1957); J. Proust, Diderot et l' "Encyclopédie" (Paris 1963); L. G. Crocker, Diderot. The Embattled Philosopher (New York 1966); P. Altari, Voltaire, Diderot e il Partito filosofico (1965).

[43] F. Venturi, Le origini dell'Enciclopedia (Turin 1963); J. Proust, L'Encyclopédie (Paris 1965).

[44] D. Ligou, La Franc-Maçonnerie française au XVIII^e siècle: L'Information historique (Paris 1955); G.-H. Luquet, La Franc-Maçonnerie et l'Église en France au XVIII^e siècle (n. p., 1955); for the connection between Freemasons and the French Revolution, see E. Weis in F. Wagner, Handbuch, 297, n. 29–33.

[45] Œuvres complètes, ed. by C. Adam and P. Tannéry, 12 vols. (Paris 1897–1910); Prinzipien der Philosophie, trans. by A. Buchenau (Leipzig 1922).—Lit. in R. Lefèvre, La vocation de Descartes (Paris 1956); idem, L'humanisme de Descartes (Paris 1957).

---

[46] J. S. Spink, French Free-Thought from Gassendi to Voltaire (London 1960).

[47] Whereas Gassendi knew how to defend Galileo's views of the universe without leaving himself vulnerable to censorship, Descartes in his treatise on the method left the possibility of error open. The fact that Galileo determined his fate by treating his question as a theological one as well "instead of relegating it to the theologians" became the problem of the Enlightenment, which no longer thought such relegation possible.

[48] H. Lange, Physik I, 193.

[49] G. Sebba, Nicolas Malebranche, 1638–1715. A preliminary Bibliography (Athens, Georgia 1959); G. Stieler, Leibniz und Malebranche und das Theodiceeproblem (Darmstadt 1930). See Cognet above.

1706)[50]—son of a Huguenot pastor, attended the Jesuit school at Toulouse in 1669, a Catholic for a period of seventeen months, and after 1681 professor of philosophy in Rotterdam—France produced the man who largely determined the intellectual climate of the century. He did so by his unsparing and exceedingly effective criticism of tradition, by the categorical separation of faith and knowledge, by his criticism of the moral discrimination of atheists, but also by his skepticism towards reason (which he considered stronger in the discovery of errors than in positive cognition). He was opposed to Leibniz, Descartes, and Spinoza, yet also cognizant enough of the consequences of the "Pyrrhonisme" to hold fast to the natural idea of reasonableness as the basis for an autonomous moral law. His Dictionnaire historique et critique (1697) often adds to insignificant keywords lengthy footnotes which contain the actual substance of the work. But while Bayle could unequivocally state that he would rather be godless than an idolator, the aristocratic Montesquieu (1698–1755)[51] in his Esprit des lois (1748) considered the various religions from the point of view of their usefulness to the state. In his conservative criticism of absolutism he held religion to function as the only existing limitation upon those who disregard human laws. This work, which first appeared anonymously in Geneva, exercised great influence by its many editions and translations, representing as it does a biological (climate) and sociological comparative constitutional doctrine. But there exists for him an original ground of being to which the laws are connected, since the absurdity of blind fate would not have been able to produce intelligent beings. Montesquieu rendered one of the most characteristic judgments of Voltaire (1694–1778; son of a notary)[52]: Just as monks did for the glory of their order, so did Voltaire write history for the glory of "his monastery," but bad history. Voltaire's partisanship for his "monastery" of restless spirits is the pendant of his fanatical hatred of the Catholic Church (Sermon des Cinquantes [1761], Le philosophe ignorant [1766], Profession de foi des Théistes [1768], and Dieu et les hommes[1769]). His life and voluminous literary work cannot be reduced to a formula. The deist philosophy he received from England is meager, but the Eléments de la philosophie de Newton (1738)[53] were deadlier for Cartesianism in France than its prohibition by the established Church. Like all those in France who called themselves "philosophes" Voltaire is the prototype of the écrivain who was equally able to write the cynical epic La pucelle d'Orléans (1739) as well as the profoundly moving Poème sur le désastre de Lisbonne" (1755). Following is a brief biographical sketch: from 1704 to 1710 he was at the Jesuit college Louis-le-Grand; in 1717 he spent eleven months in the Bastille; as an eminent writer he was received into aristocratic society, this permitted his secret return from banishment in England (1726–28). A successful financial speculator, member of the Academie in 1746, intellectual vagabond after 1750, he spent his final twenty years in Fernay near Geneva. From there he exerted his intellectual influence on all of Europe by means of his voluminous correspondence, aside from the Encyclopedia the most important factor in the propagation of the thought of the Enlightenment. His Candide ou l'optimisme (1759) documented in exemplary fashion the ever-present possibility of a sudden shift into pessimism. The Essai sur les mœurs et l'esprit de nations (1756)[54] gained fame through its added introduction entitled "Philosophie de l'histoire." It represents a fundamental attack on the interpretation of world history according to the details of the Christian Gospel. Next to Bayle, Montesquieu, and Voltaire—his life in many respects is comparable to Voltaire's but a complete opposite in the course of his intellect—Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–78),[55] the son of a watchmaker from a Huguenot family who had emigrated to Geneva, was the most signifi-

---

[50] E. Beyreuther, "Zinzendorf und Pierre Bayle," Herrnhuter Hefte 8 (Hamburg 1955); J.-P. Jossua, "P. Bayle précurseur des théologies modernes . . . ," RevSR 39, 2 (1965), 113–57.

[51] Œuvres complètes, ed. by A. Masson, 3 vols. (Paris 1950–55); German trans. of Esprit des lois by E. Forsthoff, with an important intro., 2 vols. (Tübingen 1951).—Lit. in J. Mailhol "Die Methode des Kulturkritikers u. Geschichtsdenkers Montesquieu" (unpubl. diss., Mainz 1955); M. Göhring, Montesquieu. Historismus und moderner Verfassungsstaat (Wiesbaden 1956); R. Shackleton, Montesquieu. A Critical Biography (London 1961, with biblio.).

[52] Œuvres complètes de Voltaire, Nouvelle éd., 52 vols., ed. by A. Beuchot and L. Moland (Paris 1877–85); Voltaire. Correspondance, ed. by T. Besterman, 2 vols. (Paris 1964–65).—Lit. in W. Kaegi, Voltaire u. der Zerfall des Geschichtsbildes: Historische Meditationen (Zurich 1942); R. Naves, ed., Voltaire. Dialogues et anecdotes philosophiques (Paris 1955, with biblio.); J. H. Brumfitt, Voltaire Historian (London 1958); A. Noyes, Voltaire (Paris 1936, German: Munich 1958; attempts to show the Christian Voltaire); R. P. Pomeau, La religion de Voltaire (Paris 1956); W. Weischedel, Voltaire: Große Geschichtsdenker. Ein Zyklus Tübinger Vorlesungen von K. A. Fink u. a., ed. by K. Stadelmann (Tübingen and Stuttgart 1949); H. T. Mason, Pierre Bayle et Voltaire (London 1963); R. A. Brooks, Voltaire and Leibniz (Geneva 1964); Studies on Voltaire and the 18th Century, ed. by T. Besterman (Geneva 1955).

---

[53] P. Brunet, L'introduction des théories de Newton en France au XVIII^e siècle. Avant 1738 (Paris 1931), treats the reception of Newton to that point.

[54] Vol. 11 of the ed. by A. Beuchot and L. Moland.

[55] Jean Jacques Rousseau, Œuvres complètes, ed. by B. Gagnebin and M. Raymond (Paris 1959–64).—Lit. in E. Hirsch, "Rousseaus Geschichtsphilosophie," Rechtsidee u. Staatsgedanke. Festgabe für Julius Binder (Berlin 1930); F. C. Green, Jean-Jacques Rousseau. A Critical Study of his Life and Writings (Cambridge 1955); M. Rang, Rousseaus Lehre vom Menschen (Göttingen 1959); F. Jost, Jean-Jacques Rousseau suisse, 2 vols. (Freiburg i. Ue. 1961); O. Vossler, Rousseaus Freiheitslehre (Göttingen 1963).

cant figure of the French Enlightenment. Under the guidance of the convert Mme von Warens in Annecy (Savoy), who later became his lover, he converted to Catholicism in 1728. But neither his conversion nor his return to the Reformed Church in Geneva (1754) were among the essential inner stations of his life to which his literary work corresponds. All self-stylization aside, his "Inspiration of Vincennes" (conceived in 1749 on his way to visit Diderot in jail) described in the Confessions ("en remontant aux traces de mon etre sensible," finished in 1770) may be ascribed the significance of a turning point. As it says in the Confessions, it is solely the institutions which make man evil. Following the criticism of culture represented by his Discours sur les sciences et les arts (1750), criticism of its institutions was also the thesis of the second discourse ("Sur l'origine et les fondements de l'inégalité parmi les hommes") in 1754. It was this radical inwardness, this resolute anti-institutionalism with its pietistic extension in J. G. Arnold which—aside from determining Rousseau's pedagogy of self-development (Émile ou sur l'éducation [1762]; burned as atheistic)—produced the immediate revolutionary impact of Rousseau. The Contrat sociale (1762) in one of its possible interpretations did not become truly significant until the French Revolution. There were individual reasons for Rousseau's disassociating himself in 1758 from Diderot, who had influenced him so strongly, for opposing Voltaire, and becoming alienated from D. Hume, with whom he had gone to England in 1765. What these actions demonstrate is the transition from an Enlightenment of reason to an Enlightenment of the "heart," which loses none of its explosive power in the course of nineteenth century intellectual and social history. Rousseau's temporary intellectual companion Diderot, at least initially, had moral reservations against atheism, as did Voltaire. These were not shared by the physician Julien Offroy de La Mettrie (1709–51),[56] who viewed human intellectual powers as pure bodily functions (Histoire naturelle de l'âme [1745]). In the Netherlands, where he went after the condemnation of this work, he published the radically materialist, atheist essay L'homme machine (Leiden 1748), in which he transferred the mechanism of the physical world, asserted by Descartes, to man as an intellectual being. The same anthropology was advocated by Claude Helvetius (1715–71)[57], son of a Dutch doctor, in his De l'esprit (1758), which was placed on the Index by the Sorbonne. Differing from Helvetius, Étienne Condillac (1715–80)[58] in his sensualism based on J. Locke (Traité des sensation [1754]) does not touch on the immorality of an immaterial soul nor on the issue of deist faith. As many of the writers of the Enlightenment, he was still worried about securing the moral bases of society. The extreme representative of materialist atheism in France was P. H. D. von Holbach (1723–89).[59] Raised in France as the son of a wealthy upstart from the Palatinate, his vulgarly materialist Système de la nature (1770) also appeared in a German translation (1783). His pamphlet Les Prêtres démasqués (1768) was rejected even by the likes of Diderot as tasteless. Voltaire, Rousseau, and Georges-Louis de Buffon (1707–88), the famous author of the Histoire naturelle (1749–88: thirty-six volumes; 1804: a total of forty-four volumes), withdrew from the circle which Holbach attracted around himself. In contrast to the materialism of the literary figures the important natural scientists of the eighteenth century for the most part were reluctant to accept generalizations—regardless of the radical manner by which they delimited their empirical methods from theology and metaphysics. This was also true of G.-L. de Buffon,[60] intendant of the royal gardens in Paris since 1739, to whom Louis XIV dedicated a bust with the inscription "Majestati naturae par ingenium." He held fast to the "infinite distinction" between man and "the most perfect animal"; for him the "unnoticeable degrees" of gradation in nature were "suddenly rendered invalid" by virtue of the difference between the thinking and the material being.[61] His original theory of the constancy of species, which—it was long felt—could not be abandoned in view of the doctrine of creation, was corrected by de Buffon after 1753. This theory was even more decisively polemicized against by de Buffon's friend and protége Jean-Baptiste de Lamarck (1744–1829),[62] who offered an initial theory of evolution (Philosophie zoologique, 2 vols. [Paris 1809]; Histoire naturelle des Animaux sans vertèbres, 7 vols. [1815–22]). But avowed atheism is encountered more among the literati than the truly scholarly natural scientists. The idea of progress,[63] just as atheism, was in its enthusiastic form of expression mainly a phenomenon of the French Enlightenment. But it was also a case where the French Enlightenment retained an amount of skepticism towards that faith, as was nowhere more clearly expressed than with Voltaire. Robert-Jacques Turgot (1727–81)[64] who initially studied theology and then turned to economics—he was finance minister from 1774 to 1776—in 1750 read two essays at the Sorbonne entitled "Sur les progrès successifs de l'esprit humain" (not published until 1809). In them he established a correspondence between the historical development of production stages and global commerce on the one hand, and the development of moral forces towards a moderation of customs and habits and a peaceful rapprochement of nations on the other, which includes the influence of Christianity. A friend of Turgot's was the Girondist Antoine de Condorcet (1743–94).[65] His Esquisse d'un tableau historique des progrès de l'esprit humain, written in 1794 when he faced death at the hands of the Revolution, in such a situation could not fail to go beyond the question of perfectivizing the satisfaction of basic needs, posing the question which fundamentally contradicts the belief in progress, the question of individual death, which cannot be extinguished by any collective perfectibility of mankind. The answer lies in the hope for a time in which individual life expectancy has been expanded far enough so that man slowly looses his energies and desire for life and, while not becoming immortal, dies satiated by life. To be sure, in such a meditation, eye to eye with one's own violent death, the possibility of the "unusual coincidence" cannot be excluded.

---

[56] G.-F. Tuloup, Julien Offroy de la Mettrie. Un précurseur méconnu (Paris 1938).

[57] J. Cumming, Helvetius: his Life and Place in the History of Educational Thought (London 1955).

---

[58] R. Bizzarri, Condillac (Brescia 1945).

[59] P. Naville, Paul Thiry d'Holbach et la philosophie scientifique au XVIII^e siècle (Paris 1943); V. W. Topazio, D'Holbach's Moral Philosophy (Geneva 1956).

[60] Georges Louis Leclerc Buffon, Œuvres complètes, ed. by H. R. Duthilloeul, 12 vols. (Paris 1822); G. L. L. Buffon, Œuvres complètes avec la nomenclature Linnéenne et la classification de Cuvier, par M. Florens, 12 vols. (Paris 1853–55).—Lit. in L. Roule, L'histoire de la nature vivante d'après l'œuvre des grands naturalistes français, 6 vols. (Paris 1924–32), Vol. I on Buffon; O. Fellows, Buffon's Place in the Enlightenment in T. Besterman, ed., Studies on Voltaire and the 18th Century (Geneva 1955ff.); E. Genet-Varcin and J. Roger, Bibliographie de Buffon (Paris 1955).

[61] G. L. L. de Buffon, Histoire naturelle de l'homme (Paris 1749) II, 8.

[62] L. Roule, L'histoire . . . IV; G. Wiehler, "Lamarck," Der Biologe 9 (1940).

In 1621 after the Synod of Dordrecht (1619) the Remonstrant Hugo Grotius was forced to flee to France and was banished again upon his return in 1632 from the Republic of the United Netherlands, which had been founded in 1588 following the battle against religious and political oppression. In his Dutch refuge Descartes had met with the opposition of the Calvinists, just as he had met with the opposition of the Sorbonne and the Jesuits in France. But in 1638 Galilei's main work, the Discorsi e dimonstrazioni, was able to appear in Leiden. For the Trinitarians, expelled from Poland in 1658, the federation became the same refuge which it later became for the Huguenots. It was celebrated by Pierre Bayle, who had been in Rotterdam since 1681, where he met with John Locke[66] as "l'arche des fugitifs." There Bayle founded the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, a journal read by modern intellectuals all over Europe (Amsterdam 1684–89 in six volumes; edited by Bayle himself until February 1687). But in 1693 he was forced to relinquish his chair of philosophy. Yet the Netherlands, led by an urban bourgeoisie with their avant-garde gazettes in Leiden and Utrecht,[67] their presses, whose names appear in the best-known works of the Enlightenment, and with its book trade became an intellectual market place. The botanical collections in Leiden, as well, became an attraction for critical spirits such as Carl v. Linné.

---

[63] C. Frankel, The Faith of Reason; the Idea of Progress in the French Enlightenment (New York 1948); M. Ghio. L'Idea di progresso nell'illuminismo francese e tedesco (Turin 1962); G. Iggers, "Der Fortschrittsgedanke noch einmal kritisch betrachtet," Saeculum 16 (1965), 409–22.

[64] Œuvres de Turgot et documents le concernant, ed. by G. Schelle, 5 vols. (Paris 1913–23); F. Alenguy, Turgot (1727–1781). Homme privé, homme d'État (Paris 1942); P. Jolly, Turgot (Paris 1944); C.-J. Gignoux, Turgot (Paris 1946).

[65] Œuvres de Condorcet, ed. by A. Condorcet O'Conor and M. F. Arago, 12 vols. (Paris 1847–49); E. Kohn-Bramstedt, "Condorcet u. das Geschichtsbild der späten Aufklärung," AKG 20 (1930) 52f.; A. Cento, Condorcet e l'idea di progesso (Florence 1956); J. Bouissounouse, Condorcet. Le philosophe dans la révolution (Paris 1962).

The philosopher Baruch (Benedictus in his own Latinization) de Spinoza (1632–77),[68] of Portuguese Jewish parentage, is only geographically Dutch. Ceremoniously expelled from the synagogue in 1656, he lived in lonely poverty in The Hague from 1670 on as a grinder of optical instruments. In his philosophy—the main work being his Ethica ordine geometrico demonstrata, published posthumously in 1677—he takes up the basic problem of Cartesian dualism, asserting the res cogitans and the res extensa is being the two recognizeable ones under the attributes of the deus omnium rerum causa immanens, non transiens of the natura naturans. This philosophy was rejected by Leibniz and did not have a full impact until the post-Kantian philosophy of monism in Germany, even though it had had some influence on G. E. Lessing and J. G. Herder.

In the German Empire and its countries[69] the principles of the Religious Peace of Augsburg concerning the determination of 1624 as the fixed year had been modified in 1648 inasmuch as a change of denominations occurring between 1624 and 1648 was tolerated, although with some exceptions. The formation of larger territories had resulted in a mixing of denominations (the Reformed Churches were also recognized); in individual cases the immigration of new elements of population had been promoted (especially through the admittance of Huguenots); the "enlightened absolutism," theoretically based on Pufendorf's and Thomasius's doctrine of natural law, had developed (although at different times) in the various countries. But in spite of some modern features in government, conditions had on the whole remained conservative in comparison to western Europe. A primary reason for this is the fact that even under the enlightened regimes the bourgeoisie did not play as prominent a role by far as it did in England and France. Additionally the Reformation had continued to constitute a much more serious religious and theological problem in the Empire than in western Europe. This also contributed to the fact that church historiography, as presented elsewhere in this volume, was a specific medium for the process of Enlightenment in western Europe. Corresponding in its mathematical spirit to the Enlightenment, the worldly age of the baroque, in addition to its music and architecture, also created religious monuments of exceptional splendor in the German countries and Italy. Because of the chronological lag of the German Enlightenment compared with that of western Europe, arising from historical conditions, the intellectual movement in Germany was confronted with the extremes of the late Western Enlightenment and especially the terrorist phase of the French Revolution, and thus became susceptible to restorative ideas. Romanticism subsequently created revolutionary elements of its own kind.

---

[66] P. Dibon, ed., Pierre Bayle le philosophe de Rotterdam (Amsterdam and Paris 1959); according to Ivo Schöffer in F. Wagner, Handbuch, 654, n. 3, the lit. on the Huguenots in the Netherlands is very outdated.

[67] E. Hatin, Les gazettes de Hollande et la presse clandestine aux XVII^e^ et XVIII^e^ siècles (Paris 1865).

[68] K. Fischer, Geschichte der neueren Philosophie 2: Spinozas Leben, Werke und Lehre (Heidelberg 1946); L. Strauss, Die Religionsphilosophie Spinozas als Grundlage seiner Bibelwissenschaft (Berlin 1930); P. Vernière, Spinoza et la pensée française avant la Révolution, 2 vols. (Paris 1954); H. M. Wolff, Spinozas Ethik. Eine kritische Einführung (Berne 1958); G. Friedmann, Leibniz et Spinoza (Paris 1962); A. S. Oko, The Spinoza Bibliography (Boston 1964).

[69] F. Brüggemann, ed., Das Weltbild der deutschen Aufklärung. Philosophische Grundlagen und literarische Auswirkung (Leipzig 1930); E. Ermatinger, "Deutsche Kultur im Zeitalter der Aufklärung," Hdb. der Kulturgeschichte, ed. by H. Kindermann, Abt. 1 (Potsdam 1934–35); H. M. Wolff, Die Weltanschauung der deutschen Aufklärung in geschichtlicher Entwicklung (Berne 1949); H. Schöffler, Deutscher Geist im 18. Jh. Essays zur Geistes-

Important centers of German Enlightenment were the universities of Halle (1694), part of Brandenburg since 1680, and Göttingen (1737),[70] whose Hanoverian rulers became kings of England in 1714, a factor which influenced the political and historical sciences taught there. Among those founded in Germany on the model of the Berlin Academy und Religionsgeschichte (Göttingen 1956); W. Krauss, Studien zur deutschen und französischen Aufklärung (Berlin 1963); F. Valjavec, Der Josephinismus. Zur geistigen Entwicklung Österreichs im 18. und 19. Jh. (Munich 1945); E. Winter, "Der Josefinismus und seine Geschichte. Beiträge zur Geistesgesch. Österreichs 1740–1848," Prager Studien . . . zur Geistes- und Gesinnungsgeschichte Ostmitteleuropas (Brünn and Munich 1943).

---

[70] K. Hunger, Die Bedeutung der Universität Göttingen für die Geschichtsforschung am Ausgang des 18. Jh. (diss., Leipzig 1933); G. v. Selle, Die Georg-August-Universität zu Göttingen. 1737–1937 (Göttingen 1937).

(1700) whose establishment was assisted by Leibniz, the Göttingen Academy was one of the most important ones (1751).[71] In 1732 the Göttingische Zeitungen von Gelehrten Sachen started to appear; as the Göttingische Gelehrte Anzeigen it became the leading voice of liberal science in Germany. Among the numerous "Moralische Wochenschriften" in Germany, appealing especially to women eager for education, Die vernünftigen Tadlerinnen (from 1725) by J. C. Gottsched (1700–1766), based on Wolff's philosophy of rationalism, was very successful. Its competition was the Discourse der Mahlern (from 1721), edited by the Swiss J. J. Bodmer (1698–1783) and J. J. Breitinger (1701–76), which was critical of Gottsched's rationalistic poetry. In 1773 the Teutsche Merkur, edited by C. M. Wieland (1733–1813), appeared as an organ of confirmed Enlightenment.[72] Following the Lexicon universale (1697) of J. J. Hofmann of Basel, the Große Vollständige Universallexikon aller Wissenschaften und Künste (1732–50) represented the new status of general education and the difference in spirit from the French Encyclopedia. But the most prominent propagandist of German Enlightenment was the Berlin publisher Friedrich Nicolai, editor from 1765 of the journal Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek (106 volumes). Starting in 1761 he also edited the Briefe, die neueste Literatur betreffend, one of whose contributors was G. E. Lessing. In 1788 Nicolai published his Öffentliche Erklärung über seine geheime Verbindung mit dem Illuminatenorden. This order had been established in 1776 by the Ingolstadt professor, A. Weishaupt and suppressed in 1783.

Along with Descartes and Spinoza, Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646–1716)[73] was the most important philosopher of the pre-Kantian period. After serving the elector of Mainz from 1666 to 1673, he traveled to Paris and London for three years, subsequently serving as librarian and privy councilor at the court of Hanover. A scientist and mathematician, he wrote a criticism of the anti-Cartesian empiricism of Locke (Nouveaux essais sur l'entendement humain, posthumously [1765]). In his Monadologie (1714) he attempted to overcome both Descartes's dualism and Spinoza's monism by positing the universe as joined in the form of monads in "prästabilierter Harmonie" (predetermined harmony), but independent of each other and immaterial. Since they are nonconstructed units they can only "come about and perish all at once," that is they can only be created by creation and perish by destruction.[74] They are ordered according to Cartesian "distinctness and clarity"—man on an intermediate level is unclear regarding his senses and therefore only conditionally clear regarding his reason—in ascending order to God as the uncreated "central monad." While God is called "inventor and master builder" for the "works of nature," He manifests himself "on the other hand as king and father of substances endowed with intellect whose souls are formed according to His image."[75] In his Essai de Théodicée sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté de l'homme et l'origine du mal (Amsterdam 1710) against Bayle, Leibniz addressed one of the major problems of the whole epoch, the question of the origin of evil in the world, to a greater extent than Shaftesbury, Pope, Rousseau, and, in his own way, Voltaire had done. In it he states that the world is of necessity imperfect because it is necessarily limited. Just as Leibniz's monadology and theodicy at important junctures function theologically, so is his position on history determined by religion. His confidence in the progress of humanity in the sense of an infinite process in the last analysis is founded in his faith in a divine universal design: "It is not in keeping with divine harmony to err frequently in the same manner."[76] Regardless of the rationalism of his philosophical theology, his differentiation of the two kinds of truth, the vérités de fait and the vérités de raison, prevents a rationalization of faith as that of Toland and Tindal. In contrast to historical pyrrhonism the vérités de fait are actual truths, part of which are the doctrinal truths of revelation. Christian Wolff (1679–1754), a protégé of Leibniz's at the University of Halle (1706), did not reach the latter's profundity. As a reaction to psychologism Wolff took up elements of "Scholasticism which had until then been pushed into the background."[77] Because of a speech about Chinese moral philoso-[71] A. Kraus, Vernunft u. Geschichte–Die Bedeutung der deutschen Akademien für die Entwicklung der Geschichtswissenschaft im späten 18. Jh. (Freiburg i. Brsg. 1963).

---

[72] L. Salomon, Geschichte des deutschen Zeitungswesens, 3 vols. (Oldenburg 1900–1906), Vol. I; J. Kirchner, Die Grundlagen des dt. Zeitschriftenwesens mit einer Gesamtbibliographie der dt. Zeitschriften (Leipzig 1931); idem, Das dt. Zeitschriftenwesen, seine Geschichte und seine Probleme, 2 parts (1958–62), Part 1; F. Hertz, The Development of the German Public Mind, 2 vols., II: The Age of Enlightenment (London and New York 1957), D. Freiberg, Der Wiener literarische Journalismus im 18. Jh. (unpubl. diss., Vienna 1954).

[73] Leibniz, Sämtl. Schriften u. Briefe, ed. by the Preuß. Akad. d. Wiss., 40 vols. (Darmstadt 1924ff.); Leibniz, Philosophische Werke, ed. by A. Buchenau and E. Cassirer (Philos. Bibliothek [Leipzig 1924ff.]); "Apokatastasis panton," see M. Ettlinger.—Lit.: W. Dilthey, "Leibniz und sein Zeitalter," Ges. Schriften III (Stuttgart and Göttingen 1959), 1–80; M. Ettlinger, Leibniz als Geschichtsphilosoph (Munich 1921); W. Conze, Leibniz als Historiker (Berlin 1951); J. O. Fleckenstein, G. W. Leibniz. Barock und Universalismus (Thun and Munich 1958); H. H. Holz, Leibniz (Urban-Bücher 34 [Stuttgart 1958]); R. Wisser, "Leibniz u. Vico" (unpubl. diss., Mainz 1954); W. H. Barber, Leibniz in France, from Arnauld to Voltaire; a Study in French Reactions to Leibnizianism (Oxford 1955).

---

[74] E. Cassirer II, 435.

[75] Ibid. II, 63.

[76] Fragment "Apokatastasis panton" (1715); see n. 3.

[77] M. Wundt, op. cit., 124.

phy he got into a conflict with the orthodox segment; as a result of their agitation he was banished from Halle by Friedrich Wilhelm I in 1723. Friedrich II permitted him to return from Marburg seventeen years later. Because of this conflict, and even more so because of his conciliatory attitude (which fit in with the German intellectual climate) Wolff obtained great influence, which extended even to Russia (Vernünftige Gedanken von Gott, der Welt und der Seele des Menschen, auch allen Dingen überhaupt [1719]). Among his colleagues in Halle who had found refuge there was the lawyer Christian Thomasius (1655–1728),[78] whose theory of natural law continued the process of rationalization started by Hugo Grotius by separating the legal duties from the inner moral ones. His teacher, Samuel Pufendorf (1632–94), the first German to be appointed professor of natural and international law in Heidelberg,[79] had already established the separation from theology in his major work De Jure Naturae et Gentium (1672). To be sure, he defined the primum principium as constituting the divine will, but in practice as the absolute state: it is "the pinnacle of human achievement if one, supported by the totality of the powers of the state, can say that one recognizes none higher."[80] But in his doctrine of duty he demonstrated a conservative attitude. Yet in the German domains theological issues retained their priority. The fact that Leibniz's philosophy, oriented towards theology, continued to dominate that geographic area until the arrival of Kant is manifest even in Gotthold Ephraim Lessing's (1729–81)[81] essay Das Christentum der Vernunft (1753). But Lessing, the son of a Lutheran pastor, a considerable part of whose literary work was occupied by the issue of the Christian doctrine of revelation, was at the intersection of differing intellectual currents. He was impressed by P. Bayle, for a time by Voltaire, but also by the philosophy of Spinoza. Although he applied as a criterion the correspondence with "Natural Religion" in his work Über die Entstehung der geoffenbarten Religionen (1755), he differed from French deism by adhering to the historic necessity of true and false positive religions. These were ideas which he expanded in a more profound fashion in his Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (1780). It is here—more so than in his polemic with the Hamburg pastor J. M. Göze, caused by Lessing's edition of the radically rationalist Wolfenbütteler Fragmente eines Ungenannten (by the orientalist H. S. Reimarus [d. 1768]; 1774–78)—that Lessing's specific relationship with Christianity is expressed. For him it was not a matter of finding an abstract rational concept for the truth of revelation. Instead he traces the education of mankind as an analogy of Christian salvation through the stages of the revelation (warning against its untimely abandonment) to the God-given ratio which is a category of the future, the "new eternal Gospel"[82] which Lessing invokes with reference to Joachim von Fiore. Just as Lessing's "Natural Religion" differs from the indifference of late French Enlightenment, so does his concept of tolerance: the model for his drama Nathan der Weise was the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn (1728–86),[83] who had remained true to his Jewish faith. Enlightenment as history, as in the Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts, was a lifelong topic of Johann Gottfried Herder (1744–1803),[84] a church official in Bückeburg from 1771 to 1776. But he sounds more like a Christian in the Älteste Urkunde des Menschengeschlechts (1774), where he investigates the difference between the biblical and the general manifestation of God in nature, and in his Auch eine Philosophie der Geschichte zur Bildung der Menschheit (1774), a combination of philosophy and theology (a second part, which he planned under the title Religion, Christus, Ende der Welt mit einer glorreichen seligen Entwicklung, did not come about). But only in his Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit (1784–91) does the Christian religiosity recede behind a concept of universal nature initiating Romanticism. As F. Meinecke stressed, Jesus is now designated as the teacher of "the most genuine humanitarianism." Yet for Herder's total undertaking the words of Kant in his critique of the Ideen apply: ". . . a sagacity skillful in the finding of analogies . . . combined with the skill to captivate one through feelings and perceptions for a subject always kept at a mysterious distance."[85] Immanuel Kant (1724–1804),[86] whose critique of metaphysics and the bases of perception was prompted by the Enlightenment, overcame the latter by attempting to fathom it. He raised it to a universal principle with his famous definition: "Enlightenment is the emergence of man from a state of minority of his own making." (1784). In his essay Mutmaßlicher Anfang der Menschengeschichte (1786) he applied Lessing's method of interpretation to Genesis 2–4, without Herder's application of feeling, but also without the historical sense with which Lessing lets the revelation pass in his Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts. By interpreting the transgression of God's command as the "first attempt at a free choice," which was connected with "the discharge from the maternal womb of nature," Kant defined man in his historical relevance more thoroughly than Voltaire and Herder. By his fall from grace man exits "from the era . . . of peace into that of work and discord, as the prelude to joining in society"; but the goal, the use of reason—as it is expressed in his essay Idee zu einer allgemeinen Geschichte in weltbürgerlicher Absicht (1784)—is not reached within the individual, but rather against the individual of the species, in the "antagonism of unsocial sociability of man," which causes the birth from history of "Enlightenment as a great possession." Here the detheologization of history is radical. But at the same time Kant's Idee zu einer allgemeinen Geschichte . . . seeks to forestall a concept of history as "a purposeless aggregate of human actions." This is not only an historiographical problem, one that was discussed explicitly by the Göttingen historian August Ludwig Schlözer (1735–1809),[87] who had had a falling out with Herder. More so than the moral work Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der bloßen Vernunft (1793)—suppressed by order of the Prussian council as a "disparagement of Christianity"—the two above-mentioned works from 1784 and 1786 manifest the critique of religious tradition, whose Western themes nonetheless continued to be the guiding ideas in the great works of Kant: soul, world, God—immortality, freedom, God (G. Söhngen).

---

[78] E. Wolf, Große Rechtsdenker der deutschen Geistesgeschichte (Tübingen 1963), 371–423 (with biblio.).

[79] Ibid., 311–70 (with biblio.); H. Rabe, Naturrecht u. Kirche bei Samuel von Pufendorf (Tübingen 1958); H. Welzel, Die Naturrechtslehre Samuel Pufendorfs (Berlin 1958).

[80] De Jure Nat. et Gent. II, 2, par. 4.

[81] A. v. Arx, Lessing und die geschichtliche Welt (Frauenfeld 1944).

---

[82] Erziehung des Menschengeschlechtes, par. 86.—Thus Lessing overcomes the opposites of reason and history, one of the main problems of his epoch ("Die Form der Zeitlichkeit als solche ist kein Gegensatz zum Sein" [E. Cassirer, op. cit., 256]).

[83] Lessing is the best example for Cassirer's remark (op. cit., 218f.) that tolerance was indifferentism only among the small minds; but among the great minds it was the pathos of truth which should be divorced from all merely partial orthodoxy.

[84] Sämtliche Werke, ed. by B. Suphan, 33 vols. (Berlin 1877–1913).—Lit.: T. Litt, Die Befreiung des geschichtl. Bewußtseins durch J. G. Herder (Leipzig 1943); A. Gillies, Herder. Der Mensch und sein Werk (German; Hamburg 1949); D. W. Joens, "Begriff und Problem der histor. Zeit bei J. G. Herder," Göteborgs Universitets Arskrift 62.5 (1956); J. G. Herder, Mensch und Geschichte. Sein Werk im Grundriß, ed. by W. A. Koch (Stuttgart 1957).

[85] Insel-Edition 1, 243.

[86] In addition to the ed. by the Berliner Akademie: Philos. Bibliothek, ed. by K. Vorländer et al., 10 vols. (Leipzig 1903ff.); ed. by E. Cassirer, 11 vols. (Berlin 1912–22); ed. by W. Weischedel, 6 vols. (Frankfurt 1956ff.).—Lit.: T. Litt, Kant und Herder als Deuter der

If anything, the Enlightenment in Switzerland was even more conservative than in the territories of the Empire. Here the differences in the intellectual climate of the cities played a considerable role; the German-speaking part of Switzerland was more practical than speculative.[88] The first masonic lodges were established in the French part of geistigen Welt (Heidelberg 1949); G. Söhngen, Die Theologie im "Streit der Fakultäten": Die Einheit in der Theologie (Munich 1952).

---

[87] T. Benz, Die Anthropologie in der Geschichtsschreibung des 18. Jh. An Hand einer Auswahl (Wuppertal and Elberfeld 1932).

[88] P. Wernle, Der schweizerische Protestantismus im 18. Jh., 3 vols. (Tübingen 1923–25; also deals with the Enlightenment); H. Hubschmid, Gott, Mensch u. Welt in der schweizerischen Aufklärung (Affoltern 1950); E. Fueter, Geschichte der exakten Wis-

Switzerland, in Geneva and Lausanne, then in Basel and Zurich, whereas Bern suppressed the order. In all of these cities (except for Berne) academies were founded. The fact that members from both denominations could belong to the Helvetische Gesellschaft (1761)[89] was a first step beyond the long-lasting Swiss confessionalism. Among the most important figures of modern science in Switzerland were the brothers Jakob (1654–1705) and Johann Bernoulli (1667–1748), both of them mathematicians in Basel. Jakob Bernoulli, initially a pastor and widely traveled in France, the Netherlands, and England brought up again the suppressed Copernican system, but in the spirit of Newton he considered the mathematical laws a natural manifestation of God. Jean-Alphonse Turretini (1671–1733) can be seen as representative of the French part of Switzerland. He was a theologian and naturalist in Geneva who represented a moderate orthodox Enlightenment based on ethics. The Berne patrician Albrecht von Haller (1709–77), who had studied medicine in Tübingen and Leiden, became a pupil of Johann Bernoulli. He described his naturalist observations as poetic impressions (as in the didactic poem "The Alps"), but got into difficulties with his research in anatomy. In 1738 he became a professor at the University of Göttingen and, having attracted considerable fame, returned to his native city in 1753. He was a preformationist who considered the germ cell to contain the whole animal in miniature (Elementa physiologiae corporis humani, 8 vols. [Berne 1757–66]) and polemicized against La Mettrie's "godless opinion" of the soul (De partibus corporis humani, sensibilibus et irritabilibus). The Genevan Charles Bonnet (1720–93) was able to combine Locke's empiricism with the theory of preformation. He was widely criticized for his Palingénésie philosophique (1769), which attempted to combine the belief in revealed religion with Voltaire's empiricism. For his research concerning the reproduction of plant lice he was appointed a corresponding member of the Paris Academy at the age of twenty. He developed a theory of the stages of nature according to their organizational perfection, excluding not even the angles (Idée d'une échelle des êtres naturels [1745]) and believed in the possibility of "constant progress of all species towards a higher state of senschaften in der schweizerischen Aufklärung, 1680–1780 (Aarau 1941); R. Feller, Geschichte Berns III (Berne 1955) 575f.; M. Wehrli, Das geistige Zürich im 18. Jh. (Zurich 1943); P. Kälin, Die Aufklärung in Uri, Schwyz und Unterwalden im 18 Jh. (Schwyz 1945); L. Weber, Pädagogik der Aufklärungszeit (Frauenfeld 1941), treats esp. J. Locke and Rousseau; contains a separate chapter on the Enlightenment in Switzerland (52–103).

---

[89] H. Nabholz, Die Helvetische Gesellschaft 1761–1848 (Zurich 1961).

perfection."[90] The naturalist and historian Isaac Iselin (1728–82)[91] worked in the tradition of Basel humanism; in 1747 he lived in Göttingen, in 1752 in Paris, where he met J.-J. Rousseau, whose criticism of culture he rejected. Raised with the philosophy of Christian Wolff and deeply impressed by the Esprit des lois, he advanced a utilitarian ethic. After an illness in his thirties he changed his attitude towards Enlightenment: Voltaire now appeared to him to be "a witty poisoner of the human heart." In 1764 after a long period of preparation his Geschichte der Menschheit appeared.

French Enlightenment extended to the southern European countries, but its influence within society was limited, but least so in Portugal[92] under the rule of Pombal (1699–1782; prime minister after 1756). In Spain[93] under Charles III (1759–88) the reading of works by Montesquieu, Voltaire, and Rousseau became proof of a progressive mind; authors of the English Enlightenment were translated. Enlightenment in Italy[94] came from the same sources, but there it was Jansenism which represented the actual critical element. The native modernistic literature in the southern European countries ran the gamut from critical Catholic reform to a moderate Enlightenment (with the exception of Portugal). The Italian physician and physiologist Mariello Malpighi (1628–94, in 1691 appointed as his personal physician by Innocent XII) was epoch-making in the biological developmental theory; he investigated the egg of a chicken and of a silkworm microscopically and advanced the hypothesis of the universal unity of developmental laws in flora and fauna. At the same time he maintained that since "the essence of things is hidden," one would have to "go through the whole range of phenomena" empirically (Anatome plantarum, 2 vols. [London 1675–79])[95] A solitary figure within his century, misunderstood even by many of his late discoverers, was the highly gifted historian Gianbattista Vico (1670–1744),[96] an unappreciated professor of rhetoric in his native Naples. In his Scienza nuovo (1725, revised 1744)—contrary to the geometric ideas of Cartesianism, but tying in with Augustine—he attempted to discover the one "ideal, eternal history, in accordance with which the course of all the histories of all peoples passes chronologically." Whereas man cannot recognize the order of nature in which God rules "freely and unimpeded," he can recognize the world of history which he himself made. But since man, "intending the opposite," was led to a just society only by providence, the object of the "New Science" must be a "rational theology of divine providence in history."[97]

---

[90] Palingénésie III, 3; R. Savioz, La philosophie de Charles Bonnet (Paris 1948).

[91] U. Im Hof, I. Iselin, Sein Leben und die Entwicklung seines Denkens bis zur Abfassung der "Geschichte der Menschheit" von 1764 (Basel 1947); idem, I. Iselin u. die Spätaufklärung (Basel and Munich 1967).

[92] H. Juretschke, "Die Aufklärung und innere Entwicklung in Spanien und Portugal von 1700–1808," Historia Mundi IX (Berne and Munich 1960), 135–57.

[93] O. V. Quiroz-Martínez, La introducción de la filosofía moderna en España; el eclecticismo español de los siglos XVII y XVIII (Mexico City 1949); R. Ceñal, "Cartesianismo en España," Revista Universidad de Oviodeo (1945), 5–17; P. Mérimée, L'influence française en Espagne au XVIII^e siècle (Paris 1936); L. Rodríguez, "La recepción e influjo de la Filosofía de Locke en España," Revista de Filosofía 14 (1944), 359–81; M. Defourneaux, L'inquisition espagnole et les livres français au XVIII^e siècle (Paris 1963).

[94] C. Ottaviano, L'unità del pensiero cartesiano e il Cartesianismo in Italia (Padua 1943); H. Bedarida and P. Hazard, L'influence française en Italie au XVIII^e siècle (Paris 1934); E. Godignola, Illuministi, giansenisti, giacobini nell'Italia del settecento (Florence 1947); M. Fubini, ed., La cultura illuministica in Italia (Turin 1957); F. Catalano, Illuministi e Giacobini del Nettecento italiano (Milan 1959); F. Venturi, "Le siècle des lumières en Italie," Cahiers d'Histoire mondiales 8 (Paris 1960); A. Noyer-Weidner, Die Aufklärung in Oberitalien (Munich 1957); E. W. Cochrane, Tradition and Enlightenment in the Tuscan Academies 1690–1800 (Rome 1961); idem, "French Literature and the Italian Tradition in 18th Century Tuscany," J. of the History of Ideas 22 (Lancaster, Pa. 1962).

The Scandinavian countries reacted to Enlightenment primarily in a receptive manner. Stockholm had the reputation of being a refuge (although not always an auspicious one) for great foreigners or a place where their work would come to fruition, as it was for Descartes and Pufendorf respectively. The son of a Swedish country pastor, the physician Carl von Linné (1707–78),[98] who during his studies in Uppsala was asked to assist the theologian Olaf Celsius in compiling a work about biblical plants, represented his country prominently in the history of natural sciences, although many of his works appeared in the Netherlands, where he had investigated the botanical collections in Leiden. He attempted to discover a natural system of organisms in which their "rational order" would be visible. For purposes of the flora he chose—although not exclusively—the reproductive organs as a principle of classification. The sentence which has become a classic in the constancy of the species is found as thesis 157 of the Fundamenta botanica (1736): "Species tot sunt, quot diversas formas ab initio produxit infinitum Ens, quae formae produxere plures et sibi semper similes." Like Buffon before him, Linné later abandoned this theory and considered the generation of new species possible. Characteristic of the enlightened optimism is the transference of absolutistic notions to nature where God has "police supervision" and the animals have the duty "to maintain the balance among the plants . . . so that the perfection of the creator can shine in its full glory everywhere" (Politia naturae [Uppsala 1760]).

---

[95] M. Cardini, La vita e l'opera di Marcello Malpighi (Rome 1927).

[96] Opera, ed. by B. Croce, G. Gentile and F. Nicolini, 11 vols. (Bari 1911–41); Scienza nuova, (1744).—Lit.: B. Croce, La filosofia di G. Vico (Bari 1911, 1953), R. Stadelmann, "Die Geschichtsphilosophie G. B. Vicos," Geistige Welt, Vjschr. für Kultur- u. Geisteswiss. (Munich 1947; best work about Vico's Christianity); E. de Negri, "Theologien des Historismus [Vico u. Hegel]," Roman. Forschungen 62 (1950), 277–93; G. B. Vico, La Scienza nuova e opere scelte, ed. by N. Abbagnano (Turin 1952); H. J. Daus, Selbstverständnis und Menschenbild in den Selbstdarstellungen G. B. Vicos u. P. Giannones: ein Beitrag zur Gesch. der italienischen Autobiographie (Geneva 1962); B. Croce, Bibliografia vichiana (Naples 1904); idem, Bibliografia vichiana, accresciuta e rielaborata da F. Nicolini, 2 vols. (Naples 1947–48).

[97] See Scienza nuova 44.

[98] K. Hagberg, Carl Linnaeus (Stockholm 1939); E. Malmeström, "Die relig. Entwicklung und die Weltanschauung C. von Linnés," ZSTh 19 (1943), 31–58.

The history of the Enlightenment in eastern Europe was similar to that in northern and southern Europe. As a consequence of the political history in Poland, French Enlightenment—especially that of Rousseau—did not have a noticeable influence there until the end of the eighteenth century. The Enlightenment was received both sooner and more extensively—yet also in an adapted form—in Russia,[99] where it also became an element in its native literature. In a country without a bourgeoisie this was a process initiated from above. The Academy of Sciences in Petersburg[100] was built in the spirit of Peter the Great (1689–1725), but for a long time it had to rely on a foreign faculty. A significant role was played by the Western doctrine of natural law, which was, however, subject to certain limits because of the Russian concept of sacred rule. Suvalov, minister of state to Elizabeth (1741–62), the daughter of Peter the Great, who founded the first Russian university in Moscow (1755), commissioned Voltaire to write the Histoire de l'empire de Russie sous Pierre le Grand (1759–63). Under her rule M. V. Lomonosov (1711–65)[101] was appointed professor of the academy at Petersburg. A follower of the philosophy of Christian Wolff, which had generally spread in Russia, he combined an unorthodox religiosity with an optimistic rationalism. Princess Sophie Auguste von Anhalt-Zerbst, who became Tsarina Catherine II (1762–96), opened her court to the influence of French Enlightenment. Under her rule it was possible to publish the five-volume History of Russia from its most Ancient Times, written by V. N. Tatiscev from 1686 to 1705. Its theological and philosophical interspersions represented anti-Church criticism as well as the principles of a "Natural Religion." Catherine read Pierre Bayle and Montesquieu, corresponded with Voltaire, Diderot, d'Alembert, and permitted masonic lodges. To be sure, the effects of this sort of literature were limited. But the elements carried into the educated aristocracy by French tutors by means of the French language—the latter having been made the European educational medium by the Enlightenment—can be traced throughout the modern history of Russia.

---

[99] R. Wittram, Peter I., Czar und Kaiser, Zur Geschichte Peters des Großen in seiner Zeit II (Göttingen 1964); H. Jablonowski, "Die geistige Bewegung in Rußland in der 2. Hälfte des 18. Jh.," Collana di Ricerche Slavistiche 2 (1962); A. S. Vucinich, Science in Russian Culture I: A history to 1860 (Stanford, Calif. 1963); M. Raeff, Origins of the Russian Intelligentsia, the 18th Century Nobility (New York 1966); E. Haumant, La culture francaise en Russie, 1700–1900 (Paris 1910).

[100] E. Amburger, Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutsch-russ. kulturellen Beziehungen (Giessen 1961).

[101] M. V. Lomonosov, A. L. V. Schlözer and P. S. Pallas, Deutsch-russ. Wissenschaftsbeziehungen im 18. Jh., ed. by E. Winter et al. (Berlin 1962).

Creation and Natural Law—The History of Salvation and the World of History

As far as the Enlightenment was concerned, the objectionable theses of the Christian faith were identical with those to which the classical opponents of Christianity and those involved in present-day theological discussion have objected: original sin, the incarnation, and the resurrection. The deist concept of God cannot be reduced to a simple formula. It was characterized by two elements of intellectual history: the perception of a universal law in the natural world and the experience of plurality in the world of history, either recognizable in its laws (the ricorso of Vico or the variously perceived progress) or unrecognizable in its context (as in Pierre Bayle), a world no longer identifiable with the world of Christian salvation. The concept of a providentia divina, although often used as an empty moralistic formula—especially during the late Enlightenment—continued to pose a problem, preventing a monistic idea of the world among the significant thinkers such as Descartes, Newton, Leibniz, or Vico. Regardless of the various interpretations of the concept of "soul," the idea of the difference between man and the world was adhered to, except by the representatives of a radical materialism. Although the variations of customs, laws and morality, conditioned by nature or history, were stressed (as by Montesquieu), the uniformity of humanity was not questioned, but was rather to be reconceived beyond the level of historical differences.

The two typical forms which furnished the battleground for the fundamental conflict between tradition and the present were represented within the movement of the Enlightenment: harmonizing the opposites and controversy, both on a high and low level. The Anglican bishop J. Butler gained fame with his conciliatory essay The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature (1736).[102] A classical representative of a decisive separation of the two realms was Pierre Bayle, whose Calvinist tradition has been underestimated heretofore. He demanded a resolution of the difficultés de la raison solely by means of raison. But to the Christians he said—and there is no reason to interpret his words as scoffing: "C'est aux Métaphysiciens à examiner s'il y a un Dieu et s'il est infaillible; mais les Chrétiens, en tant que chrétiens, doivent supposer que c'est une chose déja jugée." And, not so far from Pascal's position, he writes about Jesus ("Il a voulu que son Évangile choquât"), religion, and pagan aphorisms in Paulinian terms.[103] Bayle's harsh "all or nothing" was for those who wanted to save the Trinitarian faith, but abandon original sin. Yet attempts at reducing the nature of the conflict to a superficial and harmless level should be distinguished from the true intellectual effort in this period to preserve the continuity of tradition while trying to resolve the crisis. These efforts revolved around two main problems.

---

[102] J. L. Murphy, "The Influence of Bishop Butler on Religious Thought," ThSt 24 (1963), 361–401.

The laws of mathematics and physics could be conceived as the work of the factor coeli et terrae, the master builder of the world. Just as Leibniz emphatically considered himself a "Christian mathematician," so did Newton call the "omnipotent" God the one who "guides all things and knows all things which are or can be created."[104] But the problem—while not in the case of Newton himself—consisted of describing the divine will in mathematical terms, from which resulted in the perception of the eighteenth century the absolutely regular course of the world in accordance with theoretical principles and without the need for the continued presence of God once it was set in motion. The topic is broached when Newton mentions God's "unlimited, uniform sensorium," in which God moves the bodies and in so doing is able "to create and recreate the parts of the universe."[105] He posits his sensorium, namely absolute space, in terms of physics, whereas Leibniz ascribes the latter to the "seat" of God. From then on the dilemma was created between the laws of the world—open to ratio—and the mystery of the world. This was a dilemma which G. Berkeley in his Analyst (1734) would only name but not solve when, in his polemic against the astronomer Edmond Halley (1656–1742; discoverer of the autonomous motion of the fixed stars) and in disagreement with the principles of calculus, he posed the question whether such findings were more plausible than the "religious mysteries and the articles of faith." The course of rationalism was indeed unstoppable; it was a distant path to the rediscovery of the mystery. But the issue concerning God had yet another aspect for mathematicians and physical scientists such as Newton and Leibniz. The factor coeli et terrae is also a recognition of the pater omnipotens, the God of history who led Israel out of Egypt. The importance of Newton's essays on the Bible, long excluded from his biographies as mere eccentricity, is now recognized.[106] Leibniz's writings concerning biblical language and history as well as his fragment on the history of theology are more than the work of a "polyhistor."

---

[103] In Eclaircissement on the article "Pyrrhonisme": DHGE.

[104] See H. Lange, Physik II, 212, according to Dampier, op. cit., 210: "Er lenkt alle Dinge und kennt alle Dinge, die sind oder geschaffen werden können . . . , der, an allen Orten gegenwärtig, leichter imstande ist . . ."

[105] Ibid., 210.

Historiographers completely disregarded Newton's theological writings. Other theologically motivated theories on the problems of biology in the course of the seventeenth and eighteenth century take on the appearance merely of burdensome elements retarding the course of research if one regards them solely in the perspective of modern biological insight. But seen in the historical perspective they represent an admirable effort in the conflict between empirical research and religious interpretation.[107] Two main theories were involved, that of the preformation of the living being in the germ cell and that of the constancy of species. Jan Swammerdam (1637–80), cofounder with Malpighi of microscopic anatomy, attempted by means of insects and parts of their bodies to prove the thesis that all parts are preformed in miniature in the germ cell. Except for Caspar Friedrich Wolff (1733–94), who did not accept "the idea which is inherent in the uterus"[108] and whose epigenetic theory had already been implied by W. Harvey, the preformation theory was generally accepted. It was given a religious foundation by A. von Haller and C. Bonnet, whose Paligenesis was translated by Lavater with the title Philosophische Untersuchung der Beweise für das Christentum (Zurich 1771). The thesis of all succeeding generations also being contained in the germ cell was comprised in Leibniz's theory of the preformed germ cells existing continuously since creation. The idea of extreme constancy of the species because their propagation is "vera continuatio," as formulated by the early Linné in his Philosophia botanica (1751), is based on the theory of the initial perfection of creation. This was accepted in principle by Descartes, although he added the proviso that it would improve the understanding of this matter if "the gradual genesis from the seed were observed."[109] Linné himself modified the theory of the constancy of the species. His contemporary opponent, G.-L. Buffon, called Linné's classification an invented construct and considered "the nature of the species" to be constant, "just as old and constant as nature," even if there are variabilities resulting from climatic effects, but all of them within the "idea of an initial plan." In opposition to the "rash" classification by Linné, which postulates the "omnipotence of nature, capable of extracting" all organized beings from a single one, he emphatically invokes the Book of Genesis.[110] But Buffon, too, arrived at a point where he modified his thesis. Lamarck considered the constancy of the species for the duration of many generations merely a rare special case. If all organisms are products of nature, their gradual subsequent origin begins with the simplest organizations without a goal being involved—this was in contradiction to Leibniz's image of the world. What appears to us as a goal "is in reality only a necessity."[111] An opponent of his was Erasmus Darwin (1731–1802). In his Zoonomia (1794) he combined the change of species with the faith in the creation by the assumption of a "first great cause" which gave to changeability the direction towards perfection. Joseph Gottlieb Koelreuter (1733–1806) represented a caesura inasmuch as he violated the taboo of "unnatural propagation" by attempting crossbreeding.[112]

---

[106] F. Wagner in Saeculum 17 (1966), 202f.

[107] Unreflected naivety, prevalent even at the beginning of our century, leads F. Dannemann (op. cit. III, 3) to maintain that the empirical method alone is able to "distinguish between truth and error," whereas the Church's "religion with its eye toward the hereafter," lacking empirical means, adheres to its antiscientific authority. This remark certainly addresses a historical factor. But the problem is more subtle. E. Ungerer (op. cit. I/1, 6) remarks that while the "opposite world views" in the history of natural sciences appear to us now like "temporary diversions," they should nonetheless be respected because "the 'existential' view" too, has its rights. While O. Zöckler (op. cit. II, 3) is too intent on placating the opponents when he speaks of the "intimate relations between theology and science," W. Philipp (Zeitalter der Aufklärung, p. LIX) uses the example of Newton to demonstrate "that in this case the religious impulse carried the research," a fact which was insufficiently appreciated if one registered with great astonishment no more than "the 'religious returns' among the heroes of progress and Enlightenment." It is perhaps exaggerated, but not unfounded, if he maintains that "the investigation of the intellectual and theological history of the period of Enlightenment is in its infancy" (ibid., p. XI).—See F. Wagner, Saeculum 17 (1966), 193–204.

[108] Theoria generationis (1759), quoted in "Ostwalds Klassikern der exakten Wissenschaften" Nr. 84 (Leipzig 1896), vol. II, 84.

With all the consequences resulting from the total scientism, progressively applied to the world view (including present-day space travel), the issue of the human being was a decisive one. The fact that much existed in the world prior to the arrival of man, as Descartes emphasized,[113] could be reconciled with the report of the creation. But has the world been created with a view towards man? Leibniz gave an affirmative answer to this question, albeit with some provisos. On his "échelle des êtres naturels," C. Bonnet (1745) placed man at the top because his organization was the highest; above him were the angels. But like most of the natural scientists he too underwent a change in his world view, even though he continued to adhere to the "fins" of creation. Still concealed, but nonetheless efficacious, was the documentation of the sort of masochism which prompted man, who was just then reaching for his godlike humanity, to kick himself from the throne of creation by pronouncing an unreflected evolutionism deriving man from the fishes, as proved by the scales on his skin.[114] For Holbach's materialistic anthropology the question of the origin of man was essentially irrelevant; La Mettrie introduced a temporary parting from philosophy by remarking that "an unlimited number of experiences and observations . . . can be found in the annals of medical scientists who were philosophers, but nowhere among the philosophers who were not medical scientists."

---

[109] Principia III, 45.

[110] Œuvres complètes (ed. by Florens, see n. 60) II, 412–16.

[111] Philosophie zoologique, 2 vols. (Paris 1809), Vol. I, 217; Hist. nat. des animaux sans vertèbres (Paris 1815–22) I, 323.—But as Dijkerhous (op. cit., 551) stresses, this "necessity" is not conceived according to the literary model of the Enlightenment as that of a clockwork because the classical natural sciences did not pose the question of beginning and purpose.

[112] J. G. Koelreuter, Vorläufige Nachrichten von einigen das Geschlecht der Pflanzen betreffenden Versuchen . . . (Leipzig 1761–66).

[113] Principia III, 3.

Perhaps the discussion of Kant's critique of divine proof on the part of New Scholasticism permitted the problem "creation and natural law" to gain inordinate prominence in the development of Enlightenment vis-à-vis the other process, which touches more profoundly on the Christian faith because the latter is essentially a historical faith: the "Enlightenment" of the Christian history of salvation. The exact formulation of that which happened there comes from Voltaire. In his polemic against Bossuet he called it ridiculous "to attempt to prove that the God of all nations of the earth and of all creatures of other stars did not occupy himself with the revolutions of Asia and that only with a view upon the small Jewish nation did he send so many conquerers, one after the other, in order to humiliate that nation and then again to lift it up . . . , and that this small stubborn and rebellious horde were the center and the object of world revolutions."[115] This points up two aspects: the denial of the specific history of salvation explodes the medieval congruence of world history and the history of salvation; at the same time it poses the question of a universal view of history to include all cultures. We must hasten to add that the same Voltaire for whom "true history is the history of progress of the human intellect" expressed the profound skepticism of his age towards history: "Les temps passés sont comme s'ils n'avaient jamais eté. Il faut toujours partir du point où l'on est

---

[114] B. de Maillet (1656–1738), French consul general in Egypt in his work: Telliamed, ou entretiens d'un philosophe Indien avec un Missionnaire François, sur la diminution de la mer, la formation de la terre, l'origine de l'homme . . . , 2 vols. (Amsterdam 1748, The Hague 1755; Engl. trans., London 1750); "Telliamed" is an anagram of Maillet.

[115] Essai sur les mœurs . . . , op. cit. (n. 54), XI, 158.

. . ."[116] No matter the point of time in the present, which latter can be celebrated and also scorned: these words by Voltaire mark with brilliant trenchancy what would be called the "loss of history" in the twentieth century, the break with tradition. The words of Pierre Bayle: "A historian as such is like Melchizedek without a father, without a mother, and without parentage,"[117] cited most often as testimony for the approaching objectivity of historicism, should rather be viewed as witness of precisely that break. Origin and future designated by Christian salvation has been lost. But all of these and other similar utterances must be kept in mind in order not to have the relationship between the Enlightenment and history (containing the problem of salvation) blocked by the scolding of it by the Romanticists. The latter were first refuted by W. Dilthey when he said: "Enlightenment . . . has brought about a new perception of history. . . . The view of the solidarity and the progress of the human race in these works spread its light across all peoples and eras."[118] In view of the enduring Eurocentricity of the Enlightenment these words cannot be accepted without reservation. B. Croce's remark, on the other hand, according to which the Asian cultures had served Enlightenment only for the purpose of "expressing its love of tolerance or rather of religious indifference" without their representatives having taken the "historic realities" seriously,[119] requires an added remark: while Orientalistics in the strict sense belongs to a later time, the idea of viewing all nations and ages from the perspective of the human race is indeed a fruit of the Enlightenment. The fact that the problem of the presentation of universal history was one involving the subject matter itself if it was to be more than a mere aggregate was demonstrated with astonishing farsightedness by August Wilhelm Schlözer of Göttingen in his Vorstellung einer Universalhistorie (1772). He obviously refers to Bayle in demanding of a universal history that it should spread "without a fatherland" across all geographic areas. With reference to Voltaire he demands that it not have a predilection for "the people of God, nor Greeks and Romans," but rather be occupied with everything, "be it on the Hwang Ho and Nile, as well as on the Tiber and Vistula." The criterion of selection, he maintains, could not be gleaned from "special histories" but only with a view towards its "influence in the whole or in large parts of the world," thence a world history will order the "special histories" into a "lucid whole." In view of the fact that a universal connection of events appears only with the advent of modernity, "the universal history will connect nations who formerly had no connection or no visible one and will create a system by means of which the multiplicity can be comprehended all at once." But, contrary to J. G. Herder, this is not to be a system of philosophers but of historians. What is to be demonstrated is the way in which man, "this mighty sub-God," recreated the earth into his dwelling, this man who, to be sure, "is kept on a long chain" by the highest of beings.[120] Schlözer did not write this world history, but—except for the rational-theological concept of Vico—he formulated the problems it entailed as hardly another. In this way he was a creature of the Enlightenment, which, after all, only created the designs for a universal history, but no world history deserving that name. Yet the Enlightenment recognized that such a history could no longer be comprehended in a state of identity with the history of salvation, which was Vico's main problem. No doubt this is also reflected in the Enlightenment's doctrine of the state, in the rationalization of international law from Grotius to Thomasius, in the rationalization of administration and politics. In addition, the question should be brought up as to what distinguishes the sacred foundation of the absolutist kingdom from the sacredness of the medieval ruler to the point when finally "the theocratic charge is viewed in a more and more conventional manner."[121]

---

[116] E. Cassirer, op. cit., 224.

[119] Art. "Usson", note F in DHGE.

[118] W. Dilthey, 18. Jahrhundert, 209.

[119] B. Croce, Theorie, 216.

The causes of this profound change in the relationship to history were contained partly in the endogenous process of European Enlightenment and partly in the concrete experience of the world outside of Europe. In the process the two elements intensified each other. The strongest impression was made by the reports of missionaries since the late sixteenth century, upon which the Augustinian Juan Gonzales de Mendoza relied in his description of China. Foremost among them were the reports of Jesuits, those of Matteo Ricci (1552–1610), followed by the Nouveaux mémories sur l'état présent de la Chine (1696) by Louis Le Comte,[122] who reflected on the relativity of traditional customs. They also included the Description . . . de la Chine et de la Tartarie chinoise (1735) by Father Du Halde. The other authentic and fictional travelogues cannot be explicitly mentioned here.[123] The fact that François de la Mothe Le Vayer (1588–1672; tutor of Louis XIV), in his essay De la vertu de payens (1642) was tempted to exclaim "Sancte Confuci, ora pro nobis," not only anticipated Arnold Toynbee's syncretistic litany, but it also demonstrates the profound impression made by this figure who was instrumental in bringing about the China rapture enduring until the end of the eighteenth century, parallel to which criticism of Chinese absolutism also grew stronger and stronger as a vehicle of criticism of European absolutism. The fascinating aspects of China were its sophisticated culture without a religious doctrine of revelation, the moral philosophy on a purely natural, societal fundament, and the high culture based on it. With an astonishing intuition Leibniz in his Novissima Sinica historiam nostri temporis illustratura (1697) called China "orientalis quaedam Europa," endorsing in that way the only high culture which had a global opportunity like that of Europe. In accord with his harmonizing way of thinking he expressed the idea that China send missionaries of natural theology to the corrupt Europeans, while the Christians should dispatch missionaries of revealed theology to China. Following the erroneous opinion that Chinese philosophy originated long before Greek philosophy, he condemned as unwise the prejudice that "nous autres nouveaux vénus après eux, et sortis a peine de la barbarie" condemn Chinese philosophy because it does not correspond with Scholastic concepts.[124] [120] A. W. Schlözer, Vorstellung einer Universalhistorie, 2 parts (Göttingen 1772–73), pt. 1, 28, 20, 34, 32, 10, 38.

---

[121] F. Wagner, Handbuch, 87.

[122] J. Davy, "La condamnation en Sorbonne des 'Nouveaux . . . ,'" RSR 37 (1950), 366–97.

[123] W. Franke, China und das Abendland (Göttingen 1962, -Kleine Vandenhoeck-Reihe 146–48).

Perhaps more profound yet than the ideas of the high culture of China was the effect of the encounter with the primitives of America[125] on European historical consciousness, primarily because the enduring topic of the "noble savage," originating in the sixteenth century, was a means of cultural criticism. Here, too, missionary reports played a large part. In his General History of the Antilles (1654, enlarged in 1667) the Dominican Du Tertre does not tire to contrast the natural morality and simplicity of the people falsely called "savages" with the evils of European civilization. Programatic by virtue of their title are the two volumes Moeurs des Sauvages Amériquains comparées aux Moeurs des Prémiers temps (1724) by the Jesuit Lafiteau, in which the Iroquois and Hurons of Canada are described as witnesses of original manifestation and as counterwitnesses of Bayle's assertion of atheism among the primitives. While the missionary reports only indirectly resulted in criticism of the Christian tradition, it was different in the case of Baron de La Hontan, who had served with the French army in Canada, had gone over to the Indians, and returned in 1715. Protected by the mantle of a fictitious polemic with an Indian, his Travels, Memories and Dialogues (1703) attacked the Christian faith head on by awarding victory to the "natural religion" of the primitive. Enlightenment itself attacked the legend of the "noble savage," Voltaire with sarcastic scorn, Kant based on his principle of societal antagonism. Rousseau's "homme naturel" is not the primitive who is already a representative of a developing society, but the ideal construct of man prior to history. This going beyond all history back to the "beginning," from which vantage point one hoped to arrive at a critical judgment of history as a whole and win the future, was the revolutionary element. Whether it was a case of praising the "noble savage" in his heavenly countryside and his "natural religion," which was superior to revelation, or a case of outdoing each other in imagining the beginnings of mankind in animalistic ways, the origins of the history of mankind became a problem which the Bible no longer appeared to solve.

---

[124] Leibniz to de Remond, ed. by Dutens, vol. IV/1, 171; see A. Hilckmann, "Leibniz und die Pluralität der Kulturen," Saeculum 18 (1967), 317–21; U. Aurich, "China im Spiegel der dt. Lit. des 18. Jh.," Germanist. Studien 169 (1935); A. H. Powbotham, "China in the Esprit des lois," Comparative Literature 2, 4 (1950), 354–359; D. F. Flach, "The Sinophilism of Christian Wolff," Journal of the History of Ideas 14, 4 (1953), 561–74.

[125] G. Chinard, L'Amérique et le rêve exotique dans la littérature française au dix-septième et au dix-huitième siècle (Paris 1913, 1934).

This loss of an answer in terms of salvation history to the question concerning the origin and the future, the latter either pessimistically conceived or optimistically envisioned as progress, constitutes the general historical situation of the Enlightenment. Its attempts to find new answers is only judged fairly if one views this situation not as an unavoidable but as a logical result of Western history and if one reflects upon the reasons why the Church "lost its leadership."

SECTION TWO

Church Life under the Influence of the Established Church and the Enlightenment

CHAPTER 20

Jansenism in Eighteenth-Century France

The Bull Unigenitus

On Friday, 8 September 1713, Clement XI signed the bull Unigenitus Dei Filius, which condemned 101 theses from the Réflexions morales sur le Nouveau Testament by Pasquier Quesnel.[1] This was the first official condemnation of Quesnel, who was generally considered the head of the Jansenist party after the death of Arnauld; the brief of 1708 had not been accepted, although it could have been assumed that this document, requested by the King, would meet with strong sympathy. In spite of the initiatives undertaken by the Holy See, France was not immediately informed of the text of the bull; on 9 September it was simply handed to Cardinal de La Trémoille and not made public until 11 September. Louis XIV received it on 24 September at Fontainebleau and immediately expressed his extreme satisfaction because with it he believed to have found the argument necessary for the liquidation of Jansenism. According to Gallican prescriptive law the bull, in order to become legal, had to be provided with letters patent, accepted by the bishops and registered by the chambers of parliament. The text was therefore carefully designed not to affect the sensitivities of Gallicanism. But difficulties arose from another side. The 101 articles selected for condemnation from a list of 155 were to be arranged in such a way as to furnish a sort of summary of the Jansenist doctrine. But a number of these articles could be authenticated by means of patristic texts; some of them in fact seemed to be nothing but quotes from the most esteemed of the Fathers. Furthermore, several of them on first perusal appeared to express the traditional Augustinian doctrines, especially those of unmerited predestination and efficacious grace. Obviously an interpretive effort was needed to glean from them a heretic meaning. The fact that Quesnel was the author was beyond doubt: the [1] Text: BullRom XXI, 568 ff.

---

Latin translation was a faithful rendition of theses from the Réflexions morales. In contrast to what had happened in Jansen's case, the quaestio facti caused no problems here. But in the eyes of many readers the bull seemed to go beyond Quesnel and actually to condemn Augustinianism, to which many of the theologians and the faithful continued to adhere passionately, considering it one of the cornerstones of Christian thought. For them the bull was totally erroneous regarding the quaestio facti. One should also not disregard the fact that at this time the personal infallibility of the Pope was advocated by hardly any of the French theologians and that there was no agreement that this privilege even extended to so simple a bull. Thus the circumstances were quite different from those at the time of the Jansenist conflict.

Louis XIV at first did not conceive of any difficulties in getting the bull accepted. Accustomed for a long time to absolute subservience, he did not take into account that he had aged, that the end of his reign had become predictable, and his opponents now dared act much more openly. It can be assumed as almost certain that he had assured Clement XI that the bull would be accepted without prior discussion. Initial events seemed to prove him right. By means of a pastoral letter dated 28 September the vacillating archbishop of Paris, Noailles, retracted his approbation of the Réflexions morales, but without expressly recognizing the bull. On 27 and 28 September it was submitted to a group of parliamentarians, and Procurator General Daguesseau determined the central aspect of the debate by declaring that for him the bull was proof of the fallibility of the Popes. The parliamentarians did recognize that the bull contained nothing contradictory to the Gallican Liberties, yet they demanded provincial synods to be convened which were to accept the bull prior to its registration. At this point Louis XIV and Le Tellier, his confessor and advisor, recognized that their plan was more difficult than they had expected. Since the solution involving the provincial synods appeared to be all too difficult, the court decided to have the bull accepted by a special synod which was to be convened as quickly as possible and include all bishops present in Paris and those who could be summoned without delay. A letter of 5 October convened this synod for the sixteenth of the month. On that day twenty-nine prelates gathered at the episcopal see in Paris under the chairmanship of Noailles; during the following few weeks they were joined by another twenty prelates. The motion for an immediate acceptance of the bull was at once rejected in spite of the efforts of a small minority because the bishops were claiming the right of an examination of the papal decision. A commission of six members under the direction of Cardinal de Rohan was entrusted with an examination of the bull. In the process, Msgr. Bissy, bishop of Meaux, quickly assumed a significant position because of the confidence he enjoyed on the part of the King and Le Tellier. Clement XI predictably felt insulted; through his nuncio he complained about the fact that his decision was not to be subjected to judgment by the bishops.

By the court's request one of the first actions of the commission around 4 November was the dissemination of a French translation of the bull.[2] But this proved to be a mistake since it prompted the formation of a spirited opposition movement within the clergy and the public. The deliberations by the committee were protracted. By the end of December it finally became quite clear that a majority of the assembly were resisting the King's pressure, refusing simple acceptance. As a condition for any acceptance at all they demanded explanations which would preserve the Augustinian doctrine. Arguments for and against the bull were circulated; memoranda composed by Quesnel himself were sent to the commission.[3] In the course of January 1714 Clermont-Tonnerre, bishop of Langres, with the collaboration of Rohan suggested acceptance of an annotated version of the bull by means of an episcopal pastoral instruction. At first Noailles seemed to be agreeable, but then his friends moved him to revert to his earlier decision. On 12 January eight bishops, among them Noailles's brother, gathered about him and declared their intention not to take part in the meeting scheduled for the fifteenth. But the King, informed of their decision, ordered them to attend, so that the assembly finally included all forty-nine prelates present in Paris. The sessions were lengthy and stormy. On 1 February Noailles and the eight opponents declared their unwillingness to take any action until the Pope had been requested to furnish explanations which they considered indispensable for the preservation of the inviolate doctrine. The assembly dissolved on 5 February after forty bishops had accepted the constitution and the nine opponents had rejected it. Louis XIV denied them permission to send a collective letter to the Pope. On 8 February Noailles was ordered not to appear at court; the other eight were told by secret letter to return to their dioceses. From this point on the split in the episcopate became common knowledge.

Yet the King considered the acceptance by forty bishops sufficient to have the bull registered in parliament. The letters patent were issued without delay despite the heated opposition of numerous members of parliament who rejected the formulation "we are making it the bishops' duty to accept the bull." But the King insisted on precisely this wording because it was intended to enable him to proceed harshly against the opponents. The registration took place during a session of parliament on 15 February where several members refused to take part; Daguesseau and Pucelle especially were marked in their opposition. The resistance in parliament aggravated the King to such an extent that he burst into veritable fits of anger at Versailles in the presence of Daguesseau and the advocate general, Joly de Fleury.[4] In the meantime the declaration of acceptance had been sent to Rome and Clement XI thanked the forty bishops involved in a brief full of praise. But the Gallican public was shocked by the significance which the brief ascribed to this act of submission to the Holy See. On 28 February Noailles reacted by circulating a pastoral instruction dated 25 February in which he forbade the clergy in his diocese to accept the bull, pending further instruction. Several other opponents followed his example. The King thereupon decided to force the Sorbonne into accepting the bull. It was submitted at a regular meeting on 1 March and accepted over the violent opposition of Dr. Witasse in a vote which took place under very dubious circumstances. A number of professors protested; five of them were exiled by secret letter.[5] Shortly thereafter the pastoral instruction, composed by the assembly and edited by Bissy, the bishop of Meaux, was sent to the entire episcopate. During the following months the bull was published in 112 of the 126 dioceses of France. No doubt this constituted a large majority, but not the unanimity which the King desired.

---

[2] Text: C. du Plessis d'Argentré, Collectio judiciorum de novis erroribus (Paris 1728), 3 vols., 3/II, 462 ff.

[3] List and Analysis: Louail-Cadry I, 80–105.

The most grievous problem was that those bishops who had accepted the bull were in fact not supported by any sizeable part of their clergy. A number of priests refused to read the pastoral instruction of their bishop from the pulpit or did so only with reservations. The same split occurred in the orders and monasteries. The opposing bishops, for their part, issued pastoral letters expressing the desire for a papal explanation of the bull. Yet most of them accepted a temporary condemnation of Quesnel's works in their dioceses with the notable exception of Jean Soanen, bishop of Senez, a former Oratorian who was soon to occupy a central position within the Jansenist resistance. At any rate, the debate was now conducted before the public and prompted the appearance of an incredible number of works of any and all format, ranging from brief brochures to voluminous folios: in 1714 alone the contemporary catalogues listed more than 180 titles. This large volume of writing actually made use of only a very limited number of basic arguments. Those favorable to the bull, a small minority by far, stressed that submission was due the King as well as the Pope and strove to demonstrate the identity of Quesnel's Augustianism with that of Jansenism. This was the basic idea especially of a memoir ("où l'on prouve que les évêques de France doivent accepter la Constitution par voie de soumission et d'obéissance") which was widely circulated in the form of a manuscript. No doubt for good reason it was ascribed to a professor of the Sorbonne, Honoré Tournély (1658–1729), at the time a highly esteemed personality. On the side of the opposition, too, the fight was conducted on two levels. The primary intent was to present the basic orthodoxy of Quesnel, his absolute conformity with the Fathers, and, most of all, with Augustine. The most important of those works is Les Hexaples ou les six colonnes sur la Constitution Unigenitus (Amsterdam 1714), in which the 101 condemned theses are juxtaposed with the Holy Gospel and tradition and are justified by other passages from the works of Quesnel and by additional long treatises. All the great theologians of the Jansenist party contributed to it. The work, originally comprising one quarto, was enlarged with each succeeding edition until in 1721 it reached the very respectable extent of six volumes. In addition to these, the same group of collaborators published a four-volume Histoire du livre des Réflexions morales which, while partisan, was admirably well documented, thus representing an important source. Beyond this, the opponents had to justify their position vis-à-vis a formal decision by the Pope in a question which no longer, as in the case of Jansen, concerned the quaestio facti, but the quaestio juris. Characteristic in this regard was the treatise by the Oratorian Vivien de la Borde (1680–1748) entitled Du témoignage de la vérité dans l'Église (1714). Its author wanted to show that within the Church it is the totality of the faithful and clergy and not only the Holy See and the hierarchy who are the custodians of the truth of revelation. It follows from this that the bishops and the Pope can err; it can even happen that the majority of the bishops can be in error. In such a case, it is the reaction of the Christian conscience on the part of the faithful which is the sign of the truth. The author does not hesitate to push his principles to the very extreme by asking all his readers to consider themselves judges of the doctrine by the same right as the hierarchy. By encouraging them into unfettered examination he manifests the motive force of E. Richer, whose influence on Quesnel we have already pointed out. The Jansenist literature of this period generally manifested an increasing receptivity to Richer's ideas, accentuated by the demands of the lower clergy, who were hard put to bear the absolutism of the episcopate. This literature shows the first designs of political Jansenism and its agreement with Gallicanism.

---

[4] See "Fragment inédit des mémoires du chancelier Daguesseau," ed. by A. Gazier in Bulletin philologique et historique (1918).

[5] See (Witasse), Relation des délibérations de la Faculté de Théologie de Paris au sujet de l'acceptation de la bulle Unigenitus (n. p., 1714).

Louis XIV and the people around him did not grasp the seriousness of the problem. The animosity against the bull was to them merely the sort of resistance which had to be broken. Moreover, a brief by Clement

XI of 8 May 1714 recalled to the King in a veiled fashion the obligations which he had contracted.[6] But to find the right methods was not easy. Since it was evident that the Holy See would never give the explanations demanded by the opposition, Cardinals d'Estrées and de Polignac attempted to act as mediators in order to induce the King to accept the following solution: In a pastoral instruction Noailles was to give his own explanation and under this condition to accept the bull. In the course of the summer of 1714 a hesitant Noailles appeared to tend towards this suggestion, but then Rohan and Bissey managed to interfere in the negotiations and to insert clauses which Noailles held to be unacceptable. The result was a renewed split by the end of October. Irritated by the delays, the Pope at times seems to have mentioned his inclination to let the French bishops lacerate each other without intervening. But at this point the intervention of Fénelon became decisive. The latter's anti-Jansenist sentiments had become stronger than ever, especially since he now saw an opportunity to take revenge on Noailles. For the purpose of publishing the bull Unigenitus in the French part of his diocese of Cambrai he had used—with some modifications—the model of the pastoral instruction stipulated by the February assembly. For the Flemish area he composed a separate pastoral letter, dated 29 June, which represented an emphatic defense of the bull. In the course of the summer he also published his voluminous "Instruction pastorale en forme de dialogue sur le système de Jansénius." As of 1709 the relationship between Fénelon and the Holy See had improved. Fénelon thus was a suitable mediator; it is certain that Le Tellier more than once asked for his advice. After all, it was well known that Fénelon had had a part in the dispatch of the brief of 8 May 1714. In October 1714, after the negotiations had failed to produce an agreement, Louis XIV decided to proceed against Noailles although this was difficult to do without arousing the opposition of his colleagues in the episcopate. Around 25 October a system advocated by Fénelon was adopted: the convocation of a national council which was to condemn the opponents and pronounce their removal from office. This plan was not without a certain amount of danger. On the one hand, even the weight of the King's authority could not ensure the assembled bishops to be prepared to accept such injurious measures against their colleagues in the episcopate. On the other hand, it was certain that Rome—distrustful of national councils, especially in the Gallican Church—would not be particularly eager to agree to the scheme. But Fénelon was not to be deterred by these obstacles. He was more than ever convinced that forcible measures were needed, because any attempts at conciliation with Noailles would be to the advantage of Jansenism. Also he was now mentioned as possible president of the proposed future council, which would give him far-reaching possibilities to proceed against Noailles and the other opponents. In addition, the esteem that he was held in by the Pope and the Curia had reached its high point; shortly before Christmas 1714 Clement XI openly alluded to his intention to appoint Fénelon to the cardinalate in the very near future. At this point Fénelon decided to make use of his influence by sending the Holy See two memoranda concerning the necessity for a national council and for promulgating the bull in every single church.[7] At the same time Louis XIV dispatched his minister of state, Amelot, to Rome, where he was to negotiate this matter. The King had a great deal of confidence that Fénelon's intervention in this undertaking would be crowned by success. The archbishop of Cambrai for his part was quite ready to do everything in his power when his untimely death on 6 January 1715 robbed both the Pope and the King of an irreplaceable mediator.

---

[6] Text: Louail-Cadry I, 238.

Given this situation, Amelot's negotiations in Rome took a difficult turn. Renewed attempts in Paris to reach a compromise failed and Bissy, the bishop of Meaux, was appointed cardinal at the request of the King (June 1715). In July 1715 the King announced that the council would be convened even without the agreement of the Pope. Parliament stayed in the background; several memoranda favoring the opponents mentioned the possibility of an appeal to the general council, an idea which soon began to spread. Shortly thereafter the King made known his intention to have parliament pass a formal resolution excluding the opponents from the future council. But this idea encountered resistance on the part of several parliamentary councilors, especially Procurator General Daguesseau and the advocate general Joly de Fleury. In order to have his way the King prepared for a formal trial proceeding in parliament. But neither in Rome nor in Paris had any final decision been made when Louis XIV died on 1 September 1715. The idea of a national council died with him.

In his memoranda to Rome and his correspondence with Le Tellier Fénelon again and again had stressed the fact that for the most part public opinion, in spite of an outward show of submission prompted by fear of the authorities, in reality adhered to Jansenism. Events following the death of Louis XIV proved him right. The regent, Philipp of Orleans, who was almost wholly without faith in religious matters, initially went against the policies of the deceased King and deliberately favored the Jansenists, especially since there were many personal enemies of his among those who had accepted the bull. After he had the testament of Louis XIV (which only granted him the chairmanship of the council of regents) declared invalid and had himself appointed sole regent of the realm, he rewarded parliament by creating six councils charged with conducting public affairs in which the parliamentary councilors were to occupy an important position. One of them was the Conseil de Conscience, whose function had been severely limited under Louis XIV. Now it was enlarged and Noailles was made its president. The archbishop of Paris once again was an important personality at court; Daguesseau and Pucelle, well known for their opposition to the bull, were also invited to court, whereas Bissy and Rohan were excluded. Le Tellier was exiled, first to Amiens and then to La Flèche. At the beginning of October Clement XI expressed his dissatisfaction in a brief. The majority of persons exiled or jailed because of their advocacy of Jansenism regained their freedom. For a while recalling Quesnel to France was even contemplated, but in a communication by Pouillon several of his friends advised him "not to acceed to the urgings to relinquish a state which derived to his glory."[8] The old man elected to remain in his seclusion. In his first appointments to bishoprics the regent favored persons who openly showed their Jansenist sympathies, as in the case of Bossuet's nephew, Jacques Bénigne, who was appointed bishop of Troyes, a person of more than dubious morality who used the fame of his uncle as a cover. Clement XI refused his bulls of investiture for the regent's candidates. But an Assembly of the Clergy, convened on 25 May 1715, had not been interrupted by the death of Louis XIV. One of its most marked decisions was the condemnation of the Hexaples (15 October) and of the Témoignage de la vérité (29 October), which permits the conclusion that these two works were considered the two most important ones in opposition to the bull. The regent promptly forbade publication of these censures.[9] But this did not represent any progress in the issue of the original condemnation either.

---

[7] Fénelon, Œuvres complètes, 10 vols. (Paris 1851), VIII, 269–81.

During this time, public opinion considered the pro-Jansenist attitude of the regent a veritable liberation. Numerous people and bodies of people now retracted their original acceptance of the bull, pointing to the pressure to which they had submitted. This was the case with the Sorbonne when it elected a syndic in the person of Ravechet, who openly favored Jansenism. The result was a number of stormy sessions, characterized by acrimonious disputes with the acceptants among the bishops. Yet the Sorbonne did not expressly retract its acceptance of the bull. But other theological faculties did so, among them those of Nantes (2 January 1716) and Rheims (1 July 1716). Yet the problem of the opposing bishops was not removed. Initially the regent hoped to solve the issue in a way to which Noailles had agreed in principle: an acceptance of the bull in connection with a pastoral instruction which was to give a more explicit explanation compared to that of 1714. In December 1715, eighteen bishops from among the acceptants signed a letter to the regent asking him to request explanations from the Pope. A second, more satisfactory letter increased the number of signatories to thirty-two.[10] The rest of the original acceptants adhered to their decision in spite of the regent's requests, to whom it would have been useful to have a majority of the episcopate demand an explanation. Shortly thereafter Clement XI let it be known that he would not give any explanation until the bull was accepted unanimously; in May 1716 he sent a brief with threats against the opponents, which was rejected by the regent. At this point a different plan was formulated. Since the fall of 1715 the opposing bishops, with the concurrence of the regent, had gathered around Noailles in Paris. They had agreed to compose a "corps de difficultés" containing their objections to the bull, and a "corps de doctrine" which was to present their opinions regarding the controversial points. Yet agreement on this was also not easily achieved; from this point on four of the bishops seceded from the group as protagonists of extreme resistance against a bull which they considered irreparably bad. These were Jean Soanen, bishop of Senez; Colbert de Croissy, bishop of Montpellier; Pierre de la Broue, bishop of Mirepoix; and Pierre de Langle, bishop of Boulogne. The documents were finally published in May 1716, albeit not without difficulties. What remained was to induce Rome to accept this solution. The regent decided to entrust the negotiations to a man whom he trusted completely, the Abbé Chevalier, vicar general of Bissy, who tended somewhat towards Jansenism. The Abbé's sympathies became obvious when he chose de la Borde, author of the Témoignage de la vérité, as his traveling companion. This could not have a convincing effect on Clement XI. Provided with instructions by Noailles, Chevalier set out on 14 May.

---

[8] J. Tans, Quesnel, 491.

[9] Text: Louail-Cadry I, 458.

The negotiations were difficult from the start. Chevalier was not received by the Pope; not until 25 June did he even receive an audience with Secretary of State Paolucci, which was hardly encouraging. On 26 June Clement XI convened a general congregation of cardinals present in Rome, which was extremely unusual. In a speech lasting two and a half hours he presented the background of the bull and announced the dispatch of two briefs which were to demand of Noailles and the opponents to accept the bull within two months. Then he asked the cardinals how they would proceed against the opponents. The Pope did agree to have Chevalier meet separately with the cardinals and since he did not want to receive him in audience he appointed two cardinals who were to hear Chevalier and give him an account. The letters of Chevalier show that he was laboring under some illusions concerning his talks with the cardinals. These submitted their opinions around the middle of July; on the whole they were strongly against Noailles and the opponents. The more moderate cardinals were satisfied to request one more attempt at reconciliation before proceeding harshly. Chevalier meanwhile continued his negotiations until the middle of August. At that point Clement XI told the representative of France, Cardinal de la Trémoille, that he did not intend to give any explanations of the bull Unigenitus because he assumed that they would not be any better received than the bull itself. Although Chevalier remained in Rome until the fall of 1717, his mission had actually failed. Rome and Paris agreed on another negotiator, the Jesuit Pierre-François Lafitau, whose service was rewarded with the bishopric of Sisteron in 1719. At the time he was living in Rome and in September 1716 he spent about three weeks in Paris, without an official title. He, too, was to pass on the "corps de difficultés" and the "corps de doctrine" compiled by Noailles and the other opponents and to effect their acceptance. These documents were dispatched to him shortly after his departure for Rome. But Lafitau could achieve no more than Chevalier. He was not received by Clement XI either. The latter, in fact, hardened his position. On 6 December 1716 a courier extraordinary arrived in Paris carrying a letter from the Sacred College to Noailles exhorting him to accept the constitution. He also delivered a papal brief for the regent demanding that he proceed against Jansenism and a brief for the acceptants encouraging them to reject any and all compromises and to announce measures against the opponents, and, lastly, a brief for the Sorbonne canceling its privileges.[11]

---

[10] Ibid., 490–97.

The regent and his advisers were disappointed and confused by this renewed opening of hostilities. Noailles, on the other hand, sensing support from the court, had more and more stiffened his resistance. On 17 August 1716 he had announced to the Jesuits of his diocese that he would not renew their right of sermon and confession, with the exception of the five Jesuits active at the court. But before his authority had run out Cardinal de Rohan, grand almoner of France, had appointed a Jesuit, de la Ferté, Advent preacher at the court. Consequently the Jesuit assumed himself to be fully authorized to begin his sermons on All Saints' Day, according to custom and with the concurrence of the regent. But Noailles, incited by part of his clergy, obtained a revision from the regent and then revoked all privileges from the Jesuits. There was growing agitation on the part of the lower clergy manifesting violent opposition to the bull. Noailles felt overwhelmed by the letters and expressions of solidarity heaped upon him by his priests.[12] Publications for and against the bull continued to appear with great rapidity in 1716, although not quite as numerous as in the preceeding year. Those concerned with the disputes of the Sorbonne constituted a large number, but all of them evidenced the rise of Richer's ideas. In such an atmosphere it is understandable that new papal statements met with a negative reception. The regent refused to accept the brief addressed to him and forbade the letter by the cardinals to Noailles. On 9 December in a letter written by Maupéou, representative general of the clergy, he forbade the acceptants among the bishops to accept the brief addressed to them. Finally, a decree of parliament dated 16 December, followed by numerous provincial parliaments, prohibited the acceptance of the brief against the Sorbonne. Going back to Gallican positions once again made it possible to completely neutralize the Roman intervention.

---

[11] Text of the briefs: Suite de la relation des délibérations de la Faculté de Théologie de Paris, 3 vols. (n.p., 1718), II, 1–39.

Although an Assembly of the Clergy was planned for 20 November, the regent preferred to cancel it in view of the unsettled circumstances and instead to permit only partial conferences conducted on a private level. These again dealt with the issue of a "corps de doctrine" as a precondition for accepting the bull. In spite of conciliatory efforts by the regent the positions of the opposing parties proved to be farther apart than ever, especially since Colbert and Soanen heatedly announced that they were prepared to resist to the utmost. At this time the Sorbonne managed to clarify its position in an extraordinary assembly on 12 January 1717. It declared the bull to be unacceptable and assured Noailles of its alliance. All the while the negotiations were continued. On 1 February 1717 Daguesseau became chancellor and minister of justice. His great authority in this area enabled him to support his regent's efforts at conciliation. Noailles did not cease to vacillate, creating ever more difficulties. In spite of a warning from the papal state secretary Paolucci, Rohan and the other acceptants appeared to be ready for some concessions, which met with some positive inclination by the regent. A final meeting on 26 February 1717, while not reaching a definitive goal, did show some progress. For a while it appeared as if agreement was near, but then one incident was to put everything in doubt again.

---

[12] Texts of the letters to Noailles, collected: Témoignage de MM. les curés de Paris, (n. p., 1717) and: Cri de la foi I.

The Appellation

With the convening of new conferences in November 1716 an extremist group within the ranks of the opponents gradually had a significant impact. The initiative leading to its formation appears to have come from Jean Soanen (1646–1740). An Oratorian from the Auvergne, he had started his brilliant career as court chaplain. Jansenist correspondents accused him of being ambitious and having obtained his modest bishopric of Senez (1695) merely by virtue of his complacency towards de la Chaise. He was pious and charitable and an excellent bishop[13] who did not enter the controversy until the bull Unigenitus was published. A solid theologian and confirmed Augustinian, he expressed his opposition from the start. Gradually he became convinced that any attempt at reaching a compromise was dangerous. The death of Louis XIV increased his hopes and prompted him to spend some time in Paris in order to follow further developments there. Noailles's indecisiveness began to irritate him to the point of creating friction between them. In the fall of 1714 he appears to have decided upon a method designed to exclude any possibility of compromise: an appeal to a general council. In his radical opposition to the bull he had found support in the person of Colbert de Croissy (1667–1738), son of the minister to Louis XIV, bishop of Montpellier since 1696. He was a member of a powerful and wealthy family, no doubt accustomed a little too much to pomp and luxury. Yet he was an upright bishop who did his duty faithfully. Early on he had had some problems with the Jesuits in his diocese, but had not involved himself officially in the Jansenist issue until he started to express his opinions in 1713. At that point he did not hesitate to join Soanen in the latter's emphatic opposition.[14]

In November 1716 Soanen and Colbert decided to appeal to the general council. We do not know just what prevented them from going ahead with it at that time. In the course of the following weeks Soanen and Colbert gained two more allies for their appeal: Pierre de Langle (1644–1724), bishop of Boulogne, and Pierre de la Broue (1643–1720), bishop of Mirepoix, both of them virtuous and highly respected prelates. But in this issue they only played a subordinate role. Consultations between these four bishops were kept secret and nothing seems to have been divulged to the general public. It is certain that Noailles was informed and that he encouraged the appellants, but was unwilling to compromise himself. After several corrections demanded by La Broue the appellation document written by the theologian Boursier was signed in the presence of a notary from Paris, Chouvenot, on 1 March 1717.[15] Most of the text had been taken from the "corps de difficultés" of the opponents. What was left was to negotiate the canonical significance of the appellation. The four bishops considered the theological faculty to be the most suitable organ for the implementation of their plan. Ravechet, the syndic, had been won over and the faculty had been alienated by a very recent lettre de cachet from the regent which demanded that the act of 12 January containing a pronouncement against the bull be eliminated from the register. Ravechet was taken into confidence, but the vast majority of the public was totally surprised on the morning of 5 March 1717 when the four bishops requested to be admitted to the extraordinary session of the faculty about to begin. La Broue read a preamble and Soanen read the appeals document, which was then deposited in the chancellery of the Sorbonne. Of the 110 professors present 97 immediately voted for the appeal. At the beginning of the session one of the professors left in order to notify Rohan and the regent, who immediately had Noailles informed of the proceedings. On the very next day the archbishop expressed his sympathy for the four bishops by having their appeal registered with his office. After this the matter entered a new phase.

---

[13] See M. Laurent, "Jean Soanen évêque de Senez devant le concile d'Embrun," Revue d'Auvergne (Clermont 1968), 82, n. 2, 95–112.

[14] See V. Durand, Le jansénisme au XVIII^e siècle et Joachim Colbert (Toulouse 1907).

One of the initial effects of the appeal consisted of the regent switching to the anti-Jansenist side. On the evening of 5 March a council of which Rohan and Bissy were members decided to banish the four bishops to their dioceses, to exile the syndic Ravechet by means of a lettre de cachet, and to throw the notary Chouvenot into the Bastille, where he remained from 15 to 24 March. Ravechet died on his way into exile in Rennes on 24 April 1717 and was celebrated as a martyr by the entire party. But it was too late to stop the movement. Almost two years of policies sympathetic to Jansenism were bearing fruit and the regent was soon to become aware of it. News of the appeal spread rapidly, causing enthusiasm among many of the clergy. It is very difficult to get a precise idea of the situation because the contemporary literature did not give an objective account of it and we have no accurate statistics. It appears that those priests who favored the appeal were especially numerous around the universities and among the urban clergy. Montempuys, the rector of the University of Paris, on 6 March started to get other universities to join in the appeal, but the regent forebade discussion of the matter, though without success. Shortly thereafter the theological faculties of Nantes and Rheims joined the appeal. After their return to their dioceses the four bishops immediately published pastoral letters containing their appeal. In the course of a few months fourteen colleagues in the episcopate joined them. On 3 April 1717 Noailles also signed the appeals document, but to the chagrin of the other appellants kept the fact secret for a long time. In fact, several among them did not divulge their position until much later. This was especially true for the bishop of Auzerre, Charles de Caylus, who had signed his appellation on 14 May 1717, but did not make it known until 4 October 1718 in a pastoral letter. Later he nonetheless assumed a very important position within the Jansenist party. Among the lower clergy, too, the appellations increased. It is impossible to make a listing; given the present state of documentation even a numerical estimate will perforce be inaccurate since some kept their appellation secret, others retracted it very quickly. On the other hand, the united support of numerous parishes must be qualified by the fact that genuine unanimity was never really achieved. Based on the very well-documented collective work edited by the Jansenist Nivelle, La Constitution Unigenitus déférrée à l'Église universelle (Cologne 1757), it can be assumed that the number of appellants ranged between 3,000 and 4,000, while the total number of clerics in France was approximately 100,000. But these numbers again have to be interpreted by taking into account that, on the one hand, there were appellations based on mere favor which—if one is to believe the acceptants—were even bought with money; on the other hand, many of the nonappellants accepted the bull against their will because they did not dare expose themselves; yet in their hearts they were on the side of the appellants. In addition, there were appellants among the nuns and laymen. On the whole the number of appellants formed a relatively small minority, but one that was very active and enjoyed the sympathy of a broad segment of the public. The action by the four bishops was highly effective since it placed the problem on safe ground, given the prevailing Gallican atmosphere.

---

[15] Text: Louail-Cadry I, 764–70.

It could, in fact, invoke a well-known precedent: the appellation by Louis XIV to the council against Innocent XI (January 1688), which has already been mentioned. This appellation, while not having the desired results, had not been condemned by the Pope. On 22 June 1716 in a speech to a general assembly of the university its rector, Montempuys, had recalled that in 1688 Procurator General Harlay had requested only one second to the appellation, namely that of the university.[16] Thus the precedent had not been forgotten. Parliament on the whole considered the appellation canonically unimpeachable. The regent was of like opinion and in an audience of 10 March 1717 he told Noailles and the opponents so. His only complaint was that the appellation had been undertaken without his knowledge. Several of the acceptants among the bishops confirmed the canonicity of the appellation. Memoranda on this issue were circulated in the form of brochures. The acceptants on their part merely countered that the appellation was null and void and could not be supported because the bull had already been implicitly accepted by the whole Church. Thus the Gallican principles which had formed the clergy for more than thirty years gave the appellants a solid base for their undertaking. Under these conditions the publication of the appeal changed the situation and led the whole issue into a new phase. It is now understandable why there were seven bishops among the appellants who had initially accepted the bull; this was the case, among others, with Caylus, who had published the bull in his diocese on 28 March 1714. Furthermore, it should be stated that all the appellant bishops had been appointed by Louis XIV, who was intent on keeping clerics sympathetic to Jansenism out of the episcopate; further, that all of them had signed the formulary against Jansenism, that almost all of them continued to demand its signing in their dioceses, and that some of them even asserted that Quesnel's book renewed the errors of Jansenism: this fact reveals the extent to which the issue of Jansenism was perceived as being independent from the issue of the bull Unigenitus. Lastly, the appellation in its broad spectrum reveals the influence of Richerism, which had gradually permeated the lower clergy and even the faithful, who now frequently considered themselves judges of the doctrine. In this regard a reading of the appeals document is important. Here, too, the events of 1688 represent a precedent because Louis XIV had ordered Harlay to obtain the consent of the Parisian clergy. In the ensuing period of time the theoretical positions had been formulated. Publications openly inspired by Richer were now multiplying. We have already mentioned the Témoignage de la vérité by de la Borde. In June 1716 Nicolas Le Gros, canon of Rheims, who had been exiled because of his Jansenist position and returned after the death of Louis XIV, published his treatise Du renversement des libertés de l'Église gallicane (1716), which was an immediate success. This work is more moderate than that of de la Borde. But it is based on the principle that within the Church the authority of the body of the faithful is fitting and the members of the hierarchy are only its delegates. He designates the priests as successors of the seventy-two disciples of Christ and demands a special position for them. Lastly, he concedes validity to the judgment of the bishops only inasmuch as it expresses that of their flock and especially that of the body of the priests. Thus a sort of church democracy began to take shape which was destined to develop further throughout the century. As a consequence the Church of France was placed in a state of war, since all its dioceses were divided into appellants and acceptants and the bishop's authority was generally disregarded by the followers of the party opposed to him. For many years French Catholicism was split because of a number of conflicts which had a debilitating effect, although this was not being admitted. The regent recognized it, however, and tried to prevent appellation by priests and laymen, but it was too late for such a reaction.

---

[16] Ibid., 726.

Pursuant to the desire of the four bishops, the appellation temporarily blocked all attempts at conciliation. The disquiet it had caused in Rome was partly ameliorated by the news that the regent had joined the party of the anti-Jansenists. Yet Rome and Paris alike were unclear about the method to be applied now. On 21 April Clement XI sent a personal letter dated 25 March to Noailles, couched in paternal and imploring terms.[17] It had no effect on Noailles, who—as was known—had signed the appellation on 3 April and confidentially began to talk about it now. By the end of May even Rome was informed. The regent sent the Duke de La Feuillade to Rome in order to renew negotiations. To the bishops he sent an encyclical prohibiting appellations "without need and as long as the negotiations are under way." Around 6 July Noailles answered the letters by the cardinals and the Pope, warning against forcible and severe methods which could not but embitter the people and lead to unrest. These letters reached Rome on 23 July, spreading great disappointment. At about this time the regent made desperate attempts to regain control of the situation. On 7 October he issued a royal decree ordering both parties to be silent on the matter. In fact, he distrusted all parties involved, including Clement XI, who found out about this on 19 October and was injured by the fact that both appellants and acceptants were put on the same level with each other. Next, the regent had an outline of the doctrine, written by one of the acceptants, sent to the Pope in an attempt to obtain approbation by the Holy See and in the hope that this would induce Noailles and his party to accept the bull. But on 9 November Clement sent a severely negative answer. Meantime, in order to again disrupt the search for a compromise, the appellants had printed and circulated Noailles's appeals document, a copy of which had probably been found among the papers of the deceased bishop of Lectoure.Noailles, although angered, emphatically refused to deny his text, ignoring pressure by the court. At the beginning of December the regent pushed through parliament several decrees which suppressed Noailles's appellation and condemned a publication running counter to the royal decree. Some success in Rome gave rise to the hope that an agreement could yet be reached. But again the regent encountered an unbending attitude on the part of the appellants and unwillingness by Nuncio Bentivoglio, who was hostile to any compromise. Once more the regent tried to demonstrate his preparedness to Rome by dismissing Daguesseau and replacing him as chancellor with Voyer d'Argenson, lieutenant general of the police, who was known as a friend of the Jesuits. But even this had no positive results: France ignored the order of silence and Rome initiated forcible measures.

---

[17] Text: Dorsanne I, 337.

On 8 March an inquisition decree surfaced condemning the appellation of the four bishops and that of Noailles. Parliament countered by condemning that decree on 28 March. Now the regent tried another way of putting pressure on the Holy See. Since the Pope had stubbornly refused to issue bulls of investiture for the bishops appointed by the regent, the latter convened a commission at the beginning of May which was to find a solution to this problem. Saint Simon, one of the members, solicited pertinent memoranda from experts, among them several of the great Jansenist theologians: Du Guet, Petitpied, Boursier, and Le Gros.[18] The majority of answers demanded the right of the chapters in the election of their bishop, some with the proviso that it had to take place upon nomination by the King. The person elected could thus be consecrated independently of any bull from Rome. These recommendations were favorably received in France and discussed publicly. The Holy See was informed about this by the nuncio. In the regency council mention was made of appealing to a general council the name of the French nation. In an attempt to intimidate Rome the regent mentioned in a letter the possibility of return to the old customs. This time Clement XI gave way; on 15 May 1718 the bulls of investiture arrived in Paris. But the regent seems not to have intended to reintroduce the right to appoint bishops, he merely wanted to scare Rome. But the idea went its own way and was soon to be realized in the Dutch Church. The dispatch of the bulls did not defuse the tense situation in Rome. Clement XI appeared less and less inclined towards a compromise. Correspondence from Rome in the summer of 1718 more and more frequently alluded to new forcible measures. In Paris one bishops' conference was followed by another, all of them gradually running out. But in them a new personality played an ever more significant part. This was Jean-Joseph Languet de Gergy (1677–1753), appointed to the bishopric of Soissons in 1715. He was consecrated by virtue of the recently arrived bull and was to become archbishop of Sens in 1730. Because the situation continued to stagnate, Clement XI intended to decide the matter by publishing the Pastoralis officii (8 September 1718), a letter addressed to all the faithful which excommunicated all those who did not accept the bull, yet did not make mention of the appellation. Predictably, the opponents hardened their position. On 24 November Noailles officially published his appeals document,[19] causing another wave of approval. On 3 October he issued another pastoral letter protesting the Pastoralis officii. This met with the approval of the majority of his clergy, while within the dioceses tension and unrest were on the increase. Also on 3 October the parliament in Paris issued an appellation decree against the Pastoralis officii; it was immediately followed by the provincial parliaments. In practical terms this deprived the excommunication of any actual effect and consequence.

---

[18] Their views are contained in L. T. Hérissant, Avis aux princes catholiques, 2 vols. (n. p., 1768).

In the meantime a new personality had come upon the scene on the side of the regent: Abbé Dubois, who fancied himself the Richelieu of his time. The acceptants held a large majority, so he thought it best to bet on them and to influence the regent accordingly. On the other hand he was hoping to be rewarded with a cardinalate, for which Rome made him wait until the following pontificate in July 1721. But Dubois completely failed to master the events. In the course of the summer of 1718 Bissy and the bishop of Nîmes Laparisière, an acceptant, published a collection of pastoral letters by French and foreign bishops favoring the constitution under the title Témoignage de l'Église universelle en faveur de la bulle Unigenitus. On 14 January 1719 Noailles countered with a pastoral instruction couched in extremely sharp terms. In Rome, as in Paris, it was recognized more and more that Noailles would never accept the bull. In the course of 1718 Languet de Gergy had become prominent by the publication of his blunt Avertissements de Msgr. l'évêque de Soissons à ceux qui dans son diocèse se sont déclarés appelants de la Constitution, which had brought him heated answers by Guillaume Dagoumer and Nicolas Petitpied. De Gergy was also the one who used a pastoral letter of 2 February and another one of 25 March 1719 to reply both to Noailles and to a pastoral letter by the appellant bishop of Angoulême. Bissy also answered by a pastoral letter of 22 February. In his own pastoral instruction of January, Noailles seemed to make some concessions that were disquieting to the rest of the appellants. The latter clarified the matter on 25 May 1719 in a pastoral letter by Langle, who published the appellation of the four bishops against the Pastoralis officii. To complicate matters further, the accepting archbishop of Rheims, the hotheaded Mailly, published a letter dated 14 May to all cardinals, archbishops, and bishops energetically advocating the cause of the bull. This letter was rejected by parliament on 22 June. Shortly before that, on 5 June, another royal decree tried to impose quiet on both parties for one year. Neither in Rome nor in Paris was it received any better than the one before and it had just as little effect. It could also not prevent parliament from proceeding severely against de Gergy in the following few weeks.

---

[19] Text: Louail-Cadry II, 149–56.

While he engaged in intrigues in Rome by means of Lafitau and at the same time tried to secure for himself the archbishopric of Cambrai and the cardinalate, Dubois was also concerned with achieving religious peace. From his retreat in Fresnes, Daguesseau, still out of favor, took an active part in the religious issues but moderated his position. In three memoranda he authored in December 1719 and January 1720 he considered the appellation a failure because the number of appellants was too small. The memoranda indicated that he had returned to the idea of an interpretation of the bull by a "corps de doctrine." A new text, written under the watchful eye of the regent by one of Noailles's theologians, the Abbé Couet, was submitted to Noailles, Rohan, and Bissy in January 1719. The latter two had demanded of Noailles that he retract his appellation and his instruction of January 1719; the prelate seemed ready to give in. In March thirty-eight bishops present in Paris were prepared to sign the "Explications sur la bulle Unigenitus." Mailly, too, accepted the signing after de Gergy had intervened with him. Emissaries of the regent were to obtain the signature of the other bishops in the provinces. By 10 May 1720 a total of ninety-four prelates had approved the agreement. Approval by Noailles, which would have brought around a large number of the opponents, was counted upon. But in the meantime the safeguards to ensure secrecy had been broken and the public had been informed. Among the ranks of the priests and the laity violent opposition was aroused against any compromise at all and the four bishops, joined by Caylus, sharply criticized Noailles's "apostacy." The Pope, on the other hand, appeared little inclined towards a compromise which he viewed as an impairment of the rights of the Holy See. A letter of Noailles to his priests explaining his actions was condemned sharply in his diocese. In a parallel action many of the acceptants accused Languet de Gergy of having weakened. In addition to that, parliament, which had been exiled to Pontoise as a result of the Law affair, refused to register a royal declaration of 4 August sanctioning the agreement, in spite of the fact that Daguesseau, who had returned to the chancellorship a few weeks prior and had changed his position, exerted all his influence. Having delayed his acceptance all summer long, Noailles finally gave in and published a pastoral letter on 19 November containing his acceptance coupled with explanations. At that time parliament also joined a compromise and was recalled to Paris on 16 December. Then the Sorbonne submitted. Dubois and the regent thought they had won the day. La Broue had died on 20 September, but not before he and the three other bishops had signed a reappeal document on 12 September, authored by Laurent Boursier, which sharply admonished Noailles.[20] It was published by the three other bishops almost simultaneously with Noailles's pastoral letter and his acceptance. A decree by the regency council of 31 December prohibited the reappeal document. In the meantime a reappeal document for the lower clergy dated 19 November had appeared.[21] It contained the signatures of a large number of appellants, about fifteen hundred. But this number was far below that of the appellations of 1717, so the court was not visibly moved by it. Shortly thereafter a handwritten list of appellants was circulated and printed in 1721; this put the reappellants within the grasp of the authorities. At the head of this list was Abbé Jacques de Bidal d'Asfeld, a friend of Du Guet, who had to appear before a police lieutenant and was exiled to Villeneuve-le-Roi. At that point the three reappealing bishops wrote to the regent explaining their position. None of their colleagues from the episcopate followed suit. Languet redoubled his polemics. The death of Clement XI caused a moment's confusion, but soon it was clear that his successor, Innocent XIII, would continue somewhat the same policy. The confused polemics which filled his brief pontificate of three years hardly changed the elements of the problem. Initiated on 9 June by a letter to the Pope, signed by seven appealing bishops,[22] these conflicts provoked a large number of publications in which Languet de Gergy was in the forefront of the acceptants, while Colbert and Caylus played an ever more significant role on the side of the appellants. Bissy joined the fray with a sharply worded lengthy pastoral instruction of 17 June 1722 which provoked an answer in much the same tone by the six appellants in February 1723.[23] Dubois and the regent tried to control the situation by reintroducing the signing of the formulary against Jansenism as a condition for obtaining benefices and university titles; this custom had been discontinued in many faculties and dioceses. The result of this measure, implemented on 11 July 1722, was renewed unrest, especially in the university circles. The majority of the appellants obeyed because for them the issue of Jansenism was quite apart from that of the bull. But Colbert signaled the connection by prescribing the signing in conjunction with the distinction between the quaesto juris and the quaesto facti and the words of Clement IX concerning the keeping of the peace. In doing so he became involved in a long and embarrassing affair which we shall discuss later. The year 1723 was characterized by profound changes among the main actors on the stage. On 15 February Louis XV was declared of age; Dubois died on 10 August; the regent on 2 December. A little later, on 7 March 1724,

---

[20] Text: Colbert, Œuvres I, 265.

[21] Text: Louail-Cadry II, 518.

[22] Text: Colbert I, 303–54.

[23] Ibid., I 381–580.

Innocent XIII also died. At the same time a new protagonist appeared in the person of André de Fleury, bishop of Fréjus and former teacher of the King, who had enjoyed the latter's complete trust.

The new Pope, Benedict XIII, a former Dominican friar, was very open to the doctrines of Augustine and Thomas, but could not simply cancel the problem caused by the bull. But he issued the brief Demissa preces of 6 November 1724,[24] addressed to the Dominican general, which expressed his great sympathy for Augustinianism and Thomism and gave renewed hope to the opponents of the bull. But Noailles, in spite of the Pope's conciliatory stance, persistently refused to retract his appellation. At the beginning of January, following a very disappointing series of correspondence with Rome, he sent to Rome a collection of twelve doctrinal articles, characterized strongly by Augustinianism (which were probably edited by Boursier), and asked for their approbation by the Holy See.[25] Some of these articles openly seemed to favor Jansenism and the Roman authorities were scarcely inclined to accept them. In France, Rohan and Bissy, supported by Fleury, took a position against negotiations which they thought could cause acceptants to leave the fold, and the bishops of Saintes and Marseille condemned the twelve articles by pastoral letter. By an encyclical dated 20 June 1725 Colbert finally let the opponents know that in his opinion the twelve articles would not make the bull any more acceptable. Under these conditions there was no use in continuing the negotiations. A short time later, in June 1726, the duke of Bourbon fell from favor and was replaced by Fleury, who occupied this post until 1743. Smooth and agile, but of steely persistence, Fleury was firmly resolved to weaken the Jansenist opposition. With support by the moderates and those inclined towards reconciliation he did not hesitate to proceed severely against the extremists; more and more he resorted to the weapon of the lettre de cachet, a policy that proved effective in the end.

First he had to make an example of one of the appellant bishops in order to frighten the others. The most rebellious among them was without a doubt Colbert, who strove for the signing of the formulary after 1722. On 21 September 1724, a decree of the council of state had even deprived him of his temporal revenues. But Colbert had strong support. The aged Du Guet had a letter printed which he had written to the bishop on 25 July 1724 and which strongly influenced public opinion. On 13 February 1725, by the way, this letter and the publications of Colbert regarding the same topic were condemned by the Holy Office. The Assembly of the Clergy of 1726 demanded the convening of provincial councils to counteract the unrest and, in this regard, joined forces with Fleury. But the latter did not dare attack Colbert, who was protected by the power of his family. On the other hand, the utterly defenseless Soanen, bishop of the tiny diocese of Senez, was a suitable victim. Soanen himself furnished the weapons for his adversaries. Towards the end of 1727—believing that he had only a short while to live—he made public a pastoral instruction dated 28 August 1726 which was to represent his spiritual testament. In it he emphatically took the part of Colbert and, unraveling the whole background of the bull, he violently attacked its acceptants. This seemed a sufficient pretext. By 24 May 1727, all the bishops of the province of Embrun, to which the diocese of Senez belonged had lettres de cachet delivered to them. Their metropolitan was Pierre Guérin de Tencin (1680–1758), formerly a close collaborator of Dubois and the latter's representative in Rome, a prelate of more than dubious morality. Tencin convened a provincial council for 16 August 1727, which Soanen attended. This council was characterized by complex and stormy episodes where irregularities abounded. On 18 August Soanen had rejected the jurisdictional competence of his judges, whose partisanship and hostility were beyond doubt, but an appeal based on misuse of power filed by Soanen on 26 August was ignored. On 27 August he protested against the irregularity of his trial in an encyclical to all the bishops. The judgment was dated 20 September and pronounced two days later. Soanen was dismissed from all his functions as bishop and priest, pending retraction of his pastoral instruction. Shortly thereafter he was exiled by lettre de cachet to the abbey of La Chaise-Dieu. He left Embrun on 13 October and arrived at the abbey ten days later. In spite of his advanced age he lived there for another thirteen years; he died on 25 December 1740 at the age of ninety-three, revered by the entire Jansenist party as a saint and martyr. All the while he had conducted a voluminous correspondence and taken an active part in most of the affairs that concerned public opinion. After his death even the smallest objects which he had used were preserved as relics. The council of Embrun, called by the opponents "the Synod of Robbers," did not have quite the effect hoped for by Fleury. To be sure, the Holy See approved it by brief of 17 December 1727, and it induced about ten opponents to switch sides. But the unrest it caused was lasting and violent. On 28 October 1727, twelve bishops, among them Noailles, Colbert, and Caylus, sent a letter of protest to the King authored by Petitpied, which was returned to them on 15 March 1728, together with a legal opinion which was disquieting to some of the signers. Boursier collected and published a Consultation de 50 avocats which asserted the invalidity of the council of Embrun. This was protested on the part of the acceptants by a Lettre de 26 évêques au rois (4 May 1728), which in turn provoked a polemic by the lower clergy calling attention to its rights. Since Soanen had demanded a general council beyond the provincial one, petitions were circulating in the dioceses for his appeal; they contained no less than two thousand signatures. Innumerable polemics appeared; the portrait of Soanen, the "Prisoner of Jesus," was distributed in copper etchings; a number of his followers managed to visit him at La Chaise-Dieu. The conflicts which were tearing the diocese of Senez apart were passionately commented on. In the end the total result was uncertain. The procedure was not repeated even though there was a plan afoot to convene a provincial council at Narbonne for the purpose of condemning Colbert, who had emphatically defended Soanen.

---

[24] See Louail-Cadry IV, 165–67.

[25] See Colbert I, 635; Louail-Cadry IV, 341.

One of Fleury's major goals continued to be the neutralization of Noailles. At the end of 1726 the rumor surfaced that Noailles would give in to pressure by the minister and publish a pastoral letter containing an unqualified acceptance. It prompted a large number of the Parisian clergy to rise up against it. On 3 February 1727, a letter to Noailles, edited by Petitpied, appeared in which thirty parish priests who considered themselves successors of the seventy-two disciples refused to follow Noailles in any act of submission. Furthermore, they demanded that a general synod of the diocese be convened. The movement was lead by Goy, the appellant priest of Sainte-Marguerite, and Feu, appellant priest of Saint-Gervais. A decree of 14 June prohibited this letter, but in the "Très humbles remontrances des curés de Paris" of 5 September Petitpied again brought up this topic. In the meantime—as we have mentioned—the affair of Embrun had led Noailles back to the opposition. After he signed the letter of the twelve bishops, he also signed (on 7 May 1728) a document opposing the registration of the papal brief which had approved the council of Embrun. But soon the situation changed. By this time Noailles was visibly weakened by age and his ideas became increasingly unclear. Towards the end of February 1718 sickness had deprived him of his most valued adviser, who had always encouraged him to resist: Antoine Dorsanne, official of Paris and author of a Journal which was published posthumously in 1753. Fleury, on the other hand, found allies among those around the cardinal in the persons of the chancellor Daguesseau and especially the archbishop's niece, wife of the Maréchal de Grammont. They obtained Noailles's signature on a document revoking his stand against registration of the papal brief of 7 May. On 19 July he also signed a letter to Benedict XIII assuring him of his submission and absolute obedience.[26] At this point several appellants appear to have regained some influence over him inducing him to sign a declaration (22 August; the original version was sent to Soanen) in which Noailles revoked the document of 19 May and in advance repealed any public document accepting the bull which might be wrung from him in the future. On 24 September, furthermore, he signed another document protesting in advance against any forced dismissal from his archbishopric. This did not prevent a pastoral letter by Noailles, dated 11 October and containing an unqualified acceptance of the bull Unigenitus, from being posted in Paris on 24 October. As a countermeasure the appellants had the revocation act of 22 August posted as well. The Duke de Noailles, nephew of the archbishop, managed to induce him to write a letter to Fleury in which he revoked this act of the twenty-second. But a few weeks later, on 17 December, he reaffirmed it. In addition he signed another declaration on 26 February 1729 in which he revoked his pastoral letter of 11 October; the manuscript of that declaration was also sent to Soanen. The death of the unfortunate cardinal on 4 May 1729 finally put an end to these embarrassing conflicts revolving around an old man whose weakness and instability had been cruelly exploited.

---

[26] Text: Dorsanne II, 463–66, also for the following documents.

The Defeat of Jansenism

The death of Noailles represented a turning point in the history of Jansenism. It marked the disappearance of the most important man of the party, whose personal deficiencies had nonetheless been clad with the aura of the cardinalate. More deaths and desertions from the ranks of the appellants followed, soon leaving a mere four. Aside from Soanen, who was exiled to his faraway mountains and deprived of all his authority, there were Colbert in Montpellier (d. 1738), Bossuet in Troyes (d. 1743), and Caylus in Auxerre, who survived the others until 1754. Although Jansenism, to the extent that it was inspired by Quesnel, developed more and more in the direction of parochialism by according a growing importance to the parish priests and the lower clergy, it found no leader. There was nothing that could make up for the lack of leadership, properly provided by a bishop; none of the three remaining appellant bishops were able to fill that role. Nor did anyone take the place of Quesnel, who died on 2 December 1719 in Amsterdam at the age of eighty-five. In spite of some internal disagreements the Jansenist party did preserve a real cohesion, but in the future it was an army without a general.

Noailles's successor was Charles-Gaspard de Vintimille du Luc, until then archbishop of Aix. He was moderate yet an acceptant by conviction, fully in agreement with Fleury's opinions. Henceforth Unigenitus posed no more problems regarding compromise. The French court and the Holy See agreed in their demand of an unreserved acceptance.

Vintimille was firmly resolved to break all Jansenist resistance in his diocese of Paris, even though it initially appeared that he underestimated the difficulties of such an undertaking and the impossibility of destroying an opposition which, to some extent, was to endure until the Revolution. Within a few days of taking office, on 6 September 1729 he obtained approval of the bull from twenty-five canons of Notre-Dame, but met with resistance among the lower clergy. This did not keep him from enforcing the signing of the bull by a pastoral instruction of 29 September. At the beginning of November a lettre de cachet declared the appellant professors to be dismissed from the Sorbonne, depriving it of a number of famous theologians; the remaining faculty was characterized by Pucelle as a "rump." Other opponents were eliminated posthaste by lettre de cachet, especially those among the parish clergy. On 29 October all confessors and priests were ordered to appear within four months at the episcopal see in order to have their ecclesiastical authority renewed. This enabled Vintimille to refuse that authority to about thirty appellants among approximately eleven hundred priests. The others had to accept the bull.

It was probably by request of Vintimille that Fleury initiated even harsher measures. A royal declaration of 24 May 1730 elevated the bull Unigenitus to the level of a state law; it again ordered the signing of the formulary of Alexander VII and declared the benefices of those who did not sign it as "vacant and available for reappointment by full legal power."[27] The weight of economic and financial sanctions of this declaration brought about the desired effect. Since church life in the ancien régime was founded on the system of benefices, such a measure put the Jansenists outside the pale of the existing order. But the text of the declaration, recognizing a papal act as state law, clearly manifested an ultramontane inspiration. Owing to Fleury's skill, it demonstrated a new posture, through which France and Rome found a modus vivendi which for a long time eliminated this perilous problem from the relationship between the two courts. It was in the nature of things that the most spirited resistance to this scheme came from parliamentary circles. In fact, the parliaments in their opposition took the place of the clergy, who, due to their very insecure position, could hardly express their opinion anymore. This explains the growing connection between Jansenism and parliamentarianism, a connection which cannot but seem paradoxical because a growing number of parliamentarians left the faith and turned to the Enlightenment instead. Parliament refused to register the declaration of 24 March. It took a formal trial proceeding to change its mind on 3 April 1730. The declarations of the ecclesiastical councilors concerning this topic were substantially inspired by E. Richer, they strongly advocated the demands of the parish priests. Applying the same principles a short time later, parliament supported three parish priests of the diocese of Orléans against their bishop, Fleuriau d'Armenonville. This explains why the Assembly of the Clergy in 1730 complained about the rebelliousness of the lower clergy and the transgressions by parliament. The growing importance of parliamentarians led to the Jansenist theologians placing more and more stress on an argument taken over from Quesnel and de la Borde: the validity of lay witness. Innumerable polemics continued to develop this argument and defended it against attacks by the proponents of the bull.

---

[27] See Cerveau, Nécrologe V, 270–79.

When Daguesseau and Joly de Fleury submitted the royal declaration to parliament, they assumed that it would be a purely theoretical matter without any practical application. But in fact this declaration opened the floodgates for persecution of the Jansenists. The Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, numerous polemics, and an incredible number of archival documents testify to numerous unpleasant incidents concerning priests, laymen, parishes, and whole congregations. By means of the simple lettres de cachet, which dispensed with all due process, a large number of opponents were sent into jail or exile. Since there are no statistics available, it is impossible to list accurate figures, but it can be assumed as certain that practically all dioceses and orders were affected, including the women's congregations, the Benedictines and the Oratorians, the Carmelites and the Sisters of the Visitation, and even the Carthusians. In the fall of 1725 about thirty Carthusians and fifteen Cistercians of Orval thought it wise to leave France and seek refuge in Holland. In order to reduce the extent of resistance, the powers that be unscrupulously resorted to forcible measures: several houses were closed and their members either deported or dispersed. Several episodes, such as the ones involving the Sisters of the Visitation of Castellane, who sympathised with Soanen, the Carmelite nuns of the Rue Saint-Jacques in Paris, and the abbey of Saint-Polycarpe in the diocese of Narbonne agitated public opinion to a great extent. It all contributed to the creation of a martyrdom mentality in Jansenist circles. But the measures were effective; by and by the various congregations officially accepted the bull, albeit generally without enthusiasm. The Dominicans had done so in 1728; the Benedictines and Doctrinarians followed suit in 1744, the Genovevians in 1745, and the Oratorians a year later in 1746. But it must be added that the acceptance was never general and that a good many members of religious families more or less admittedly continued to be sympathetic towards Jansenism. This was true especially in the case of the Oratorians and the Benedictines of Saint-Maur, many of whom remained loyal to the Jansenist party. The dioceses of the appellant bishops continued to represent a natural refuge for those who managed to escape exile or jail: Montpellier, Troyes, and Auxerre took in many refugees; others sought asylum in Holland. Others were accepted into communities covertly under an assumed name. Numerous laymen placed themselves, their homes, and fortunes in the service of those persecuted. After the death of Nicole in 1695 his inheritance had been handed over to the Oratorian Fouquet and the Abbot d'Eau. It laid the foundation for a fund providing assistance to persecuted clerics, and in the course of the eighteenth century it was augmented by numerous private gifts.

Vintimille's tenure in office also abounded in parliamentary conflicts. The first dispute ensued when a council decree suppressed a memorandum by forty lawyers from Paris in favor of opposing priests from Orléans. At first the other lawyers reacted heatedly, but calmed down when Daguesseau intervened and ameliorated some of the harshness. But the forty lawyers were called to task by some of the bishops, among them Vintimille. They were about to formulate a reply when another council decree again put them in the wrong. Thereupon they went on strike. In retaliation ten of them were exiled, but the others did not give in and so the ten had to be recalled from exile in November 1731. The highly complex and more or less emotional hostilities continued and parliament had to suffer a lettre de cachet forbidding any discussion of matters pertaining to the bull. By publishing a pastoral letter on 27 April 1732, abruptly suppressing the party organ Nouvelles ecclésiastiques Vintimille initiated a new phase in the conflict. As many as twenty-one priests in Paris refused to disseminate the pastoral letter; in other parishes some of the faithful left the church while it was read. A royal declaration of 10 May 1732 forbade the parliament from dealing with this affair. The ecclesiastical councilor Pucelle and another by the name of Titon protested loudly and were promptly arrested. A strike suppressed by royal decree provoked new incidents and 158 officials of the magistrate were dismissed on 20 June. When parliament remonstrated, the dismissals were retracted by the court. The remonstrations by parliament were very serious and on 8 August the court replied with a harsh statement which could only be registered after a formal trial on 1 September. This led to renewed protests resulting in 140 parliamentarians being exiled. But now the public was so enraged that the government had to give in, admonish Vintimille, and forgo proceedings against twenty-one protesting priests. This is a good example of the way in which ecclesiastical matters were again taken up by parliament.

Thereafter Vintimille avoided any additional problems. He shunned conflicts with priests who were undeterred and continued in their appeals; he even maintained friendly relations with some of them. He extended authorizations for hearing confession or renewed them in the case of opponents and asked well-known Jansenists for their services. When he died in 1746 he had succeeded relatively well in keeping peace in his immediate environs. The church policy of Fleury has been subject to various kinds of judgment. It could be considered brutal and repressive and it is certain that he did everything he could to diminish the ranks of the appellants. The forty-thousand lettres de cachet supposedly issued under his government as asserted by some historians demand closer examination. Without doubt he was interested in a peaceful settlement of the problem. His appointments placed moderate bishops at the head of dioceses. He avoided chicanery towards those prelates who were suspected of Jansenist sympathies. In 1735, for example, the bishop of the small diocese of Saint-Papoul, Jean-Charles de Ségur, submitted his resignation after he published a pastoral letter explaining his scruples and acknowledging the appellation of 1717. The pastoral letter was suppressed by council decree, but the prelate was left unscathed. He died peacefully at the parish house of Saint-Gervais in Paris, whose appellant priest François Feu gave the eulogy. Fleury died in 1743; his successor in the Ministry of Culture was the Theatine Jean-François Boyer, who had become Bishop of Mirepoix in 1730 and tutor of the Dauphin in 1736. Boyer proved to be much more unyielding than Fleury, often brutal. Although he was the black sheep of the Jansenists, as explained in the many articles about him in the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques, he was not even respected by the enemies of Jansenism. His death in 1755 was generally felt to be a liberation.

Boyer had to undergo the last embarrassing affair of the Jansenist conflict, that of the certificate of confession. A preliminary sign was the fact that some of the acceptants among the bishops were refusing the last rites to notoriously obstinate appellants. Towards the end of 1739 the bishop of Laon, La Fare, issued a pastoral instruction forbidding the priests either to administer the sacraments to appellants or to give them ecclesiastical burial. In 1746 the bishop of Amiens, La Motte, issued a proclamation containing similar rules. This affair reached its climax with the intervention of the archbishop of Paris, Christophe de Beaumont, the uncompromising successor of Vintimille. He resumed the fight against Jansenism and ordered his priests who were ministering to the dying to demand from them a certificate of confession, written by a regularly approved priest, in which the dying would accept the bull Unigenitus. The most astonishing aspect was that this measure was applied without reservation even in the case of poor and totally uneducated people. One of the first incidents (on 17 February 1749) involved the Jansenist theologian Boursier, whom the priest of Saint-Nicolas du Chardonnet, Garnot, gave the last rites and a formal burial with the complete rites of the church without having demanded a recantation. Garnot was exiled to Senlis. On 21 June 1749, the former rector of the university, Charles Coffin, died without the last rites because he refused to show the required certificate of confession, though he did receive a church burial in Saint-Eustache. During the following months several more incidents occurred and the problem spread to other dioceses in the provinces whose bishops had issued similar rules. Parliament, of course, repeatedly intervened in favor of the opponents and its relationship with the court became so critical that it was exiled from May 1753 until September 1754.

At this point Louis XV resolved to put an end to this conflict which weakened royal authority and could even call into question the very institutions themselves. Upon the return of parliament he issued a declaration, written on 2 September and registered on 5 September, which imposed silence on both parties.[28] This important declaration marked the beginning of yet a new phase because the King, especially as of 1756, was bent on having it respected. In order to set an example, several bishops who violated it—among them Beaumont himself—were temporarily exiled. Then, too, the Holy See was at this time occupied by a well-educated and moderate man, Benedict XIV. The divided Assembly of the Clergy of 1755 turned to him and in reply received the brief Ex omnibus (16 October 1755), which approved the silencing and treated the matter of the certificate of confession in an acceptable manner. Boyer died in 1755; his successors, Cardinal de La Rochefoucauld and after him Jarente de la Bruyère were intent on pacification and succeeded in having the order of silence respected. More and more bishops concurred in their views. This attitude, combined with the progressive deterioration of the Jansenist party, altered the elements of the problem.

The scene of events also changed. Although the Society of Jesus had played a relatively subordinate role in the context of political Jansenism, it incurred violent hostility, not only from the Jansenists but also from several acceptants among the bishops. Several incidents occurred in quick succession. The first one revolved around a work by the Jesuit Jean Pichon, which appeared in 1745 under the title L'esprit de Jésus-Christ et de l'Église sur la fréquente communion. In it Pichon resurrected a problem treated a century before in the famous work by Arnauld. He attacked any delay of absolution, advocated communion immediately following confession of even the most grievous sins, and—according to a formula of P. Sirmond attacked by Pascal in his Provinciales—reduced the love of God to the fact of not hating God in any way. In 1747 the

---

[28] Ibid., 363.

Nouvelles ecclésiastiques sat in judgment over Pichon's book. Then several pastoral instructions condemned the work, the first few of which were issued by bishops who were either known to be Jansenists or who sympathized with them: Caylus; Rastignac, bishop of Tours; Fitz-James, bishop of Soissons. Languet de Gergy pronounced a prohibition. Then Beaumont had to publish a recantation by Pichon in the diocese of Paris, dated 24 January 1748. But he was unable to avert condemnation of Pichon; during the next few months twenty-seven additional bishops censured the book. In August 1748 Pichon was exiled to Mauriac by lettre de cachet. On 11 December 1748, his book was condemned by the Holy Office. Parallel to the Pichon affair another one had erupted which was to reach its climax just a little later. In 1738 Isaac-Joseph Berruyer, a Jesuit, published the first part of a voluminous Histoire du peuple de Dieu which presented the passion and salvation of Christ in the form of a novel. It was condemned by Colbert, enabling Daguesseau to resist publication of the following volumes. The eight volumes of the second part did not appear until June 1753. They were not approved by the Jesuit superiors, a fact which incurred for them the reproach of duplicity. The ensuing scandal was of considerable proportions. In December 1753 the work was condemned by twenty-seven bishops. But Berruyer defended himself; a condemnation issued by Benedict XIV on 16 February 1758 did not keep him from publishing the remaining five volumes of the third part, which were condemned on 2 December 1758. Numerous polemics against Berruyer appeared, the most significant of which was written by a former theologian of Colbert's, Jean-Baptiste Gaultier. His Lettres théologiques also attacked another Jesuit, Jean Hardouin, who—although he had died in 1729—was considered to be the source of Berruyer's ideas. On 1 August 1759, Fitz-James joined the fray with a pastoral instruction of several thousand pages, composed by a well-known Jansenist theologian, Étienne Gourlin, and containing a severe refutation of Hardouin and Berruyer. It was followed by other censures, including one by the Sorbonne.

All this created an atmosphere favoring further attacks against the Society of Jesus, whose reputation had been declining—even in Rome—since the end of the seventeenth century and which was now coming under attack from almost all sides. At a time when political power was increasingly based on a growing nationalist sentiment, the society was accused of being allied with a foreign power, the temporal power of the papacy. Conversely, contemporary philosophy saw the society as the strongest barrier against the deism of Voltaire. Henceforth even the slightest incidents were pounced upon. In 1756 a regrettable financial affair involving a Jesuit, de la Valette, furnished the desired pretext. The parliaments went on the attack against the society, a decree of 8 August 1761, the first of several others, declared its constitution irreconcilable with the laws of the realm. After several cases involving promissory notes the King gave in to the pressure exerted by Mme de Pompadour and his minister Choiseul: a decree of 18 November 1764 banned the Society of Jesus in France. A similar campaign had been carried out in a number of European countries and led to the brief Dominus ac Redemptor by Clement XIV (see also Chap. 30), by which he abolished the Jesuit order. These measures were celebrated as victories by the Jansenists, who were unable to see that it was a triumph of skepticism and not of Saint Augustine. On both sides of the issue the conflict led to a great number of publications, the most interesting of which is still the Annales de la Société des soi-disant jésuites, an ambitious work which was probably financed by Choiseul himself and compiled by the Jansenist Gazaignes. It remained unfinished but its completed five volumes (1764–71) contain a wealth of valuable details.

These polemics involving the Society of Jesus refrained from resuming the Jansenist issue because the court was firmly resolved to enforce the law of silence and to avoid any rekindling of the conflict. Proof of that was an incident involving the appellant François-Philippe Mésenguy (1677–1763), who—out of modesty—had remained a mere acolyte and whose views had forced him in 1728 to resign his function as superior at the Collège de Dormans-Beauvais. Mésenguy was a respected theologian; without regard to his views Vintimille had employed him to improve the second edition of the Bréviaire de Paris in 1736 and had entrusted him with the editing of the Missel de Paris two years later. In 1744 Mésenguy had published his lectures under the title Exposition de la doctrine chrétienne.[29] The Exposition had been mentioned in 1752 by the Dictionnaire des livres jansénistes by the Jesuit Patouillet, but its being placed on the Index in 1757 was based exclusively on its Gallican tendencies. One year later the book was translated into Italian and this translation was considered Jansenist. As a consequence it was condemned by Clement XIII in his brief Dum inter gravissima (1761). But the courts of France, Spain, Naples, Vienna, and the Republic of Venice refused to accept the brief. Louis XIV forbade the nuncio to promulgate it in any way in France and Choiseul sent a severe official protest to the Pope. Even Rome now understood that it was better not to permit the matter to be revived. The pontificate of Clement XIV was ready to let things rest. Pius VI on the occasion of his trip to Vienna on 20 April 1782 publicly announced to the bishops of Hungary that the bull Unigenitus should be spoken of in historical terms and not in dogmatic ones, "historice, non dogmatice." Several years later, with the advent of the French Revolution, the political aspect of the problem was to enter a completely new phase.

---

[29] Mésenguy himself composed a "Mémoire justificatif" about this affair which was published shortly after his death (n. p., 1763).

In the meantime political Jansenism—as opposed to the religious Jansenism of the seventeenth century, which had been limited to France and Louvain—had gained considerable ground. In the Netherlands, where the Jansenist group enjoyed firm support, the situation quickly came to a head. The eight dioceses had accepted the bull Unigenitus almost immediately after it had been issued. Prior to that the faculty of the University of Louvain had accepted it, although not without spirited resistance by part of its members. In 1716 Thomas-Philippe d'Alsace de Bossu, hostile to Jansenism, became archbishop of Mechelen. On 17 October 1718, he issued a pastoral letter which excommunicated the opponents of the bull. The other seven dioceses, as well as the Louvain faculty, followed suit. Supported by officialdom, the archbishop initiated a number of forcible measures against the opponents. Towards the end of 1727 the famous canonist Zeger-Bernard Van Espen (1646–1728) had to flee to Holland, where he died six months later.[30] In the meantime Van Espen's advice had contributed considerably towards the creation of a schism in the Dutch Church.[31] Since the end of the sixteenth century the Church had been governed by vicars apostolic with the title "in partibus infidelium." Jean de Néercassel, vicar apostolic of Utrecht, had been a close friend of Arnauld's and had facilitated the Jansenist infiltration into Holland. His successor in 1688 was Pierre Codde, archbishop of Sebaste, who had flatly refused to sign the formulary. He was cited to Rome, but even there he adhered to his position and was banished for it (May 1702). The chapters of Utrecht and Harlem stood up for him; the latter quickly gave in, but Utrecht, followed by a large number of its faithful, stood fast in its opposition to the Holy See and refused to recognize the vicars apostolic who succeeded Pierre Codde. Several French prelates were willing to ordain priests who had been issued letters dimissory by the chapter acting as administrator of the archbishopric, but the regent prohibited the bishops from continuing this practice. Thereupon the chapter of Utrecht and its faithful who had joined in the appellation of the bull Unigenitus consulted several canonists, among them Van Espen, who had always supported the legitimacy of the rights of the chapter. The majority of the replies reaffirmed the chapter's right to elect its bishop and to have him consecrated. A priest of the foreign mission, Dominikus Varlet, consecrated bishop "in partibus" of Babylon, was willing to act as consecrator upon the request of the Dutch chapter but was suspended for so doing (1720). He took up residence in the United Provinces and on 15 October 1724 he consecrated Cornelius Steenoven, the elected candidate of the Utrecht chapter, who in turn consecrated the first three of his successors. Furthermore, the archbishopric of Utrecht created suffragan seats in Harlem (1742) and Deventer (1758), ensuring the continuity of apostolic succession. Although supported by the Dutch government, the Church of Utrecht suffered a rapid decrease in its membership: around 1750 it had less than ten thousand members, contrasted to the total of two hundred thousand Catholics in Holland. Several attempts at rapprochement with Rome were undertaken, but all of them foundered upon the steadfast refusal by the chapter to recognize the bull Unigenitus. Throughout the eighteenth century the Church of Holland served as a refuge for numerous appellants; even today their archives, enriched by many documents from France, constitute one of the most important sources regarding the history of Jansenism. The French immigrants, several of whom, such as Leclerc and Le Sesne d'Étemare, were widely acknowledged theologians, contributed to maintaining an undeniable intellectual vitality in the Utrecht schism in spite of its numerical minority. The Jansenist infiltration in Ireland, England, Germany, Austria, and Spain was of minor importance, but not so in Italy. There the problem took on a special aspect, which is to be examined later (Chap. 26).

---

[30] See G. Dupac de Bellegarde, Mémoires historiques sur l'affair de la bulle Unigenitus dans les Pays-Bas, 4 vols. (Brussels 1755); G. Leclerc, "Zeger Bernard van Espen (1646–1728), un canoniste janséniste," Miscellanea jansenistica offerts à Lucien Ceyssens (Herverlee and Louvain 1963), 174–200.

[31] See G. Dupac de Bellegarde, Histoire abrégée de l'Église d'Utrecht (Utrecht 1755); B. Van Bilsen, Het schisma van Utrecht (Utrecht and Brussels 1949); J. Tans and M. Kok, Rome - Utrecht (Hilversum and Antwerp 1966).

Jansenism and the Religious Mentality of the Eighteenth Century

When the conflict involving the bull Unigenitus broke out, Jansenism included a large number of first-rate theologians in its ranks. Several of them by their age were still part of seventeenth-century Jansenism. Pasquier Quesnel, who, as we have seen, occupied a place of extraordinary importance, possessed an amazing vitality belying his eighty years. The incredible number of memoranda, polemics, and replies which he authored until shortly before his death on 2 December 1719 in Amsterdam is astonishing. But this wealth of literature did not augment his system. He continued to represent a moderate Augustinianism as coined by Bérulle. Richer's ideas, advocated by him, combined with the fact that the army of appellants was composed primarily of priests and faithful, led him to accord increasing value to the rights of the lower clergy and laity without, however, going as far as the almost Protestant exaggerations of de la Borde. While he did, in fact, remain a revered figure within the Jansenist group, he was surpassed by some of the younger of his allies, over whom he no longer had the uncontested authority he did during the period between 1690 and 1710. Not so in the case of Jacques-Joseph du Guet (1649–1733), his younger companion who had accompanied him to his refuge with Arnauld in 1685 but was forced to return to France soon afterwards.[32] Although thereafter he lived in cautious seclusion, his voluminous correspondence with numerous friends even outside the Jansenist circle had proved his extraordinary intellectual and literary abilities and had obtained for him a position of high respect expressed by the sobriquet "the Seer," given to him by his friends. Although he had at first shown little inclination for writing, he had two small treatises printed in 1717 (Traité de la prière publique and Traité des saints mystères) which enjoyed great success and made his name as an author. He also continued his career as a moralist, especially in the ten volumes of his Lettres de Morale et de piété, several of which had been printed in 1707 without his permission and which he edited himself after 1718. The last few volumes appeared posthumously. He was a gracious and shy person who eschewed public appearances. For that reason he refused to take on a prominent role of leadership in the controversy involving the bull. But he was frequently asked for advice; he checked and corrected numerous writings of his friends. Himself an appellant and reappellant, he had advised the four bishops at the time of the appellation. But the number of polemics published by him is small, the most important one being his letter to Colbert of 25 July 1724 concerning the signing of the formulary which he had printed the following November. His actual theological work is limited to a small volume entitled Dissertation théologique (1727) which deals primarily with baptism and the Eucharist. In addition there are the two volumes published posthumously of the Conférences ecclésiastiques (1742), actually a work of his youth. Written around 1678 it demonstrates the influence of Richer's doctrine as advocated by Quesnel. But in general, Du Guet's ideas, dominated by Augustinianism, are sharp, penetrating, very subtle and solid, his morality determined by a relatively moderate rigorism. Innumerable reprints throughout the eighteenth century popularized this admirable, talented author who deserves better than the oblivion which has been his fate.

François-Laurent Boursier (1679–1748), professor at the Sorbonne, was a much stronger and more aggressive personality. Highly respected as a theologian by his peers, he made a name for himself in 1713 by his book De l'action de Dieu sur les créatures, traité dans lequel on prouve la prémotion physique par le raisonnement, a powerful defense of Augustinian-Thomistic ideas. Malebranche, who felt himself and his Traité de la nature et de la grâce attacked, considered the work worthy of an answer and replied in his Réflexion sur la prémotion physique (1715). Unfortunately, the ensuing polemic claimed all of Boursier's strength, so that he did not find time to realize his plan for a comprehensive work concerning the gratia efficax. As a confidant of Noailles and the appellants he composed a respectable number of texts for them, including the appeals documents of 1717, 1719, and 1720 and several of Soanen's pastoral instructions. He also achieved merit as the central figure in the negotiations, initiated with Jubé, the priest of Asnières, and eighteen other professors, which were to bring about a rapprochement with the Russian Orthodox Church.[33] His exclusion from the Sorbonne (1730) was predictable and his death in the parish house of Saint-Nicolas du Chardonnet, as mentioned above, provoked an incident. An important theologian with a comprehensive patristic as well as Scholastic education, courageous and unselfish, Boursier enjoyed an undisputed authority within the Jansenist party and his intervention was usually decisive. Comparable to him was another professor of the Sorbonne, Nicolas Petitpied (1665–1747), who had expressed his views on the issue of conscience at the beginning of the century and for that reason was forced to flee to Holland. He was a highly respected canonist; in 1718 Saint-Simon had him return to France in order to ask his advice in the matter of the bulls of renewal rejected by Rome. On 1 June 1719, he was readmitted to the Sorbonne. The anti-Jansenist reaction forced him to go into hiding and then again to flee to Utrecht in 1728. As a moderate yet unyielding spirit, he objected to the deviations of the Jansenists and their acts of violence against the hierarchy and because of that was accused of weakness. But his sterling character ensured him of high esteem even on the part of his adversaries and in 1734 the court permitted him to return to France. But his esteem within the party gradually decreased, his intervention against several polemics met with heated criticism. Soanen was the only one who kept him in his confidence and Bossuet of Troyes asked him until the end to write his pastoral instructions for him. His work is considerable: it comprises more than eighty titles, but is submerged totally in his polemics. There are three major works: two volumes entitled Oboedientiae credulae vana religio (1708), defending the silentium respectuosum; the five volumes of his Réponses aux avertissements de M. l'évêque de Soissons (1719–24), a powerful refutation of Languet de Gergy; and the posthumously published Examen pacifique de l'acceptation de la bulle. The lucid and prolific intelligence of Petitpied's was able to contribute new and unassailable arguments on a number of ever-recurring problems and many of his writings deserve to be read even today. Along the same lines, albeit of a lesser intellect, the deacon (who also had licentiate from Sorbonne) Jacques Fouillou (1670–1736) deserves mention. He was also prominent in the issue of conscience and joined Quesnel in Holland in 1705. He did not return to France until 1720, where he helped formulate Boursier's Prémotion physique and furnished a significant contribution to the famous Hexaples concerning the bull Unigenitus. But his major work is the three volumes of his Justification du silence respectueux (1707). Jean-Baptiste Louail (d. 1724), prior of Auzay, is best known as the author of the first part of the Histoire du livre de Réflexions morales, which has already been discussed. The main author of the remainder of the work is Jean-Baptiste Cadry (1680–1756), former teacher of theology at the cathedral chapter of Laon, who also wrote numerous polemics of lesser interest.

---

[32] P. Chételat, Étude sur Du Guet (Paris 1877).

---

[33] The documents of this affair are compiled in: Histoire et analyse du livre de l'action de Dieu, 3 vols. (n. p., 1753), III.

In the person of Nicolas Le Gros (1675–1751), doctor of theology and canon of Rheims, forced by his quarrels with Bishop Mailly in 1714 to take refuge with Quesnel, we encounter a personality of a different spirit. He returned from his exile after less than a year to resume the fight. In 1716 he brought out the best known of his works, Du renversement des libertés de l'Église gallicane dans l'affaire de la Constitution Unigenitus. In it he advocates a very traditional Gallicanism, modified by a few theses of Richer's concerning the rights of the parish priests, whom he calls shepherds just like the bishops. The latter are therefore obliged to act in concert with their priests and to listen to their advice. But he also upholds the rights of the hierarchy. Although he accords to the Christian people the right to elect their bishops and priests, he nonetheless stipulates that this election does not give them the power of consecration or jurisdiction, which they must receive from God through the mediation of the established hierarchy. This starting point leads him to a very subtle theory combining Gallicanism and the position of Richer with great success. An appellant and reappellant, he barely managed to evade a lettre de cachet and, following a sojourn in Rome and England, he once again returned to Holland. He joined the Church of Utrecht, to which he was of great service in the years between 1726 and his death. He was one of the first to create close connections between the French Jansenist faction and the Dutch schism. While in Holland he worked on a comprehensive volume, part of which is dedicated to a commentary on the Holy Gospel applying the mode of allegorical exegesis favored in Jansenist circles. Around 1745 the Utrecht Church had a somewhat more burdensome guest in the person of Pierre Leclerc (1706 until approx. 1781), subdeacon of the diocese of Rouen, a strange and in some respects eccentric figure with an obscure past. In 1756 he published two slim volumes under the title Renversement de la religion et des lois divine et humaines par toutes les bulles et brefs donnés depuis près de 200 ans contre Baius, Jansénius, les cinq propositions, pour le formulaire et contre le P. Quesnel. In it he develops an exaggerated presbyterianism by equating priests with bishops and insulting the Pope and the hierarchy. The same ideas are repeated in other works in which he called himself another Gilles de Wittes, former priest of Mechelen who also had strong Presbyterian tendencies. He found followers in the Church of Utrecht and created disciples for himself, but for the Jansenist faction both of France and Holland he was a disappointment. In September 1763 the archbishop of Utrecht convened a provincial council in which the parish priests had the same vote as the bishops; this council was strongly protested by Leclerc. Although he published a few more tracts marked by extraordinary vehemence, all traces of him were eventually lost.

In spite of his excesses the personality of Pierre Leclerc manifested the problem of the propagation of Richer's ideas within the Jansenist faction. In the meantime a canonist who possessed the requisite erudition which Leclerc was lacking had given voice to the most daring demands of the lower clergy. This was Nicolas Travers, (1674–1750), a prolific writer and local historian. He became known in 1734 by virtue of his work Consultation sur la juridiction et approbation nécessaires pour confessor, followed in 1744 by the Pouvoirs légitimes du second ordre dans l'administration des sacrements et le gouvernement de l'Église. He denies the bishops any and all priority of jura divina, regarding them as of purely human origin; he also denies them any special power of ordination and advocates that all functions reserved for the bishops can also be delegated to simple priests. From this he draws the conclusion that all priests by virtue of their own ordination receive the power of ordination and of jurisdiction and consequently have no need for an authorization by the local ordinary to hear confessions and to grant absolution validly and licitly. Travers's ideas produced mixed reactions among the Jansenists; they were virtually put on the Index; the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques speaks of the work with contempt and no necrology of the Jansenist party even mentions it. But it is possible that his ideas spread and were actually practiced by some Jansenist priests; at least they are emphatically accused of this by their opponents. Similar theses, but based on a wealth of extraordinary erudition, are found in the large body of works of a lay canonist, the lawyer Guilleaume-Nicolas Maultrot (1714–1803). A specialist in curial law, he tried to prove in a series of twenty-nine volumes the most daring positions of Richer's and the right of the parish priests to jurisdiction on the basis of their ordination. During the second half of the eighteenth century Maultrot met with a relatively favorable response in Jansenist circles and was supported by another renowned lawyer and canonist, Adrien Le Paige.

Among the last great theologians of Jansenism at least three deserve mention. First among them is Jean-Baptiste Le Sesne de Ménilles d'Étemare (1682–1770). He became a cleric at the suggestion of Du Guet and was ordained in 1709. He read one of his first Masses at Port-Royal, shortly before the expulsion of the nuns. Part of his superabundant work is as yet unpublished, a significant part, as we shall see later, is occupied with allegorical exegesis. He took an active part in all the controversies and maintained an intensive correspondence with the entire Jansenist group. In order to retain his independence, he carefully avoided all official titles and functions. He loved to travel, spent time in Rome, England, and frequently visited Holland, where he took up residence in 1754 and died in 1770. In Rhynwick he founded a sort of French seminary under the auspices of the Church of Utrecht, to which he had close ties, leaving to it an admirable collection of documents. D'Étemare was an important spirit with a profound and comprehensive education whose work, though extremely interesting, is never even marred by his allegorical exegesis. Another theologian worth mentioning was a friend of D'Étemare's, Jean-Baptiste Raymond de Beccarie de Pavie de Fourquevaux (1693–1767), a former officer whose modesty prompted him to remain a mere acolyte. The regular correspondence which he maintained with D'Étemare represents an extremely fertile source of information deserving publication. As a confirmed appellant he published several polemics, the most interesting of which is the Catéchisme historique et dogmatique. Its first two volumes appeared in 1729; a new edition of 1758 enlarged the work to five volumes. It is a historic presentation of the controversies surrounding the bull Unigenitus. Because of its admirable documentation it is in many aspects a valuable source for us. But the horizon of Fourquevaux's presentation is very narrow. Such cannot be said of the third theologian to be mentioned in this context: Pierre-Étienne Gourlin (1695–1775), bachelor of theology, vicar at Saint-Benoît, appellant, and victim of the interdict by Vintimille, which forced him to spend his life in seclusion. He authored several very important polemical works, the best of which is the comprehensive Mémoire justificatif (1742; for the appellation of the priests of Sens against Languet de Gergy). He put his pen in the service of several bishops, among others the previously mentioned author of Fitz-James's pastoral instruction against Berruyer. He also left a considerable number of theological treatises in manuscript form; unfortunately, not all of them have been published. But two of the most important ones did appear: Tractatus theologicus de gratia Christi salvatoris (1781) and De Jansenio et de Jansenismo (1790). At a time when no one was occupied with Jansenism anymore and even Augustinianism had fallen into the background, these two works witness an unusual erudition and a thinking of rare profundity. In the France of this epoch Gourlin is probably the last heir of the great theological tradition. One must acknowledge also that the Jansenist group was at that time the only one in which theological thought remained truly active. Independently of the great controversies, this group was also involved in several other interesting theological disputes. The first of them—concerning the relationships between the timor servilis and the fiducia filialis—was caused in 1728 by the appearance of Fourquevaux's Traité de la confiance chrétienne, attacked by Petitpied in 1734 in nine successive letters but defended by D'Étemare, who in turn was disputed by his fellow member of the Oratory, Mariette. Other controversialists entered the fray until Boursier, in his Lettre sur l'espérance et la confiance chrétiennes, finally put an end to the conflict in notable fashion (1739). Petitpied and Boursier also were the protagonists in a controversy concerning the theological virtues (1742–46) in the course of which Boursier wrote a very interesting Dissertation sur les vertus théologales (1744) which was primarily directed against a new treatise by his fellow Oratorian Mariette. Unfortunately, all the great minds of Jansenism had already passed away by 1778 when a last great doctrinal controversy broke out involving the Traité du sacrifice de Jésus-Christ by Abbé François Plowden, a cleric of English origin who sympathized with the Jansenists. He viewed the essence of the sacrifice of the Mass not in the destructive change of the offering, but in the presentation of a sacrifice made once and for all. The entire Jansenist contingent entered this controversy; the publications in this context deserve a careful investigation.

After 1730 the Jansenist party was irrevocably condemned and it was aware of it. A minority from the start, it now watched its substance gradually melt away without a chance to renew itself. Even the diligence of its members could not deceive anyone about the impending fateful end. The mentality of the group changed progressively: it assumed the attitude of a clan withdrawn unto itself, embittered, full of resentment, belligerent, narrow-minded, suspicious; the tenor of Jansenist polemics became more and more unpleasant. The most significant document in this regard was the famous Nouvelles ecclésiastiques. During the Council of Embrun (1727) the party had planned establishment of an informational journal which was to replace the hand-copied Nouvelles ecclésiastiques which had appeared in the seventeenth century. This plan seems to have originated primarily with D'Étemare and two very wealthy Jansenist clerics, Jean-Baptiste and Alexis Desessarts. Du Guet, whose advice had been solicited, responded positively. The editorship was initially entrusted to a deacon, Boucher, and to a chaplain of Bicêtre, de Troya, but the latter was incarcerated a short while later. A few months later Boucher, who continued to collaborate on the journal, handed its direction over to a priest of the diocese of Tours whose Jansenist membership had forced him into exile, Jacques Fontaine de la Roche (1688–1771). The latter quickly demonstrated an extraordinary organizational talent; he built up a network of information and distribution of such perfection that he was able to thwart investigation by the police throughout the century. The first issue of the Nouvelles appeared on 23 February 1728. But the authors also published a fascicle reviewing the sequence of events since the issuance of the bull. In the face of all sorts of difficulties Fontaine succeeded in maintaining the weekly appearance of the publication almost without interruption. D'Étemare, the brothers Desessarts, and Fourquevaux were regular contributors, especially noted for the reviews and the doctrinal articles. After the death of Fontaine, his responsibilities were taken over by Marc-Claude Guénin de Saint-Marc, supported by a group which included Gourlin and Maultrot. After 1794 the Nouvelles was continued in Utrecht by a refugee priest, Jean-Baptiste-Sylvain Mouton, who reduced it to two issues a month. The last one appeared on 24 May 1803; Mouton died on the following 13 June. The basic tone of the Nouvelle is one of incredible vehemence. Everything coming from the appellants is heaped with praise; the slightest utterances by an acceptant or a Jesuit is mercilessly criticized. Reading the journal is simply unpleasant, yet one must acknowledge the extraordinary accuracy of the information used in it. This makes it for us an extremely valuable source. Predictably the Nouvelles was subject to repeated condemnations, among them a decree of parliament of February 1731, a pastoral letter by Noailles of April 1732, and a decree by the Holy Office of April 1740. Starting in 1734 the Jesuits tried to counter the Nouvelles by their own Suppléments, which was by no means any more objective and had to be discontinued in 1748. The Nouvelles also reflected the controversies which split the Jansenist milieu. Its vehement tone caused them to be condemned by some of the most famous Jansenist theologians. Du Guet was a case in point: he condemned the Nouvelles in a letter (dated 9 February 1732) to a young fellow Oratorian of the Collège de Juilly, Pinel. At the instigation of a niece of Du Guet's, Mme Mol, who was hostile to the Jansenists, this letter was publicized. This resulted in a long series of polemics between D'Étemare and Le Gros. This was also the case with a letter by Petitpied made public in 1735. As a countermove Fontaine welcomed the touching approbations of Soanen and gave them all the desired publicity he could. In addition to the Nouvelles there was a wealth of published material the majority of which were pamphlets of the most regrettable satire, some of which, however, are publications of valuable documents, especially the irreplaceable Journal by Dorsanne (1753) and the Anecdotes ou mémoires secrets sur la Constitution Unigenitus by a member of the Academy, Joseph Bourgoin de Villefore (1744).

On the whole the spirituality of the Jansenist milieu of the eighteenth century continues to be of the intellectual, psychological, and rational kind. The doctrinal reliability of the works it created could not, however, hide the progressive withering coming about as a consequence of its break with the living sources of inner experience. The literary production is more than abundant. Jérôme Besoigne (1686–1763) and René Cerveau (1700–1780), best known as historians, published a considerable number of devotional books. Yet more frequent were reprints or editions of hitherto unpublished works of the seventeenth century. The fourteen volumes of the Essais de morale by Nicole came out in incredibly quick succession and were even incorporated in non-Jansenist libraries. In addition, there were the Instructions chrétienne by Singlin (1744); about twenty works by the doctor of Port-Royal, Jean Hamon, among them some previously unpublished ones; the interesting Lettres chrétiennes et spirituelles by Saint-Cyran, which had also been previously unpublished (1744); the Exercices de piété of Port-Royal (1787), and many others. Naturally the Jansenists were emphatically antimystical, manifest in the irony with which the Nouvelles announced the publication in 1752 of the admirable Instructions spirituelles en forme de dialogue by de Caussade. But the main target of the Jansenists was the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus.[34] Strangely enough, the people of Port-Royal had frequently talked of the Heart of Jesus devotion in their devotional literature. But in 1729 when Languet de Gergy published a voluminous Vie de la Vénerable Mère Marguerite Alacoque, the Nouvelles published a malicious review in January 1730 in which the Heart of Jesus, however, was hardly mentioned. Not until 1758 did its opposition to this devotion become apparent. It became more virulent in 1765 when a brief by Clement XIII officially recognized the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Thereupon the Nouvelles increased the number of articles rejecting the devotion. In 1781 the most vehement polemicist in the person of Marc-Antoine Raynaud, the priest of Vaux (1717–96), joined the battle, heaping insults and sarcasm upon those whom he called "cordicoles."

The Jansenist faction, nonetheless, must also have been aware of the fascination of the miraculous and irrational. Ever since the famous Miracle of the Sacred Thorn in 1656 most of their representatives were forced to accept the idea that God manifests himself in favor of His cause by means of miracles. Yet miraculous events within the group of appellants did not occur until relatively late. On 31 May 1725, Anne Charlier, the wife of Lafosse was suddenly healed of a chronic uterine bleeding during a sacramental procession in which the appellant priest of Sainte-Marguerite, Jean-Baptiste Goy, was carrying the Blessed Sacrament. Noailles recognized the reality of the miracle in a pastoral letter and the parish of Sainte-Marguerite introduced a service commemorating the event. The appellants, of course, viewed that event as a sign in their favor and hastened to publicize it. They increased the publicity in 1727 when suddenly miracles began to happen at the grave of a well-known appellant, Gérard Rousse, canon of Avenay in the diocese of Rheims. These constant references by the appellants led to a heated polemic between Languet de Gergy and Colbert which at least had one positive result: In a printed letter of 5 February 1727, Colbert published Pascal's thoughts concerning miracles. These were previously unpublished fragments of his unfinished letter about the Miracle of the Sacred Thorn, copies of which were circulating in the Jansenist faction. But the most spectacular events occurred in Paris in the small cemetery surrounding the church of Saint-Médard at the grave of an appellant and reappellant, François de Paris (1680–1727), the eldest son of a rich parliamentary councilor, who had modestly remained a mere deacon. He had lived and worked in seclusion and written a few commentaries on the Holy Gospel and several devotional works. The occasionally frightening asceticism of his way of life and his inexhaustible charity towards the poor had made him famous; his personal holiness cannot be doubted. His funeral on 3 May 1727 was triumphal and there was talk of miracles reputed to have happened at that occasion. Noailles finally ordered an investigation which was interrupted by his death and the unwillingness of his successor to resume it. But the masses continued to come and pray at the grave of François de Paris. Again and again miracles were said to have occurred. But on 3 November 1730, the sensational healing of a certain Anne Lefranc occurred, which was doubted and declared false by a pastoral letter of Vintimille dated 15 July 1731. Additional miracles created great excitement among the public, which now veritably flooded the small cemetery of Saint-Médard.

---

[34] See L. Cognet, "Les jansénistes et le Sacré-Cœur," Le cœur, Études carmélitaines (Paris 1950), 234–53.

A short time later another episode began.[35] On 21 July 1731, a poor and almost totally paralyzed servant woman by the name of Aimée Pivert was healed at the deacon's grave and immediately afflicted by violent nervous seizures. During the next few weeks the phenomenon reoccurred with other patients. At the beginning of September a cleric, the Abbé de Bescherand, was seized at each of his visits at the cemetery, his reactions evident to all. This phenomenon proved to be more and more contagious, turning the cemetery into a scene of extraordinary mass hysteria in the course of autumn 1732; soon the discussions of the onlookers degenerated into brawls. Several interventions by the police led to a royal decree on 27 January 1732 ordering the cemetery to be closed and placed under police surveillance. But the convulsions did not cease.[36] They merely assumed a different character. Until then they had been a healing process, but now they turned into a prophetic manifestation. Several people, as a general rule members of the highest society and among them even a brother of Voltaire,[37] had strange meetings at their homes around a crucifix or some Jansenist relic, most often one of Deacon de Paris. Following a period of prayer an individual participant, especially gifted in this manner, fell into a trance and began to prophecy in favor of the appellants while the rest of those present reverently collected and wrote down his words. Among these were some privileged beings, such as the famous Sister Holda, who were given warlike names and considered genuine oracles. The wealth of manuscripts with her prophesies contains, among a lot of verbiage, some beautiful pages.[38] Several participants fulfilled prophetic deeds, others regressed into a childlike state. All of the participants, of course, viewed the phenomenon as a divine sign in favor of the appellation. Then various phenomena of yet another kind occurred. At the end of 1732 several among them in a trance asked the others to beat them or wound them in order to give them relief. This practice spread rapidly and became customary among the convulsionaries. Truly sadistic meetings ensued. A distinction was made between the "small assistance"—beatings with whips, sticks, or wooden trestles—and the "large assistance" or "murderous assistance," for which nails, daggers and swords were used. There were women whose breasts or extremities were pierced, others who were crucified for several hours. What had started as acts of penance became the miraculous manifestation of insensitivity, invulnerability, and sudden healing of injuries. The participants wrote exceedingly accurate reports, many of which were left to us but are hard to judge so long after the events. In many cases fraud or hysteria are easy to distinguish, but in some cases one seems in fact to be confronted by strange and extraordinary phenomena which are hard to understand. In all of this the participants, of course, saw miracles in favor of Jansenism. It is, on the other hand, quite certain that this system of "assistance" which gradually spread over a large part of France made possible a number of moral aberrations and sexual excesses. The abominations happening among the pupils of a certain Abbé Causse, called Brother Augustin, and among those of a certain Vaillant created a tremendous scandal.

---

[35] See P. F. Mathieu, Histoire des miraculés et des convulsionnaires de Saint-Médard (Paris 1864).

---

[36] See P. Gagnol, Le jansénisme convulsionnaire et l'affaire de la Planchette d'aprés les archives de la Bastille (Paris 1911).

[37] See A. Gazier, "Le frère de Voltaire," Revue des Deux-Mondes, 1 April 1906.

[38] Interesting texts by Marie-Anne Fronteau, called Sœur Holda, have been summarized by L. Silvy: Extraits d'un recueil de discours de piété sur nos derniers temps, 5 vols. (Paris 1822).

The authorities tried to restrict the convulsionaries to their homes. Then a royal decree of 17 February spoke against them and their meetings were prosecuted by the police. From 1732 on there were innumerable arrests; the questionnaires kept in the archives of the Bastille furnish a number of interesting details in this matter. Yet the meetings of the convulsionaries continued into the nineteenth century. Such an unsettling phenomenon predictably led to heated conflicts within the Jansenist party, where the positions differed considerably. There were avowed opponents of both the convulsionaries and their assistance. The best known among them was no doubt Du Guet, who died in 1733 and witnessed only the beginnings of it. But his niece, Mme Mol, continued the fight in his name, followed by a number of the great theologians of the party: Fouillou, Boursier, Petitpied, and Gourlin. The expert opinion against the convulsions signed by thirty doctors on 7 February 1735 includes many Jansenists. The most vehement opponent no doubt was Debonnaire, who thundered against the convulsions in a number of pamphlets. By all accord, the one who showed the most common sense was the physician Pierre Hécquet. In his book Naturalisme des convulsions (1733) he characterized them as either fraud or sickness. Most characteristic is the case of the bishop of Auxerre, Caylus, who at first recognized the miracles of the deacon François de Paris, but then emphatically turned against the movement of the convulsionaries. The attitude of the Jansenist opponents in this matter naturally furnished a welcome issue to the defenders of the bull, especially to the Benedictine Dom Lataste. Others, while they approved the convulsions as a prophetic manifestation, condemned the so-called assistance as most immoral. This was the position of Colbert, Soanen, D'Étemare, and the Nouvelles ecclésiastiques. But there were also some passionate advocates of the so-called assistance, as well as of the convulsions, whose leader apparently was the parliamentary councilor Louis Carré de Montgeron (1686–1754), an atheist who had converted at the grave of F. de Paris on 7 September 1731. As a manifestation of his conviction he wrote a comprehensive work, lavishly illustrated by Restout, La vérité des miracles opérés à l'intercession de M. de Paris (1737). He was daring enough to go to Versailles and submit the first volume to the King, whereupon he was interned for the rest of his life. Yet he was able to have the remaining two volumes of his work, which were dedicated to a passionate defense of the convulsions and the assistance, published as well. This strange personality attracted followers such as the brothers Desessarts, the Oratorians Pierre Boyer and Julien de Gennes. The wealth of literature produced by this controversy, which dragged on until the Revolution, is astonishing.

The bull Unigenitus posed a difficult problem for the Jansenist party. They considered it totally erroneous in the area of the faith, but were forced to admit that the majority of the Church had recognized it. What then was the state of the promise of infallibility which Christ had given to his Church? The main features of the answer to this question were outlined even prior to 1720, they took on a clear form after 1730: this almost general apostasy of the Church is the sign that the end of time is drawing nigh. This was presaged in the Holy Gospel and the appellants are the small remainder of the steadfast mentioned by the prophesies. This is the cause for the strange eschatological mentality in the Jansenist faction, the expectation of the impending and victorious return of Jesus Christ. Many theologians of the group sought their justification in the Holy Gospel, interpreting it according to the principles of a very specific allegorical exegesis practiced neither by the great theologians of the seventeenth century nor by Quesnel, but whose initial features can be encountered in Pascal. Du Guet's system, which can be called figurism, consists of viewing everything that has happened to the Jewish people as an allegory, a figure of that which is fated for the Church. By this perspective he arrived at the conviction that the end of time had to be preceded by a general conversion of Israel. It is possible that he even managed to convert Bossuet to his ideas around 1682.[39] The exegetic principles of Du Guet's, however, were not published until later, in his Régles de l'intelligence des Saintes Écritures (1716), on which his friend D'Asfeld had collaborated. This slim volume also contains an (important) appendix concerning the conversion of the Jews. In the course of his long career Du Guet applied his method to lengthy commentaries on a part of the Bible. For the most part they were not published until the end of his life or after his death. The entire work comprises about fifty volumes, but the text has been emendated several times. These commentaries, whose spiritual aspects often result in some admirable perspectives, enjoyed success even outside of the Jansenist milieu. But in the meantime Du Guet had been passed by his pupils. On 8 April [39] See A. F. Vaucher, Une célébrité oubliée, le P. Manuel de Lacunza y Diaz (Collonges-sous-Salève 1941); idem, Lacunziana I (Collonges-sous-Salève 1949).

---

1722, D'Étemare had been present at a conversation about this topic between Du Guet and Charles de Sévigné, son of the famous Marquise de Sévigné, and this talk which converted him to figurism had opened up broad perspectives for him. He followed Du Guet's system to its outer limits and arrived at a point where he viewed the entire Holy Gospel as a chain of symbols concerning the Church, the future of the Jewish people, and the end of time. In it he thought to have found proof that the apostasy of almost the entire Church had to be followed immediately by the conversion of the Jews. In 1723 he started developing his views in several works, primarily in his Tradition sur la conversion des Juifs (1724). Du Guet, who held these ideas to be exaggerated, was irritated and criticized them in his conferences. Yet D'Étemare had become popular and found many followers, among them Le Gros, Fourquevaux, and many others. The expectation of the conversion of the Jews to the Christian faith and that of the arrival of Elijah as a sign of the end of time played a significant role in the Jansenist milieu. The convulsionaries spoke of it in their prophesies and the famous/infamous Vaillant called himself Elijah. The apocalypse offered the ideal subject matter for such commentaries, but these were generally so audacious that no one dared to publish them. Those of D'Étemare did not appear until the nineteenth century (1866), those of Le Gros have remained unpublished. D'Étemare clearly expressed the idea that the locusts are identical with the Society of Jesus and Le Gros thought that Babylon represents the Christian and corrupt Rome. In addition, D'Étemare advocated the idea of a "millenium," a spiritual reign of Christ on earth prior to the end of the world. Some of the exegetes attempted by means of calculations, whose perspicacity, however, was again and again deceived, to determine the date of the conversion of the Jews. Today we are hard put to imagine the strange climate of this eschatological expectation which brought about such an incredible volume of writing.

One last feature characterized the Jansenist faction, one that stemmed from its mentality as a minority: its hero cult. Initially its heroes were essentially the great men of Port-Royal, the nuns and friends of Port-Royal. Then towards the end of the century the famous appellants became objects of veneration. Some Jansenists remembered them during Mass on the same level with the canonized saints. Their relics developed into a veritable cult; even the smallest vestiges of bone or clothing were kept in valuable reliquaries. But this veneration is interesting to us primarily because of the preservation and publication of important documents which fortunately were left to us and represent an irreplaceable source. The Church of Utrecht has a collection of documents of incredible abundance the most important part of which is kept at the seminary of Amersfoort, which has possession of it today. Another collection was compiled by Françoise-Marguerite de Joncoux (1668–1715), a loyal friend of the last nuns of Port-Royal, who managed with the help of a Lieutenant Voyer d'Argenson to save the documents confiscated at the destruction of the convent. She also collected a wealth of other items or had them copied. Mlle de Joncoux, who had received an extraordinarily thorough theological education, took an active part in the controversies and in 1699 originated the idea of publishing the Provinciales, in which she translated Nicole's Latin annotations into French. During the eighteenth century her work went through fifteen reprints. At her death her collection was left to the Abbey Saint-Germain-des-Pres and is now in the National Library. Another much larger and more complete collection was compiled by Marie-Scholastique de Ménilles de Thémericourt (1671–1745), who had been a pupil at Port-Royal and had close ties to the nuns and their friends. About 1715 she undertook a systematic listing of all historical documents relating to the dissolved convent. She was supported in her task by some devoted friends, such as Mme de Bourdun, the mother of D'Étemare. She could only collect a few of the original documents, but employed several professional copiers who copied and carefully compared all documents which she was able to borrow. Then she put them together into various methodically arranged collections which she then annotated. She also inspired several publications. Later on she added her manuscripts to the rich collection of documents relating to the controversies which was compiled by Adrien Le Paige; the entire collection remained in the possession of the Society of Port-Royal. Several other holdings have been transferred to public libraries without any sizeable losses.

These archives were able to satisfy the needs of Jansenist circles for veneration because they placed at their disposal the works of their heroes and the recollection of the authors of memoirs. According to the custom of the times these publications changed the text to some extent, leaving out what could be troublesome or superfluous; yet they are very informative. A close determination of the conditions under which these editions originated is quite difficult. Some of the collaborators can be identified, such as Michel Tronchay (1666–1733), the former secretary of Tillemont; Claude Goujet (1697–1767), literary figure, historian, and contributor of the Nouvelles; Favret de Fontette and Barbeau de la Bruyère. Pierre Leclerc was responsible for the Vies intéressantes et édifiantes des religieuses de Port-Royal (1750–52), the Vies des amis de Port-Royal (1751), and the curious Recueil de pièces sur le formulaire (1754). The production was especially intensive around the middle of the century; thereafter there were hardly any more new editions, proof that interest was gradually lessening. Instead there appeared the Lettres of Mother Angélique (1742), the "memoirs" about her written by various nuns, which have become known under the title Mémoires d'Utrecht (1742), numerous devotionals by her niece Angélique de Saint-Jean, and the famous Recueil d'Utrecht, containing voluminous documentation about Pascal (1740). The great memoirists of Port-Royal were presented to the public: Lancelot and Fontaine in 1738, Thomas du Fosse in 1739. There were several attempts at historical synthesis which, although tendentious in favor of the Jansenists, are nonetheless interesting. The best work is the Histoire générale de Port-Royal (1757) by the Benedictine monk Dom Clémencet. Also deserving mention are the somewhat anecdotal work by Jérôme Besoigne Histoire de l'abbaye de Port-Royal (1752) and the strange Mémoires historiques (1759) by Pierre Guilbert, both full of theretofore unpublished but unfortunately unfinished writings. In 1737 Fouillou published the Lettres of Arnauld, but later on this work was relegated to less importance by the monumental edition of the Œuvres complètes of Arnauld in forty-three volumes, edited by Dupac de Bellegarde, Larrière, and Hautefage (1775–83) and printed in Lausanne with historically valuable introductions. This remarkable work, no doubt the most important one produced in this field during the eighteenth century, which far surpassed similar ones dedicated to Fénelon and Bossuet, is a testimonial to the collapse of Jansenism.

CHAPTER 21

Spirituality and Its Development in Eighteenth Century-France

Christian Life

In eighteenth-century France the religious energies were for the most part consumed by the Jansenist conflict and its aftereffects. This led to impoverishment in other areas as well. Embroiled in daily battles which left room for only the most immediate questions, even the best minds were unable to recognize that the actual danger was lurking in the growing influence of deist philosophy. On 18 November 1751, a collaborator of the Encyclopedia, Abbé Jean Martin de Prades (1720–82), submitted to the Sorbonne several theses inspired by philosophic deism which the syndic Dugard naively found to be "full of nice sentiments in favor of religion." Although parliament reacted soon after, it was only against a contumacious thesis regarding the inequality of the classes. The Jansenist Étienne Gourlin was the only one to attack the problem perspicaciously, making the bull Unigenitus responsible for this pervasive blindness. This explains to a great extent the weakness of Catholic apologetics in the century of the Enlightenment.[1]

Spiritual life itself was impoverished because of the crisis of quietism, which for a long time discredited all mystical elements, cutting off Christian piety from its living sources of inner experience. Henceforth psychologizing moralism, whose gradual advance we have already examined, was to triumph. Several authors who were actually part of the seventeenth century had their widest dissemination in the eighteenth century. As mentioned above, this was the case with the great Jansenist moralists: Nicole, Du Guet, and Quesnel; Jean-Jacques Boileau (1649–1735) who sympathized with the Jansenists but was clever enough never to expose himself unduly, also belongs to this group. He was the author of several very conventional devotional books, but above all he was appreciated as a spiritual guide. After his death two volumes of Lettres sur différents sujets de morale et de piété (1737–47) were published which really deserve our interest. They are the source for the famous story of the chasm which Pascal constantly thought he saw on his left side.[2] Lastly, it should be remembered that Bossuet also did not become famous as a religious author until the eighteenth century, since his great works in that field Élévations sur les mystères (1727), Méditations sur l'Évangile (1731), and the Lettres et opuscules (1748) were not published until then.

The Jansenist tradition was continued by numerous authors the majority of whom have deservedly been relegated to oblivion. One of the most interesting authors among them was no doubt Paul Collard (1698–1775), superior of the small seminary of Troyes at the time when Bossuet's nephew was bishop there. He was a keen spiritual guide, dedicated to a rigorism that made no concession, author of the posthumously published Lettres spirituelles (1784) in which he developed a severe spirituality raised to extremes. Similar qualities are encountered in the historians Jérôme Besoigne (1686–1763) and René Cerveau (1700–1780), who also wrote devotional literature. Their works are doctrinally sound and their devotion to the incarnate word places them among the successors of Bérulle. But their style is dry and artificial, their psychology insufficient and conventional, which makes them hardly worth reading. Similar qualities can be ascertained in several of their non-Jansenist contemporaries.

This situation attests to an undeniable deterioration of the intellectual level while that of Christian practice was maintained—or so it appears—throughout the century. There were villages even in 1788 whose number of inhabitants was determined by attendance at the Easter Communion and where this number was destined to sink almost to zero in 1804, after the concordat. The congregations, especially the contemplative ones, attracted fewer and fewer members; the nadir appears to have been reached around 1765, at the time when the government took up the problem by means of the famous Commission des Réguliers.[3] Later on the houses again attracted a greater number of recruits and this increase continued until the Revolution.[4] In this climate new foundations were rare, yet where they were undertaken they were invariably dedicated to teaching or the care of the sick. But the charitable organizations of the laity remained active; the secret "A.A." associations (Associatio amicorum) were formed everywhere. The work of the popular missions was continued, ensuring a periodic renewal of parish life. Religious zeal stayed alive to the extent that it made possible the Catholic resistance during the Revolution and the subsequent renewal.[5] [1] See F. Bouillier, "L'abbé de Prades," Revue politique et littéraire, 11 October 1884; A. Gazier, Mélanges d'histoire et de littérature (Paris 1903).

---

[2] See A. Durengues, Monsieur Boileau de l'Archevêché (Agen 1907).

In addition, we have to call attention to the liturgical efforts in eighteenth-century France. The best example was the initiative by Vintimille, the archbishop of Paris, who provided for his diocese a new missal (1736) and a new breviary (1738), which latter enjoyed a great success. The missal was the work of Mésenguy, an appellant and reappellant; the breviary had been adapted by the Oratorian Vigier, who was sympathetic to the Jansenists. Both books contained admirable Latin poetry in the form of hymns, prose texts, and sequences, among them the older creations of the canon of Saint-Victor, Santeul, and the very beautiful ones by the rector of the university, Charles Coffin (1676–1749), as well as hymns by other authors. The breviary offered a new order of psalter which made its weekly recital possible since the excessively long psalms had been shortened. As we know this was the model for the breviary of Pius X. Although both the missal and the breviary were very controversial, they made their way and were adopted or imitated by many other dioceses.

The Continuance of Mysticism

It would be wrong to assume that the crisis of quietism extinguished mysticism; it merely pushed it to the periphery and almost made it into a secret movement. A detailed examination of the documents shows, for instance, that the number of nuns in the convents who received the grace of mysticism stayed exactly as high as in the preceding century. But whereas it had once been surrounded by an interested environment and almost invariably attracted a biographer, they were now enveloped by silence and secrecy, penetrated only by a few of the initiated. This was true for the Marseille Sister of the Visitation Anne-Madeleine de Rémusat,[6] a champion of the Sacred Heart of Jesus devotion. Her spiritual guide was the Jesuit Claude-François Milley (1668–1720), who died as the result of his caring for the plague-stricken. He did not publish anything during his lifetime, but his very beautiful spiritual correspondence appeared in print not too long ago.[7] To his charges he preached unreserved surrender of the self, disassociation from all temporal ties, the secluded life in God and pure love; thus he continued the great seventeenth-century mystical tradition of the Society. No doubt he was also influenced by Guillore and Surin. In his proximity—although not on his level of teaching and coherence—was Claude Judde (1661–1735), whose Oeuvres spirituelle was published posthumously in 1781;[8] he, too, is part of the tradition begun by Lallemant and Surin.

---

[3] See P. Chevallier, Loménic de Brienne et l'ordre monastique 1766–1789, 2 vols. (Paris 1959).

[4] See B. Plongeron, Les réguliers de Paris et les serments révolutionnaires (Paris 1963).

[5] See P. Mouly, L'association secrète denommée Aa (Montgeron, n. d.).

Other congregations furnished just as interesting a contribution. The Avis sur différents états de l'oraison mentale by the Dominican Jean-Baptiste Rousseau (d. 1756), which came out after the quietistic crisis, courageously fights for the legitimacy, indeed the necessity of contemplative prayer, manifesting the influence of the great Rhenish-Flemish mystical tradition down to Saint Theresa and Saint John of the Cross. This little but very valuable work unfortunately seems to have remained almost unnoticed. The Pauline Jean-Baptiste-Élie Avrillon (1652–1729), on the other hand, was a well-known preacher, famous spiritual guide, and author of numerous works. His mysticism is primarily characterized by the emphasis on the affective elements of spirituality, but he often speaks openly, if with some reservation, about the passive stages and the unifying life. His most characteristic work in this regard is the Année affective ou sentiments de l'amour de Dieu sur le Cantique des Cantiques (1707).

The best religious author of the eighteenth century no doubt was the Jesuit Jean-Pierre de Caussade (1675–1751), who seems to have owed much to the Sisters of the Visitation of Nancy, with whom he resided from 1729 to 1731 and again from 1733 to 1739.[9] He published only one work, the Instruction spirituelle en forme de dialogues sur les divers états d'oraison suivant la doctrine de M. Bossuet (Perpignan 1741).[10] In it he undertakes the difficult task of demonstrating that Fénelon and Bossuet concurred in the essential points and that Bossuet was basically a defender of mysticism. To prove his point he referred to a text entitled "Manière courte et facile pour faire l'oraison en foi et de simple présence de Dieu" which had been ascribed to Bossuet by the Sisters of the Visitation of Meaux and which de Caussade published in an appendix. Ironically, it appears that this originally anonymous little work was actually by Mme Guyon. Although de Caussade's argumentation is not totally convincing, his essays on contemplative prayer and the unifying life are most interesting. His correspondents and the Sisters of the Visitation had gathered several collections of his letters on the topic of spiritual guidance. In the nineteenth century Ramière compiled from them the book L'abandon à la Providence divine (1861), which gained posthumous fame for Caussade, acknowledged by numerous reprints and a critical edition which appeared quite recently.[11] Caussade shows himself to be heir to the great authentically mystical Ignatian tradition as well as to Salesian influences. It is easily noticeable that he is also indebted to Surin and the Jesuits of the seventeenth century; moreover, Fénelon remains in many aspects his major stimulus. Just like the latter, Caussade wanted to lead man to pure faith and pure love, to guide him in holy indifference to a total devotion to God and to introduce him to contemplation beyond all conceptual and didactic ways. Caussade's remarkable literary talent ranks him among the foremost of the religious authors, a position granted him by our time, whereas in his own time he was scarcely known beyond the circle of his charges.

---

[6] See G. van den Berghe, Anne-Madeleine de Rémusat (Paris 1877).

[7] See J. Bremond, Le courant mystique au XVIII^e^ siècle, l'abandon dans les lettres du P. Milley (Paris 1943).

[8] See R. Daeschler, "Le P. Judde et la 'tradition mystique,'" RAM 11 (1930), 17–36.

[9] See Madeleine Huillet d'Istria, Le P. de Caussade et la querelle du Pur amour (Paris 1964).

Aside from him—albeit on a slightly lower level—a few others should be mentioned. The Capuchin friar Ambroise de Lombez (1708–87) was the author of a small Traité de la paix intérieure (1757). Reprinted frequently even today, it manifests a very subtle and well-balanced moralism with a discreet mystical quality. The Jesuit Guilleaume Berthier (1704–82) was a defender of the great mystics, especially John of the Cross and Jean de Bernières in his treatises collected under the title Réflexions spirituelles (1790). The work of yet another Jesuit of this period, Barthélémy Baudrand, (1701–87), which demonstrates a great wealth of spiritual themes, looses by its prolixity. But towards the end of the century we encounter a truly great author in the Jesuit Jean-Nicolas Grou (1731–1803), who was also influenced by the Sisters of the Visitation. In England, where he was forced to seek refuge in 1792, he composed the major part of his voluminous work, which was not published until the nineteenth century and is read even now. It presents to us in an admirable form a profound mystically oriented doctrine of the inner life. This context also requires mention of Pierre-Joseph Picot de Clorivière (1735–1820) who, although active in the subsequent period, played a significant part in the reconstruction of the Society of Jesus.[12]

---

[10] Reedited by H. Bremond under the title: Bossuet maître d'oraison (Paris 1931).

[11] J. P. de Caussade, Lettres spirituelles, ed. by M. Olphe-Gaillard, 2 vols. (Paris 1961–64); L'abandon à la Providence divine, ed. by M. Olphe-Gaillard (Paris 1966).

Popular Devotions

We have already mentioned that devotions continued to be popular among the people in the seventeenth century, but the educated public took a critical stance towards them, demanding moderation and theological distinctions. Some aspects of the devotion to Mary, especially, were questioned. But the spirited controversy provoked in 1673 by Widenfeld's Monita salutaria and continued in 1693 by the pamphlet De la vraie dévotion à la Sainte Vierge et du culte qui lui est dû by the Jansenist sympathizer Andrien Baillet barely reached into the eighteenth century. It was simply a case of special caution being applied on this point. But it was precisely this epoch that witnessed the work of Saint Louis-Marie Grignion de Montfort (1673–1716),[13] whom posterity has considered one of the great apostles of the devotion to Mary. Yet the question arises of whether (at least to some extent) this might not be a case of optical illusion. His work has been handed down to us under very unsure circumstances. His career, short but checkered, was primarily occupied with his missionary work, in which the devotion to Mary played a significant although not exclusive role. This is the case in the only work he ever published, the Lettres aux amis de la Croix. L'amour de la Sagesse éternelle, which he left in manuscript form and the accurate text of which was not published until 1929, is certainly the best of his writings. In it the influence of Suso is combined with that of the Bérulle school, which he received during his education at Saint-Sulpice. But the significance of his Traité de la vraie dévotion à la Sainte Vierge, now his best-known work, should not be exaggerated. To be sure, the idea of Marian servitude advocated by him is highly interesting, yet it resumes—in a very personal form—a practice reaching back into the sixteenth century and used by Bérulle. But one must question to what extent Montfort actually disseminated it beyond just a small circle of the initiated. It is certain that the manuscript of the Vraie devotion was forgotten after the death of its author. Rediscovered in 1842, it was published a year later and did not find an echo until the nineteenth century. Although the doctrine presented in the pamphlet cannot be faulted, some of its formulations would hardly have permitted its publication in the eighteenth century.

---

[12] See P. de Clorivière, Prière et oraison, ed. by A. Rayez (Paris 1961).

[13] See Saint Louis-Marie Grignion de Montfort, Œuvres complètes, ed. by M. Gendrot et al. (Paris 1966).

The spread of the Sacred Heart devotion within the framework treated here was in fact one of the most significant elements characterizing the eighteenth century. Although it prevailed in the end, it was preceeded by lengthy controversies. We have seen that at the end of the preceding century this devotion had assumed two forms: that of Saint John Eudes, the more theologically oriented form, and the more emotional one of Saint Margaret Mary Alacoque, whose central idea was penance. This latter form was able to prevail very quickly, propagated by the Sisters of the Visitation and the Society of Jesus, who then accorded a central position to the revelations of Saint Margaret Mary and emphasized the painful and human aspect, as symbolized by the human heart of Jesus. These traits appeared very clearly even in the first of the significant works dedicated to this topic, that of the Jesuit Jean Croiset (1656–1738). Published in Louvain, it was very successful, but it was also resisted to the same extent, especially from within the ranks of the Jesuits. In 1704 it was finally placed on the Index. In the meantime another Jesuit, François Froment (1649–1702) had published his Véritable dévotion au Sacré-Cœur (1699), in which the theological reasoning is more thoroughly worked out. But the decisive work was written by Joseph de Gallifet (1663–1749), who occupied an especially influential position by virtue of his office as assistant to the Jesuit general in Rome. In 1726 he submitted to the Congregation of Rites a very important memorandum "De cultu sacrosancti Cordis," in which he developed the theological reasons for the devotion, perhaps insisting too much on the heart as the seat of the emotions and on the revelations of Margaret Mary. Prosper Lambertini, the future Pope Benedict XIV, took a stand against him and on 12 July 1727 the congregation gave him a negative reply, reiterated in 1729, concerning the introduction of the celebration of this feast. This did not discourage Gallifet; in 1733 he had a French translation of his work published under the title L'excellence de la dévotion au Cœur adorable de Jésus-Christ in which the major part of Margaret Mary's autobiography appeared for the first time.

At about this point a rather important episode occurred in this connection. In 1729 Languet de Gergy, bishop of Soissons and late archbishop of Sens, had published his Vie de la Vénérable Mère Marguerite Alacoque. Although at this time the work was attributed to the Jesuits, to whom Languet had merely lent his name, the latter does seem to have been the actual author who had edited the documents placed at his disposal by the convent of Paray-le-Monial. By the criteria of his time the work was not bad. But Languet was then one of the celebrities of anti-Jansenism and the book inevitably provoked the opposition of that group which had earlier been indifferent to the Sacred Heart devotion. This hostility, which we have already mentioned earlier, became especially virulent after 1765. But in view of the progressive weakening of the Jansenist party at that time its opposition had no more than a limited effect, presenting no obstacle to the continued development of the devotion, which was able to spread almost everywhere.[14]

On 26 January 1765 a brief by Clement XIII finally approved a Mass and an office for the Sacred Heart of Jesus for Poland and the Roman archfraternity. This made possible the liturgical devotion wherever there was a desire to introduce it. In 1748 an altar had been dedicated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus at the church of Saint-Sulpice in Paris. On 22 June 1767 a pastoral letter by the archbishop of Paris, Christophe de Beaumont, ordered the feast of the Sacred Heart to be celebrated in his diocese, and several other dioceses followed suit. The polemic now reached its climax. Disregarding it, Fumel, the bishop of Lodève, published a pamphlet Le cult de l'amour divin ou la dévotion au Sacré-Cœur de Jésus which was violently attacked by the Jansenists. Yet the confraternities dedicated to the Sacred Heart multiplied almost everywhere and attracted followers even among that segment of the aristocracy who remained tied to the traditional religion. This astonishing growth explains the fact that devotion to the Sacred Heart continued to flourish unimpaired even during the Revolution.

---

[14] See L. Cognet, "Les jansénistes et le Sacré-Cœur," Le Cœur, Études carmélitaines (Paris 1950), 234–53.

CHAPTER 22

Anglican Spirituality in the Eighteenth Century

The Anglican spirituality of the seventeenth century produced fruitful and manifold impulses. They reflect the essence of a profound but highly intellectual piety tied strictly to the Gospel, best exemplified by Bishop Lancelot Andrewes (1555–1626).[1] His Preces privatae is an admirable collection of poetry compiled from biblical texts and written almost exclusively in Greek. Newman, a great admirer of this work, published its well-known translation in a series of pamphlets by the Oxford movement. Other authors express this sort of piety by poetry of a tender mystical lyricism. This is the case with John Donne (1572–1631), a passionate and complex figure, and more so with the admirable Henry Vaughan (1622–95), some of whose poems, as for example "The Night," remind us of John of the Cross.[2] Yet other poets anticipated pietism, especially the strange Nicholas Ferrar and the Puritan Thomas Goodwin (1600–1680), whose work The Heart of Christ in Heaven towards Sinners on Earth (1642) was a precursor to the Sacred Heart devotion.[3] The Platonizing tendency, well developed especially among the educated circles of Oxford, brought forth interesting and curious works, especially those of Henry More. He was under the influence of the esoteric mysticism of Jakob Böhme, who enjoyed great esteem in seventeenth-century England; Charles I had a personal interest in him and had his works translated. One of the most interesting works from the Puritan circles is that of John Bunyan (1628–88), a tinker who became a popular preacher. He achieved lasting fame through his treatise Grace abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666), but even more so through his Pilgrim's Progress (1678),[4] expressing a spirituality which—while intellectually meager—is pragmatic and soulful. Even more interesting—by virtue of his position at the periphery of the official Churches—is the case of the founder of the Quaker movement, George Fox (1624–91).[5] His intriguing diary offers a beautiful itinerary of his calling; his numerous spiritual treatises develop an illumination theory sharply opposed to all institutional Churches, but especially to Catholicism.[6] His protégé, William Penn (1644–1719), the founder of the Quaker state of Pennsylvania, was much more tolerant. In his famous treatise No Cross, no Crown (1669) he defends the Quaker view of life and does not hesitate to quote an excerpt from the biography of the Baron de Renty by the Jesuit Saint-Jure as proof of his thesis that the soul must concentrate on a point in the sea of destruction.

---

[1] See P. A. Welsby, Lancelot Andrewes (London 1958).

This quote raises the question of the influence of continental spirituality on Anglicanism. An examination of the total picture shows that this influence was very significant even in the seventeenth century and that it deepened even more during the following centuries. The English public was very much interested in the religious controversies which were stirring up France and frequently interpreted them in an antipapal sense. In general their sympathies were with Port-Royal and the Jansenists, who were viewed as the least corrupted among the Roman Catholics. Numerous texts of Jansenist origin were quickly translated into English, among them the Provinciales (1657) and the Pensées (1704) by Pascal. In 1669 Theophile Gale published The True Idea of Jansenism; based on his stay in France, his work is remarkably well informed and perspicacious. But some other representatives of French spirituality were also highly respected. The Puritan J. Alleine invoked De Renty, just as Penn had. The famous historian G. Burnet (1643–1715), a bishop with latitudinarian tendencies, did likewise. R. Roach, who had at first been a member of the sect of the Philadelphians, inspired by Böhme, and had then become a millenarian, expressed his admiration for the mystics from Francis de Sales to Fénelon (1725).

---

[2] See F. E. Huntchinson, Henry Vaughan, a Life and Interpretation (Oxford 1947).

[3] See M. Kyne, "Goodwin," DSAM 6 (1966), 601.

[4] See A. Talon, John Bunyan, l'homme et l'œuvre (Paris 1948).

[5] See P. Held, Der Quäker George Fox, sein Leben, Wirken, Kämpfen, Leiden, Siegen (Basel 1953).

[6] See P. Janelle, "Fox," DSAM 5 (1963), 770–79.

At the very beginning of the eighteenth century the influence of Fénelon and Mme Guyon in England was indeed very considerable.[7] There was also a noticeable influence of a much less convincing mystic, Antoinette Bourignon (1616–80), who was officially a Catholic but joined a variation of illuminatism, similar to that of the Quakers. While English publicists ironically compared the Quakers with the quietists of the continent, the Quakers themselves devoutly invoked Fénelon, Mme Guyon, and Antoinette Bourignon. Between 1727 and 1738 one of them, Josiah Martin, published translations of Fénelon and Mme Guyon, while Nathanael Hooke, a Catholic sympathizer and friend of Pope's, translated the Vie de Fénelon by Ramsay. Personal ties were soon formed. Numerous members of the English aristocracy visited Fénelon at Cambrai, where he had been banished, and Mme Guyon, exiled to Blois after she was set free. Both of them had a profound influence on the Protestant segment of England, especially on the followers of James II in Scotland, where several of their friends were arrested and executed during the rebellion of 1715. The most prominent personality of the Protestant group was André Michel Ramsay (1686–1743), who converted to Catholicism when he was with Fénelon and became secretary to Mme Guyon until her death.[8] A well-known physician from London, John Keith served as a focus for the whole group where all the correspondence converged. Through him Mme Guyon sent a copy of her autobiography to England. This entire group also had great appreciation for Pierre Poiret (1646–1719), a pietist pastor of Calvinist origin, editor of the works of Mme Guyon, Antoinette Bourignon, and of many other mystical texts. Their admiration was, by the way, quite eclectic, extending as it did to Francis de Sales, Pascal, Renty, Olier, Surin, Laurent de la Résurrection, a fellow Carmelite well liked by Fénelon, as well as to a simple Breton servant woman, Armelle Nicolas (1606–71), called the Bonne Armelle.[9] [7] See J. Orcibal, "L'influence spirituelle de Fénelon dans les pays anglo-saxons au XVIII^e siècle," XVII^e siècle 12–14 (1951/52), 276–87.

---

[8] See A. Chérel, Histoire de l'idée de tolérance: un aventurier religieux au XVIII^e siècle, A. M. Ramsay (Paris 1926); G. D. Henderson, Chevalier Ramsay (London 1952).

The Episcopalian milieu of Scotland was in fact strongly influenced by the mysticism of the continent since a command of French was widespread among the educated. Robert Leighton, originally Presbyterian and then Archbishop of Glasgow, had lived on the continent for a long time and maintained close ties with the Jansenists; like them he favored Augustinianism and had a certain preference for the early Church. In regard to spiritualism his most sincere sympathies were reserved for Francis de Sales, in whom he sought the idea of a preeminent inner religion beyond all dogmatic controversies. His pupil Henry Scongal, before his untimely death at a very young age, was able to publish a small volume oriented along those lines, The Life of God in the Soul of Man, whose many reprints attested to its success. Two of his friends, James and George Garden, Episcopalians and pastors in Aberdeen, continued his work. In 1699 James attacked the intransigent dogmatism of the Presbyterians in his Theologia comparativa, published by Poiret in a translation. George was initially a pupil of Antoinette Bourignon, but her strange ways worried him a bit and around 1710 when he discovered his ideal in Mme Guyon he embraced the latter's cause with great zeal.

Similar influences were at work in the circle of those clerics who had refused to swear the oath of loyalty to William of Orange after the revolution of 1688. Spiritually and liturgically they formed a very interesting group, asserting themselves until the very beginning of the eighteenth century. They had close ties with French Gallicanism and Bossuet. In 1712 and 1718 efforts were made toward reunion. The pious bishop of Bath and Wells, Thomas Ken, who had a reputation for saintliness, sought his ideal in the Jansenist Nicolas Pavillon and was inspired by Pascal and Saint-Cyran. A member of the group, Francis Lee, translated Fénelon's pastoral letter concerning the love of God in 1715. Thus their ritualistic tendency by no means kept them from making the personal inner life the foremost goal of their efforts.

Among those who had refused the oath of loyalty, William Law (1686–1781) was an interesting personality and a great author. His convictions had forced him to leave Cambridge and he withdrew to the house of the historian Gibbon as tutor of the latter's family. As an author of devotional literature he was strongly influenced by Francis de Sales. While God must be the only object of human activity, he asserted that the Christian can arrive at holiness under all conditions. An expert in German religious thought, he was also influenced by Tauler and the Theologia teutsch. This concept of Christian perfection, at once challenging and elastic, is expressed in his two best works, Treatise of Christian Perfection (1726) and Serious Call to a Holy Life (1728), both of which—though especially the latter—are classics of the Anglican spiritual literature. Around 1733 he made the acquaintance of George Cheyne, a fashionable physician who took a passionate interest in mysticism. He was a friend of Pope's and pupil of the brothers Garden, as well as of the French eccentric Saint-Georges de Marsay. Under Cheyne's influence Law discovered Böhme, whom he learned to admire and through whom he arrived at a unique esoteric position. On the other hand, he severely criticized Antoinette Bourignon and Marsay; yet he consistently respected Fénelon and Mme Guyon.[10] Among Law's friends, John Heylin should be mentioned. He was a teacher at the cathedral school of Westminster Abbey and had lived in France for some time. In 1724 Heylin published Devotional Tracts concerning the Presence of God and other Religious Subjects, which includes texts by Fénelon, Mme Guyon, and, above all, Laurent de la Résurrection. In 1721 Heylin also published a translation of the homilies of the pseudo-Macarius, which had a strong influence on Wesley, who was one of his friends. Lastly, we cannot leave the topic of the High Church without making mention of Joseph Butler (1692–1752), bishop of Bristol and later of Durham, author of a work entitled The Analogy of Religion Natural and Revealed (1736), remarkable by virtue of its view of conscience and the supernatural which greatly influenced Newman during the latter's youth.

---

[9] See Le Gouvello, Armelle Nicolas dite la Bonne Armelle (Paris 1913).

John Wesley (1703–91) and Methodism

Of all the religious currents which were shaping England in the eighteenth century Methodism possessed the greatest vitality. Its founder's family was of Puritan origin; his parents, Samuel and Susanna Wesley, however, had staunchly adhered to the High Church and faithfully kept to its principles in their small parish of Epworth. The parents gave their large progeny of nineteen children an example of piety and learning. Samuel was enthusiastic about the early Church and occupied himself with the works of Bossuet and Arnauld; Susanna had memorized almost the entire translation of Pascal's Pensées by Kenneth

---

[10] See M. Grainger, William Law and the Life of the Spirit (London 1948); A. W. Hopkinson, About William Law (London 1948).

(1704). The example set by his family could not but influence Wesley strongly; he belonged to the High Church until 1737. Later on he reproached himself for indifference in his spiritual life until 1725. At this point he experienced his first conversion, in which he also involved his brother Charles, who appears to have played a prominent role in the subsequent events. This first experience, which prompted Wesley to devote himself entirely to God, was influenced by reading the Imitation by Jeremy Taylor and the works of Scongal and Law. As we know, the latter two were very much steeped in the mystics of the continent. Wesley now sought to go back to the sources. Around 1730 he read Francis de Sales, Pascal, Quesnel, and Fénelon. At this time he was also influenced by Heylin in a clearly mystical sense. In 1732 he had the opportunity of making the acquaintance of William Law, but as a person the latter disappointed him.[11] On the other hand, he was still fascinated by the vision of the original Church. He now read Les mœurs des chrétiens by the confirmed Gallican historian Claude Fleury (1640–1723), who was a friend of Fénelon's and Bossuet's. At about this time he also read Tillemont and in 1733 he even sought the acquaintance of the latter's translator, Thomas Deacon. Together with his brother and some other fellow students he founded a student society in Oxford, the "Holy Club," where he lectured about his ideas. At that time he discovered the work Vie de Renty by Saint-Jure, who was also revered by his father. Its discovery was followed by that of Tauler, Mme Guyon, and Molinos.

In point of fact, Wesley, during the years 1731–36, underwent a severe inner crisis and sought help from the Catholic mystics. Towards the end of this crisis he took part in a missionary expedition to Georgia. But the meager success of this mission caused him great disappointment and affected him profoundly. In the course of this mission he met the Moravian Brethren, pupils of Zinzendorf, who was a strange mystic of illuminism. After his return to England a short time later Wesley initiated personal ties with Zinzendorf. For a time the Lutheran-inspired Moravian Brethren caused him to give primary importance to the idea of justification solely on the basis of faith and the idea that the justification of man is solely the justice of Christ imputed to him.[12] At the occasion of a conference of the Moravian Brethren on 24 May 1738 Wesley heard a reading of Luther's introduction to the letter to the Romans. This became a decisive element, causing his second, his "evangelical" conversion. He felt his heart "strangely warmed" and received the inner conviction that Christ had forgiven his sins and saved him from the law of sin and death. After a short sojourn in Germany, where he visited the communities of the Moravian Brethren, Wesley, supported by his brother Charles and some of his pupils, began to pronounce his ideas by means of open-air or field preaching. To this task he dedicated himself until his death with a courage and stamina that shrank from nothing. He gave about forty thousand sermons, and we also have a considerable number of hymns composed by his brother Charles for those camp meetings. But John Wesley did not want to be a "dissenter" at all. What he actually wanted was to give people a personal religious life within the framework of the established Church and he consistently refused to give up those ties which connected him with official Anglicanism. He was accused of "enthusiasm," meaning an irrational illuminism, and for that reason he encountered strenuous resistance, especially on the part of Joseph Butler. But Wesley did not change his position. He knew how to organize and sweep along his listeners so that soon he had strong groups of followers. He divided them into classes of twelve faithful each who were under the direction of a leader who was responsible for their spiritual progress. These firm and clearly delineated structures impressed public opinion; hence the name "Methodism," initially given to them somewhat scoffingly. As a matter of fact, the activities of Wesley and his group had the effect generally of raising the social and human level of his followers, having a positive and beneficial influence on English society.

---

[11] See J. B. Green, John Wesley and William Law (London 1948).

[12] See J. E. Rattenbury, The Conversion of the Wesleys (London 1937).

Early on Wesley apparently started to keep a diary whose entries as of 1735 have come down to us, still partly unpublished. Aside from being a fascinating document concerning his travels and sermons, it also offers us a spiritual experience of rare quality, some points of which, however, remain obscure. It is, for example, not easy to find out why Wesley in 1736, towards the end of his crisis, turned against the same mystics from whom he had sought help and solace before. He reproaches them for their excessive desire to isolate the Christian in solitude and for their attempt to reinterpret the inner trials as constituting grace while he saw in it nothing but a sign of God's anger. His brother Charles, although his confidant, did not follow him in this. As we shall see, Wesley later on changed his position without, however, expressly revoking it and included the mystics in his anthologies. At any rate, it is certain that his experience of 24 May 1728 was not the last of his spiritual trials; his state of depression lasted for several months until he regained his inner peace. Several commentators think that this is proof enough for questioning the actual significance of that experience. But the value which Wesley himself gave to it contradicts this interpretation. There can be no doubt that the analysis of his own case led him to put his "evangelical" experience on a much less sentimental level than some of his successors did and to put it manifestly in the area of a moral decision.

Thus Wesley arrived at very complex points of view regarding certain Protestant positions. He had always been an opponent of the Calvinist idea of predestination and on this point he soon contradicted his pupil Whitefield. But to the extent in which he became aware that conversion had to be translated into a challenge within practical life he rejected the Lutheran idea of justification solely through faith and without good works. No doubt he held the opinion that Christ is the sole savior and that man is saved only by believing in Him. On this point he completely shared the Christocentricity of the Moravian Brethren, but without accepting its sentimental and pious aspects. More and more he arrived at the conviction that faith could be given valid expression only through works. Luther's commentary on the letter to the Galatians and his reflection on the letter of James which Luther called an "epistle of straw" seemed blasphemous to him. At the same time he began to reject the idea of imputed justice as absurd. On this point he was contradicted by the Moravian Brethren and Zinzendorf; he conferred with the latter on 3 September 1741, but their talk was disappointing because each persisted in his position. Shortly thereafter Wesley encountered similar resistance from some of the members of his own movement.

Yet his ideas continued to develop in this direction. More and more he arrived at the conviction that justification had to be connected with a progressive sanctification through man, a sanctification achieved through his own efforts under divine grace, leading man to a genuine moral progress. In his eyes, faith acted through love and love was developed through deeds. Factually he drew away farther and farther from the positions of Protestantism while approaching traditional Catholic ethics; from this he unhesitatingly drew the moral consequences necessary for the actual ministry. Once he did this, he encountered the problem of creating the instruments and aids for his faithful which they needed on this path towards perfection. For this purpose he published the fifty volumes of his Christian Library (1750–56), a collection of spiritual anthologies to which more volumes of the same genre were added later on.[13] Its very eclectic selection is highly significant. Naturally the English and among them the Anglicans are most prominently represented, but there are also many Puritans whose seriousness and Christocentrism Wesley appreciated. There are some German Pietists, especially Arndt. The Spanish are represented by John of Ávila, Gregor López and Molinos. Because of their exclusively mystical orientation, Wesley did not include Saint Teresa and Saint John of the [13] See J. Orcibal, "Les spirituels français et espagnols chez John Wesley et ses contemporains," RHR (1951), 50–109; idem, "L'originalité théologique de John Wesley et les spiritualités du continent," RH (1959), 51–80.

---

Cross. The French are heavily represented with Laurent de la Résurrection, Fénelon, Mme Guyon, Antoinette Bourignon, Saint-Cyran, Pascal, Du Guet, De Renty, and Armelle Nicolas. In his selection Wesley seems to have been inspired by similar anthologies of Pierre Poiret, although he limited the proportion of mystics.

In such a perspective the spirituality of John Wesley, without loosing its elasticity, gradually reassumed the moral and even pragmatic shadings which were given a rare communicative value by virtue of his eloquence. Of course he encountered the spirited resistance not only of the Calvinists, who accused him of giving man the possibility of saving himself by his own power, but also that of the established Church, which he stirred from its lethargy by reminding it emphatically of the urgency of its apostolic task. But it must also be admitted that he developed, especially towards the end of his life, a certain indifferentism towards the strictly dogmatic aspects by moderating their severities and lessening their significance. This point of departure, to be sure, enabled him to create an attractive, albeit fragile, synthesis between the Protestant doctrine of grace and the Catholic ethic of sanctification. The respectable spread of Methodism after Wesley's death attests to the vitality of the spiritual enthusiasm he created. But the Calvinist orientation of many of his disciples shows how difficult it was to maintain that doctrinal balance for which Wesley had hoped.[14] [14] See H. Lindeström, John Wesley and Sanctification (Uppsala 1946); C. G. Cell, John Wesley's Theology (Cokesbury 1950).

---

CHAPTER 23

Episcopalism in the Church of the Empire from the Middle of the Seventeenth to the End of the Eighteenth Century

Practical Episcopalism from the End of the Seventeenth to the Beginning of the Eighteenth Century

The roots of the seventeenth and eighteenth-century episcopalism of the Church of the Empire extend back to the late Middle Ages.[1] Spanning the Council of Trent and the Reformation, it tied in with the reaction against papal claims in the late Middle Ages, with the church reform movement of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the Councils of Constance and Basel and the prereformational gravamina. As a practical episcopalism it initially based its claims concerning beneficiary rights, episcopal jurisdiction, and payments to the Curia on the Concordat of Vienna of 1448. Using the controversial clause "In aliis autem" (buttressed by historical research) as its point of departure, episcopalism next extended the basis of its claim to the Princes Concordats of 1447, which were acknowledged in the above clause and were much more advantageous to the Church of the Empire. Finally it advanced as a rationale the Mainz Acceptation of 1439, comparable to the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, the basic law of the Gallican Church. After 1762 the episcopalism of the Church of the Empire viewed as its basic law and program the Basel Decrees accepted in Mainz.[2] The attempt to reform the Church's constitution in favor of episcopalism, simultaneously changing the ecclesiastical principalities into modern, enlightened absolutist states on a Catholic foundation was shaky from the start. It was to be brought about by reviving the decrees of the Council of Basel; in some places there was even talk of overcoming the religious schism. This attempt, however, was immediately countered by more than three hundred years of ecclesiastical and imperial history; it was full of inner contradictions and doomed to failure by the empiric-historic method it was based on.

---

[1] L. Mergentheim, "Die Wurzeln des deutschen Febronianismus," HPBl 139 (1907), 180–92; H. Raab, Die Concordata Nationis Germanicae (Wiesbaden 1956); A. Werminghoff, Nationalkirchliche Bestrebungen (Stuttgart 1910); F. Vigener, "Gallikanismus und episkopalistische Strömungen," HZ 111 (1913), 495–581.

The Council of Trent had created decisively positive as well as negative conditions for the revival of episcopalism a century after its last sessions. The less the ecclesiastical territories were threatened in their existence and the more the prince-bishops concentrated on their ecclesiastical and political tasks,[3] the more frequent were the quarrels with the papal nuncios in Cologne, Vienna, Lucerne, and with the Roman Curia about violations of the Vienna Concordat, the archiepiscopal indults for the papal months, quinquennial faculties, the jurisdiction of the nunciatures, annates, confirmation fees, pallium payments, exemptions, and decimations.[4] [2] H. F. Hürten, "Die Mainzer Akzeptation," (unpubl. diss., Münster 1955); H. Raab, Concordata, 125 ff.

---

[3] The archbishop of Salzburg, Wolf Dietrich, had already prepared the theory that he was a prince of the Empire holding the archdiocese as a vassal of the Emperor. As a prince, he asserted, he was not subject to the authority of the Pope and would furthermore remain a prince even if he resigned as bishop (F. Martin, Salzburgs Fürsten in der Barockzeit [Salzburg 1966], 36).

[4] W. Michel, Das Wiener Konkordat vom Jahre 1448 und die nachfolgenden Gravamina des Primarklerus der Mainzer Kirchenprovinz (diss., Heidelberg 1929); L. Mergentheim, Die Quinquennalfakultäten pro foro externo (Stuttgart 1908); A. Franzen, "Eine Krise der deutschen Kirche im 17. Jh.?" RQ 49 (1954), 56–111.

In the first decades after the Treaty of Westphalia, leadership of the opposition in the Church of the Empire was represented by the elector-archbishops of Mainz and Cologne, Johann Philipp von Schönborn[5] and Max Heinrich von Bayern. In his capacity as lord chancellor of the Empire, Johann Philipp considered it his foremost task to watch over the liberties and rights of the German nation. As archbishop of the Metropolis Germaniae, concerned with the reform of the higher and lower clergy, he complained in 1648 about the diminution of his ordinary rights by the Cologne nunciature. He was confirmed in his hostility to the nunciature by his political and Gallican views as well as by the unionist intentions and anti-Roman sentiments on the part of several of his advisers, especially the convert Johann Christian von Boineburg.[6] For the Cologne elector Max Heinrich, whose heated disputes with Johann Philipp concerning the right of coronation had been resolved in the so-called Coronation Tractate of 1657,[7] there were several causes for the outbreak of tensions with Rome in 1659. Among them were theological and canonical misgivings regarding the direct interference of the nuncios, especially those of Cologne and Liège, with their idea of the special rights of a "born legate of the Holy See"; the influence of his favorite, Franz Egon von Fürstenberg, who was oriented towards the Gallican model; and, most importantly, the Wittelsbach church policy.

In this regard it should be stressed that nine years earlier, in 1650, the election of the very pious, yet weak Max Heinrich in Münster had been rejected by Christoph Bernhard von Galen because Max Heinrich "was too much a cleric to be a good ruler and general as demanded by the times."[8] When his brother Albrecht Sigismund planned to resign,[9] he sought to succeed him in the bishopric of Freising, although he already held the Cologne electorate and the prince-bishoprics of Hildesheim and Liège; as far as political power was concerned Freising was insignificant. With some justification it was later designated as "our parish" by the elector Max Emanuel.[10] With only two interruptions, the Wittelsbach dynasty ruled the prince-bishopric from the middle of the sixteenth to the middle of the eighteenth century. But it was an "arcanum" of Freising politics in no case ever to separate from the Emperor and the Empire. One of the goals of the Wittelsbach church policy had always been to unite Freising in a personal union with either the old Bavarian bishopric of Regensburg or the ecclesiastic secundogeniture in the northwest German Germania Sacra, founded by Duke Ernst. In addition to Max Heinrich, the other candidates for Freising were Cardinal Friedrich of Hesse,[11] Franz Egon von Fürstenberg, and the prince-bishop of Osnabrück and Regensburg, Franz Wilhelm von Wartenberg, progeny of the marriage of Duke Ferdinand of Bavaria to a commoner.

---

[5] G. Mentz, Johann Philipp v. Schönborn. Kurfürst von Mainz, Bischof von Würzburg u. Worms 1605–73 (Jena 1899) 172 f.; re. Johann Philipp see also LThK IX (1964), 451 and biblio.

[6] NDB 2 (1955), 424 f.; St. v. Dunin Borkowski, "Aus der Briefmappe eines berühmten Konvertiten des 17. Jh.," StdZ 105 (1923), 132–47. The following quote from a letter by Boineburg to Hermann Conring (23 January 1659) is characteristic: "Let the Romans hate us, as long as they fear us."

[7] G. Mentz, Johann Philipp II, 20 f.; A. M. Reitzel, Das Mainzer Krönungsrecht und die politische Problematik (Mainz 1963); G. Wallner, Der Krönungsstreit zwischen Kurköln und Kurmainz (1653—57) (diss., Mainz 1967).

[8] W. Kohl, Christoph Bernhard von Galen. Politische Geschichte des Fürstbistums Münster 1650–1678 (Münster 1964), 3.

[9] Albrecht Sigismund had been elected coadjutor of Freising at the age of sixteen; he was religious and without blemish. Upon entering his office he applied for dispensation from consecration (H. E. Feine, Die Besetzung der Reichsbistümer vom Westfälischen Frieden bis zur Säkularisation [Stuttgart 1921; reprint, Amsterdam 1964], 35, 38f.).

But Pope Alexander VII refused to accept Albrecht Sigismund's resignation unless the Holy See were granted the unreserved right to the new appointment; he withdrew the election rights from the Freising chapter and ordered the nuncio to thwart the election of the Cologne elector.[12] These differences, stemming from the policies of the Wittelsbach imperial Church were intensified by the failure of Max Heinrich's designs on Paderborn, because of the quarrels covering the quinquennial faculties and the archiepiscopal indults to fill the benefices becoming vacant during the papal months. In the fall of 1660—probably on the advice of his minister Franz Egon von Fürstenberg, who was hostile to Rome—Max Heinrich suggested the convocation of a national council to counter the presumptiousness of the Holy See and the abuses in the Church of the Empire.

According to the Vienna nuncio, this was to be accompanied by the reunion project, the so-called "Mainz Plan," propagated in September 1660 by Frankfurt.[13] Its goal was said to be the reunion of the Church into a national Church achieved by means of far-reaching concessions to the Protestants. One year later, in November 1661, the Cologne nuncio, Marco Gallio, declared that he had heard of a plan of an intended union between the three ecclesiastical electors in order to "realize an absolute power of disposition over all church benefices, independent of Rome."[14]

[10] B. Hubensteiner, Vom Geist des Barock. Kultur und Frömmigkeit im alten Bayern (Munich 1967), 37.

[11] F. Noack, "Kardinal Friedrich von Hessen. Großprior in Heitersheim," ZGObRh 80 (1928), 341–86.

[12] A. Franzen, Krise der deutschen Kirche, 87 f.; A. A. Levinson, "Nuntiaturberichte vom Kaiserhofe Leopolds I.," AÖG 103 (1913), 667ff.

[13] See Chap. 27 : "Attempts at Church Reunion."

[14] A. Franzen, Krise der deutschen Kirche, 103.

At the Imperial Diet in Regensburg violent attacks against Rome were to be expected. According to testimony by the Salzburg archbishop Guidobald von Thun, the elector-archbishop of Cologne intended "di costituire un patriarca in Germania e di costituire o almeno d'introdurre nel clero dell'imperio la prattica e lo stilo della chiesa Gallicana."[15] The compromise, achieved by conciliatory action of the Pope, was of short duration. In 1665 the Diet and the Supreme Court in Speyer unequivocally opposed the practice of appeals to the Pope and the nuncios in trials concerned with temporal matters.

A first climax in the opposition by the Church of the Empire is the gravamina of the three Rhenish elector-archbishops in 1673.[16] Max Heinrich, elector-archbishop of Cologne and prince-bishop of Liège and Hildesheim; Lothar Friedrich von Metternich, elector-archbishop of Mainz and prince-bishop of Speyer and Worms; and Karl Kaspar von der Leyen, elector-archbishop of Trier formally protested the violations of the Vienna Concordat concerning the freedom of episcopal elections, the annates, and the right of appointing beneficiaries. They demanded that the Curia respect the indults granted the archbishops when the Vienna Concordat was accepted and, further, that the German Church not be placed at a disadvantage compared to the French and Spanish Church.

Nor was there any lack of complaints in the future about violations of the concordat and interferences by the nuncios in the ordinary episcopal jurisdiction. When Archduke Joseph was elected Roman King (1690), the electorate of Trier moved to renew the formulation of gravamina against the Holy See. The pertinent article of the electoral capitulation,[17] which had bound even Ferdinand III in 1654 to remove jurisdiction in temporal matters from the nunciatures and the Roman Curia and to insist on the observance of the concordat, had been discussed again and again. At the election of Charles VI in 1711 that article was reformulated as ARTICLE XIV, remaining valid until the time of Leopold II. A "language quite corresponding"[18] to the Punctation of Ems in 1786 appeared in a complaint by the Corpus Evangelicorum as early as 1703, when it intervened in the quarrel that began in 1699 between the Roman Curia and the cathedral chapter of Münster concerning the appointment to the provostship. Similar conflicts ensued between the Curia and the cathedral chapters of Worms and Constance.[19] The episcopal attitude of the Mainz chapter during the waning seventeenth century, hostile to the nunciatures, is sufficiently characterized by the remarks of the Cologne nuncio Buonvisi: "Non essendoci niuno provisto dalla Santa Sede, non vi è chi voglia havere corrispondenza col Nuntio."[20] Elector-Archbishop Lothar Franz von Schönborn resolutely opposed all attempts on the part of the Cologne nunciature to communicate officially with Mainz or Bamberg, since "neither the archbishopric of Mainz nor the local bishopric (Bamberg) are located within the boundaries of his legation, but are both ab omni nuntiatura free and directly subject to the Holy See."[21]

---

[15] Caraffa, Regensburg, 26 Dec. 1663 quoted in A. Levinson, Nuntiaturberichte, 763.—G. Mentz (Johann Philipp, 184) mentions demands to convoke a combined German-French council towards resisting the presumptions of the Holy See.

[16] The Gravamina of 1673 in Gärtner, Corp. jur. II (1799), 322f.; F. J. Buß, Urkundliche Gesch. des National- und Territorialkirchentums in der kath. Kirche Deutschlands (Schaffhausen 1851), 702–10; H. Raab, Concordata, 67; concerning Lothar Friedrich, successor of Johann Philipp von Schönborn, elected with the help of the French, see M. Braubach, "Politische Hintergründe der Mainzer Koadjutorwahl von 1670," RhVjBl. 15/16 (1951), 313–38; also in M. Braubach, Diplomatie und geistiges Leben im 17. u. 18 Jh. (Bonn 1969), 43–77; on Max Heinrich, see A. Franzen, Krise der deutschen Kirche (with biblio.) and M. Braubach, Kurkölnische Miniaturen (Münster 1954), 1–24; concerning Karl Kaspar von der Leyen, see P. Pillorget, "La France et l'Électorat de Trèves au temps de Charles Gaspard de la Leyen (1652–76)," Revue d'histoire diplom. 78 (1964).—It is noteworthy that none of the elector-archbishops advocated the same political line. The archbishop of Trier was one of the most reliable followers of the Emperor. Metternich was expected to fix Mainz more firmly into the French system. Max Heinrich was weak and unreliable; under Fürstenberg's influence he tended towards France.

For a time it might have seemed as though Lothar Franz von Schönborn[22]—after his uncle Johann Philipp the second prominent lord chancellor of the Empire from that family which for three generations determined the episcopal history of Germany—would place himself at the head of the aspirations for a national Church. The relationship between the Rhenish archbishops and the Cologne nunciature deteriorated "to the outer limits of tolerance"[23] as a result of the proscription of Elector Joseph Clemens von Bayern, the most recent armed conflict between the Emperor and the Pope involving Comacchio, the execution of the controversial preces primariae. and, finally, the Privilegium illiminatum de non appellando granted to the electorate of Trier. As the executor of "First Prayers" and uncle of the imperial vice chancellor Friedrich Karl von Schönborn,[24] who with Joseph I was held responsible for the latter's anti-Roman policy (dictated by specific Habsburg interests), Lothar Franz was made to feel Rome's irritation at his coadjutor election in Bamberg and the demanded recantation. He found himself in a very delicate situation between the Emperor and the Pope. Yet in spite of his episcopal antipathy towards Rome and his patriotism for the Empire he did not permit himself to be made a tool of Josephinist church policy. This emerging dilemma of episcopal Germany caught between the Pope and the Emperor, or rather between Rome and Vienna, was at the same time aggravated by differences with the Catholic lay princes, as in the case of Elector Palatine Karl Philipp (from 1731 to 1734),[25] who managed—against the resistance of the prince-bishops—to shift their oppressive tax burdens onto the Church, thanks to papal indults. Practical episcopalism, even before it was provided with a sufficient theoretical foundation, was confronted at the beginning of the eighteenth century with the same constellation of forces which had frustrated it earlier in the fifteenth century.

---

[17] F. Hartung, "Die Wahlkapitulationen der deutschen Kaiser und Könige," HZ 107 (1911), 306–44; idem, Volk und Staat in der deutschen Gesch. (Leipzig 1940); G. Kleinheyer (Die kaiserliche Wahlkapitulation. Gesch. Wesen und Funktionen [Karlsruhe 1968]; does not deal with this problem.

[18] Mainzer Monatsschrift von geistlichen Sachen IV (1788), 420–23; H. Raab, Concordata, 68; F. Keinemann, Das Domkapitel zu Münster im 18. Jh. (Münster 1967), 85ff.

[19] K. Wild, Lothar Franz von Schönborn. Bischof von Bamberg u. Erzbischof von Mainz 1693–1729 (Heidelberg 1904), 154.—For the provision by the Swiss A. S. Reding which led to a lengthy conflict between the bishop and the cathedral chapter of Constance on one side and the Roman Curia, the nunciature of Lucerne, and the Helvetic Confederation on the other, see R. Reinhardt, Die Beziehungen von Hochstift und Diözese Konstanz zu Habsburg-Österreich in der Neuzeit (Wiesbaden 1966) 75f. The German party urged a settlement in Mainz where the "customs" of the German Church were well known and sought to obtain "as a matter of principle the imperial court or at least an ecclesiastic trial court in Germany as the place of venue for all disputes concerning aristocratic origin in the Church of the Empire." Emperor Leopold, in order to protect the imperial-Austrian position in the Lake Constance area against the influence of France and the Helvetic Confederation, emphatically took the part of the cathedral chapter.

[20] Buonvisi to Paluzzo-Altieri, Cologne, 2 Nov. 1670. F. Diaz, ed., Francesco Buonvisi. Nuntiatura a Colonia I (Rome 1959), 86.

[21] H. Weber, "Die Privilegien des alten Bistums Bamberg," HJ 20 (1899), 40, 634; A. Veit, "Die Kölner Nuntiatur und der Mainzer Hof," HPBl 167 (1921), 208–16.

The Canonical and Theological Foundation of Episcopalism in the Church of the Empire

The political-ecclesiastical opposition within the Church of the Empire against Rome, notwithstanding its severity in the first third of the eighteenth century, lacked a real theological and canonical foundation; it was only peripherally touched by the Enlightenment and not at all by theological rationalism. Only occasionally did such opposition arise because of the striving by ecclesiastical principalities for an order corresponding to their dual function within Church and Empire. Since the "evolution of Austria from the Empire" and the strengthening of the established Church within the monarchy the opposition could only occasionally rely on the Emperor as the Advocatus Ecclesiae, as the Vindex canonum. Aside from such occasions as the rejection of Gregory VII's "Offizium," the false "Hildebrandism," and "ultramontane"[26] principles practiced too openly, an appreciable reaction among the faithful occurred only during the conflict involving the Munich nunciature or the Udligenschwyl dispute. The episcopalism of the Church of the Empire can only vaguely be compared with Gallicanism. Even in its most radical utterances it never put in doubt the unity of the Church; it never strove for a German national Church, but merely for the securing of its rights and liberties.

---

[22] See LThK IX (1964), 452; H. Reifenberg, "Lothar Franz von Schönborn und die Liturgie im Bistum Bamberg," 103. Bericht des Histor. Vereins für die Pflege der Gesch. des ehemaligen Fürstbistums Bamberg (Bamberg 1967), 419–66.

[23] K. Walf, Entwicklung des päpstlichen Gesandtschaftswesens. 151.

[24] H. Hantsch, Reichsvizekanzler Friedrich Karl von Schönborn: M. Braubach, "Friedrich Karl von Schönborn und Prinz Eugen," Festgabe für H. Hantsch (Graz, Vienna and Cologne 1965), 111–31; also M. Braubach, Diplomatie und geistiges Leben im 17. und 18. Jh. (Bonn 1969), 301–20.

[25] H. Duchhardt, Philipp Karl von Eltz. Kurfürst von Mainz, Erzkanzler des Reiches (1732–1743) (Mainz 1969), 119f.

Efforts towards a justification of practical episcopalism based upon canon law and theology did not start until the end of the seventeenth century under the impact of the conflicts between Louis XIV and Innocent XI, the growing particular differences with the nuncios and Rome and with the acceptance of Gallican and Jansenist ideas and those concerning an enlightened established Church.[27] One of the pioneers of German church freedoms, the Protestant canonist Johannes Schilter, was indebted to Petrus de Marca in his work De libertate ecclesiarum Germaniae,[28] written one year after the Declaratio Cleri Gallicani. It contains the germ of Febronianism, intending to prepare the way for a reunification of the denominations by means of a reduction of the papal primacy of jurisdiction and the abandonment of the doctrine of papal infallibility. By its glorification of the medieval imperial power it reinforced the anti-Roman tendencies in the Church of the Empire. Episcopal, established Church, and Jansenist ideas were assimilated into the Church of the Empire from the theories of Zeger-Bernard Van Espen,[29] who published his pioneering Jus ecclesiasticum in 1700. The decisive stimuli for the canon law of the Empire and the theoretical justification of German episcopalism in the second third of the eighteenth century emanated from the Schönborn sphere of influence, even though the later Mainz suffragan bishop Schnernauer, during the years of feud between Cardinal Damian Hugo von Schönborn and his metropolitan, developed ideas which almost anticipated the Koblenz and Ems Punctations.

---

[26] H. Raab, "Zur Gesch. und Bedeutung des Schlagwortes 'ultramontan' im 18. und im frühen 19. Hh.," HJ 81 (1962), 159–73.

[27] For Bossuet's influence on Febronius, see J. Kuntziger, op. cit., 30, 40f. As yet a history of the reception of Bossuet in the Church of the Empire is lacking. Some references in this connection in H. Raab, Concordata, 64, 157. In the announcement of Bossuet's defense in the Mainzer Monatsschrift IV (1788), 496f., we find the following: ". . . daß dieses treffliche Buch an recht vielen Orten seine gesunden und wahren Grundsätze verbreite, curialistische Maßnahmen und den gesamten Isidorischen Sauerteig verbannen helfe."—On Jansenism in Germany, see the following work, which, while very much in need of updating, is still of primary importance: W. Deinhardt, Der Jansenismus in deutschen Landen (Munich 1929); also L. Just, "Die Bekämpfung des Jansenismus in der Erzdiözese Köln unter Josef Clemens (1703)," AHVNrh 136 (1940), 131–38; idem, "Der Trierer Weihbishchof Johann Mathias v. Eyss im Kampf gegen den Jansenismus (1714–1729)," AMrhKG 11 (1959), 160–89; H. Tüchle, "Die Bulle Unigenitus und die süddeutschen Prämonstratenser," HJ 74 (1955), 342–50; H. Raab, "Landgraf Ernst von Hessen-Rheinfels und der Jansenismus," AMrhKG 19 (1967), 41–60.

[28] J. Schilter, De libertate ecclesiarum Germaniae libri VII (Jena 1683); H. Raab, Concordata, 71ff. and Chap. 27 of this volume.

Among the professors at the seminary and university at Würzburg, where the former vice-chancellor Friedrich Karl von Schönborn had been rector since 1734, was a former pupil of Lambertini's, Johann Kaspar Barthel.[30] He was celebrated by his contemporaries as the prince of canonists and oracle of his century. In accordance with the charge by his bishop and ruler he taught a canon law which, adapted to the special German conditions, was at variance from what was taught in Rome. As the future Würzburg suffragan bishop Gregor Zirkel wrote in 1794, Barthel taught "the German Church to feel its rights and independence."[31] He contradicted the Jesuits and the Roman Curia with "German frankness," transplanted principles of French canonists to Germany, exposed Roman policies from history and thus created as many opponents to Rome as he had listeners. Barthel rejected an absolute form of governance by the Church for theological, historical and ecclesiopolitical reasons. According to him the doctrine of papal primacy should distinguish between essentialia, based on divine right, and accessoria, acquired by prescriptive right and historical development ("Olim non erat sic"). Papal primacy has not been granted "in destructionem sed in aedificationem ecclesiae" and could be limited in the interest of harmony between imperium and sacerdotium. The independence, coexistence, and orientation of ecclesiastical and temporal power towards a common goal makes it difficult, says Barthel, to delimit the authority and rights of the two since from the fulfillment of a common divine mandate grows the "quasi confusio" of ecclesiastical and temporal laws; from necessary mutual subordination arises the obligation to create harmony between Church and state.

---

[29] G. Leclerc, Zeger-Bernard van Espen (1648–1728) et l'autorité ecclésiastique. Contribution à l'histoire des théories gallicanes et du jansénisme (Zurich 1964).

[30] H. Raab, "Johann Kaspar Barthels Stellung in der Diskussion um die Concordata Nationis Germanicae," Heropolis jubilans (Würzburg 1953), 599–616; idem, Die Concordata Nationis Germanicae, 79–96; idem, Neller und Febronius.

[31] A. F. Ludwig, Weihbischof Zirkel von Würzburg in seiner Stellung zur theologischen Aufklärung und zur kirchlichen Restauration I (Paderborn 1904), 91.

The episcopalism of the Barthel school,[32] following the lines of the Schönborn sphere of influence, spread from Würzburg to the ecclesiastical states on the Main and Middle Rhine and from there to Bonn, Cologne, Salzburg, and to almost all the Catholic universities. Georg Christoph Neller,[33] the most prominent pupil of Barthel, was called to the chair for canon law at the University of Trier by Franz Georg von Schönborn.[34] His appointment, opposed by the Jesuits, had important consequences. It established the connection between the Franconian Enlightenment and the political and canonical views of the Church arising from the border situation of the archdiocese and from the differences with the Austrian Netherlands and France promoted by the spread of Jansenist ideas and those of the established Church. Such views were represented at the court of Ehrenbreitstein by the convert Jakob Georg von Spangenberg and his friend, the former officialis and later suffragan bishop Johann Nikolaus von Hontheim, especially after the negotiations involving the election stipulations of Emperor Charles VII (1742). Neller's tenure in Trier, his friendship and collaboration with Hontheim marked the turning point from episcopalism to Febronianism. His Principia juris ecclesiastici ad statum Germaniae accommodata, compiled substantially from Gallican authors and published anonymously in Frankfurt in 1746, made his name as a scholar. In it he sharply attacked the traditional constitutional doctrine of the Jesuit canonical position and intensified the episcopal theses. Spangenberg's wish—it is probable that Neller had already made Hontheim's acquaintance at that time—for a canonist who could differentiate between the original power of the Pope in church matters and the mere presumptions of the Curia appeared to be fulfilled by Neller's appointment. In his more than thirty years of teaching, in numerous publications Neller was largely responsible for the breakthrough of episcopal canon law in the Empire. As a friend and collaborator of Hontheim he occupies a superior place in the history of Febronianism.

---

[32] Students of Barthel from Franconia included the brothers Georg Christoph and Georg Franz Neller, their nephew Georg Philipp Leuxner, who was destined to succeed his uncle in Trier, and the ecclesiastical advisor of Archbishop Hieronymus von Colloredo and Salzburg's representative to the Ems Congress, Johann Michael Bönicke, the canonist and future suffragan bishop of Speyer, Philipp Anton Schmidt, his brother Michael Ignaz, "the historian of the Germans," as well as the canonists Johann Nepomuk Endres and Johann Josef Sündermahler. Franz Carl Joseph von Hillesheim (1731–1803), who played a prominent role in Cologne as an advocate of the episcopal interests, also studied under Barthel. Neller went on to become "the father of learning" in Trier. Most of the Rhenish episcopalians of the second half of the eighteenth century came from his school.

[33] H. Raab, Neller u. Febronius, 185–206.

[34] NDB V (1961), 370–71; LThK IX (1964), 453; E. H. Fischer, Ellwangen, Augsburg, Rom. Die Exemtion des Ellwanger Stifts und seine Exemtionspolitik unter Fürstpropst Franz Georg von Schönborn in den Jahren 1732–1749: Ellwangen 764–1964 [1964], 423) stresses that Franz Georg tied "his see of Ellwangen closely to the Holy See through his wise and purposeful exemption policy."

Febronius and Febronianism

According to corresponding testimony by Hontheim and Spangenberg, the immediate impetus for the genesis of Febronianism[35] was furnished during the negotiations for the election of Emperor Charles VII by the discussion of ARTICLE XIV of the imperial electoral capitulation concerning the German concordats, the Gravamina contra Curiam Romanam, and the demand by the electorate of Trier to abolish the jurisdiction of the nunciatures in Germany. Based on his study of the gravamina and the reform councils, Spangenberg suggested that a future work summarize the rights and liberties of the Church of the Empire after the model of the Gallicans Pithou, Dupuy, de Marca, as well as the Protestant canonist Johannes Schilter and that it create better conditions for surmounting the "Calamitas Imperii," for the reunification of the denominations, by a far-reaching reduction of papal claims. The erudite, personally irreproachable suffragan bishop Hontheim,[36] who followed in the tradition of Van Espen's school, encountered these problems in the course of his two decades of ministry in a large diocese. Through historical research, efforts to reform both the Church and the universities, but above all through scholarly collaboration with his friend Neller he hit upon possible solutions. Considerations for the Dutch and French part of the archbishopric of Trier required a modus vivendi with those governments which were oriented towards an established Church. Schönborn episcopalism had to be defended against Roman claims based upon ecclesiastical and political considerations. Religious and ecclesiastical reforms and political practice in the Church began to orient themselves after the ideal of the Ecclesia primitiva—the ex-Jesuit F. X. Feller called it "a whim of souls with a mania for innovation"—and to demand the restoration of a historically transfigured church constitution which had been spoiled by pseudo-Isidorianism and "Hildebrandism." Their demands were addressed one-sidedly to Rome, so that the transformation of ecclesiastical territories into enlightened absolutist states was not made impossible. These aims and a delimitation of the rights of the prince-bishops and the Pope, better corresponding to the interests of the Church of the Empire, were to be achieved, at least in part, by a work written under the pseudonym Justinus Febronius, De statu ecclesiase et legitima potestate Romani Pontificis liber singularis ad reuniendos dissidentes in religione christanos compositus[37] (Frankfurt 1763; reprints and supplements 1765–70; expanded to five volumes in 1770–74). The means to the goal were to be the revival of the Concordata Nationis Germanica integra, of the Mainz Acceptation of 1439, and the decrees of the reform Council of Basel. Reviving an idealized pre-Hildebrandian or pseudo-Isidorian church constitution was to provide the stimulus for a religious and ecclesiastical reform in connection with a moderate Enlightenment.[38] By means of the empirical-historical method, based on the Gallicans, Van Espen, and the Würzburg school of canonists, Febronius used the well-known distinction between the jura essentialia, quae tendeunt ad unitatis ecclesiae

---

[35] L. Just, Zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Febronius; idem, "Die römische Kurie und das Reich unter Karl VII. (1742–45)," HJ 52 (1932).

[36] A Hontheim biography is lacking. One-sided but still essential: O. Mejer, Febronius; also L. Just, Hontheim. Ein Gedenkblatt; H. Raab, Neller u. Febronius; L. Rechenmacher, Episkopalismus; F. Stümper, Kirchenrechtl. Ideen des Febronius; E. Reifart, Kirchenstaat Trier; H. Petersen, Febronianismus und Nationalkirche. Influenced by the church policy and "völkisch"-biological views of the National Socialist period, the author poses the question whether Febronius strove for a national Church in which the "national law of life" would find expression and all "alien intellectual claim of leadership is eliminated." But he concludes sadly that "Hontheim was lacking the fundament of a national world view ["völkische Weltanschauung"], which alone would have been capable of overcoming the universalistic exaggerations of the papal system" (154). The extent of agreement with Petersen, Mejer, and Zillich that a "national feeling" was the motive force behind Febronius' and the entire current of episcopalism is yet to be investigated. The designations "national feeling" and also "national Church" appear to me to be misapplied. Hontheim and the episcopals of the eighteenth century advocated "liberties" of the Church of the Empire. Imperial patriotism and anti-Roman sentiments were indeed among their impulses but not a "national feeling" or "völkische Weltanschauung."

---

[37] The original title of the work was: "Symbola quam(!) ad reuniendos in Religione dissidentes Christianos . . . in qua primario agitur de genuino statu et forma regiminis Ecclesiastici nec non legitima potestate Rom. Pontificis" (L. Just, Entstehung des Febronius, 377).—Originally it was planned, probably under the influence of Spangenberg, to have it printed in Göttingen, but then, just like Neller's first work, it appeared with Eßlinger in Frankfurt, most likely because Eßlinger's discretion was sufficiently well known to the Trier episcopals ever since the dispute involving Neller's Principia. Another reason was that Hontheim's friend Krufft knew that his old acquaintance Damian Friedrich Dumeiz there could supervise the printing.

[38] We should add a reminder that in 1748 Hontheim newly edited the Brevarium Trevirense and in 1767, following the Strasbourg example, edited a new rituale for the archdiocese. He also strove for improving university studies.

conservationem and the jura accessoria in order to relegate the papal primacy to a preeminence of honor after the model of the first eight Christian centuries. According to him, the Pope is not entitled to a jurisdiction competing with that of the bishops since the latter are not his vicarii but are reigning as successors of the apostles by the authority of divine right. With the help of the Holy Spirit only the Church and the General Council as representation of the Corpus ecclesiasticum are infallible. The Pope is the centrum unitatis only insofar as the representation of a federalist system permits. As is evident by the title Febronius borrowed from Pufendorf, the Analogia Ecclesiae cum Imperio was the godfather of his doctrine of the status mixtus of the Church constitution. Febronius also considers a reduction of papal rights and supervision of all undertakings of the Roman Curia necessary in the interest of the state. In spite of a basic recognition of independence, coexistence, and submission to a common final goal his ideas of the relationship between Church and state amount to a superiority of the state. It passes into Josephinism by virtue of concessions to the temporal princes—according to divine right they are the born defenders of the Church—and in view of the doctrine of the Jus circa sacra (jus advocatiae, jus cavendi). The corresponding theory of a Jus circa civilia is characteristically lacking.

In spite of the fact that his work was a compilation and contained innate contradictions, Febronius exercised a very strong influence on the ecclesiastical and intellectual history of the eighteenth and early nineteenth century. Beginning in 1774, under the influence of undercurrents of Enlightenment and Jansenism, Febronianism was either increasingly opposed by elements of an established Church, or accepted in a radicalized form, but it was also rejected by many moderate episcopalists, such as Abbot Martin II Gerbert.

An intense battle involving countless attacks and counterattacks by such as the brothers Ballerini, Johann Gottfried Kauffmann, Tomaso Maria Mamachi, Ladislaus Sappel, and Francesco Antonio Zaccaria was waged against Febronius. It took place on the literary and scholarly level, but beginning around 1770 it was also conducted for and against a revocation by the aged author. Not until April 1764 did the elective nuncio Niccolò Oddi with the help of the Frankfurt canon Damian Friedrich Dumeiz manage to identify Suffragan Bishop Hontheim as the author.[39] Prior to that several others had been suspected of the author-

---

[39] The question whether Neller coauthored or contributed to the Febronius, posed by the famous Salzburg episcopal Gregorius Zallwein as early as 1763, has not been clarified in detail but can generally be answered in the affirmative. Father Ferdinand Söhr, confessor of Clemens Wenzeslaus of Saxony, elector of Trier, affirmed on 27 ship, among them Barthel, Neller,[40] the enlightened Mainz lawyer Johann Baptist Horix, the future suffragan bishop Ludwig Philipp Behlen, and the canonist Benedikt Oberhauser from Fulda.[41] Hontheim's persistent denial of his authorship was facilitated by the compiled nature of the work of Febronius, the fact that his collaborator Neller was also suspected, and the benevolent attitude of the imperial court and a considerable segment of the episcopate. This denial cannot be explained sufficiently by weakness of character, being of two minds, or Jansenist insincerity. Finally, in 1778 a heavy-hearted Hontheim, upon the urging of his elector-archbishop Clemens Wenzeslaus and the "Counsel of Conscience" of the Alsatian Franz Heinrich Beck, agreed to a formal revocation.[42] On the advice of his friends and under the pressure of the discussions provoked by his revocation, and especially

---

October 1768 in a letter to the secretary of the cologne nuncio Caprara "che il maledetto Febronio è veramenta opere del Neller, e che il Suffraganeo non ha fatto altro che mettere la materia in buon stile, e ha di più avute l'imprudenza di mandare il manuscritto come suo allo stampatore." Other affirmations were similar.—A comparison between Neller's Principia, some of his older dissertations, and Febronius leaves no doubt that entire passages of the latter are Neller's ideas, so that he can be called a collaborator even if he did disavow Febronius under pressure by his opponents and even offered to disprove it. On this see H. Raab, Neller und Febronius, 200f.

[40] W. A. Mühl, Die Aufklärung an der Universität Fulda mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der philosophischen und juristischen Fakultät (1734–1805) (Fulda 1961), 46–49.

[41] H. Raab, "Damian Friedrich Dumeiz und Kardinal Oddi. Zur Entdeckung des Febronius und zur Aufklärung im Erzstift Mainz und in der Reichsstadt Frankfurt," AMrhKG 10 (1958), 217–40; A. Bach, Goethes Dechant Dumeiz, Ein rheinischer Prälat der Aufklärungszeit (Heidelberg 1964); corrected and supplemented by H. Raab, "Zur Geschichte der Aufklärung im Rhein-Main-Gebiet," HJ 88 (1968), 423–33, 442–43.

[42] L. Just, Widerruf des Febronius; concerning early attempts to clear up the Febronius affair, see H. Raab, Franz Eustach von Hornstein, 124–29 (plans of Giacomelli, Maillot de la Treille, and Suffragan Bishop Scheben).—The group of Hontheim's opponents ranged from the Worms suffragan bishop and book commissioner Franz Xaver Anton v. Scheben (see H. Raab, "Apostolische Bücherkommissare in Frankfurt am Main," HJ 87 [1967], 345–51), the Alsatian Beck, Suffragan Bishop Jean Marie Cuchot d'Herbain, appointed coadjutor to the encumbered Hontheim, the chancellor of the episcopal University of Strasbourg, François Philippe Louis, the Mannheim court librarian Maillot de la Treille, to Jean Pey, whose Traité de l'autorité des deux puissances had been called by Prince-Abbot Martin Gerbert of Sankt Blasien an iron wall against the flood of Febronian ideas, and the nuncios Carlo Bellisoni and Guiseppe Garampi. Noticeable among Hontheim's opponents were the Alsatian theologians. Alsace, measurably affected by neither Jansenism nor Gallicanism, began to prepare a restoration of the Church as early as the eighteenth century.—The Febronius affair was actually reignited in connection with Johann Lorenz Isenbiehl's attempt concerning the prophesy of Emmanuel. Hontheim's expert opinion about Isenbiehl provoked the demand for his recantation. See also F. R. Reichert, "Johann Gertz (1744–1824)," AMrhKG, 16 (1966), 96f.; P. Fuchs, "Der Pfalzbesuch des Kölner Nuntius Bellisomi von 1778 und die Affäre Seelmann in der Korrespondenz des Kurplfälzischen Gesandten in Rom," AMrhKG 20 (1968), 170f.

the press campaign involving the voluntary nature and sincerity of his utterances, Hontheim substantially attenuated his retraction by his Commentarius in suam retractationem,[43] (based on the Gallican theses of 1682) and by his correspondence. His ambiguous and somewhat insincere conduct, whose motives have not been clarified yet, but even more so the clumsy steps taken by the Roman Curia abetted the efforts to make him into a martyr for the freedom of the German Church against "ultramontane" positions, intrigues by the Curia, and ecclesiastical obscurantism. The assumption that Hontheim "revoked his revocation prior to his death (2 September 1790)" was countered even by his contemporaries by means of his correspondence with Prince-Abbot Martin Gerbert of Sankt Blasien and the testimony of the Luxemburg ex-Jesuit Jardin, who called attention to Hontheim's "true Catholic and apostolic-Roman' faith."[44] Yet the history of his revocation remains obscure on many points and requires additional clarification and complement.

Although the traditional constitutional doctrine was defended skillfully by Joseph Kleiner, Johann Mathias Carrich, Hartzheim, Eusebius Amort, Kauffmann, and others, the progression of the "Catholic revolution of ideas"[45] led to an ever-growing spread of episcopalism-Febronianism at the German universities and prince-episcopal sees. Even in 1758 Johann Baptist Horix in Mainz had called attention to the acceptance of the Basel Decrees of 1439. The interest he aroused gave a new impetus to the opposition of the Church against Rome. In 1763 the document of acceptation appeared in print for the first time and immediately became the charter of German episcopalism. The future suffragan bishops Behlen and Würdtwein supported the Mainz policies with their historical and canonical writings. In Salzburg the famous canonist Gregorius Zallwein[46] advocated a quasimonarchical church constitution; he called for the liberties of the Church of the Empire, which he called preferable by far to the Libertés de l'Église Gallicane, and the special privileges of the Salzburg archbishop. The legal proceedings between the disputatious dean August von Limburg-Styrum and his cathedral chapter of Speyer (1763–64) threatened to escalate into a frontal attack of German episcopalism on the appellations, the nunciatures, and all interferences into episcopal jurisdiction, especially after the Palatinate and the archbishop of Mainz joined the action. Yet the Palatine monition during the negotiations for the electoral capitulation of Joseph II failed, as did the Trier petition of 1742 requesting limitation of the jurisdiction of the nunciatures. Febronian positions and those of the established Church merged in a work by Joseph Anton Felix Balthasar, De Helvetiorum juribus circa sacra, which had grown from a decimation conflict of the Republic of Lucerne with the Curia. The book was fought by the bishop of Constance and put on the Index by Rome on 1 February 1769. It nonetheless formed the basis for "the entire system of the modern-day established Church of Lucerne, starting with the monastic reform at the end of the eighteenth century to the articles of the Baden Conference," indeed, all the way to the battle against the Vatican decrees of 1870/72.[47]

---

[43] Justini Febroni ICti commentarius in suam retractionem Pio VI Pont. Max. Kalend. Novemb. a. 1778 submissam (Frankfurt a. M., Eßlinger 1781).

[44] In connection with the Isenbiehl affair Hontheim explained to his elector-archbishop Clemens Wenzeslaus of Trier (9 April 1778) that he was "prepared to give my blood and life for the Roman Catholic Church . . . yet I make a great distinction between the Roman Church and the exaggerated demands of the Roman court, which have caused many bad things, have impugned the holy religion in the eyes of our enemies, and are making it impossible to bring about this much-desired union, hoped for also in the imperial constitution."

[45] L. T. Spittler (Sämtl. Werke VIII [1835], 473) dates the beginnings of the "Catholic revolution of ideas" with the publication of Febronius's book and the Mainz acceptation of the dual election of Liège of 1763.

[46] His major work: Principia juris ecclesiastici universalis et particularis Germaniae, 4 vols. (Augsburg 1763); H. Raab, Concordata, 117f.; M. Spindler, Electoralis Academiae Scientiarum Boicae Primordia (Munich 1959); passim.

The Coblenz Gravamina of 1769

Among the high points of episcopal aspirations in the Church of the Empire was the compilation of the Coblenz gravamina. It came about under the influence of publications concerning the concordats, the canonical works of the episcopalists of Würzburg, Trier, Mainz, and Cologne, and the influence of the enlightened ministers of state in the ecclesiastical electorates. On the one hand, these gravamina were the result of enlightened-absolutist concepts[48] which were making an advance at the ecclesiastical courts in the years of peace after Hubertusburg. These concepts were aimed at reordering the relationship between Church and state primarily for political and economic reasons. On the other hand, these gravamina represented a reaction on the part of episcopalism within the Empire to the constant disputes with the nunciatures and the papal refusal for the retention of the prince-bishoprics of Regensburg and Freising by Clemens Wenzeslaus of Saxony, who had been elected elector-archbishop in Trier and had succeeded the deceased prince-bishop Joseph von Hessen-Darmstadt as coadjutor in Augsburg. In this connection the Apostolic See had claimed the right to fill the two vacant Bavarian bishoprics, ignoring their right to an election as guaranteed by canon, concordat, and the law of the Empire.[49] When Clement XIII, under pressure of the Church of the Empire, finally granted an election to the two cathedral chapters, it was interpreted as an attack on the freedom of the German Church.[50] In March 1769 it was countered by the electorate of Mainz with a request to all ecclesiastical princes for a confidential exchange of ideas directed against the ultramontane claims of rulership. In Mainz, during the disputes of the Speyer cathedral dean Damian August Philipp von Limburg-Styrum with his chapter and because of the exemption of the new bishopric of Fulda, the position, by tradition scarcely friendly to Rome and definitely hostile to the nunciature, had hardened. The reformative, moderately enlightened elector-archbishop Emmerich Joseph von Breidbach-Bürresheim,[51] embroiled in a violent fight with Rome over the annates, taxes, and confirmation fees for Worms and Mainz, on the advice of his minister Groschlag and his official and later suffragan bishop Ludwig Philipp Behlen,[52] strove to unite the ecclesiastical princes in a concerted action against Roman presumptions and to become the "Patriarca in Germania."[53]

---

[47] The appraisal of J. Schwendimann quoted in B. Laube, Joseph Anton Balthasar (Basel 1956), 87. Also U. Im Hof, Isaak Iselin (Bern 1967), 191f.

[48] In this connection the written justification of the Mainz minister of state Groschlag for Pergen in the spring of 1769 is revealing (K. J. Krüger, Groschlag, 128); H. W. Jung (Anselm Franz von Bentzel, 15) states the view that in electoral Mainz "claims of the absolutist state were raised under the mantle of suggestions for ecclesiopolitical reforms." The economic aspect is stressed in the little-noticed article by H. Illich, "Maßnahmen der Mainzer Erzbischöfe gegen kirchlichen Gütererwerb 1462–1792. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Aufklärungszeit," Mainzer Zeitschrift 34 (1939), 53–82; E. Hegel (Febronianismus, 156) stresses the "deep religious worry of the German archbishops" in this undertaking; Emmerich Joseph, regardless of the other motives he may have had, stated his conviction that it was his duty to restore episcopal authority vis-à-vis the incursions of Rome to the state to which it was entitled according to the will of the donor of the Church.

---

[49] H. Raab, Clemens Wenzeslaus von Sachsen, 286ff.—In Mainz J. Baptist v. Horix, who must be regarded as a protégé of the enlightened minister of state Friedrich v. Stadion, characteristically was asked to investigate the Regensburg-Freising problem. Horix, "Betrachtungen, welche zur Erörterung der Frage dienen, ob den Domkapiteln in Teutschland das Recht zustehe, in die Stelle des zu einen sonstigen Bisthum gewählten oder postulierten Bischofs einen anderen zu wählen (1769)," Concordata Nationis Germanicae integra III, 83–109.—In 1769 the Regensburg cathedral chapter elected Anton Ignaz Fugger as bishop, who in turn appointed Clemens Wenzeslaus coadjutor for the prince-priory of Ellwangen. On Fugger see E. E. Meissner, Fürstbischof Anton Ignaz Fugger (1711–87) (Tübingen 1969).

[50] In this connection see also the imperial rescript to the cathedral chapter of Regensburg, Vienna, 30 September 1768. The Emperor as "highest guardian and protector of the German Churches" rejects the Roman claim "to reserve unto the Papal See for its own appointment and disposition without canonical election the bishoprics falling vacant in such cases" (J. B. Horix, Concordata Nationis Germ. III [1773], 110–13).

[51] On 3 July 1763 the Cologne nuncio Lucini reported to Cardinal-Minister Torregiani: "La di lui famiglia è di massime contrarie alla giurisdizione Apostolica in questi parti." On 8 March 1768 the French ambassador Entraiques attested to the archbishop's attitude against the nunciature: "Il ne reconnait en rien la jurisdiction du Nonce, il employe tous les moyens légaux pour prevenir les appels en Cour de Rome."—A biography of Emmerich Joseph has not yet been written. For now see L. A. Veit,

Two other canonical conflicts drove the Cologne elector-archbishop Max Friedrich von Königsegg-Rothenfels to the side of Mainz. Max Friedrich, whose vicar general Johann Philipp von Horn-Goldschmidt and the latter's adviser Franz C. J. von Hillesheim held Febronian views, was enmeshed in an argument with the Cologne nunciature over the visitation of the Augustinian house of Saint Michael at Weidenbach[54] and with the Curia in Rome because of the intended closing of the Benedictine seminary of Überwasser[55] in favor of a university in Münster. In spite of a basic agreement, Cologne and even more so Münster, where Fürstenberg emphasized that he was not a Febronian,[56] were not terribly enthused about the far-reaching plans by Mainz and caused the pertinent suggestions to be attenuated. The Mainz initiative also met with misgivings on the part of the prince-bishops of Hildesheim, Paderborn, and Würzburg-Bamberg. They were worried that a realization of the Febronian program would bring no advantages to the bishops but

---

"Emmerich Joseph v. Breidbach-Bürresheim und die Verminderung der Feiertage," Festschr. für Sebastian Merkle (1922), 348–69; H. Illich, op. cit.; H. Raab, "Die Breidbach-Bürresheim in der Germania-Sacra," Mainzer Almanach (1961), 91–106; idem, Clemens Wenzeslaus, passim.

[52] According to the French ambassador in Mainz, Groschlag was "le premier auteur d'un nouveau sisteme ecclésiastique" (Entraiques to Choiseul, Mainz, 12 Dec. 1768).—On Behlen see H. Raab, "Der Mainzer Weihbischof Ludwig Philipp Behlen (1714–77)," Mainzer Almanach (1968), 59–79.

[53] This was the appraisal of the nuncio Caprara in his final relation about the aims of the Mainz archbishops, held "da tempo immemorabile." On 18 February 1770, Caprara reported about Emmerich Joseph that the latter "acknowledges totally the system of Febronius. Foremost he is intent upon his own rights as German primate. But he does not enjoy the full trust of his ecclesiastical brothers." (A. Schnütgen, Ein Kölner Nuntius, 751); see also H. Becher, Der deutsche Primas (Colmar, n. d. [1944]).

[54] C. Löffler, "Das Fraterhaus Weidenbach in Köln," AHVNrh 102 (1918), 174ff.; E. Hegel, Febronianismus, 147–286; A. Schnütgen, Kölner Nuntiatur, 207–41; H. Hinsen, Kaspar Anton von Belderbusch und der Einbruch der Aufklärung in Kurköln (diss., Bonn 1952), 140ff.

[55] R. Schulze, Das adelige Frauen-(Kanonissen-)Stift der hl. Maria (1043/1773) und die Pfarre Liebfrauen-Überwasser zu Münster/Westfalen. Ihre Verhältnisse und Schicksale (Münster 1952).

[56] In this connection we refer to Fürstenberg's statement in a letter to Friedrich Heinrich Jacobi of 20 June 1779: "We have never been Febronians or anti-Febronians. We are, briefly stated, orthodox without any distinction as to party." (A. Hanschmidt, Fürstenberg, 199).

would merely expand the metropolitan rights and, in the end, exchange dependence on Rome for an increased dependence on the German archbishops. The initiative for a union and concerted action by the ecclesiastical princes, initially the Rhenish electors, was clearly started in Mainz. It raised the threat of a national council, an assembly of the Catholic princes and dignitaries of the Imperial Diet after the model of 1523, and a new concordat. For the extreme case it toyed with the idea "that perhaps even a separation of the harmony and concurrence between Church and state might have to ensue and the rights granted to the sovereigns immediately by the grace of God prevail."[57]

On 27 January 1769, after toilsome negotiations an eight-point preliminary convention[58] between Mainz and Cologne was signed, obligating the two parties to list the "old original" episcopal rights, not to withdraw unilaterally from the concerted action, and to induce the Emperor and the elector-archbishop of Trier to join them. To be sure, considerable efforts and the diplomatic skill of the Mainz minister C. W. von Groschlag were initially required to obtain the support of Suffragan Bishop Hontheim for the plans of Mainz and, towards the end of 1769, with his help to overcome the reservations of Elector-Archbishop Clemens Wenzeslaus, which had been caused by political considerations and his innate caution. Clemens Wenzeslaus appears to have borne a grudge against the Mainz group around Emmerich Joseph, who had opposed him at the election of Trier by nominating the brother of Elector Ernst von Breidbach-Bürresheim and had thwarted his designs on the bishopric of Worms. But above all it had been his persistent designs on the foremost electoral bishopric of the Empire and for the establishment of a Wettin episcopal realm extending from Trier via Liège, Cologne, and Münster to Paderborn and Hildesheim which prompted him to use extreme caution towards Rome, the Cologne nunciature, and the Imperial court. Neither in Rome nor in Vienna did he want to see the Wettin church policy damaged by Febronian-metropolitan actions.[59]

A firm union of the three ecclesiastical princes had not yet been effected and the misgivings of the suffragans of Cologne and Mainz[60] concerning the archiepiscopal enterprise not yet overcome when the Mainz lawyer Deel, the Cologne ecclesiastical councilor Hillesheim,[61] and the sixty-eight-year-old Trier suffragan bishop Hontheim met in conference to put the finishing touches on the complaints against Rome and to agree on the manner of asking the Emperor, the defensor ecclesiae, to support their plan. In the opinion of Mainz the aid of the Emperor and a firm union of the three ecclesiastical electors were indispensable conditions for the realization of their Febronian ideas.

---

[57] From Bentzel's memorandum of 30 Oct. 1788 (H. W. Jung, Anselm Franz von Bentzel, 15).

[58] Preliminary convention reprinted in M. Höhler, Arnoldis Tagebuch, 317–20.

[59] H. Raab, Clemens Wenzeslaus, 307ff.

[60] Nuncio Caprara reported to the cardinal-minister on 18 February 1770 that "they (the suffragan bishops of Mainz) see no chance to obtain the advantages promised by the Febronian system. In case of its implementation they fear that they will remain in the same state of dependence, free of the Roman yoke, but encumbered by a new Mainz yoke" (A. Schnütgen, Ein Kölner Nuntius, 751).

Within a short time, on 13 December 1769, Deel, Hillesheim, and Hontheim, who had already been agreed on the most important issues as a result of lengthy preliminary negotiations, concurred in thirty-one gravamina and the text of a letter which was to submit the complaints to the Emperor.[62] Under "Imperial protection" the German Churches were to regain "their hereditary freedom so that they would not be behind the churches of other countries" in order that the German church system could be reordered according to the requirements of a modern state.[63] The frailties of the church constitution and the disregard of the gravamina by Rome were generally considered as "one of the main causes of the weakness and debility of the Catholic lands of the Empire." The Coblenz desiderata invoked the Councils of Constance and Basel, the Mainz Acceptation of 1439, the Concordata Nationis Germanicae, and especially the concordats with Eugene IV (1447). All of the accepted Basel decrees "in favorem atque utilitatem Ecclesiarum Germaniae promanare possunt" would have to be executed. Episcopal authority, "the freedom of the German Church,"[64] was to be restored to its original extent, the reforms executed in a manner corresponding to the demands of the time. The initial gravamina were concerned with the abuses in awarding benefices. Henceforth the archiepiscopal indult to fill the benefices of the papal months was no longer to be limited to five years but extended to life or abolished.[65] The higher nonpontifical dignities at the cathedral and collegiate churches were no longer to be subject to papal reservation but to be bestowed by the ordinary collators. The reservations of the extravagants, execrabilis and ad regimen were to cease and all chancery rules,[66] with the exception of de idiomate, de viginti, de triennali possessione, were to become invalid within the Church of the Empire. The annates and monastic exemptions were to be abolished. The episcopal informatory process was to be followed according to the Tridentine decrees and the "vassal oath" of the bishops, customary since Gregory VII, was to be replaced by its original form. Papal orders and decrees by Roman congregations were not to be published without prior knowledge and concurrence of the ordinaries. The power "to bind and loose" of the bishops in their sees was to be unrestricted. In legal proceedings the successive appeals were to be strictly observed; the nunciatures were to be abolished. The accepted Basel Decrees, acknowledged by the Concordata Nationis Germanicae, were to be the basic laws of the Church of the Empire.

---

[61] Franz Carl Joseph v. Hillesheim, born in Cologne on 11 April 1731, studied in Würzburg under Johann Kaspar Barthel and became rector of the University of Cologne (1760–66). In the preparation of the Coblenz gravamina he played an important yet so far insufficiently determined role. He soon turned away from Febronianism and opposed Isenbiehl. He died in 1803 at his retreat in Niehl near Cologne (see A. Stelzmann, Hillesheim); H. H. Kurth Das kölnische Domkapitel im 18. Jh. (diss., Bonn 1953).

[62] M. Höhler, Arnoldis Tagebuch, 25–30, 253–65; older printings in Le Bret, Magazin VIII (1783), 1–21; Gärtner, Corpus jur. eccl. cath. (Salzburg 1799), II, 330–46; abundant material also in Deutsche Blätter für Protestanten und Katholiken 1 (1839), 38ff.: "Die Koblenzer Artikel vom Jahre 1769 nebst historischen Anmerkungen derselben," Deutsche Blätter für Protestanten und Katholiken 6 (Heidelberg 1840) 1–40; also "Gutachten der churfürstlich-erzbischöflichen Rechtsgelehrten und Staatsmänner über die Rechtmäßigkeit und Ausführbarkeit der Koblenzer Artkel vom Jahre 1769."

[63] M. Höhler, Arnoldis Tagebuch, 253f.

[64] The concept of "Freedom of the German Church"—as is stated in the cover letter under that title by Clemens Wenzeslaus and Max Friedrich to Joseph II—"does not mean an independence which is opposed to the general structure of the hierarchical constitution. The aim of sincere conviction and of the efforts in the here and now is the Attempts to strengthen the union of the Rhenish archbishops by effecting participation by the archbishop of Salzburg, Cardinal-Bishop Franz Konrad Kasimir von Rodt of Constance and Cardinal-Bishop Franz Christoph von Hutten in Speyer failed. In Vienna, where the Coblenz gravamina were not submitted until July 1770, the desired support did not materialize, just as the Mainz ambassador J. G. von Brée had correctly predicted[67]; "to the immense detriment of the Ger-maintenance of the Church and its original and inalienable rights and the justified redress of the well-based complaints of a whole nation" (M. Höhler, Arnoldis Tagebuch, 266; E. Hegel, Febronianismus, 156–57).

---

[65] A special aspect of the desideratum for electoral Trier is stressed by the reference of the viciarate general of Mainz to the great cost of registering the indults with the French parliaments. "It is therefore indicated to ask that it (the indult) be granted the respective archbishop for his lifetime" (E. Reifart, Der Kurstaat Trier und das Staatskirchentum [diss., Freiburg 1950], 84).

[66] L. Jackowski, "Die päpstlichen Kanzleiregeln und ihre Bedeutung für Deutschland," AkathKR 90 (1910), 1–47, 147–235, 432–63.

[67] On 8 October 1769, von Brée on the basis of thirty years of experience had warned against false hopes for the help of the Emperor. The court of Vienna, he said, would espouse the cause of the gravamina of the German Churches only if it would obtain advantages for itself from the Pope (decimation, a Turkish tax, etc.); Vienna, he continued, was very satisfied with Clement XIV, who "does everything he can to please the potentates of Europe" (M. Höhler, Arnoldis Tagebuch, 339–41); see E. Hegel, Febronianismus, 187–88 regarding the negative attitude of the Emperor.

man Church and the German Nation," as Hontheim's friend and biographer Krufft thought. Joseph II let the archiepiscopal initiative come to nothing, not because a "movement away from Rome" would have meant at the same time "a movement away from the Empire,"[68] but—this is evidently the motivation of Vice-Chancellor Colloredo—because a realization of the episcopal reform program would have strengthened those forces which were resisting the territorial established Churches and would have consolidated the position of the ecclesiastical princes in the Empire vis-à-vis the Emperor as well. In order not to endanger his own plans for an established Church, Joseph II did not want to burden himself with the complaints of the German archbishops against Rome. No doubt his delaying tactics, dictated by long-range political goals and the negative attitude of the Mainz ambassador to Vienna, Friedrich Karl von Erthal, towards the action of the Rhenish archbishops contributed to its failure.[69] The reaction in Vienna had the effect of causing Clemens Wenzeslaus to distance himself from the three ecclesiastical electors out of consideration for the Wettin church policies. Suggestions by the Mainz archbishop concerning a second meeting in Coblenz and a congress in Frankfurt for the end of August 1771 or for the dispatch of a common negotiator to Vienna foundered on the conflicts of interest between the Rhenish electoral courts.[70] The large-scale attempt to turn episcopal ideas and concepts into reality came to naught. The enlightened episcopal movement steadily gained ground as a result of the monastic regulations (30 July 1771), the amortization law (6 June 1772), the school and university reforms, and, lastly, the substantial elimination of the cathedral chapter from participation in the government until the death of Emmerich Joseph (1774). During the interregnum and the first few years of the reign of Friedrich Karl von Erthal this prompted a countermovement.

---

[68] E. Hegel, Febronianismus, 157.

[69] In the following two decades Erthal's views changed completely. In 1774 as candidate of the "anti-Emmerich" group, i. e., a rather conservative segment in the cathedral chapter, he was elected elector-archbishop of Mainz and soon continued the policies of his predecessor Emmerich Joseph. At the time of the Congress of Ems and the dispute over the Munich nunciature he and his suffragan bishops Valentin Heimes and Stephan Alexander Würdtwein became the spokesmen of the Church of the Empire opposition against Rome.

[70] The complex reason for the behavior of the Trier elector given by M. Höhler (Arnoldis Tagebuch, 46,) is not convincing. H. Schotte (Emser Kongress, 90) uses the argument of the ecclesiopolitical caution prevailing in Trier at that time. O. Mejer (Zur römisch-deutschen Frage I [1871], 38) emphasizes that temporal and not ecclesiastical considerations had prevailed. E. Reifart (op. cit., 71) blames "temporal political expedience" for Clemens Wenzeslaus's turning away from the League of Rhenish Electors.

The Nunciature Dispute and the Congress of Ems

It was not long before an anti-Roman current regained the upper hand. Stephan Alexander Würdtwein, Franz Anton Dürr, Johann Georg Schör, and Johann Jung[71] broadcast their episcopal views in numerous theses and in most of the journals. Not only the elector-archbishop of Mainz, but also the ecclesiastical electors in Coblenz and Bonn persistently tried to apply Febronian principles in cases of marriage dispensations, disputes concerning benefices, visitations, on the issue of the archiepiscopal "first prayers," and ecclesiastical jurisdiction.[72] The number of conflicts between the Church and Rome increased steadily and some of the south German prince-bishops had to wage hard-fought defensive battles against the Bavarian established church system.[73] The last great conflict of the Church of the Empire with Rome and the movement representing an established Church broke out when the Palatine-Bavarian Elector Karl Theodor tried to bring about an adaptation of the church organization of southern Germany to political borders and the replacement of prince-bishoprics by provincial ones. Eighteen nonresident bishops and archbishops were responsible for the Palatine-Bavarian territories, combined since 1777. Each of them resided outside the borders of these territories and, by means of his own territory, which was subject to the Emperor only, possessed a last independent ecclesiastical and political sphere vis-à-vis the absolutist claims of powerful temporal neighbors.

For a period of about two hundred years, the aspirations for the establishment of Bavarian provincial bishoprics had to some extent been compensated by the Wittelsbach secundogenitures, especially in the old Bavarian bishoprics of Freising and Regensburg. When Cardinal Johann Theodor died in 1763[74] the dynasty was no longer able to present proper candidates for the episcopal see and the rule over the prince-bishoprics and the Church in Bavaria had to be put on a different basis, corresponding more to the enlightened absolutist political concept of the state. An added reason was the fact that the elections were getting very hard to arrange for eligible aristocrats who could be assumed to put up little or no resistance against the Bavarian established Church. This was clearly shown by the example of the related Clemens Wenzeslaus of the Wettin dynasty in Freising, Regensburg (1763, 1768), and Augsburg (1765). To be sure, the plan for a Munich provincial bishopric (1780–83), aimed against the aristocratic liberties of the Church of the Empire, failed. But an alliance of expedience against the common enemy represented by episcopalism, strengthened by personal meetings between Elector Karl Theodor and Pope Pius VI, produced the compromise of establishing a nunciature in Munich (7 June 1784). The new nunciature, consistent neither with the constitution of the Empire nor with tradition, was obviously intended to strengthen papal authority in the Germania Sacra, to meet the Bavarian established Church halfway, and to form a counterweight against Josephinism. The new nuncio Cesare Zoglio,[75] who also was to occupy the see of a provincial archdiocese, was equipped with extraordinary powers. This would enable the forces of the established Church to encompass the far-flung Palatine-Bavarian territories like a pincer and push back the episcopal movement. On the other hand it inevitably challenged the episcopate of the Empire to ward off the "curial pretensions" and the territorial established Church.

---

[71] H. Raab, Concordata, 143ff.; A. P. Brück, Die Mainzer theologische Fakultät im 18. Jh. (Wiesbaden 1961); F. G. Dreyfus, Sociétés et mentalités à Mayence dans la seconde moitié du dix-huitième siècle (Paris 1968), 403–41.

[72] H. Raab, "Die Finalrelation des Kölner Nuntius Carlo Bellisomi (1785–86), RQ 51 (1956), 70–124.

[73] G. Pfeilschifter, Salzburger Kongreß; K. O. v. Aretin, Heiliges Römisches Reich I, 379.

[74] H. Raab, Clemens Wenzeslaus, 130–33, 135–49, 160–66, 216–22; Reinhardt, Hochstift Konstanz, 103–6, 127–30f.

The battle of the nunciatures, smouldering for a long time with varying intensity, broke into the open even before the new nuncio arrived in Munich when the immediately affected metropolitans of Salzburg and Mainz and the Freising prince-bishop Ludwig Joseph von Welden[76] raised formal complaints. The major participant in the second phase was Elector-Archbishop Max Franz of Cologne, the brother of Joseph II,[77] whose request for the installation of Judices in partibus had been rejected by Rome. He now found his episcopal rights transgressed not only by the Cologne nunciature, but in addition by the Munich nunciature, responsible for the Palatine-Bavarian territories of his see. But the main defense by the Church of the Empire had to be directed against the territorial established Church. If Karl Theodor were emulated by others, "the day would come when the prince-bishops and their dioceses would be limited to their territories and lose the reason for their existence."[78] In their fight against the two fronts of Rome and the established Church, conducted against the background of the growing threat of secularization, the German archbishops, while basically encouraged by Emperor Joseph II, were only insufficiently supported by him. The change in the endangered Nunziatura ad tractum Rheni by the transfer of the moderate titular Archbishop Carlo Bellisomi to Lisbon and the subsequent appointment of the merely twenty-eight-year-old Bartolomeo Pacca,[79] who was unfamiliar with the German situation, increased the tensions.

---

[75] B. Zittel, Vertretung des Heiligen Stuhls in München, 419f.

[76] Information on Welden in J. Angermeier, Das Bistum Freising im Nuntiaturstreit (1921); see also H. Raab, Clemens Wenzeslaus (Index).

[77] G. J. Jansen, Kurfürst-Erzbischof Max Franz von Köln und die episkopalistischen Bestrebungen seiner Zeit; M. Braubach, Maria Theresias jüngster Sohn Max Franz.

[78] K. O. v. Aretin, Heiliges Römisches Reich I, 385.

At a conference of the representatives of the four German archbishops in Bad Ems (July–August 1786), convened after lengthy preliminary negotiations and characterized by considerable differences of opinions, a twenty-two-point reform program for the Church of the Empire was formulated which constituted a declaration of war against the nunciatures.[80] The Ems Punctation (25 August 1786) took up where the gravamina of 1673 of the Rhenish archbishops, the Coblenz desiderata of 1769, Febronius and the Massime moguntine, going beyond Febronius, left off.[81] The independence of the episcopal from the Roman authority was most strenuously emphasized in Ems.[82] Additional demands included: the cancellation of the exemptions and the quinquennial faculties, the complete abolition of the nunciatures, but at least of their competing jurisdiction,[83] the right of the bishops to dispose of charitable contributions,[84] the episcopal placet for Roman bulls and briefs, and the conduct of ecclesiastical legal proceedings by native judges. The prereformational demand to reduce the annates and pallia was renewed. No longer was the Vienna Concordat (1448), but rather the Mainz Acceptation (1439) and the Concordata Principum (1447) to be the basis for the constitution of the Church of the Empire. Lastly, the Emperor was asked to restore the archiepiscopal rights and "to bring about the council at least on a national level which had been promised [in the German concordats] by His most high intercession to take place within two years at the most for the purpose of definitively removing all of these complaints" and in the case of insurmountable obstacles to effect redress by constitutional means.[85]

---

[79] LThK VII (1962), 1329.

[80] Text in M. Höhler, Arnoldis Tagebuch, 171–83. The significance of the concurrent synod of Pistoia for the Church of the Empire is pointed out in F. G. Dreyfus, op. cit., 435; comparisons are contained in A. Wandruszka, "Ems und Pistoia: Spiegel der Geschichte," Festgabe für M. Braubach (Münster 1964), 627–34.—The most striking figure among the archbishops' delegation was the Mainz suffragan bishop Valentin Heimes. His rigidity and radical program repeatedly jeopardized the whole congress. For Heimes, see H. Raab, Jb. für das Bistum Mainz 7 (Mainz 1955/57), 172–89; A. Bach, RhVjBl 27 (1962), 97–116; idem. Germ.-Histor. Studien (Bonn 1964), 475–92; idem, Aus Geothes rheinischem Lebensraum (Neuss 1968), 329–49. The representative of Salzburg, Johann Michael Bönike, stayed in the background completely. The delegate of the electorate of Trier was the skillful vicar general Beck. He was supported by the ecclesiastical councilor Arnoldi, whose diary is one of the most important sources for the course of the conference. Electoral Cologne was represented by the administrator of the vicariate Tautphäus, a moderate, and the lector of the elector, Karl Joseph v. Wreden, who was the actual representative of Cologne although he was not officially active at the conference (H. Raab, "Briefe von K. J. v. Wreden an Stephan Alexander Würdtwein [1785–1787]," AHVNrh, 153–54, 170–200).

[81] Regarding the intentions of Mainz the French ambassador O'Kelli reported: "L'électeur de Mayence en proposant le congrès d'Ems avait le projet de séparer l'Église germanique du Saint-Siège et d'établir un concile national permanent qu'il aurait dirigé plus particulièrement que la Diète" (F. G. Dreyfus, op. cit., 435).

[82] "Christus . . . hat den Aposteln und ihren Nachfolgern, den Bischöfen, eine unbeschränkte Gewalt zu binden und zu lösen für alle jene Fälle gegeben, wo es die Notwendig- oder Nutzbarkeit ihrer Kirchen oder der zu denselben angehörigen Gläubigen immer befördern mag" (ART. I) (M. Höhler, op. cit., 172).

The difficulties militating against the Ems program, in spite of the positive consent of a part of the educated public, and the weakness of the archiepiscopal position in its fight against the alliance of expedience between Rome and Munich were soon evident. Emperor Joseph II had indeed declared inadmissible "the exercise of jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters" by the nunciatures[86] and had also annulled an encyclical by Pacca. Yet he could not make up his mind about the far-reaching political plans for his Church which his brother Leopold had advised. These called for "throwing off the selfish and despotic yoke of the Roman court in Germany forever by encouraging and supporting with all one's might the German bishops, by abolishing the nunciatures in Germany forever, and convincing the bishops and ecclesiastical princes to convene and to form a national council."[87] The distrust and, finally, the resistance of the suffragan bishops against an expansion of the metropolitan authority and the power of the ecclesiastical electors assumed the character of an anti-Ems movement, especially when Prince-Bishop August von Limburg-Styrum of Speyer began to exert his efforts and when an assembly in Waghäusel or Bruchsal was suggested. The union of the four archbishops dissolved rather quickly. The Mainz electorate was pried from the ranks of the opponents of the nunciatures through Prussia, with which it was joined in the Alliance of Princes and in connection with the election of Karl Theodor von Dalberg to the position of coadjutor of Elector-Archbishop Friedrich Karl. In view of its desire for a special ecclesiastical position for its northwest German possessions, Prussia was not interested in strengthening the metropolitans' power.[88] Consequently, it recognized the jurisdiction of the Cologne nunciature. Theological, canonical, and personal doubts, but especially considerations of his second bishopric of Augsburg (which extended onto Bavarian territory), as well as growing difficulties in the French parts of his archbishopric of Trier induced Clemens Wenzeslaus to disavow the Ems program. The early death of Joseph II prevented a hearing of the nunciature dispute in the Imperial Diet. Max Franz of Cologne almost single-handedly continued the fight against the nunciatures and the established Church. The only concrete result of all the efforts was the inclusion in ARTICLE XIV of the Imperial Electoral Capitulation of 1790 of a stipulation aimed at abolishing the jurisdiction of the nunciatures in ecclesiastical courts.[89] The Ems Punctation thus remained "the mere declaration of a feud against Rome, not followed by the feud itself" (Werminghoff). Under the threat of the impending French Revolution, the events in the Netherlands and their impact in western Germany the archbishops' opposition to Rome and the modern established Church collapsed. But far into the nineteenth century, when the established Church had long turned against its erstwhile ally, the papal central authority, and when the Church prepared to fight the late absolutist state for a modicum of freedom, the ideas of Ems stayed alive, to be called up again by many a government in their conflicts with Rome, even though they misunderstood the historical connections.

---

[83] ". . . ebenso hören d) die Nuntiziaturen in Zukunft völlig auf. Die Nuntien können nichts anders als päpstliche Gesandte sein und dörfen . . . keine actus jurisdictionis voluntariae oder contentiosae mehr ausüben" (ART. IV) (M. Höhler, op. cit., 174).

[84] ART. III (M. Höhler, op. cit., 174).

[85] ART. XXII (M. Höhler, op. cit., 183); G. J. Jansen, op. cit., 68: Cologne and Trier prevailed over the objection of Mainz regarding the two-year deadline.

[86] Rescript of Joseph II, dated 12 Oct. 1785 (M. Höhler, op. cit., 277).

[87] Leopold to Joseph, 5 Dec. 1786 (A. v. Arneth, Joseph II. und Leopold von Toscana. Ihr Briefwechsel II [1869], 48f.).

---

[88] According to Dreyfus: "Les princes protestants, à leur tête le roi de Prusse, défendaient le Saint-Père, car ils craignaient que tout ce que le Saint-Siège perdrait en Allemagne ne fut gagné par l'Empereur" (F. G. Dreyfus, op. cit., 435).

[89] F. W. Becker, Die Kaiserwahl Leopolds II. 1790. Eine Untersuchung zur Geschichte des alten Reiches und der Nachwirkungen des Fürstenbundes (diss., Bonn 1943).

CHAPTER 24

The Established Church and the Enlightenment in the Temporal Territories of the Empire—Theresianism and Josephinism

The eighteenth-century upheaval regarding the respective rights within the system of the established Church is inadequately described as a usurpation of the ecclesiastical realm or as an absolutist abuse by the ruling princes with the goal of making the state omnipotent. Neither is it sufficiently characterized as an outgrowth of enlightened absolutism, dominated by the concept of the "welfare state." As the reductions in the number of monastic establishments and the case of Josephinist charity demonstrate, the induced participation of the Church in the service of the enlightened welfare state had a special importance for the realization of the rationalistic postulate of "the greatest possible happiness of all." But this also involved the fulfillment of partly neglected yet genuine demands of Christian morality, the state as the guardian of public morality, and the creation of a Church, reformed in the Jansenist-enlightened sense, eliminating baroque abuses in the interest of a better order in this world and salvation in the hereafter.

In the Empire the problem of "state versus Church" emerged to a lesser extent as one between the Pope as the supreme head of the totality of the Church and the Emperor as the protector of the Church of the Empire. Instead it was a dispute between the larger territories rising to the status of modern states on one side and the bishops, nunciatures, and the Roman Curia on the other. As a consequence of ecclesiastical and temporal rule being combined in one person, the fact that in these cases there could be no integration into a modern state, and, lastly, because of a lack in self-reform, the ecclesiastical principalities experienced the problem more as an "internal affair," as an episcopal opposition[1] to the nunciatures and the Roman Curia or as moderate administrative enlightenment on the well-known battlefields of monastic reform, reduction on the religious feast days, amortization laws, matrimonial legislation, and the field of education.[2]

In the Catholic temporal territories the relationship between Church and state in the matter of their respective rights hardly differed from that of the Protestant states. The necessity for reforms in many areas was widely recognized here too. The realization that if the nascent enlightened welfare state wanted to fulfill its comprehensive tasks it needed an enlarged material basis and therefore had to break with the traditional preferences and privileges of the Church was not limited to enlightened enemies of the Church. The amalgamation of the ecclesiastical and the temporal had reached a highpoint in the late seventeenth century. The rise to absolutist principalities had taken place thanks to extensive support to the Church inspired by the Counter Reformation. But even in the period of the Enlightenment, especially in the years of economic distress and reconstruction following the Austrian War of Succession and the Seven Years' War, the Church with its possessions and revenues continued to represent a potential reservoir of state power. By way of ecclesiastical secundogenitures it offered the Catholic dynasties a possibility of providing for their sons, of increasing their prestige and power, and promoting their foreign and domestic policies. By means of cathedral chapters and religious establishments it secured for the feudal aristocracy and the knights of the Empire a sphere of freedom against the absolutist principalities. To the chagrin of the enlightened and the reform-minded, the territory, the rise to statehood, the jurisdictions, finances, and the economy everywhere were permeated by the Church. This made it advisable for the Catholic princes who at the time of the Enlightenment were still considering themselves as protectors of both tables of law to find better ways to control the Church, both in the interest of the state and for the sake of needed reforms in the Church. The respective limits were to be redetermined based on rational law and a deepened understanding of each other's nature and tasks.

---

[1] See above, pp. 443ff.

[2] Among the abundant literature concerning these problems, see L. A. Veit, "Emmerich Joseph von Breidbach-Bürresheim und die Verminderung der Feiertage," Festschr. für Sebastian Merkle (1922), 348–69; H. Illich, "Maßnahmen der Mainzer Erzbischöfe gegen kirchlichen Gütererwerb 1462–1792. Ein Beitrag zur Gesch. der Aufklärungszeit," Mainzer Zschr. 34 (1939), 53–82; H. W. Jung, Anselm Franz von Bentzel im Dienst der Kurfürsten von Mainz (Wiesbaden 1966); J. Mack, Die Reform- und Aufklärungsbestrebungen im Erzstift Salzburg unter Hieronymus von Colloredo (Munich 1912); M. Schmidt, Die Aufklärung im Fürstbistum Passau (Munich 1933); M. Braubach, Maria Theresias jüngster Sohn Max Franz, letzter Kurfürst von Köln und Bischof von Münster; K. J. Krüger, Carl Willibald Frh. von Groschlag (diss., Munich 1967, Cologne 1970); R. Reinhardt, Die Beziehungen von Hochstift und Diözese Konstanz zu Habsburg-Österreich in der Neuzeit. Zugleich ein Beitrag zur archivalischen Erforschung des Problems "Kirche und Staat" (Wiesbaden 1966).

When the Catholic states began to consolidate and to take on new tasks it was but a small step from protection of the Church (ius advocatiae, sive protectionis) to protectorate or tutelage by means of Enlightenment. In many respects this step could appear to be almost one of self-defense by the princes against exaggerated ideas and oppressive power of the Church.[3] Dispensation from taxes and local immunity were issues well suited to promote the idea of the Church as a state within the state. The assets of the mortmain, the great number of mendicant houses, the many feast days, processionals, and pilgrimages could be represented as weakening the economic and financial strength of the territory, this in turn being responsible for the political weakness of the Catholic states. Furthermore, it could be attacked as being inconsistent with genuine piety.

There is no doubt that the growth of the established Church—especially since the middle of the eighteenth century—and its distinct

---

[3] R. Reinhardt, Verhältnis von Kirche und Staat, 173.

Austrian variety inadequately called Josephinism intended to reduce ecclesiastical power and ultimately achieve state supremacy over the Church. Yet this movement was neither inimical to the Church, nor was it innately synonymous with Enlightenment. Max III Joseph of Bavaria went relatively far in his sympathy with the Enlightenment; Joseph II wanted to assign it no more than a certain precisely limited sphere; and Karl Theodor, who implemented his system of an established Church in league with Rome, fought against Enlightenment in a variety of ways. A good many regulations of the established Church in the second half of the eighteenth century in ecclesiastical as well as temporal states were intended to remove abuses in the Church and to effect a church reform whose aim, dictated by the selfish interests of the state, by Jansenist, episcopal, and reform Catholic currents, was an approximation of the ideal of the Ecclesia primitiva.

Josephinism differs sharply from the old established church movement which reaches back into the late Middle Ages and reassumes a more prominent role as of the sixteenth century. It is "a 'harmonizing' of disparate elements of tension—disharmonious within itself"—and came about "through the mutual permeation of all movements and tendencies at work during the reign of Maria Theresa which did not unreservedly support baroque Catholicism."[4]

Theresianism and Josephinism

